

Stanford University Libraries

36105011707473

STANFORD UNIVERSITY LIBRARY

HARPER'S WEEKLY

Edited by George Harvey

HARPER & BROTHERS NEW YORK

JULY 2 1904

Price 10 Cents

Geo. A. Kessler & Co.

THANK THE PUBLIC FOR THEIR GENEROUS APPRECIATION AND PATRONAGE OF

MOËT & CHANDON

CHAMPAGNE,

And take pleasure in announcing that after June 1st 1904

Every Club, Wine Merchant, Hotel & Restaurant will have the

New Vintage, 1898

WHITE SEAL

ON SALE.

EVERY CORK BRANDED.

Never IN THE HISTORY OF CHAMPAGNE HAS SUCH A SUPERB QUALITY OF WINE BEEN OFFERED.

A Great Revelation AWAITS
EVERY LOVER OF A SPARKLING
WINE. IN THIS LATEST VINTAGE.

Moët & Chandon
WHITE SEAL

MUCH DRYER THAN MOST SO CALLED BRUT CHAMPAGNES.

tion for the Plains, 1963.

"Is a Head Here for Scripts," 10

Don. Montalbano

HARPER'S WEEKLY

VOL. XLVIII

New York, Saturday, July 2, 1904

NO. 196

Copyright, 1904, by Harper & Brothers. All rights reserved.

Photo. not copyright by John P. Long

THEODORE ROOSEVELT

HARPER'S WEEKLY

Vol. XLVIII.

No. 2480

EDITED BY GEORGE HARVEY

THIRTY-SIX PAGES
AND SUPPLEMENT

NEW YORK CITY, JULY 2, 1904

Terms: 10 Cents a Copy—$1.00 a Year, in Advance
Postage free to all Subscribers in the United States, Canada, Mexico, Hawaii, Porto Rico, the Philippine Islands, Guam, and Tonga Islands.

Entered at the New York Post office as second class matter

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS
NEW YORK CITY: FRANKLIN SQUARE
LONDON: 45 ALBEMARLE STREET, W.

COMMENT

THE appalling loss of human life by the burning of the excursion-steamer General Sherman in the East River, under the eyes of thousands of horror-stricken spectators—and the latest estimate of the total number of the burned and drowned souls near a thousand—is not by any means the only portentous feature of the catastrophe. The outbreak of a fire at sea is not an unusual phenomenon; we have been informed by officers of transatlantic steamships that, on an average, such an incident occurs at least once during every voyage. In almost every case, however, the fire is instantly controlled and quickly smothered. There was ample time on board the Sherman for the exhibition of similar competence to avert disaster. According to the testimony of one eye-witness before the Committee, the fire broke out when the steamer was between Fifth and Fifty-fifth streets, or, in other words, more than six miles distant from North Brother Island, where she was beached. According to another witness, the vessel was off Eighty-sixth Street, and according to a third witness off Ninety-second Street, or about four miles from the island just named. It is important to keep these facts, as well as others, in mind if we are to fix responsibility for the awful loss of life incurred. The captain and the pilot may or may not have evinced a grievous lack of judgment in not placing the vessel at right angles with her course, so as to prevent the flames, which started in the forward cabin, from being blown astern; or in not beaching the steamer on the Sunken Meadows, or at some other point much nearer than North Brother Island. It may or may not be true that it would have been imprudent to turn a vessel at right angles in a narrow and rock-fringed channel. It may or may not be true that if the steamer had been beached at any point nearer than North Brother Island the water would have been so deep that only expert swimmers could have reached the shore. As it was, a few strokes sufficed to bring a swimmer near enough to land to permit him to wade ashore.

These questions, though they have an obvious bearing on the possibility that the frightful proportions of the calamity might have been diminished, do not touch the core of the matter. First, how did it happen that the fire was not at once put out; and, secondly, when the fire was seen to be uncontrollable, why were not the life-boats, the life-rafts, and the life-preservers turned to account? These are the questions that must be answered, if we are to have any assurance of immunity from a repetition of the horror. So far as the evidence as yet forthcoming is concerned, it seems to be certain that no life-boats or life-rafts were launched; and the excuse for the failure to launch them is that they were so firmly fastened to the deck that they could not be loosened and got over the side in time to be of any service. Most of the life-preservers were thirteen years old—some are said to have been much older—and their canvas covers were not only mildewed and rotten, but they were filled with powdered cork. Under the circumstances, the life-preservers were worse than useless. How was it possible, in view of the rigorous inspection prescribed by Federal statutes, that the life-saving apparatus of the Sherman should have proved, in the hour of trial, totally unserviceable? That is a question which President Roosevelt, we are glad to record, has determined to have answered, and to that end, he has ordered Secretary Cortelyou, of the Department of Commerce and Labor, to institute a rigorous investigation of the fire-extinguishing and life-preserving equipment of the steamer.

What is too likely to be the outcome of the inquiry may be guessed from the statement made in an interview by Supervising Inspector Usher. He declared that the regulations formulated by Federal laws were adequate, and that the Federal inspectors did everything in their power to enforce them, but that their efforts were thwarted incessantly by politicians. What, he asked, is the use of having wise precautionary laws, if anybody who has a "pull" can set them at naught? An inspector may discover that a steamer has bad boilers, worthless fire-extinguishing apparatus, and rotten life-preservers. All that the inspectors can do is to impose a fine for the glaring violations of law. Then what happens? The violator of the law appeals to a Senator or to a Representative, or to others high in official place or possessed of much influence. Thereupon the fine is reduced to a sum so decried that it fails utterly to act as a deterrent. Supervising Inspector Usher says that he knows of cases where fines were reduced from $500 to $10, from $1000 to $20, and even from $1500 to $25. For the failure strictly to enforce the Federal statutes relating to inspection, and consequently for a large share of the responsibility for the dreadful consequences of the tragedy whereof the Sherman was the theatre, Federal officials must be held to account.

It is pertinent to this point to note that after Secretary Cortelyou took hold of the new Department of Commerce, he had a bill drawn up providing for the reorganization of the Steamship Inspection Bureau. The bill passed the Senate, but failed to pass the House. One objection the Secretary made to the present law was that the inspectors were paid in proportion to the number of boats they inspected, and that the tendency was for them to give their chief attention to getting vessels to submit to inspection, regardless of whether such inspection was properly made. "The vice of this system," said the Secretary, "is obvious. It puts a premium on lax inspection." Mr. Cortelyou also tried to get $100,000 from Congress for the pay of special agents to inspect the inspectors, but he failed. His position with reference to the Sherman disaster is better than that of Congress.

We note elsewhere some of the significant incidents attending or immediately preceding the calling to order of the Republican National Convention at Chicago. We would here direct special attention to the course which had been previously pursued by the Republican National Committee in the matter of nominated delegations. It is, of course, well understood that the decision of a National Committee is only provisional, not decisive. The utmost that this body can do is to recognize temporarily one of two contending delegations, and thus permit it to take part in the temporary organization of a convention. Its decision may be reversed by the Committee on Credentials, or, on appeal from the report of that committee, by the convention itself. Experience has shown, however, that the decision of the National Committee is seldom reversed. Now, there is no doubt that, in the case of three contests, that committee assumed grave responsibilities which it cannot shirk by pleading that it obeyed the peremptory mandate of the President. The fundamental conception of a national convention, and of the National Committee to which for a quadrennial term its representative functions are delegated, is utterly at variance with the notion that either the one body or the other should meet merely for the purpose of registering the bids of the man who is Chief Magistrate for the time being. Yet this is what was done when decisions were rendered with regard to the provisional recognition of delegations from Alabama, Delaware, and Wisconsin.

Not only was the President's hand felt more distinctly than has been the case on any previous occasion; but, in our instance, Mr. Roosevelt failed to fulfil his promise to carry out the policy of his lamented predecessor. No feature of that policy was more characteristic or more exemplary than Mr. McKinley's avowed and persistent wish to conciliate the white citizens of the Southern States, and thus to promote the establishment of a white Republican party in those commonwealths. His kindly and broad-minded overtures were cordially received in many quarters, and especially in Alabama and Louisiana. In both of those States the so-called "Lily-White" Republican organization has shown itself to be much stronger at the ballot-box than the "Black-and-Tan" organization, composed almost exclusively of colored men. Accepting the principle that the organization which, nominally, was the more powerful ought to be recognized officially, the McKinley administration appointed "Lily-White" Republicans to office in Alabama. Many of these, however, including Mr. Bingham, the United States Revenue Collector at Birmingham, have been dismissed from the government service since the Republican State convention, held at Birmingham, evinced much hostility to Mr. Roosevelt, and by only a narrow majority endorsed his candidacy for the Republican nomination for the Presidency. It was in pursuance of this policy that the Republican National Committee decided to admit the "Black-and-Tan" delegation from Alabama to seats in the convention at Chicago, thereby doing their best to alienate the "Lily-White Republicans" in that State. In the case of the Louisiana contest, the Committee on Credentials reversed the decision of the National Committee, giving half representation to the Lily-White organization. In the Delaware contest, the National Committee proceeded on a principle diametrically opposite to that which they adopted in the case of Alabama. With regard to Alabama, the committee were constrained to admit that they entirely disregarded the relative strength of the two Republican factions, and considered only the wishes of the President. So far as Delaware is concerned, on the other hand, they may truthfully state that they admitted the Addicks delegation because the so-called Addicks Republicans have shown repeatedly at the ballot-box that, nominally, they are much stronger than the self-styled "Regular" Republicans.

It is, however, by the exclusion of the La Follette delegation from Wisconsin that the National Committee has ridged the estrangement of a faction representing a majority of the Republican voters in that commonwealth. There is no doubt that the Republican State convention was regularly organized by the followers of Governor La Follette, and that the so-called "Stabwarr" delegation, headed by Senator Spencer and Senator Quarles, was named by leaders. It is true that both conventions put forward the same list of Presidential electors, but a statute of the State forbids the name of any citizen nominated for a Presidential electorship to be inserted more than once on the official ballot. Now, because the National Committee decided to exclude the whole of the La Follette delegation, eleven of the Republicans designated for Presidential electors have signified a determination that their names shall be printed under the emblem of the La Follette faction. They are expected to put forward an electoral ticket of their own, in which event it is almost certain that the Democrats will carry the State.

In the week ending June 18, the Hearst workers failed to capture the six delegates from Indian Territory, but the loss was far more than offset by the gain of fifty-four delegates from Illinois. At this hour, the computations of the total strength on the first ballot thus far secured to Mr. Hearst range from 203 to 225. For the sake of argument, we will take the last-named figure, and add to it the sixteen delegates from Nebraska and the six delegates from Oklahoma who are controlled by Mr. Bryan. That would give Mr. Hearst 247 votes. We will even add the ten delegates of Colorado and the six of Montana, though the California candidate is by no means sure of getting them. That would give the Hearst-Bryan faction 257 delegates in the aggregate. It is hard to see where any further additions can be looked for, and so, therefore, adhere to the opinion that what may be termed the Radical element in the St. Louis convention will fall considerably short of a third of the vote, and, consequently, cannot hope to veto an unspectable nomination. Chief-Justice Parker, on the other hand, in the week ending June 18, had 278 delegates, either instructed or endorsed, and a reasonable prospect of securing more than half of the 287 uninstructed delegates on the first ballot; and the thirty-two of Massachusetts, the six of Delaware, and the twenty-six of Wisconsin on the second ballot. All of the remaining Democratic State conventions will have been held before the close of the week ending July 2. Nobody seems to understand why ex-Mayor John T. Hopkins, who dominated the Illinois convention, and might have had the delegates instructed for himself, chose to have them pledged to vote for Mr. Hearst so long as the latter's name shall be before the national Democratic convention.

Shrewd observers of the situation are inclined to think that the Parker boom has now attained so much momentum that it cannot be side-tracked. Some of them concede, however, that, if the New York candidate does not obtain two-thirds of the votes on the first or second ballot, a "dark horse" may come forward and carry off the prize. We have seen no list of possible "dark horses" that has any pretensions to completeness. We observe, however, that every such list is headed with the name of Grover Cleveland. It may be a fact of some significance that, of late, in Indiana, Illinois, and Wisconsin, which are now bracketed with New York, Connecticut, and New Jersey among the States confessedly doubtful, many influential Democratic newspapers have advocated the nomination of the ex-President, on the ground that his record and his personality would constitute an all-sufficient platform, and offer the only logical solution of the problem which Democrats have to face. The problem is, How shall conservative Democrats, who, we may now take for granted, will be predominant at St. Louis, draw sufficient votes from those Republicans who look with misgiving on Mr. Roosevelt's candidacy to more than offset the votes that will be lost through the disaffection, if not organized secession, of at least a part of the Bryanized wing of the Democracy? We, probably, may take for granted that in all of the doubtful States, with the possible exception of New York—the Southern States with the possible exceptions of Delaware, Maryland, West Virginia, and Kentucky are committed irrevocably to the Democratic nominee, no matter who he is—a majority of the qualified voters are, as present, nominally Republican. It is not, therefore, enough to say of this or that Democratic candidate that he would be sure to pull the full Democratic vote. To be successful, the Democratic nominee must do better than that. He must draw thousands, nay, tens of thousands, of recruits from the Republican camp. That is what Mr. Cleveland did in 1892, and it may be that the triumph can be repeated by Chief-Justice Parker, possessing, as the latter does, Mr. Cleveland's thorough and outspoken confidence.

It is plain enough that whatever disapproval may have been privately expressed by veteran Republican politicians, it will not take the form of overt opposition to Mr. Roosevelt's known desire to place Mr. George H. Cortelyou, Secretary of Commerce and Labor, at the head of the new Republican National Committee. Those who criticize the selection say that Mr. Cortelyou has but a limited acquaintance with the great capitalists and manufacturers, on whom the Republican party has been wont to rely for its campaign funds. To this objection there are two answers: first, that if Mr. Cornelius N. Bliss shall retain the post of treasurer to the committee, as he is expected to do, he will be amply qualified to discharge the functions of superintendent-general and commissary-general. Secondly, it may do Mr. Roosevelt no harm in many States to have it known that he chose for chairman of the National Committee a man almost as much a stranger to financial matters as is Mr. Bryan himself. Unquestionably the designation of Mr. Cortelyou will be accepted in many quarters as conclusive proof of an intention to conduct the campaign with fairness, probity, and dignity. We should add, however, that it is of the utmost moment to Mr. Roosevelt's personal reputation, and to the future serviceableness of our present system of political machinery, that Mr. Cortelyou should resign his seat in the cabinet before beginning to perform the functions of chairman of the National Committee. The two places could not be held simultaneously without provoking a grave scandal. It would be needful to discover some method of nominating and electing a Chief Magistrate, other than the existing system, if it were proved possible for an isting President not only to dominate so utterly a national convention that no opposition dared to show itself, but also to place the whole campaign machinery of a great party, all the principal organs and wheels of which are located in its National Committee, under the thumb of an appointee who has held the closest personal relations to the occupant of the White House, and still keeps a seat in the cabinet. We take for granted that no such blunder will be made by Mr. Roosevelt.

To another objection that has been made to Mr. Cortis's appointment we attach but little importance; the objection, namely, that, as he was at one time a member, though a subordinate member, of Mr. Cleveland's official family, his loyalty to the Republican party is open to some doubt. That Mr. Cortis has been a convinced and a zealous Republican since 1896 is, we believe, undisputed. Whether he voted against General Harrison in 1892 we do not know; but, if he did, he did so more than was done by the veteran Republican politician, Judge Greenham of Indiana. There is reason to believe that a similar course was pursued that year by a great many of Mr. Blaine's friends. How, otherwise, can we explain the fact that in the year named Indiana repudiated one of her own sons in order to give her electoral votes to a New York candidate?

It has been for some weeks evident that, on the face of things, there was no reason why the Republican National Convention, called to meet in Chicago on June 21, should be a long one. The candidate for the Presidency had been long predetermined, and the platform was believed to have been framed in advance in Washington. On that very account, however, it was foreseen by the party managers that it might be expedient not to hurry the proceedings of the convention, but to give them at least the aspect of free discussion; and to allow ample time, not only for speeches to be made by nominators and seconders of Mr. Roosevelt, but also for ostensible deliberation over the choice of a nominee for the Vice-Presidency, and, perhaps, too, over some details of the platform. It was felt by veteran campaigners that it might prove a mistake to let the impression prevail among the voters that the work done at Chicago had all been cut and dried. The Democratic politicians have no occasion to be on their guard against a like contingency. We presume that nobody expects that in less than two or three days a platform can be framed at St. Louis by the Committee on Resolutions, but ratified by the convention; or that two-thirds of the delegates can so quickly agree upon a nominee. There are those who predict that, as the Democratic convention does not meet until July 5, which is a Wednesday, it can scarcely hope to complete its work within the week, and, therefore, may be compelled to adjourn until Monday, July 11.

The longest convention in our political history was the Democratic national convention which met at Charleston, South Carolina, in 1860. At the end of ten days it had accomplished nothing, and adjourned to meet in Baltimore. Even when the majority of the delegates reconvened in the last-named city, they needed four days to nominate Stephen A. Douglas. In 1868, the Democratic national convention met in Tammany Hall, New York, on the 4th of July, which fell on Saturday. It did not begin balloting until the following Tuesday, and it was not until Thursday that the convention was stampeded for Horatio Seymour. In 1892, the Democratic national convention, which nominated Mr. Cleveland for the third time, was in session three days. Neither was it until the third day that Mr. Bryan was nominated by the Democratic national convention which met at Chicago four years later. The Kansas City convention also sat for three days, although, after the platform was carried through the Committee on Resolutions by one vote, Mr. Bryan had everything his own way. It will be surprising if the St. Louis convention should not require more time to arrive at conclusions, as regards both principles and men, than was needed at Kansas City.

On June 19, while delegates to the Republican National Convention were on their way to Chicago, their predestined nominee was visiting Valley Forge and taking part in the celebration of Washington's evacuation of the Revolutionary camp. We are told that, curiously enough, never before has a President of the United States been seen in the place which witnessed a memorable crisis in our Revolutionary struggle, not even Washington himself having been there after he became Chief Magistrate. Possibly Mr. Roosevelt himself might not have gone thither, had he not been the guest of Attorney-General Knox, whose summer home is close by. Whether the address which the President delivered after his service held on Sunday afternoon near the Huntington-Rodolph was premeditated we know not; but it certainly was apt and interesting. He began by diverting the attention of his auditors to the noteworthy coincidence that Pennsylvania should have within its borders the localities which mark the two most memorable conjunctions in our national history, to wit, Gettysburg, which saw the high tide of the Rebellion; and Valley Forge, which witnessed the passing of the danger point of the Revolution. If the men who had taken up arms in 1775 had succeeded in the trying winter of 1777-8, there never might have been a free nation born upon this continent. Had, on the other hand, the men of '61 failed in their Titanic struggle for national unity, the work accomplished by Washington and his associates might almost as well have been left undone. Mr. Roosevelt, of course, would not deny that there have been great deeds wrought at other epochs in our national history, but in our, we imagine, will dispute his assertion that never has there been any deed positively vital to the welfare of the nation, except the two achievements of which he was speaking—the deed of him who founded and the deed of him who saved the Republic. There never have been any Americans whose lives can truthfully be described as indispensable to the commonwealth save those of Washington and Lincoln.

Mr. Roosevelt went on to point out how dire were the exploits commemorated at Gettysburg and Valley Forge—the former a single, tremendous, quickly triumphant effort—the latter a prolonged, persistent, patient, undiscouraged endeavor. He asked, what is unquestionably true, that, hard as it may be to rise to the supreme height of self-sacrifice at a time of brief but soul-testing crisis, it is harder yet to place and keep yourself at the level of a crisis when it takes the form of a need of protracted endurance, inflexible fortitude, and, steadily, unflinching work, maintained month after month and year after year. It was well to remind us of what we no often forget, that at Valley Forge Washington and his Continentals warred not only against foreign soldiers, but against themselves; against appeals which human nature finds the most difficult to resist; against despondency, discontent, the mean envies, jealousies and heartburnings that are sure to arise in large bodies of men when they have been long afflicted by defeat, disaster, and hope deferred; when the soldiers who uphold our national standard were suffering from cold, hardship, and privation, knowing the while that their opponents were well housed, and that things went easier for the invader, the hireling, and the traitor than for the unsundering patriot. If the men of Valley Forge were to re-appear, reborn, victorious on the field of Monmouth, and at last to capture Cornwallis at Yorktown, it was because they had confronted discouragement and misery with dauntless faces; because they had in them the indomitable spirit that made them steadfast and unflinching, not only on an occasional great day, but day after day and year after year, in a consistent lifetime of resolve and endeavor to do their duty. The conviction was expressed by Mr. Roosevelt that, of the lessons taught by the two battlefields named, the American people needed more to learn that of Valley Forge than that of Gettysburg. He had not the slightest doubt, he declared, that our fellow citizens, if the need should come, would be able to evince a heroism equal to that displayed at Gettysburg; but he added that, in his judgment, the vital thing for them to do was unweariedly to cultivate the quality exemplified by Washington and his comrades at Valley Forge—the firmness and the fortitude that are proof against reverses and calamities, the contempt of loss, "the unconquerable will; and courage never to submit or yield; and what is else not to be overcome."

Sir Harry Johnston is inspired by the spectacle of the Herero revolt against German rule in Southwest Africa to lay down certain large general principles concerning the White Man's Place in Africa, in the Nineteenth Century. He sees the threat of an awful war between black and white, in the present tendencies, which are existent no less in the Congo Free State and Uganda, than in the German region west of the Transvaal. There are two alternatives: the white man's Africa, in which the European races will seek to dominate the negroes and negroid races, driving them out as far as possible from all the richer localities, and reducing them to a servile or wholly servile state. The result will be sudden submission, passing into revolt and rebellion, as it has been with the Hereros, and a series of slave wars, such as shook the base of the Roman republic. Or there is the other conception of Africa, as primarily the home and possession of the black races, and in which the whites will perform rather the part of an intellectual caste, than an army of monopolists and slave-owners; where the rights, privileges, and development of the black race will be given ample scope, and the negroes will be treated sympathetically and paternally, as is the best ideal in the Southern States. This is the view which Sir Harry Johnston subscribes to, and he hopes that Europe will make up its mind to demand no larger share, but will agree that the remainder of African territories should be allotted almost entirely to the ownership of the negroes and negroids who now inhabit them, with perhaps some degree of Indian colonization in those waste lands of East Africa which have a climate unsuited to Europeans. Sir H. Johnston thinks that if some idea of the scope of this partition could be brought home to the indigenous races, there would be "less risk of piling up the elements for an awful war between black and white." The ideal of justice between the two races, of mutual advantage, rather than an imaginary equality, which this gifted administrator supports, seems to be the true solution of the race-problem, not only in Africa, but also nearer home.

English opinion is divided over the Tibetan Expedition. The Spectator, which very many people in this country recognize as exceptionally large-minded and sane, looks on it as a conspicuous example of the destiny which pushed Kipland forward, when she would greatly prefer to go back, and very frankly points out the immense and unforeseen difficulties which Colonel Younghusband is compelled to face. It has proved far harder than was anticipated to approach Lhasa, and very large reinforcements are being hurried up the Himalayan passes, to support the diminutive original force. The Tibetans evidently fail totally to distinguish between a commercial mission and an armed invasion; or perhaps their antipathy to both is equally deep-rooted and invincible. But the Spectator points out that when Lhasa is reached, as it will soon be reached, even at the cost of frightful bloodshed, the real difficulties of the undertaking will only have begun. It is desired to make a treaty with the Tibetan government; but the government of Tibet is in the hands of the Buddhist Lamaic hierarchy, and the head of this system is the Dalai-Lama of Lhasa. Therefore the Dalai-Lama is the only representative of Tibetan government whose signature could make a treaty binding on the nation. But suppose the Dalai-Lama not only refuses to sign a treaty under pressure from Colonel Younghusband and the Calcutta government, but anticipates the arrival of the British force by a timely retreat from the Holy City of Buddhism! What will the British Mission do? What can it do? It is obviously impossible for Colonel Younghusband to pursue the Grand Lama over the Roof of the World, from monastery to monastery among mountains four or five miles high. If the Lamaic hierarchy elects to screen its spiritual head, helping him to pass from one monastery to another, the pursuit could be prolonged to the day of doom, or, to speak with local color, until the end of the Manvantara. Tibet is some 450,000 square miles in area, about equal to the whole of Central Europe, and all at a level higher than the summit of Mont Blanc. The possibilities suggested are perplexing in their vagueness and magnitude. The Spectator suggests that the Teshu-Lama, who is likewise a spiritual head of the Tibetans, may be found more friendly and conciliatory, and that a treaty may eventually be arranged with this high spiritual functionary.

The main excuse that Russia has made for the subversion of the guaranteed liberties of Finland, has been that Swedish influence was strong in Finland, and had to be checked. The process of checking it involved the violation of the agreements made when Finland became a Russian dependency. The Finns became subject to Russian military service without restriction; their parliament lost its power, and Russia sent General Bobrikoff to rule the country as governor-general under the new system. General Bobrikoff died on June 17, at Helsinki, shot by a student named Schumann, son of a well-known citizen who had formerly been a Senator, but had retired because he was opposed to Russian domination. The assassin killed himself instantly. Finland is in a bad case, but assassination cannot help her. Russia has her bitten and curbed, and will drive her; ancient pledges to the contrary notwithstanding. Naturally the Finns, though outwardly loyal, are sympathizers with Japan in the present war. It is conceivable that a sufficient degree of Japanese success might so weaken the Czar's government that a revolution could overthrow it, and release from custody by force the Finns, the Poles, and the other Russianized peoples who have been driven against their will into the great Russian pen. This possibility—remote enough—is not affected one way or the other by the murder of a governor-general. The chief effect of the present Russian embarrassments on the situation at Helsinki is likely to be some prudent restraint in avenging Bobrikoff's murder. It is not a convenient time for drastic reprisals even in Finland.

The great event of this year's Commencement at Brown University, was the unveiling of the portrait of Brown's former president, Benjamin Andrews. They call him "Benjy" Andrews, at Brown, and seem to have kept a warm place in their hearts for the man who followed Bryan out into the free-silver wilderness. The portrait, by Chase, was the gift of the class of '90, the first class to enter college after Dr. Andrews became president. Don McKeel, who is spokesman of the givers, and said: "I wish that I could bring every future freshman before this portrait and let him behold a man and say to him, 'If there is any manhood in you, look at him and he will see it. If there is any meanness in you, he will see it and shame you out of it.'" Then the curtain was drawn from the picture, and all Brown yelled as from one throat, and kept long at it. Old graduates said they never saw such a tribute paid at Brown. Professor Tong, of Nebraska, brought Dr. Andrews' greeting to Brown. Through him the chairman of the dinner of the younger graduates sent this message: "Tell Benjy that so long as the light he lit on this hill shall burn, we shall hold in our hearts him who made Brown University what she is." These must be grateful words to Benjamin Andrews. He was an honest man, mislaid by figures. He was true to his convictions as long as he had them, and when he finally saw his mistake he admitted it.

Mr. William Dean Howells, a prophet not without honor in his own country, has received, in an honorary doctor's degree from Oxford, a new proof of the regard in which he is held abroad. If there is any living American writer better appreciated than he by the English readers it can only be Mark Twain. He is very much at home in England, and London is to him a town at least as friendly as New York. He will stay about the rest of the year, and is settled for the summer at Folkestone, a resort which he finds entirely acceptable and to his taste. Commenting on Mr. Howells' new honorary degree, the Boston Transcript comments him heartily as an American author "trained first in the American newspaper office, country and metropolitan, and then in the magazines of the United States, and wholly impregnated of the conventional 'education' afforded by American colleges." By all the commendation his, but can it be said with accurate truth, that a man who lived so long in Boston as Mr. Howells did, who lived so long in Cambridge as he did, who lived so near to James Russell Lowell as he lived, and whose most familiar associates in years when his mind was still plastic were Harvard professors, was "wholly independent of the conventional education afforded by American colleges." It is true that Mr. Howells was never graduated from a college, but he got his full share of college education; got it at second hand from men who had it; got it through the pores, and by word of mouth.

The Probable Issues of the Campaign

Of course the Democratic platform has not yet been framed, but even if, like its Republican competitor, it were already before the people, we could find no assurance that in either of the documents would be found the issues on which the outcome of the ensuing campaign will turn. Doubtless one of the two purposes for which a national convention is called is to set forth clearly the views and aims on which a given party means to appeal to the country. Practically, however, as our political history has shown in a majority of cases, the formulation of the issues on which a decision will be rendered is relegated to the voters themselves.

It is, indeed, not difficult to conceive a priori circumstances under which a national convention might deem it superfluous or impudent to proclaim too definitely its convictions and its intentions. When, for instance, the national convention of a great political party meets earlier than that of its opponent, it may not be wise, from a strategic or tactical viewpoint, to disclose its available points, or to assume advanced positions from which retreat would be impracticable. Or, again, there have been times when widespread discontent and disgust at the economical plight of the republic, at the suspension of credit, the prostration of industry, and the paralysis of business can be relied upon to sweep away, as by a tidal wave, the party in power, to whose measures, in whole or in part, and rightly or wrongly, the alarming state of things may be attributed. Such was the situation in 1840, when the Whig national convention forbore to put forward any platform at all, and when William Henry Harrison was elected President by an overwhelming majority of the electoral votes on a "log cabin and hard cider" issue. In 1844 it was no more by virtue of the Democratic platform that James K. Polk won at the ballot-box. On the contrary, the victory of the Tennesseean was due, first, to the unforeseeable penning of a letter in which his opponent, Henry Clay, expressed views touching the annexation of Texas and our attitude toward Mexico that cost him many electoral votes at the North; and, secondly, to the shrewdly calculated effect on Pennsylvania of the nomination for the Vice-Presidency of George M. Dallas, who was believed to be an inflexible protectionist. In 1848, when the quick conquest of Mexico—which Wellington termed the greatest feat of arms in the nineteenth century—was fresh in the popular mind, the Whig party, as Thurlow Weed forebore, would have had not the faintest hope of victory had it not virtually assumed its opposition to the Mexican war, and proclaimed for its standard-bearer one of the heroes of that contest, thus raising where it had had none. In 1852, had the Democratic platform revealed so much as the germ of the coming Nebraska bill, it is extremely doubtful whether Franklin Pierce could have been elected. Does any man who can recall the campaign of 1860 imagine that Lincoln could have been successful had the majority of voters in the Northern States deemed it possible, in view of his published utterances, that he would ever subscribe his name to an emancipation proclamation? What host Lincoln, in 1860, was it any statement of conviction or intention contained in the platform framed at Cincinnati. Or was it the candidate's inadvertent suggestion that the tariff, after all, was but a "local law"? What defeated Tilden in 1888? Was it any thought or phrase in the platform on which he stood, or in any utterance of his own; or was it a sordid and despicable transaction of which Congo Island was the principal seat? To that question an answer might have been given either by the late Senator Quay, who that year was chairman of the Republican National Committee, or by the secondarily (nominally Democratic), who subsequently was sent to Sing Sing.

In a word, platforms cannot always make the issues on which a campaign is to pivot, even if the framers desired them to do so. Nevertheless, it is possible for these leaders to be forewarned by intelligent observers of what the great mass of voters are thinking of and caring about! The Whigs, who were shrewd enough in 1840 to construct no platform for the hero of Tippecanoe to stand upon, had sense enough to see that the people had been rendered desperate by the consequences of the financial crisis of 1837, and that what, above all things, they wanted was a sweeping change of men and measures at the seat of the Federal government. Lucky once more was it for the Whigs that Thurlow Weed had sufficient discernment to perceive in 1848 that the real question before the country would be whether it would ratify or deprecate the rich harvest of a war policy, which had secured not only Texas but New Mexico, Utah, Arizona, Nevada, and California. However far-sighted or misled the conventions at Chicago or St. Louis may prove to have been, it is absolutely certain that, long before election-day shall dawn next November, American voters will know precisely why they are going to give their ballots to a particular candidate for the Presidency. Long before the arrival of the great issues when the people, in their majesty, will deliver judgment, the professional politicians will find out how much or how little sagacity they have evinced in fabricating platforms and agreeing upon manlines; and it will not be in the least surprising if, in a large majority of cases, their hindsight shall prove much better than their foresight.

If, nevertheless, we leave out of view, as needs we must, unforeseeable events or revelations, and fix our eyes upon facts and truths that lie upon the surface, it should not be difficult for any thoughtful and unbiased man to recognize certain issues, which seem certain to be pivotal, when the mass of voters awaken to the consciousness that they are once more confronted with their one quinquennial opportunity of speaking decisively for themselves. Their hour, like Samson's, has grown once more; and, like him, if they choose, they can pull down the pillars of the temple. If they regard an onerous the maximum duties of the Dingley tariff; if they believe that Dingley himself framed those duties for little other purpose than to afford a margin for reciprocity; if they recall that the lamented McKinley, in the last public speech that he uttered before he was shot down, pledged himself and his party to an equitable reduction of those duties through reciprocal conventions; if, on the other hand, are their convictions they will be thinking themselves next November that, at last, they have their day in court, and that in the ballot they grasp an irresistible weapon of redress. How outlandish may possibly be the effect of a demand for a reasonable readjustment of the Dingley tariff, and for at least an installment of the promised reciprocity—even in States which, normally, are Republican strongholds, such States as North Dakota, Minnesota, Wisconsin, Michigan, Iowa, Illinois, Indiana, Maine, and even Massachusetts—nobody knows better than veteran Republican politicians, who are thoroughly familiar with the local conditions in those commonwealths.

There, again, is Mr. Roosevelt's personality and his record in the office of Chief Magistrate; and his inevitable, that he, his temperament, his character, his recent past, his possible future shall be one of the principal pivots, if not the chief pivot, of the contest.

Judge Gray and His Latest Public Utterance

THE belief that Judge George Gray, of Delaware, may prove a formidable candidate for the Democratic nomination to the Presidency, has directed the public gaze upon a man who, when a member of the United States Senate, was recognized as the real leader of his party in that body, and who, now, as a diplomatist, as a jurist and as an impartial arbitrator has been lately and capital, has won golden opinions from multitudes of his countrymen. To those who have followed his career we need not say that any speech of his on an important public question would deserve the careful perusal which, under the existing circumstances, it is sure to challenge. Judge Gray's latest and most memorable utterance is the address which he delivered on June 1 at Lake Mohonk, New York, as presiding officer of the tenth annual conference on international arbitration. It was an address which faced him on that occasion. It included three members of The Hague Tribunal; ten judges of Federal and State courts, including Justice Brewer of the United States Supreme Court, and Justice W. F. Potter of the Pennsylvania Supreme Court. Fifteen presidents of colleges and other educational institutions, forty-two conspicuous business men from different parts of the United States, representing the Chambers of Commerce of New York, Philadelphia, Boston, Baltimore, and other cities, and, finally, many well-known clergymen.

He began by directing attention to the extraordinary advance that had been made during the last decade in the direction of international arbitration. He recalled that ten years ago—all over the civilized world, with the possible exception of Great Britain—statesmen were indifferent, and practical politicians were aversely hostile, to the proposed substitute for war. Kindly and optimistic people, he said, carried the hope that a more enlightened method of settling disputes than by sword or battle might eventually be hit upon, but, in their hearts, they felt that the dream's fulfillment was far away. They did not perceive, or they did not recognize, the spiritual ferment which everywhere was stirring the minds and hearts of men, a ferment already on the eve of becoming so powerful and irresistible that to-day statesmen are chafing rather than directing the sweep of public opinion toward the goal of peaceful adjustment of international controversies, and toward a lively and poignant sense of the wastefulness and folly of international warfare. The speaker went on to point out how long, though sometimes overlooked, had been the preparation for such a happy consummation. For many a decade had the peoples of the world been drawn closer together by the wonderful achievements of theoretical and practical science in the applications of heat and electricity. The salt, unplumbed, strange seas no longer separate, but now unite, the nations of the Old World and the New, and a solidarity of material interests has produced at least an approach to a solidarity of thought and feeling. The old assumption which lay at the root of so much misguided legislation and so much procrustean diplomacy, the assumption that what was harmful to the well-being of one country might be helpful to another, is far less prevalent than it used to be. No longer do intelligent legislators take for granted that the advance of an alien people in prosperity is a menace to our own. We are now much more disposed than we were formerly to divert in such advance an increment to the wealth of the whole world, an increment in which all of us now or late must have some share, however small. Conversely, we are far more willing than we once were to recognize that, just as the waters of a great lake cannot be drawn from or depleted at its remotest corner without affecting sensibly the general level of the great body of its waters, so the material improvement and destruction, and the moral deterioration, inseparable from international war—however distant, geographically, may be the contest—must, to some extent, affect injuriously the whole of the civilized world.

It is evident that the mature and sober intellect of Judge Gray, no less than the youthful and sensitive heart of the Czar Nicholas II., has been profoundly affected by the grim data and inexorable deductions marshalled by M. Bloch, the late distinguished Polish exponent of the suicidal significance of war. Far-reaching, indeed, though not, of course, as yet, irresistible, has been the effect of M. Bloch's appalling demonstration. It is true, as Judge Gray told his fellow conference, that the economic waste consequent upon the maintenance of great and growing military and naval establishments is beginning to make the due impression upon the enlightened conscience and intelligence of increasing numbers of observers in all countries. Altruism is no longer excluded from national policies and disregarded in national conduct; on the contrary, there is a widening appreciation of the truth that upon nations, as well as upon individuals, the obligations of civilization are the same. No longer to public opinion forced in by national confines. It has crept across such boundaries; and now an international public sentiment, making itself felt from one corner of Christendom to the other through the instrumentality of a free press, forewarns and controls the conduct and the policies of kings and cabinets. It was not, of course, disputed by Judge Gray that these phenomena are still but tendencies rather than accomplished results; but, considered merely as tendencies, they may well fill our hearts with encouragement and hope. The upward movement of man has been, at best, a slow one, and progress has often been followed by reaction. In the evolution of civilization there has been an ebb as well as a flow, a receding as well as an advancing tide; but if we take a broad survey of the past and compare the beginning with the end of a considerable period we shall seldom fail to note the preponderance of gain and of ascent. We need not, therefore, be discouraged by the imperfections and transient, untoward conditions. The salutary events occurring under our eyes in the thirtieth century remind us that war is a bad habit, not easily broken, and that it is still, perhaps, in some cases, unavoidable. But, although the Czar of Russia himself, who suggested the creation of a peace tribunal, is involved in an intestine contest that strains the resources of his empire, yet, even in the face of that event, Judge Gray is convinced that the establishment and the continued exercise of a permanent court of international arbitration will make it more difficult in the future, than it has been in the past, for nations to engage in war. He believes that the influence of The Hague tribunal will grow steadily, though slowly, and that each renewed resort to its decisions will tend to form and strengthen the habit of looking thereunto for settlement of international quarrels by an appeal to reason, instead of an appeal to arms.

After addressing the exemplary agreement of England and the United States to submit the Alaska boundary to delimitation by a court, in which each of the litigants was represented by the same number of judges, Judge Gray referred to the remarkable records of the progress of the principle of arbitration afforded recently by the treaties concluded, on the one hand, between France and Great Britain, and, on the other, between France and Italy. As for ourselves, he expressed the conviction that we are bound by our own past. He knew, he said, of no more glorious page in the history of our country than that which records the series of its arbitral agreements, and establishes its leadership in upright diplomacy and peaceful settlement of international disputes. To his eye, "the parliament of man and the federation of the world" is, at last, emerging from the mist of poetry into the sunlight of the Western Hemisphere. An aggressive, a sordid, a selfish national policy will more and more be recognized as out of date and supplanted in the annals of the United States. More and more must our national conduct conform to the enlightened conscience of the country, for with more and more rigor will be applied to it the test of morality as well as of self-interest. Judge Gray brought his address to an end by reminding his auditors that there is growing to be such a thing as chivalry among nations, as there has been a chivalry among men; and that, under the protection of that sentiment, the weaker nations of the world already are measurably secure from aggression and spoliation. Especially would he hold this to be true of the millicent. With characteristic approval he quoted, in conclusion, the words of an American President: "I mistake the American people if they favor the odious doctrine that there is no such thing as international morality; that there is one law for a strong nation and another for a weak one; and that, even by indirection, a strong power may with impunity despoil a weak one of its territory."

Fourth of July

LINCOLN, in one of his speeches during his great debate with Douglas, stated what he supposed to be the use of celebrating the anniversary of the Declaration of Independence. "We hold this annual celebration," he said, "to remind ourselves of all the good done in this process of time (1776 to date), of how it was done and who did it, and how we are historically connected with it; and we go through those memories in better humor with ourselves—we feel more attached to the one to the other, and more firmly bound to the country we inhabit." So much for the service done for those who were descendants of the Revolutionary fathers. But what, asked Lincoln, of the German, Irish, French, and Scandinavian who are in the country, who were born in Europe after the Revolution? What has Fourth of July for them? Nothing but that universal sentiment which makes them at one with men who believed that all men are created equal. Realizing that, "they feel that that moral sentiment taught in that day evidences their relation to those men, that it is the father of moral principle in them, and that they have a right to claim it as though they were blood of the blood, and flesh of the flesh, of the men who wrote the Declaration, and so they are. That is the electric cord in that Declaration that links the hearts of patriotic and liberty-loving men together, that will link those patriotic hearts as long as the base of freedom exists in the minds of men throughout the world."

Is the Fourth of July in most American communities used in any such educational way as Lincoln taught it should be? Has not Memorial Day come to take its place as a day of sentiment, and has not the Fourth of July in most towns and cities come to be more a day of sports, recreation, noise, and gaudiness? Moreover, what of the Declaration of Independence itself and the "electric cord" principle in it of equality of all men? Is that prized as it once was?

It must be admitted, we think, that the higher sentimental and spiritual possibilities of the Fourth of July have been allowed to fall into disrepute in cities and towns, being as such, and by most adults everywhere, but that the children of the country are led to think about it far more than they used to, and in more rational ways, no one who knows anything about school education or the contents of juvenile periodical literature would dare to deny. Just as instruction on temperance is passing away from the pulpit to the school, from education to education, an instruction on patriotism is passing from the orator's forum to the teacher's classroom.

So as to the Declaration of Independence. It is true that it is now said of it that "it can be read so as to make it the Bible of Anarchy." Professors of history in our colleges now bemoan that "to hold the doctrine of the consent of the governed as literally applicable to all societies and at all times is to main- tain political suicide." The president of Harvard University affirms that "the only possible equality among men is equality before the law." Henry Ward Beecher's successor in Plymouth pulpit holds that the Declaration of Independence "says nothing whatever about self-government"; that "what it affirms is that governments exist for the benefit of the governed; and this is very different from affirming that they must always be administered by the governed." In addition to such sentiments as these by representative men, we have such facts as these: essential nullification of the war amendments and the disfranchisement of most of the negroes of the South, and government of Porto Rico and the Philippines by Congressional decree departing from the principle of the fathers of the nation and of the statement of the civil war, and that we are on the road to national ruin.

When Rufus Choate declared that the Declaration of Independence had its "glittering generalities," Emerson replied: "Glittering generalities! rather blaring ubiquities." So today when such sentiments are uttered, there are those who reply that the nation is unfaithful to its ideal, that it is departing from the principles of the fathers of the nation and of the statement of the civil war, and that we are on the road to national ruin.

On this point former words by Lincoln relative to the Declaration of Independence may be illuminating. In the same great historic debate with Douglas he said: "I think the authors of that notable instrument intended to include all men, but they did not intend to declare all men equal in all respects. They did not mean to say all were equal in color, size, intellect, moral development, or social position. . . . They did not mean to assert the obvious untruth that all were then actually enjoying that equality, nor yet that they were about in confess it upon them. In fact, they had no power to confer such a boon. They meant simply to declare the right, so that enforcement of it might follow as fast as circumstances would permit."

Several months later Lincoln said at the opening of the fourth joint debate:

"I am not, nor ever have been, in favor of bringing about in any way the social and political equality of the white and black races. . . . I will say, in addition to this, that there is a physical difference between the white and black races which I believe will forever forbid the two races living together on terms of social and political equality. And inasmuch as they cannot so live, while they do remain together there must be the positions of superior and inferior, and I, as much as any man, am in favor of having the superior position assigned to the white race."

The point of view that Lincoln held with respect to the Declaration of Independence as a setting forth of an ideal to be progressively—not immediately—realized was an essentially opportunistic point of view; and it was one that he held up to the time of his death on all the problems involved in reconstruction. Had he lived, how different the history of the nation and the relations between the North and the South, the Canadian and the negro! No one can read what he has to say about liberty for the individual, whether black or white, without seeing that it was unlimited in one sense, limited in another. To himself, his labor, his elemental needs and longings, every man—as Lincoln thought—had the right of absolute control. Hence he sought the extension of slavery. But that suffrage was an unalienable right for all men, that the ideal of the Declaration of Independence could be realized, then, among people of all sorts and all stages of development, he did not believe. Hence, had he lived, he would have fought the dualism which shaped reconstruction legislation, and today he would be, doubtless, on the side of responsible administrators who, whether in the South, in Porto Rico, or in the Philippines, believe that suffrage is a privilege to be earned by attainment in character, not a right going along with natural attainment of a specified age, and independent of character and possessions.

Analysis of criticism of the nation today will show that it comes in the main from men of radical temper or conservative mood. Whereas the more complex our national life becomes, the greater becomes the authority of the opportunist, the nationalist, the rationalist, who declines to be bound by written constitutions, doctrinal formulae, the letter of idealism.

Hence it may be that from the standpoint of the opportunist and nationalist we are truer to liberty to-day than we would have been had we obeyed strictly the letter of the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution.

Congo Atrocities Again

THE discussion of the misdeeds of Belgian officials in the Congo Free State has reached a pass when contradictory questions are exhibited side by side, without apparent recognition of the absurdity involved.

We read, for example, that Sir Charles Dillke and the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs, Earl Percy, renewed this discussion in the House of Commons on June 9. The former, evidently convinced that the Congo officials had been guilty of the cruel practices ascribed to them, suggested that the United States should act with Great Britain in the attempt to put an end to the "horrible" scandal, presumably by investigation, to be followed by punishment and amendment. The latter said that the fair sense of Western civilization was on trial; and the British government sincerely hoped that the rulers of the Congo State would prosecute the inquiry which they had promised to make. He also expressed his conviction that the charge of inhuman cruelty was true. In the same issue of the same newspaper we read that the government of Great Britain is bringing forward these grave charges before English traders and adventurers come some of the rich equatorial African lands, or English contractors want to run the Cape to Cairo Railway across a corner of the Free State!

To us it seems that there is no thought whatever in the second assertion; that it is merely an attempt to evade the issue under cover of idle abuse. For, in order to attach any importance to it, we should be obliged to assume that the distinguished speakers in Parliament, at the very moment when they are insisting upon a thorough investigation, know in their hearts that their contention is false, and actually try to induce the United States to participate in an inquiry which is not designed to ascertain the facts, but only to play into the hands of British land grabbers.

Again, we read that a national association was formed some time ago to refute the charges against the Belgians and to create such impressions as should be satisfactory to the accused government. And yet we are asked in the same breath to accept, as a complete disproof of the charges, reassuring accounts of the achievements of King Leopold's government in the Congo region which appear to have been prepared and spread abroad by that patriotic association.

Those who reflect on the exaggeration and harsh emphasis which in the past have so often disfigured reports from the outposts of civilization in savage communities will not prejudice the case of the Belgians. The right to separate truth from error through inquiry into the abuses with which the Congo administration is charged, and which, as we have before pointed out, are so injurious to the reputation of Europeans, resides in the powers that are responsible for the creation of the Free State.

Labor Rule and the Birth-rate in Australia

IT is a curious fact that the colonies and dependencies of England seem to have been so constituted and formed that each one of them might form an example in a book on economics and policy. The note of Ireland is sufficiently distinctive. India stands for the greatest experiment in administration, and the greatest success, since the Roman Empire. New Zealand has carried paternalism to such a point that the island colony of the Southern Cross has been made the field of a thousand socialistic sermons. South Africa shows the trend of the death between postulation and philosophy, as clear cut in principle as the historic fight of the ancient Greeks, where the people of the mountain were at odds with the people of the plain, and these, in turn, fought the people of the shore. In the same way, Australia seems to stand, with entire distinctness and absence of shading, for the domination of labor; a commonwealth wholly built up on the amalgamation of great labor-unions and the vote of the working-man.

A report just issued by a royal commission appointed by the government of New South Wales sheds much light on the conditions of Australian life which exist under the domination of the working-man and the voting woman.

Special attention is paid in it to the question of dwindling birth-rate and the retarded increase in infant mortality. The report examines every side of the question, and reaches conclusions drastic in their thoroughness. It is shown that, during the last thirty years, New South Wales has had a natural increase of population amounting to a quarter of a million; and, during the same period, the whole Australian commonwealth has lost no less than 940,000; or, let us say, thirty thousand a year. The royal commission went into the matter with the greatest care, and at first with the hypothesis that this alarming dwindling of the race might be due to natural causes, but witness after witness referred to the realness, and even spontaneity, of married people in admitting a deliberate restriction in the number of their children.

In no other part of the world are there so many holidays as in Australia, where open-air sports and amusements seem to absorb the great mass of the industrial population in an unprecedented degree. Early marriages are common throughout the commonwealth, but only a very limited number are followed by the birth of children. The whole drift of labor legislation during the last few years has been so largely to decrease the hours of employment, especially in towns, that the great body of workers, especially the younger ones, have placed before them every possible inducement to devote their leisure time to what may be described as the business of pleasure.

It would be unjust to say that the decrease of population, the dwindling birth-rate, is directly due to the tendencies of labor legislation; but it is by no means unjust to say that both phenomena are results of the same cause. The ideal of self-indulgence and selfishness which, expressed in legislation, enables the younger working-men and women to devote themselves to the business of pleasure, is palpably the cause which prompts these same young people to early and deliberately childless marriages. The desire to seek pleasure and avoid pain is the root of the evil; a concept of life which finds the aim of life in self-indulgence and not in duty.

It is curious and ominous to find that the restriction of the number of births is not accompanied, as is often claimed, by lessened attrition of the few children born. The report is quite definite on this. The artificially diminished birth-rate is accompanied by an increased mortality among children, which we are tempted to describe as almost equally artificial. It is due to the improper nurture of infants and the substitution of artificial foods for the natural nourishment of children; in plain words, it is due to the selfishness of the mothers, and their willingness to see their babies die, rather than make a sacrifice in order to keep them alive. The "struggle for the life of others," which enables and redeems so much of animal life, has in humanity reached its lowest ebb, and in the conditions which we are considering, has fallen below even the common level of standard of humanity.

It would be instructive to look to connect these phenomena with the other movement already discussed, as a result of which a million women recently voted in the Australian commonwealth. In both there is the disappearance of an old ideal of womanhood.

At the time these photographs were taken, the lineup of the Yale crew was as follows: Yale:—Bow, Weeks; 2, Daly; 3, Morse; 4, Scott; 5, Miller; 6, Whistler; 7, Cross; Stroke, Whitney; Coxswain, Le Blanc.

Harvard:—Bow, Duffingham; 2, Smith; 3, Flint; 4, Mier; 5, Lawson; 6, Shustack; 7, Huffy; Stroke, Filly; Coxswain, Chase.

THE YALE-HARVARD CREWS ON THE THAMES IN TRIALS FOR THE 'VARSITY BOAT-RACE ON JUNE 30

On the day when this issue of the "Weekly" appears the annual boat-race between the 'varsity crews of Yale and Harvard will have been decided at New London, Connecticut. Since 1859 there have been thirty-three contests between crews of the two colleges, Yale winning nineteen times and Harvard fourteen. In a practice spin a few days ago the Yale crew covered the four-mile course in 24.53. The Harvard crew, in a similar trial over the same course on the Thames, went the distance in 24.95.

COOLIES UNLOADING SUPPLIES FOR JAPANESE TROOPS AT RI-KA-HO

Winnipeg, the Korean port thirty miles southeast of Wiju, has been since April the principal disembarking harbor for troops and supplies of the First Japanese Army Corps. The tender is referred to a description of how the Japanese land their supplies in the article appearing on page 1010 of the "Weekly" a special correspondence in the Far East. The photograph shows a force of soldier coolies heading out at Ri Ka Ho (Port of the Plain Rice), the Japanese name for the harbor of Wiju.

Shipping Drugs and Supplies for a Hospital Train at St. Petersburg

Red Cross Nurses leaving St. Petersburg for the Front

RED CROSS PLANS FOR THE WOUNDED RUSSIANS

Active preparations are being made in Russia to aid Red Cross work at the front. The Czar's mother has directed the Society to provide for all the wounded, and working parties have been making clothes for the troops in the palace of the Grand Duchess Vladimir. Applications have been received from women all over the world to nurse the troops in the Far East.

With the Japanese Troops at Chinampo

By William Dinwiddie

Special Correspondent of "Harper's Weekly" in the Far East

CHINAMPO, May 16, 1901

THE "Port of the Plum Blossom," or Iika-ho, as it is known in Japanese, has been, since the sixth day of April, the great disembarking harbor for troops and supplies of the First Japanese Army Corps.

It is situated on the Kuro-shi coast, some thirty miles southeast of Wiju, and, but for an intervening island, one might look directly into the mouth of the Yalu River, about fifteen miles away.

The Japanese military officers at more southern ports never specify that such a landing place exists, and, in fact, until recently, an evasive answer would have met any direct question regarding it; however, though military strategy may have devised such secrecy necessary, it might have been frankly admitted that a great army and the requisite supplies thereto were being landed there, so far as any possible danger of the Russians finding it, or any save Japanese pilots being able to enter it was concerned, for it lies tucked away behind a maze of little islands, expansive mud flats and shallow, and is only to be reached by tortuous channels charted nowhere except on the secret coast maps of the Japanese government.

The tide goes wildly swirling out to sea and rushes rushing back in curling waves, exposing miles of swampy, quaking flats at low tide and creating beautiful sheets of navigable water at the flood. Twenty-three feet is the average tidal range of the water, and so it is the fate of any iron-hulled vessel if she makes the mistake of floating over these disappearing lakes, for she may find herself on dry land, helpless and careened, if not broken to splinters, a mile from the nearest sea water. Only the ponderous Santa-Maria fashioned Chinese junk can enjoy the situation, rocking gently on their curved flat bottoms as the waters freely, and then settling down for a quiet nap until the return of the tide, with their great upsurging sounds projected thirty feet in the air, while their great round appendage of a helm wave contentedly in the stiff breeze.

The Japanese have leased the ship and small boat channels for fifteen miles from the landing, and, without these guides, it is doubtful whether any iron ship could enter, as the windings of the narrow passage of deep water are very crooked.

All transports, at the best, must come to anchor four miles away from the landing wharves, and, from this point, soldiers and supplies are hoisted aboard the thousand-ton Japanese landing boats, or sampans, as they would be called on the China coast. Also, two great steel lighters, drawing five feet, are used for getting supplies ashore.

While in quiet weather or at the turn of the tides it is possible for the sampans men to woad their boats to and from the anchored ships, with their huge hand-hauled sweeps, when the current sets in or off shore, or the strong, western afternoon winds lash the waters, they are helpless, and the boats must be towed at least one way.

The army has been able to meet the towing problems with comparative ease, as many private ship companies—especially the one navigating on the Amulho River—own two-tonners, middle-tunnelled boats of three and a half to four foot draught, and all of these have been requisitioned upon by the government, and are doing excellent service in landing the Japanese armies, which are becoming as thick as bees in these northern waters.

These vessels can actually pass around in one place, by turning one propeller ahead and the other back, and are very powerful tugboats, handling two steel lighters with ease, and romping away with twenty-five loaded sampans wriggling and twisting at their stern connecting buoys like the tail of a gigantic kite.

When Major Yamauchi was detailed as Commander of Anchorage, with his staff, to Iika-ho, there was presented to him, as his official boat for the time, a beautiful rocky promontory, covered with a magnificent growth of gnarled and grotesque pines, with slopes of rich green grass revealing in the spring sunshine and shaded little dells purpled with sweet violets and blue bells and the tiny wild rose, all harbingers of the kindly awakening of mother earth our north.

While he appreciated the beauties of nature—as is testified by his selecting the most picturesque and exquisite spot for his tents, and decorating his canvas house with wild flowers and sprigs of lovely trailing plants and pear blossoms—his problem was one of grim war, and, in less than three days, his corps of trained men had landed at high tide and erected at low, two wharves, half-spiked and half-floating pontoons, nearly six hundred feet long. The abutments, holding an earthen roadway for a few yards from the bluff front, are made of earth-filled grass-stem bales, and from them spring the tripod-legged piers, whose cedar piles are held firmly in place by sand-lugs deposited about their bases. When the point of deep water is reached at flood tide, pontoons of junks take the place of the solid structure, though at low tide the pontoons rest upon the muddy bottom.

It has taken an heroic effort to keep these wharves in good passable condition, for, on several occasions, the rushing waters have been followed by a howling wind, which has set the drifting bridge-booms heavily tugging at their anchor chains and backing in the waves to demolish the growing, creaking load of steel-banded flooring. The writer witnessed a night's fight, by this anchorage force, to prevent the complete destruction of one of the wharves, and a wild night it was, as the men lurched and swayed among the floor timbers, tightening up chains and carrying out supplementary keel-anchors. At daylight the wind died down, leaving the wharf a little askew, but it was now straightened, as the thousand toasting soldier-cooks went straining in and out over it, bearing army supplies upon their shoulders.

It is marvellous the immense quantities of military stores which have been landed at this port, in spite of all the physical and mechanical difficulties which impede the work.

On account of the tides and wind the work can be carried on only during about half the time, and yet a line, made up of stores and munitions of war, to say nothing of the fighting soldiers, extending thirty-five miles to the front on the Yalu River, has been kept going steadily forward since April 10, or until the crossing of the First Army, sixty thousand strong, for the supplying of which this port was established.

A corps of one thousand trained soldier-cooks is used for unloading the boats as they arrive at the wharves, and to carry the supplies ashore and stack them in well-arranged squares, which may be conveniently reached from the ramps. The whole proceeding is well ordered and carried on with true military precision, the men marching down in companies when the time comes to relieve those at work. They line up, the roll is called, and then, in single file, they march out on the right-hand side of the wharf to its extreme end. A detachment goes into the small boats which cluster, like flies, about the gangplanks, and immediately begins passing the bags, bundles, boxes, ammunition, shells, litter, wagons, harness, tinners, planks, pontoons, etc., to the wharf, where each load is taken up by coolies fling by and marching, loaded, ashore, on the opposite side of the causeway.

Japanese landing troop-boats on the beach at Chinampo

JAPANESE LANDING IN THE HARBOR AT CHINAMPO

All Japanese transports bound for the important Korean port of Chinampo, as described in the interesting letter from Mr. Overide in this issue, have to come to anchor four miles away from the landing-place, and from this point soldiers and supplies are landed aboard the landing-boats, or sambans. In addition, two steel lighters are used for landing supplies.

The wharf settles down, as a rule, pick up the bluff crew, but drop their loads at the end of the wharf and pass back again for another load. A company or two of men, who know the yard or the method of placing the piled supplies, take them from the end of the wharf.

As the unloading goes forward continuously, up in the yard is another activity in the shape of dispatching supplies to the front. Every pound of stuff unloaded must be checked up and accounted for even though it may not remain five minutes at the depot before it is again moving forward toward Wipa over the military highway, either in a tow-hauled, one-horse cart, in one pulled and driven by three soldiers, or on the backs of Korean coolies, in their straw shoulder slings or wooden back-ribs.

Thus two sets of checkers are required, whose business is distinct—but not confusing, that I could see—one set who check into the yard and another who check out or dispatch the property to the front.

To accomplish all the clerical work involved has necessitated the erection of quite a canvas village on the spot, and in the tents the clerks work incessantly, night and day in relays, at the tables, keeping the accounts straight.

The Commander of the Ammunition is a quiet, self-contained man, with a silent reserve which suggests that he is rather unapproachable, though the contrary is the case. The necessity of keeping his mind concentrated on the details of the work before him, in order to meet promptly the orders from headquarters for every conceivable thing likely to be used by an army, and not permit of his being half-fallen well met with every one, even if he were so inclined.

Three days before the battle of the Yalu the great steel pontoon bridge and thousands of long planks and rail timbers were still at Hsien-to, but the men so timed the work that the bridge was built on exact schedule time across the river, and the last pontoon were still on the road when men had already been loaded. Behind the pontoon he put the medical corps supplies and men, and they went marching up before the final crash of battle, and in time to ready the necessary medical and surgical assistance.

Of all the multitudinous supplies going forward, one woman must at the need for the thousands and thousands of racks of sake—the native Japanese drink, it really seems to be as much in evidence as rice, on the march, and far more so than ammunition. The writer has not yet been able to get out of it is issued as so justifiable that the powerful rays reach far out upon the water, and the white light on land illumines every road and supply track in the yard.

At night this busy harbor—where Major Yamaguchi and his staff officers work nineteen hours a day, apparently without halt to their constitutions—is a blaze of light. A dozen or more powerful acetylene gas lamps, each with its individual gasometer, are so juxtaposed that their powerful rays reach far out upon the water, and the white light on land illumines every road and supply track in the yard.

When the tide falls, as it tanning under the reddened setting sun, the coolies on each wharf take up a vocal chant—a happy one and filled with smiles, for they laugh and jostle for one another against the bricking mud flat, as the vessels are landed back and forth.

Then a race of unloading begins, and the hollow wharf floors resound with the sound of running feet. Cattle and hounds and geese and laughter are flung at the opposite wharf, where the vanquished soldier coolies, who were at first so abundant, sweating under their heavy burdens, by the successful, empty-handed boats who romp back to their camp, always happy, tall men still happy by the slight triumph which they have achieved over their friends in labor.

A Colonial Career for Americans

By Sydney Brooks

London, June 25, 1904.

ADVENTURE to return again to Mr. A. R. Colquhoun on Greater America. Nor do I think I need apologize for doing so. It would perhaps be too much to say that what Mr. Bryce did for Internal America Mr. Colquhoun has done for external America. The mere fact that America is a rebelling power is still in the tentative and experimental stage would alone make the production of such a classic as the America Compendium impossible at present. Mr. Bryce had the advantage of dealing with a nation and a civilization already set and established; Mr. Colquhoun confronts a problem the depths of which are still unexplored, while its surface is agitated by a thousand fluctuating cross-currents. But if one cannot call Greater America an actual rival to the America Compendium, it is not too much to describe it as an indispensable supplement. When Mr. Bryce wrote, the United States, outside of the Monroe Doctrine, had practically no foreign policy whatever, and Imperial America was not merely unborn, but undreamed of. Mr. Colquhoun possesses many of the qualifications of his distinguished predecessor. For one thing he knows his subject both on its real and its theoretical side. He has himself been concerned in the solution of difficulties and unlike those which face Americans in the Philippines. He is thus able to bring to bear upon the discussion of American imperialism the invaluable outside and comparative point of view. He is thoroughly well acquainted with the domestic conditions that obtain in the United States; he both knows and admires America; and he looks forward to a time when Anglo-American cooperation in international politics will be an actual and tangible fact. Moreover, though an Englishman, he has none of that peculiar prejudice to which Englishmen so readily incline—the prejudice, I admit, this makes him so delightfully confident that because a thing is British it is therefore a law of nature. Any volume from a student of Whitpöth as detached and candid and well equipped mind, therefore, he is fascinating and readable and should be welcome. It should, indeed, be doubly welcome, because in the vast literature that has grown around the Philippines, Hawaii, Cuba, and Porto Rico a firm grasp of essentials and a knowledge of what has been done by other nations under similar or nearly similar circumstances have been curiously lacking. Much excellent work has been done in the way of describing the Philippines, but little in the way of explaining them or of examining the principles upon which their government is based. Previous writers, for the most part, have got too near to the details of their subject to be in a position to view it as a whole, and what they have had to say has been too often disfigured by dithyrambic eulogies or vapid generalizations or a narrow partiality. Mr. Colquhoun, at once philosophical and practical, frank and experienced, authoritative yet without dogmatism, seems by contrast to be promulgating that judgment of their peers—cold, edged with clear thought wisdom—which Mr. Kipling warned Americans to expect as a consequence of their share in shouldering the white man's burden.

I doubt in a previous letter I did some of Mr. Colquhoun's criticisms of American achievements and policy in the Philippines. I should now like to call attention to various remarks of his—rather wider question—the question how for a colonial career is likely to attract American youths. England is singularly fortunate in finding this problem more or less solved for her. France and Germany are not so well off. In France especially it is particularly difficult to induce men of good quality to enter the colonial service. The forced conscription division of property makes most Frenchmen capitalists on a small scale. With a very little money they are able to provide themselves with a comfortable competency. They are thus deprived of one of the first incentives to an enterprising and independent career, and in ever-increasing numbers prefer to enter the home civil service, where they may be sure of a settled salary and of secure advancement with the minimum of personal exertion. Frenchmen are naturally not so naturally towards the dignity of so-fortune as an American's towards commerce. Consequently, as it is inevitably the case under a centralized government, others are multiplied to meet the demands of the place-holders. Again, the conscription division of property has given birth to a peculiar territorial form of patriotism, an intense passion for the actual soil of France. This is a feeling that can hardly be avoided when a large proportion of the population are able to measure their stake in the country in acres, rods, and prices. The result, however, is that France is made so comfortable and pleasant a place to live in, there are so many the kindling the citizens down to his share in the national heritage, that the seductive Frenchman, lured of much of his initiative in the schools which turn out excellent functionaries, but inadequate men, and finding himself in possessed possession of an income from his property, or whatever it may be his father has left him, has no ambition to better himself by emigration, either as a settler or as an administrator. A Frenchman away from France is always and everywhere the nonplus of his people.

None of these conditions applies to England. The custom of primogeniture throws upon the world every year a host of healthy, energetic young men, who, with the same way to make, they have a love of sport and adventure bred in their bones, and their school training has given them the habit of using power and authority. That perhaps is the best point about the English public schools, like Eton, Rugby, and Marlborough. Scarcely one of them is called "public" because they are reserved to the middle and upper classes, and they are called "schools" because they teach athletics. It is the bare truth that most of them fell technically. They do not provide an education suited to a competitive age.

On the other hand, they are, undoubtedly, splendid nurseries for a certain kind of leadership. The British Empire itself is administered on principles that are merely the extension of public-school methods. When all that can be urged against them has been urged, it is still to be said that the great English seminaries do lay the foundations of a sturdy and chivalrous character; they do inculcate order and the habits of discipline and command, to most responsible ability, and to a very great extent to certain rough and ready firms of honesty, justice, and "good form." "There is still," says Mr. Colquhoun, "even in these days of luxury, a certain element of Spartan discipline in the lives of British boys. The little chap who, at eight or nine, leaves his mother's arms for a boarding school has to cultivate in that tender age a self-possession, reticence, and decision which become second nature to him and lay the foundations of successful administration in later life. Not only does the rough and tumble of his school days make the boy hard and self-reliant, and develop in him that knowledge of his own powers which will be so valuable to him, but he has, naturally, a capacity and love for ruling."

To a boy of these qualities and reared by this method, a post in the Indian civil service or in Africa or the Malay States or wherever there is governing work to be done, appears the most glorious thing on earth. In the first place, England is over-crowded to a degree hardly to be conceived by those who have not lifted some corner of the veil themselves and seen with their own eyes the really ghastly struggle that is being fought out behind the smiling, comfortable exterior of English life. That makes a career abroad seem doubly attractive in its prospectiveness. Secondly, government service confers a distinct social status. Thirdly, it gratifies that inherent spirit of adventure which no Englishness is without and which cannot be satisfied in England. Fourthly, as a further inducement to a colonial career, there is the certainty of a pension. "The Englishman, as a rule, looks forward with pleasant anticipations to the time when he can retire to a country house, and, with the steady of a small but regular income for the rest of his life, can indulge in one of his many hobbies, take a leading part in local politics, and see his name launched on careers similar to his own in their moderate expectations and honorable position." And, fifthly, the work itself is congenial to the average Englishman. "Their whole training has made them self-reliant in the sense that they are prepared to take responsibilities and to act independently. . . . They are not cowed or depressed by solitude if called upon to dwell far from any of their kind. Boys fresh from school or college go cheerfully to distant frontiers where, occupying one or two quiet offices, they may not see a white man for months. After this period of training they often go to a more complete isolation. Such conditions would drive a Frenchman crazy; but, though there are occasional cases of breakdown, some solid Britons even grow to enjoy their isolation, helped by the natural inclination and self-reliance of their race and class."

Turning now to American conditions, Mr. Colquhoun notes, to begin with, that the average American has no desire to rule.

It is not a part of his make-up. He has neither inherited it in the blood nor does his school training supply it. "Indeed, he is truly imbued with principles which make despotic government by one man repugnant to him." Again, "No pride to him is attached to an unknown civil life in the United States is far more valuable and gratifying than at Great Britain." Moreover, Mr. Colquhoun considers American youths to be "less hardy, more sensitive, physically and mentally, less able to endure the peculiar conditions of life in the tropics than their more phlegmatic English comrades." Besides this, what is there, failing any hereditary instinct, that would urge an American to expatriate himself to the Philippines? If he is ambitious there is no country with one-hundredth part of the opportunities to offer that America throws at his feet. If he is pining for adventure, where will he find it and in the United States? The ideal of a comfortable old age or a pension—none supposing that a pension were permissible in the Philippine civil service—is not one that captivates the fancies of young America. High salaries and liberal allowances are opposed to American theories of the lines on which a government service should be organized, and one need not therefore include these as features among the possible attractions of a colonial career.

In the United States to hold a post under government "neither confers nor is an honorable profession, nor as an interesting and engaging life-work, does the career of a colonial official appeal to the best class of young Americans," and that the service must therefore "be recruited largely from less desirable ranks."

A painful conviction; and all the more painful if the saying be a true one that the Malays are all gentlemen, and that no one who is not a gentleman—both in the right and the conventional sense—need try to govern them.

The Approaching Doom of Port Arthur

By Charles Johnston

FROM the military point of view the coming attack on Port Arthur is certain to be one of the most splendid episodes in modern history. From the humanitarian standpoint it will be a terrible tragedy, involving human sacrifices of human life and human sorrow. The situation of the Russian troops, huddled in the extremity of the Kwangtung Peninsula is such, so deplorably weak that General Kuropatkin has said again and again to have urged the evacuation of the fortress as untenable; yet it is imperative on Russia to do all in her power to retain possession of her most important Manchurian stronghold.

This is not primarily because of the immense loss of prestige which Russia will suffer, if she is driven from Port Arthur by the victorious Japanese, nor the Chinese were driven out, just ten years ago. Russia is compelled to hold Port Arthur for far more serious reasons. It is not the fear of an insurrection, a revolution at hand, which haunts her with the authorities of St. Petersburg, but the immediate military necessity of the situation. Russia, as everybody now sees, never expected to go to war, but showed a bold front in the mishap negotiations which terminated last February, with a perfect expectation that Japan would give

Map showing the Strategic Situation of Port Arthur

WITH THE JAPANESE TROOPS—ON THE WAY

The photograph shows a detachment of Japanese infantry setting out for the front. The barracks and every available room and shed are occupied by the Japanese.

MARCH NEAR SEOUL, THE KOREAN CAPITAL

the road near Seoul. In Seoul, writes a correspondent of the "Weekly," the Korean
The Koreans receive the value of sixty cents a night from their soldier lodgers in and althoher her large chains. Russia was in no degree ready to go to war, nor, it is quite evident from the hesitating and delaying policy of General Kuropatkin, is Russia ready to fight to advantage to-day.

The war began badly and continued disastrously for Russia. When the fleet was attacked, and very largely destroyed, we were told that everything would be changed when the fighting on land began; that the tactics of Plevna were irresistible; that the Cossacks would give a good account of the Japanese soldiers. No such revolution has taken place, and Russia has lost as decisively on land, at the Yalu and again at Kim-Chow, as she did at Chemulpo and under the Golden Hill. But we are once more told that the tide is presently to turn; that Russia is massing immense forces at Mukden, at Harbin, at Baidai; and that presently the fortunes of war will be reversed and the armies of the Mikado swept back thousands of miles to the island home. It is, unfortunately, there is little reason to believe that these sanguine hopes are based on a clear perception of the problems involved; nor can we see that such preparations are being made as will give any chance of their realization. But, in those plans of recuperation and revival, Port Arthur plays a vital part. Japan has complete control of the sea, and can continue to cut masses of troops into Manchuria, probably to a total of a million, just as easily as she has handled the two hundred thousand men now there. Russia's only hope is that, at some future time, she can regain control of the sea, cut off the Japanese army, destroy the Mikado's fleet, and then, from the straits of Korea, drive the Japanese from the strong positions in Manchuria they already hold. To do all this Russia is counting on the arrival of her Baltic fleet, of eight new battleships and several armored cruisers; these are expected to be able to meet the Mikado's new dispatches, which consists only three or four ships of the largest size, and two, perhaps one, of heavy weight. There are still six battleships, in varying stages of repair, at Port Arthur, as well as several cruisers and gunboats, destroyers, and torpedo-boats; and these, effecting a junction with the Baltic fleet, would perhaps be able to regain control of the sea.

But for the success of this plan a naval base is still indispensable; and besides Port Arthur, there is no possible naval base for Russia to look to. Vladivostok is ten days north, and a fleet operating from there could have small chances of getting through the Korean strait. To lose Port Arthur means, for Russia, to lose not only the six battleships now there, and all of which are believed to be nearly ready for more to go to sea; it would mean also the final loss of all hope of recovery; the annihilation of all chance that Russia's plan of recuperation and revival can be put in force. The loss of Port Arthur will mean what Sedan meant for France in 1870.

Small wonder, then, that Japan is straining every nerve to take the stronghold, which Russia is straining every nerve to keep. Let us begin by enumerating the resources of the defenders. First, as to situation: the position of Port Arthur, as a fortress, is by no means so naturally strong as we have been repeatedly told. The sea channel is very narrow, and the water is so shallow that heavy war-ships can enter and leave only at high tide, and it often takes half a day to bring a large ship safely to anchor or to get her out to sea. Hence, opposing the six Russian battleships are perfectly repaired and ready to come out, which are certainly the case. Japan would only have to choose the time to attack her, and she would have her enemy's ships far more securely "bottled" by nature than she could hope to bottle them by the expedient of sinking ships. So that there are only a few hours out of the twenty-four during which Port Arthur is useful as a base for a fleet. This applies, of course, only to battleships and large cruisers; the small fry of naval war can come and go more freely. In view of this, one wonders why the Russians did not long ago move their fleet to the deep waters of Tallinn Bay and Delny, where, at least, they would have been able to find at all stages of the tide, but the point is that the Russian fleet can only do this at the expense of the loss of its base with her army at Port Arthur, and this involves a much dead loss of power. Moreover, the fleet is badly protected while in port. There is no point, within the eastern basin, at which the ships are safe from high-angle fire, well directed from, perhaps, five miles off, by the Japanese fleet; nor is there any point within the fortress which is entirely out of range of the Japanese war-ships.

The Russians within Port Arthur are, therefore, "between the devil and the deep sea." Their position is naturally weak, and no amount of fortification has enabled to correct its natural defects. The modern war-ships, the largest of the latter, are so low that, at low tide, it is no expense of anti-forts. The fortress proper is, therefore, a hollow ring, broken at the entrance to the harbor, and everywhere under possible fire from the sea. The ring is oval, and is formed of hills from six or six hundred to eight or nine hundred feet high. Along these hills the fortifications are built.

There are three or four especially strong forts at different points along the hills, with the largest guns mounted in them; and the strong points are united by earthworks, in which are mounted guns of lower weight. Divided among the chief forts are thirty 12-inch guns, as large as the largest used on the heaviest battleships, supported by thirty-four 6-inch quick-firing guns, fifty-two 4-inch guns, and numbers of rapid-fire small-caliber guns, similar to the "pom-poms" which gained such celebrity in the Boer war. Altogether, in the fortifications proper, there were, at the beginning of the war, one hundred and forty 4-inch guns, and 12-inch calibre. We may confidently calculate that most of the guns from the battleships of Port Arthur will appear in the fortifications, since it is unlikely that the ships can be of use in their proper element. This may add a dozen 12-inch and as many 6-inch guns, besides others of all lower-caliber; perhaps a hundred guns have been added altogether, bringing the total up to five hundred and thirty, before rubble and spent shells, and many more, at least, excepting on the Russian side have tumbled out rather badly, that there is ammunition enough to keep all these guns going, for as long as the siege is likely to last; so that, from this point of view, we may consider the defenses of Port Arthur adequate, as far as a naturally weak situation admits of. To make these guns there is a garrison which probably exceeds thirty thousand men, if we include the ten thousand or thereabout who manned the Port Arthur fleet. This is just about twice as many men as China had at Port Arthur, in November, 1894. Even in these days the fortifications were well planned, having been laid out by a distinguished German strategist, and, with powerful Armstrong guns. The Chinese were fairly expert in their use, too, but they had very little staying power, and succumbed to an almost equal number of Japanese, there being about eighteen thousand on either side. When we consider the immense girth of the Russian fortifications, nearly thirty miles in all, it becomes evident that thirty thousand is by no means too large a force to hold the fort. This gives only a thousand men per mile, at the beginning of the siege; a somewhat thin line of defense, and one liable to continual attrition, to use a phrase coined in the Boer campaign. There is reason to believe that the Chinese had this in mind, and that they were not so much of the various Siberian tribes who form a parallel to the very army of India. We cannot, therefore, count on them manifesting the tenacity and staying power which active Russian troops undoubtedly possess, nor the endurance and resourcefulness of the Chinese. We may expect them to show a fair average batch of bravery and skill; and ten thousand or more, of the Siberian rifle-brigades, who are said to be pretty fair shots.

We may, therefore, think of Port Arthur, with its garrison of thirty thousand men, along the rim of the hills that shut in the east and west basins of the harbor; the fleet, rather badly damaged, in the east basin, and the Japanese army approaching from the north.

The Japanese attacked Port Arthur ten years ago with only eighteen thousand men. Today they must have not less than eighty thousand men available for the attack. They are proceeding down both sides of the Korean Peninsula, and, when we remember that it is only thirty miles or so from Kim-Chow to Port Arthur, we shall realize that the investment of the latter is already pretty close; that the two armies are practically in touch; that the siege has in reality begun. For some time the Japanese were at Delny, but it will undoubtedly go towards Port Arthur, and will be the chief base of the attack. We may order service as material as that of the Japanese guns, which pointedly won the day at Nanshan Hill, south of Kim-Chow. The whole country around Port Arthur is hilly, and most of the hills are as much as 1000 feet high, thus crowding the fortifications close to the shore, and making it difficult for us to say with certainty that these high hills are within range of the Russian forts; but they seem to be so. If we consider the high powers of the Japanese artillery, and recognize the fact that they will undoubtedly bring guns of the heaviest calibre to bear, even supposing, what we need not suppose, that they have to land their heavy ships, and the English ship at Fushan.

The siege will begin, therefore, with a long-range duel of heavy guns; and if the Japanese can get close the Russian forts and bring their largest artillery to bear, they can certainly make things hot for General Suchoval and his garrison. The Japanese fleet will at the same time attack from the sea, and the fighting is certain to be intense.

The assailants have the advantage that they can choose their position and change it as occasion arises. The position of the defenders is fixed from the start, and the Japanese artilleryists will find a hundred purposes, aiming at a single point. The Russian must also, of course, choose a landmark within half a dozen miles of the fortifications on all sides, so that the shooting ought to be accurate. The aim of the Japanese will be to break the ring of defence formed by the oval of forts and earthworks, and to get into the centre of the ring. They may send one or two point until they silence the Russian batteries; then, or they may try attacking at all sides at once. In any case, their aim will be, first to pound the batteries of big guns into silence with their heavy artillery, and then to storm the separate forts at the point of the bayonet. Very much will depend on their getting good positions for their heavy siege-guns, and doing accurate shooting is a preliminary to infantry attacks. For the Russians much will depend on their keeping absolutely cool and letting slip no slightest opportunity of inflicting damage either on the land forces or the war-ships of Japan. General Suchoval will doubtless make a counsel of despair, and see that nothing remains for him but to sell the fire of his garrison as dearly and as effectively as possible. He is hemmed in on all sides, and cannot hope to increase his forces, while the Japanese can, without great difficulty, double the eighty thousand men they are already bringing in. But it will largely be a question of artillery to begin with, and the artillery duel may last for many days.

There is little prospect of relief from the north. General Kuropatkin is between the horns of a dilemma; if he sends a small force south to Port Arthur it will never get there; if he sends a large force he weakens his own defense against General Heikob, and endangers the right flank of the Russian army. The Baltic fleet could possibly arrive, but in the fall, so that relief from the sea is hardly a possibility.

THE CLUB OF UFER TRADES

The Noticeable Conduct of Prof Chadd

by
G·K·CHESTERTON

Part II.

"WHERE is Professor Chadd now?" I said, getting up in some agitation. "We ought not to leave him alone."

"Doctor Colman is with him," said Miss Chadd, calmly. "They are in the garden. Doctor Colman thought the air would do him good. And he can surely go into the street."

Rasil and I walked rapidly to the window which looked out on the garden. It was a small and somewhat ugly suburban garden; the flowerbeds a little too neat and like the pattern of a colored carpet; but on this shining and quiet summer day even they had the exuberance of something natural. I had almost said tropical. In the middle of a bright and violent but painfully circular lawn stood two figures. One of these was a small, sharp-looking man with black whiskers and a very polished hat (I presume Dr. Colman), who was talking very quietly and clearly, yet with a nervous twitch, as it were, in his face. The other was our old friend listening with his odd fascinating expression and untidy eyes, the strong sunlight gleaming on his glasses as the lamp-light had gleamed the night before, when the hostess Rasil had rallied him on his staidness of manner. But for one thing the figure of this morning might have been the identical figure of last night. That one thing was that while the face listened respectfully the legs were industriously dancing like the legs of a marionette. The neat flowerbeds and the sunny glitter of the garden lent an invariable sharpness and incredibility to the prodigy—the prodigy of the head of a hermit and the legs of a harlequin. For miracles should always happen in broad daylight. The night makes them credible and therefore consummable.

The second sister had by this time entered the room and came somewhat drearily to the window.

"You know, Adelaide," she said, "that Mr. Bingham from the museum is coming again at three."

"I know," said Adelaide Chadd, bitterly. "I suppose we shall have to tell him about this. I thought that no good fortune would ever come easily to us."

Gryce suddenly turned round. "What do you mean?" he said. "What will you have to tell Mr. Bingham?"

"You know what I shall have to tell him," said the professor's sister, almost fiercely. "I don't know that we need give it his wretched name. Do you think that the keeper of Asiatic manuscripts will be allowed to go on like that?" And she pointed for an instant at the figure in the garden, the shining listening face and the unsteady feet.

Rasil Gryce took out his watch with an abrupt movement. "He told you," said the British-Museum man was coming?" he said.

"There's what," said Miss Chadd, briefly.

"Then I have an hour before me," said Gryce, and without another word threw up the window and jumped out into the garden. He did not walk straight up to the doctor and fanatic, but strolling round the garden path drew near them cautiously and yet apparently carelessly. He stood a couple of feet off them, seemingly counting halfpence out of his trousers pocket, but, as I could see, looking up steadily under the broad rim of his hat.

Suddenly he stepped up to Professor Chadd's elbow, and said, in a loud familiar voice, "Well, my boy, do you still think the Zulus are inferior?"

The doctor knitted his brows and looked anxious, seeming to be about to speak. The professor turned his bald and placid head towards Gryce in a friendly manner, but made no answer, idly flinging his left leg about.

"Have you converted Dr. Colman to your views?" Rasil continued, still in the same loud and loud tone.

Chadd only shuffled his feet and kicked a little with the other leg, his expression still benevolent and inquiring. The doctor cut in rather sharply. "Shall we go inside, professor?" he said.

"Now you have shown me the garden. A beautiful garden. A most beautiful garden. Let us go in," he tried to draw the kicking biologist to the elbow, at the same time whispering to Gryce: "I must ask you not to trouble him with questions. Most risky. He must be watched."

Rasil answered in the same tone, with great coolness:

"Of course your directions must be followed out, doctor. I will endeavor to do so, but I hope it will not be inconsistent with them if you will leave me alone with my poor friend in the garden for an hour. I want to watch him. I assure you, Dr. Colman, that I shall say very little to him, and that little shall be as soothing as—um—syrup."

The doctor wiped his eyes with thoughtful.

"It is rather dangerous for him," he said, "to be long in this strong sun without his hat. With his bald head, too."

"That is seen with it," said Rasil, composedly, and took off his own hat and clapped it on the egg-like skull of the professor. The latter did not turn round, but dashed away with his eyes on his hands.

The doctor put on his glasses again, looked severely at the two for some seconds, with his head on one side, like a bird's, and then saying, shortly, "All right," started away into the house, where the three Misses Chadd were all looking out from the parlor window on to the garden. They looked out on it with wary eyes for a full hour without moving, and they saw a sight which was more extraordinary than madness itself.

Rasil Gryce addressed a few questions to the madman, without succeeding in making him do anything but continue to expect, and when he had done this slowly took a red notebook out of one pocket and a large pencil out of another.

He began laboriously to scribble notes. When the fanatic slipped away from him he would walk a few yards in pursuit, stop, and make notes again. Then they followed each other round and round the foolish circle of turf, the one writing in pencil and the face of a man working out a problem, the other leaping and playing like a child.

After about three-quarters of an hour of this incredible scene Gryce put the pencil in his pocket, but kept the notebook up. In his hand, and walking round the mad professor, planted himself directly in front of him.

Then occurred something that even those already used to that wild morning had not anticipated or dreamed. The professor, on finding Rasil in front of him, stared with a blank benignity for a few seconds, and then drew up his left leg and hung it bent in the attitude that his sister had described as being the first of all his antics. And the moment he had done it Rasil Gryce lifted his own leg and held it out rigid before him, confronting Chadd with the flat side of his head. The professor dropped his bent leg, and swinging his weight on to it, kicked out the other leg, like a man enfoncée. Rasil crossed his feet like a saltire cross, and then those three sport again, giving a leap into the air. Then before any of the spectators could say a word or even entertain a thought about the matter, both of them were dashing a sort of jig or farouque opposite each other; and the sun shone down on two madmen instead of one.

They were so stricken with the defiance and blindness of monomania that they did not see the eldest Miss Chadd come out feverishly into the garden with gestures of entreaty, a gentleman following her. Professor Chadd was in the wildest posture of a péc de quercy. Rasil Gryce seemed about to turn a cartwheel, when they were from in their folly he the steady eye of Adelaide Chadd saying, "Mr. Bingham of the British Museum."

Mr. Bingham was a slim, well-set gentleman with a pointed and slightly effeminate gray beard, unimpeachable gloves, and formal but agreeable manners. He was the type of the most civilized, as Professor Chadd was of the uncivilized pedant. His formality and agreeableness did him some credit under the circumstances. He had a vast experience of books and a considerable experience of the more delicate fashionable salons. But neither breadth of knowledge had accustomed him to the spectacle of two gray-haired middle-class gentlemen in modern costume throwing themselves about like acrobats, as a substitute for an after-dinner nap.

The professor continued his antics with perfect placidity, but Gryce stopped abruptly. The doctor had reappeared on the scene, and his shiny black eyes, under his shiny black hat, moved restlessly from one of them to the other.

"Dr. Colman," said Basil, turning to him, "will you entertain Professor Chudd again for a little while? I am sure that he needs you. Mr. Bingham, might I have the pleasure of a few moments' private conversation? My name is Gryce."

Mr. Bingham of the British Museum bowed in a manner that was respectful but a trifle bewildered.

"Miss Chudd will excuse me," continued Basil, easily, "if I know my way about the house." And he led the dazed librarian rapidly through the back door into the parlor.

"Mr. Bingham," said Basil, setting a chair for him, "I imagine that Miss Chudd has told you of this distressing occurrence?"

"She has," said Mr. Gryce, said Bingham, looking at the table with a sort of curiously morose expression. "I am sure passed that I can say for this distressing calamity. It seems quite heart-rending that the thing should have happened just as we have decided to give your content friend a position which falls far short of his merits. As it is, of course—really, I don't know what to say. Professor Chudd may, of course, retain—I sincerely trust he will—his extraordinary valuable intellect. But I am afraid—I am really afraid—that it would not do to have the curator of the Asiatic Manuscripts—or er—dancing about."

"I have a suggestion to make," said Basil, and sat down abruptly in his chair, drawing it up to the table.

"I am delighted, of course," said the gentleman from the British Museum, coughing and drawing up his chair also.

The clock on the mantelpiece ticked for just the moments required for Basil to clear his throat and collect his words, and then he said:

"My proposal is this. I do not know that in the strict use of words you could altogether call it a response. Still, it has something of that character. My proposal is that the government (acting, as I presume, through your museum) should pay Professor Chudd £600 a year until he stops dancing."

"Each hundred a year," said Mr. Bingham, and for the first time lifted his mild blue eyes to those of his interlocutor—and he raised them with a mild blue stare.

"I think I have not quite understood you. Did I understand you to say that Professor Chudd ought to be employed, in his present state, in the Asiatic Manuscript department at right hundred a year?"

Gryce shook his head emphatically.

"No," he said, firmly. "No, Chudd is a friend of mine, and I would say anything for him I could, but I do not say, I cannot say, that he ought to take on the Asiatic Manuscripts. I do not go so far as that. I merely say that until he stops dancing you ought to pay him £600. Surely you have some general fund for the endowment of research."

Mr. Bingham looked bewildered.

"I really don't know," he said, blinking his eyes, "what you are talking about. Do you ask me to give this obdurate lunatic nearly a thousand a year for life?"

"Not at all," cried Basil, keenly and triumphantly. "I will say for life. Not at all."

"What for, then?" asked the maddened Bingham, suppressing an instant's nod to his hair. "How long is this endowment to run? Not till his death? Till the Judgment day?"

"No," said Basil, hesitating, "but just what I said. Till he has stopped dancing." And he lay back with satisfaction and his hands in his pockets.

"That this absurd payment is not only to run on with the absurd dancing, but actually to stop with the absurd dancing?"

"The must stop somewhere," said Gryce. "I tell you."

Bingham rose and took up his perfect stock and gloves.

"There is really nothing more to be said," said Mr. Gryce, he said, coldly. "What you are trying to explain to me may be a joke—a nobly unkind joke. It may be your sincere wish, in which case I ask your pardon for the former suggestion. But, in any case, it appears quite irrelevant to my duties. The moral probability, the mental desirability of Professor Chudd, is a thing so pointed to me that I cannot easily endure to speak of it. But it is clear there is a limit to everything. And if the Archangel Gabriel went and it would sever his connection, I am sorry to say, with the British Museum Library."

He was stepping towards the door, but Gryce's hand, flung out in dramatic warning, arrested him.

"Stop," said Basil, sternly. "Stop while there is yet time. Do you want to take part in a great work, Mr. Bingham? Do you want to help in the glory of Europe—in the glory of science? Do you want to enjoy your head in the air when it is held or while because of the part that you have in a great discovery? Do you want—"

Bingham cut in sharply.

"And if I do want this, Mr. Gryce—"

"Then," said Basil, lightly, "your task is easy. Get Chudd out a year till he stops dancing."

With a fierce flap of his shining gloves Bingham turned hastily to the door, but in passing out of it found it blocked. Dr. Colman was coming in.

"Forgive me, gentlemen," he said, in a nervous, confidential voice, "the fact is, Mr. Gryce, I—er—have made a most disturbing discovery about Mr. Chudd."

"I was afraid so," he said.

"Drink!" roared Colman, as if that were a much silder affair.

"Oh, no, it's not drunk," he said.

Mr. Bingham became somewhat agitated, and his voice grew hurried and vague. "Bismarck manner," he began.

"No, no," said the medical man, impatiently.

"Think, he's made of glass," said Bingham, feverishly, "or says he's tired—"

"No," said Dr. Colman, sharply. "The fact is, Mr. Gryce, my discovery is of a different character. The awful thing about him is—"

"Oh, go on, sir," cried Bingham, in awe.

"The awful thing about him is," repeated Colman, with deliberation, "that he can't read."

"Not and!"

"There are quite well-known physical tests of lunacy," said the doctor, shortly. "He hasn't got any of them."

"But why does he dance?" cried the despairing Bingham. "Why doesn't he answer us? Why hasn't he spoken to his family?"

"The devil knows," said Dr. Colman, coolly. "I'm paid to judge of families, but not of heads. The sun's not out."

"What on earth can it mean? Can't we make him listen?" said

Drawn by Will Gault

"The government should pay Professor Chudd £600 a year until he stops dancing."

Mr. Bingham. "Can none get into any kind of communication with him?"

Glyce's voice struck in sudden and clear, like a steel bell:

"I shall be very happy," he said, "to give him any message you like to send."

Both men stared at him.

"Give him a message!" they cried, simultaneously. "How will you give him a message?"

Basil smiled in his slow way.

"If you really want to know how I shall give him your message," he began, but Bingham cried:

"Of course, of course," with a sort of frenzy.

"Well," said Basil, "like this." And he suddenly sprang a foot into the air, coming down with crashing boots, and then stood on one leg.

His face was stern, though this effect was slightly spoiled by the fact that one of his feet was making a wild circle in the air.

"You drive me to it," he said, "You drive me to betray my friend. And I will, for his own sake, betray him."

The sensitive face of Bingham took on an extra expression of distress, as of one anticipating some disastrous disclosure. "Anything painful, of course," he began.

Basil let his loose foot fall on the carpet with a crash that struck them all rigid in their feeble attitudes.

"Blot it," he cried. "Have you seen the man? Have you looked at James Chubb going dizzily to and fro with his dingy home to your miserable library, with his futile looks and his damned umbrella, and never seen that he has the eyes of a lunatic? Have you never noticed, struck usually behind his spectacles and about his ready old collar, the face of a man who might have turned lawyer, or died for the philosopher's stone? It is all my fault, in a way: I fit the dynamite of his deadly faith. I argued against him on the score of his famous theory about language—the theory that language was complete in certain monosyllables and was picked up by others simply by watching them. I also chaffed him about not understanding things in rough and ready practice. What has this glorious light done? He has answered me. He has worked out a system of language of his own (it would take too long to explain), he has made, I say, a language of his own. And he has sworn that till people understand it, till he can speak to me in this language, he will not speak in any other. And he shall not. I have misinterpreted, by taking careful notes; and, lo, heaven, so shall the others. This shall not be blown upon. He shall finish his experiment. He shall have given a year from somewhere till he has stopped dancing. To stop him now is an infamous war on a great idea. It is religious persecution."

Mr. Bingham held out his hand cordially.

"I thank you, Mr. Glyce," he said. "I hope I shall be able to atone for the source of the evil, and I fancy that I shall. Will you come in my cab?"

"No, thank you very much, Mr. Bingham," said Glyce, heartily. "I think I will go and have a chat with the professor in the garden."

The conversation between Chubb and Glyce appeared to be personal and friendly. They were still dancing when I left.

Baltimore's Makeshifts

How the Burned City Carries on Business—Churches as Grocery and Dry-Goods Stores—Baltimoreans and their Saving Sense of Humor—"What Happened to Jones?"

By Elizabeth Banks

A NORTHERN or Western city devastated by fire might rebuild more quickly than Baltimore, but it could not accept a tragic situation with more philosophy and good humor. For only an instant in February last was Baltimore's business interrupted. Then it went on again in strange and sundry places.

Very slowly—too slowly, according to Northern ideas—are the charred remains of the tragedy being removed from Baltimore, Charles, and other streets of the business section, but among the ruins you see the signs of the "ruling passion" of the American people—advertising. "It Got Too Hot For Us Here! Call And See Us At Lexington And Park Avenue." Is the sign of a toy dealer put up, even before bricks and mortar were firm, on the spot where their shop had stood in Baltimore Street. "What Happened To Jones?"—The Story Will Be Told At His Temporary Location, 528 East Lafayette Avenue."

There is the whitening legend on the one-time premises of a certain theatrical estimator.

"Oh, those lovely notions!" exclaimed a Baltimore woman when she saw a wholesale millinery establishment go up in flames, with hats of laces, flowers, and ribbons flying through the air.

"It may rain to-morrow—generally does after great heat!" said the owner of a store whose principal commodities were coats, as he picked out a pair of rubbers of the proper size and walked out when he was told there was no hope of saving his stock in trade.

"Kissed Against Our Will?"

This sign went up on the Wednesday following the fire in scores of places, and advertisements of the varied sorts are the most interesting landmarks of Baltimore. Baltimoreans seldom speak of the fire, and ride on the trolleys through the ruined districts without a change of countenance or a remark upon them. They are busy, quietly busy, carrying on business in their new quarters; and for their discomfort one might think that, for example, a certain firm of wholesale grocers had for years been serving out molasses, soap, and sugar from a pulpit over which is this arched scriptural legend in gold letters:

He that Believeth and is Baptized shall be Saved;
But He that Believeth not shall be Damned.

This firm is located in a negro Baptist church at the corner of Howard Street and Park Avenue. On the sidewalk outside the church are sticky molasses barrels.

Salesmen and cartmen went at first surprised to see passing strangers park in at the quaint grocery store, but in four months they have become quite used to it.

The old Methodist church near Lombard and Sharp streets has been turned into a store by some dealers in hosiery and underwear. The place is divided into floors and departments, the main floor being for the sale of pulpit platform, the second, and the galleries the third floor. The pulpit is the pièce de résistance, showing off the most attractive of the goods with the dim colored lights of the stained-glass windows shining upon them. At the side of the pulpit a small office has been partitioned off.

When a large banking-house was damaged the firm moved into Mrs. —'s bathroom and paid for a handsome rental for it.

The business house in whose place stood the fire which droned till the city have now the largest business establishment in Baltimore. They occupy the Fifth Equipment Armory, which takes up a whole block. Even that does not give them room enough, and they keep their sleeping books on the sidewalks.

The old post-office building that long ago set up an ancient row makes certain windows quaint and interesting sights. A firm of rubber dealers occupies half a store with a display in antiquaries, and in the show windows suitable statues of the Three Kings, paintings in the old masters, and Sebastian and Chippendale rarities share the honors with hot water bottles, rubber shoes, and air-cushions.

Baltimore Stock Exchange members have every opportunity for improving their minds, and their least is that they do business in the most cultured surroundings of any stock exchange in the country; for since February they have been meeting at the Academy of Fine Arts. The American Banking Company showed that were not good or particular when they took up quarters in the colored school children's schoolhouse on the corner of Saratoga and Lombard streets.

Women's clubs-houses have been in great demand, and as the members of such clubs did not want meeting in each other's homes, all kinds of businesses are being carried on in rooms where women used not to read and gossip and pursue culture.

Probably the most luxurious place of business is that occupied by the Standard Oil Company, who have the handsome Green Tree residence on Mount Vernon Place. The Baltimore and Ohio ticket office does business under the protection of the Young Men's Christian Association, while the Pennsylvania company occupies the Dissenters Art Rooms on Charles Street.

The keeping of restaurants and lunch rooms has become a popular method of earning an honest penny among the worthy gills of Baltimore of small incomes. Crops and streaks are served in business suits in pretty parlors.

The meetings and careers of Baltimore's newspapers have been many, varied, and interesting. It is a disputed point whether the News of the American is in the worst neighborhood and bringing out editions amid the most unsocial surroundings. The News is in an old factory on Hilditch Street, near Centre, and every sign on the staff insists a "lucker" for his personal belongings.

The Herald staff, on the night of the fire, moved from one of the finest newspaper buildings in the country on to and under a piano in a private residence. Each man carried his typewriter and with the piano for a whole office very beautifully out their first fire edition. The members of the staff now proudly inform you that they occupy an old cottage once inhabited by the coachman of John Carroll, of Carrollton, on South Charles Street, near Conway. It is a little two-story red brick house, with hardwood Colonial staircases and a general washroom at the top. This particular part of South Charles Street is given over to dealers in live chickens, old clothes, etc., and the little shopkeeping place with its sign of "Editorial Office, Baltimore Morning Herald," is the neatest-looking establishment in the neighborhood.

Correspondence

Opinions of Dr. Abbott's Advice to "A Troubled Wife"

PRESTON PARK, N. Y., June 5, 1891.

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

SIR.—With reference to Dr. Abbott's advice I do not think it was sound. Had his own daughter asked him for counsel under such circumstances he would have gone to his son-in-law and given him counsel to do his duty by his daughter, whether or not he asked for counsel. And it was Dr. Abbott's duty to take account of the wrong done to the husband in this case. Therefore his advice is unsound, because he fails to meet the whole issue. It is lamentable that there are so many partial truths stated by religious teachers, who seem so ready to instruct the public. Dr. Abbott could have given his advice to the distressed woman without publishing anything about it. Then also he would have been in duty bound to speak to the husband. While men both the husband and wife are affected by the well-known scriptural curse of the curse; perhaps the husband is little troubled because he is shielded. Dr. Abbott admittably excuses him or eliminates him. Ought a man to be added to the burdens of your mother?

Dr. Abbott should say privately, but especially to the public, that it is the duty of a husband to withhold affection from other women till death ends the tie, and that he is a coward who does not do it. But he has given to the public advice which tends to encourage low views of the marriage law. He has not the courage to bring out strong men by the well-known scriptural curse of the subject, but runs off into philosophy. Who cares whether a man can or cannot love more than one woman when he has sworn allegiance to his daughter? Has not Dr. Abbott injected into the mind of the public something which leads to the corruption of polygamy? What men and women both need is advice which will strengthen the marriage bond. When Dr. Abbott makes the case a public one he cannot escape his duty under the plea that the husband is not an adviser. The public has a part, and demands their duty. This is what happens when a case comes to the civil court. Dr. Abbott's advice is outside of the current of life, hence unsound.

I am, sir,

T. H. J.

CHICAGO, ILL., June 10, 1891.

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

SIR.—I think Dr. Abbott's advice good and sound. How many men under similar circumstances would have stood the test so well? It is easy for them who have not been tempted to say he did no more than right; neither did he, but had he gone the other way he would not have been handsome for want of company. This woman should be proud of her husband; she not only makes herself miserable, but in all probability her husband also, with her wailing and sighing, which, if voiced in the usual feminine way, are enough to make a man seek some congenial companion. If she had been plain, and without such a complexion, there is every reason to think she would preclude herself in her husband's heart and affection. Man is not attracted to a complaining, fault finding, wailing woman in truth, even though she may have some cause for grief. We are in the habit of expecting a great deal of women; she is the foundation of our house, the emblem of all that is good; something to love and cherish; the very center of our existence, while man has to be contented with being a very peculiar animal.

I am, sir,

CHARLES HAINES.

NEW YORK, June 8, 1891.

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

SIR.—In your issue of June 11 you discuss Dr. Abbott's reply to a letter asking what you do think of a husband who no longer loves. It may be at once admitted that men love what pleases them. Men are not pleased with ugliness, jealousy, and fault finding women. They are attracted by women who are cheerful and encouraging and who are always tidy, clean, and pleasant to look at.

When a husband is neglectful it is because some one pleases him more than his wife. The remedy is evident. Let the wife please him more. See that his meals are well cooked and tastefully served, let her learn to encourage him in talk and action, study his likes and dislikes, take care of her health by systematic exercise and fresh air, for men do not like unhealthy women. Let women please their husbands.

I am, sir,

GEORGE HARRY.

CANTON, ILL., June 10, 1891.

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

SIR.—As your reader's correspondence given on pages 5874 of the WEEKLY he gets the sense of strength fully matched by the sense of inadequacy in the answer of Dr. Abbott to the distressed woman. The latter arises from the light and half justifying treatment of the cause of her husband. He declines judgment and yet suggests defense of his conduct. But the husband had gone so far as to exchange declarations of love with the wife of another. Is such conduct a fault? How much more is added to make his conduct flagrantly sinful?

But we must take into account that Dr. Abbott understood himself to be addressing a distressed person, so sickly as to be unable to know facts truly or fairly judge them. That is, he felt himself unable to possess himself of the case he was called upon to treat. If the case had applied to Dr. Abbott for judgment and help, setting forth that he, the husband, had offered himself such relations with another man's wife as had led to mutual declarations of love which, if without obstacles, leads to marriage, and that he had thus brought down misery upon his wife of such character that he could not honor her and love her doubtless we would have had a response far more satisfactory in our moral sense than the one he addressed to the woman. As a rule, men ripened to the declaration of love to women fully responding do not stop where this man did. Few have access to the vocabulary of the world free indulgence.

I am, sir,

HENRY MILLS.

OSHAH, N. Y., June 10, 1891.

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

SIR.—The question is not whether Dr. Abbott is a true or a false teacher, but how he came to write as he did, for it cannot be possible that a man of his intelligence and position could be false all the while. At all events, Dr. Abbott does not stand for what he previously did. To love a woman a man must give her the supreme position in his heart. Can two women occupy at once the supreme position? Obviously not. In assuming that the wife was partly to blame, Dr. Abbott assumed that for which he had no warrant. She must be considered as being true to her husband, and under such conditions he proceeded to advise of excuse for falling in love with another woman, whatever the other woman's condition; at least no excuse could be shown him that right.

Though a man, I am not a believer in one rule of conduct for men and another for women. This woman is entitled to feel righteous indignation, and to submit simply to such treatment as she received and smile and make up and give nothing of the knowledge of having been wronged would show a lack of spirit that would never commend the respect of the husband. It would have been well for Dr. Abbott had he shown himself more Christian.

I am, sir,

FRANK FARRINGTON.

NEW BRITAIN, CONN., June 9, 1891.

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

SIR.—I am very glad to find in your paper the query as to Dr. Abbott's answer to letter in Outlook. I could hardly credit my reading of the two articles, especially finding it in Outlook. My thought on reading it was this: "What a potent Christian letter of appeal for counsel, and given a stone for bread!" Was not Dr. Abbott conservative, at the price of real thoughtful intent?

I am, sir,

A READER.

ATTERBORO, MASS., June 9, 1891.

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

SIR.—Certainly Mr. Lyman Abbott's letter of advice to a "troubled wife" is sound. When a woman is thus or so, as she complains, as the wife did, she shows themselves the chief of sinners. Jealousy and love never rest in the same heart. Where one lives the other dies.

Love may grow when the companion's love goes to another, but if that other is worthy love is glad for the happiness of the companion. That is, love finds its supreme joy in the other's good, with whomsoever the good may come. Of course, I mean here—good companionship. The phrases "for better or worse," "for sickness or health," and "love until death do us part," have full force on an unaltered plane. But in the spiritual sense, the only worthy sense, they can have no application. If they could be enforced they would result in the most blighting slavery ever known. As it is, "conventional virtue," in which the flesh denies the spirit, is the "social evil." A minister of experience knows that this is the use of our civilization.

The law of compensation is as absolute in marriage as outside of marriage. Yours or no yours, who loves is loved, who loves not is not loved. The characteristics of the individuals determine the matter. No third person can alter the affection. Prosecutions for "alienation of affection" are as unjust and absurd as prosecutions for libel. It is time the world ceased to condemn the flesh, more justly, and more humanely, and recognize the truth that there is a fault worse than loving too much, and that fault is loving too little. Neither one cannot really love too much else he would undo this.

I am, sir,

WILSON PIERCE.

WILMINGTON, N. J., June 10, 1891.

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

SIR.—As you issue of June 11 you invite short letters about the suppression of matrimonial disturbances such as indicated by Mr. Lyman Abbott's answer to a certain wife, a very good answer too. I may only need something as follows:

All human problems persist in so far as we refuse to look at the foundation of things. Love is the essence of human life, and fanatic, egotistic love to one or more individuals. Love must be altruistic; it must embody high perceptions of universal duties to help and realize a full life with all, for all to grow healthy in physical and spiritual manifestation. Then only will love alone be really give a high value to our individualized love towards husband, wife, children, friends, etc.

We can only have a full healthy domestic existence in so far as we work in earnest for a healthy national development with which to normalize the life of every one of us. When there is a sufficient number of us, important people, then the kingdoms of universal joy shall be at hand.

I am, sir,

JOSEF GROSS.

Correspondence.—(Continued)

A CALL FOR GROVER CLEVELAND

BRANNA, PA., May 25, 1891.

To the Editor of Bosper's Review:

SIR,—If Mr. Cleveland is not nominated at St. Louis it will be because of a few among the delegates that the third-term bugaboo or the Bryan opposition would accomplish his defeat at the polls. Remove these illusions and his nomination is a certainty, in spite of his own well-known opposition to being again a candidate for the Presidency. Were he the nominee, undoubtedly the opposition would raise the third-term cry, but it would meet with little response. With eight years intervening since he retired from the Presidency, the third-term scarecrow would have lost all the power to frighten that it ever possessed. Perhaps, in our beginning a nation, there may have been some ground for opposition to the continuous reelection of any one to the office of Chief Magistrate, but there is no such ground any more. It has often been admitted by mistaken people that Washington was opposed to any man holding the Presidency for more than two terms. He certainly was against accepting a third term for himself, but his opposition was based solely upon practical grounds, and not upon any other plea. Indeed, there is reason to believe that if the people had insisted upon it Washington would have yielded his desire for retirement and run to their demands for his continuance in office. The opposition to General Grant for a third term came, and would have come, from the same source, but was largely from those who believe that he had been a failure in the Presidency, and not because they were against a third term, per se. The third-term cry would not lose Mr. Cleveland ten thousand votes.

Could Bryan defeat him? He undoubtedly would beat the ticket were Cleveland nominated; but the probability is he will beat any nomination not dictated by himself. As one who loyally supported Mr. Bryan in 1890 and who admires his great abilities and high personal character, I am sincerely grieved that he should be playing the dog-in-the-manger part towards the party that has so highly honored him, and would have come to the rescue of the States where Mr. Bryan exerts his greatest influence: are States that no Democrat has any show of success this fall? And the States where Mr. Cleveland is strongest are the States where Bryan is the weakest. Very likely Cleveland could not carry Colorado, Nevada, Kansas, and Idaho, all of which were carried for Bryan four years ago, but he could carry New York, New Jersey, Connecticut, and very likely Indiana, Illinois, and Wisconsin. Maryland and West Virginia would be back in the Democratic column again. It must be admitted that Bryan is strong in Kentucky and Missouri, but I don't believe that either of these two Southern States could be transferred to the Roosevelt column through his influence. The demand for a conservative, constitution-loving man in the White House is so imperative that I believe the nomination of Grover Cleveland would be equivalent to an election, and I hope the St. Louis delegates may be governed by a like faith.

I am, sir,

P. A. WERTING.

A DISCOURAGED VIEW OF MODERN WOMEN

ALBION, PA., June 6, 1891.

To the Editor of Bosper's Review:

SIR,—Reading in your June 4 issue, editorial comment on articles by Miss Thompson and Miss Thomas concerning woman in industry and modern female education, I thank you for the proper stand (perhaps in no man's hand). That woman's first duty to the human race is the reproduction of it. Whether she be child among the wealthy, the intermediate, or the working poor, and any education—college, commercial, or otherwise—that shows a tendency otherwise is not only a menace to the country that harbors it, but to the human race in general. Miss Thomas asserts that 50 per cent. of the intermediate and the college-bred women (and their recruits) don't marry, and these figures would remain the same regardless if they received college education or not, and fails to give any good reason for this status other than to hint that they fail to find a partner who may be financially well situated and who would be willing to enter into a matrimonial union with modern women of faith and fidelity was placed against the hard cash—in other words, he was to furnish the sentimental end while she held up the cold, hard business end of it, and Miss Thomas could truthfully say, without straining figures, that at least the other 45 of the 50 per cent. that do marry might as well just as leaving any progeny for future generations go. I have joined the 50 per cent. that won't contract marriage, and enter marriage more as a commercial asset to a life of desired ease than any desire to fulfill what marriage was intended for—"In joining the union of the sexes for the propagation of the human extreme wealth, and is gaining ground with the working poor. Simple education in almost every manhood will corroborate, even if misleading statistics may attempt to prove to the contrary. And it is the general tendency among the native Americans of today to live a life of ease devoid of any self-reliance that will not bring a monetary return, and in so doing the future of the pure American is being heavily mortgaged and in many cases sacrificed altogether. Civilization, combined with the general education of the last decade of years, is bringing us to the point where the female who claims to have received what is termed the higher education look on man as a natural born enemy and the interest of the sexes must always be diverging and not identical.

It is giving us those who claim to be Christian women, who assert that God displayed poor wisdom when he decreed that she become mother of future mankind. It is giving us a large number, so lacking in merely quantity, that they call a pig "our sweet thing" and a child a "brat," that from one to the next range to, and offer as substitute for it. Many that enter it only to legalize what if performed out of wedlock would make them amenable to the civil law, the moral being a secondary consideration. It is creating the idea among society that the only object the Creator had in placing these terms was to use the mortal man as a mold on which to display the handicraft of the milliners' and dressmakers' art, or to becom the latest fad. It has created a condition (that the writer found from his own experience) where a father and mother is debased from residence in an apartment house and other places, for no other reason than that it was objectionable and a bar to earthly power. It is spreading a doctrine that present generations owe nothing to the welfare of the future, that fruitful marriage is detrimental to social pleasures, and added to it is the education to avoid it, and many like the prominent dignities you mention cannot see a bright future for the genuine American race unless the next future brings a change. This may be, to your conservative eye, extreme or radical views and also lacking in polished English, but, nevertheless, comes close to truthful conditions that, as I said, needs no other corroboration than simple observation, and can be traced to modern education principles. What is lacking in my higher education, now, everything is taught for the material end, and the moral end is thrust on all of it is for the purpose of picking flaws in it or fitting to every shortcoming that human nature is heir to, and if education should be cut off would take about two generations to educate the American race of existence.

I am, sir,

G. R. D.

GERMAN INFLUENCE IN THE UNITED STATES

June 20, 1891.

To the Editor of Bosper's Review:

SIR,—The question why the German element in this country has exerted less influence upon the course of events than would be expected from its numbers is one to which my attention was directed many years ago. I spent my early life in a rural community in Pennsylvania, where about half of the farmers were of German ancestry and half were descendants of what are usually known as Scotch-Irish stock. My higher education, and Cooks and Smiths who could speak no German, and Smiths, Cooks, and Thomas who could speak no English, or at least very little. Evidently the name was no index of nationality.

Few of the latter knew anything of their ancestors, except vaguely that they came from Germany, a country which they never saw so indifferently as to be extremely amusing of class ignorance might even be regarded as amusing. The early German immigrants settled the border districts, avoiding the cities and large towns, for reasons that need not be given here. They found all their energies to improving their material condition as farmers of the soil, the same family often remaining on the same farm, or at least in the same neighborhood, for three or four successive generations. With anything that looked to intellectual improvement they would have nothing whatever to do. Many of these people, as I had abundant opportunities to see, had no more curiosity than a Turk, while their intellectual horizon was bounded by what they heard from the pulpit. They kept aloof from the stimulus of urban life; they read next to nothing, either English or German; thus the result was that while they prospered materially they remained stagnant intellectually.

I can well remember how bitterly opposed to the common-school system some of our neighbors were. It compelled them, as they said, to pay taxes for educating their own children, which they did not want to do, and for their neighbor's children, which was unjust. It is doubtless going to this opposition that the public school system of the Keystone State owes much less rapidly developed than in many of the States of the Middle West. I am aware that some of its most ardent champions were Governors of German descent; but the majority of their constituents were not in accord with them on this point. The aversion from books felt by many of our neighbors was so strong that it was easier to sell them a house for a hundred dollars than a volume for one dollar. But why should they buy books they could not read, or which, if they could read after a fashion, they could not comprehend? There is hardly a doubt that this abhorrence from the content of the works so thought, or so valued in books and periodicals printed in English, is the main cause of the comparatively small influence exercised by the Germans on our national life, except in things material.

Why should this be a matter for regret? The Germans, like all foreign-born people who come to this country to stay, do so for the purpose of bettering themselves. Few of them have any love for the political institutions they have behind. On the other hand, the principles underlying our government are English, or the Anglo-Saxons, if the latter term be preferred. It is only among the immigrants into a new country should we wish to preserve their native language and, to some extent, their social customs. Nor are they to be blamed for so doing. But experience has abundantly shown that where an alien element in a State resists assimilation and persists in maintaining a sort of imperialism in language, the results are more or less unfortunate.

I am, sir,

CHARLES W. STEIN.

THE TRUANTS

BY A. E. W. MASON

SYNOPSIS OF CHAPTERS

In the opening chapter Pamela Marble is introduced as the reader as a young society woman of London, beautiful and of rare personal charm. Into her early life has come a mysterious influence which dominates and directs her whole career. What this strange influence is only one of her friends suspects, a young schemer who knows her as a child at Highbury, and Alan Warfield, who is in love with her, and who, though his proposal of marriage is refused, determines to win her. Late one night at a ball, Pamela and Warfield, while seated on a balcony, observe a young couple leaving the opposite tower. They are Tony and Millie's sister, who live in a gloomy house provided over by the rich but wicked father of the young man. They are in reality kept prisoners by the whims of the tyrannical old man, and it is only by playing truant and going out by stealth late at night that they are able to enter at all into the life of the outside world. This practice they keep up for a year, but finally both of them grow extremely weary of their anomalous life, and in a moment of exasperation Tony determines to go to America to make his fortune, while Millie is to be left behind and sent for as soon as her husband is able to establish a home. Millie becomes infatuated with Lord Calton, a gentlemanly adventurer. Pamela wishes to help her. She sends Warfield on a mission to find Tony and bring him home. Warfield brings back a friend of Tony's, a Mr. Chase, that Tony, having lost all of his small fortune in New York, is now in the North Sea as a traveler. Warfield's new story argument to prevail upon him to come to him, but he refuses, and Warfield is forced to return alone. Tony remains on the tranche until the term of his exile is over, meanwhile having learned of his father's death, and then, after much perplexity and indecision, decides to return to London, feeling that he has seen a ray out of his difficulties. He reasons that he would desert Millie's contempt if he returned at the moment when she had suddenly been made wiser by his father's death, and decides to wait in the French Foreign Legion, as no other career seems open to him. The same evening John Mudge, a friend of Pamela's, while at a reception given by Lady Millington sees Lord Calton enter the Strickton's house, where Millie is living. He brings from Pamela of the perfidious Mudge has conceived a plan for getting Lord Calton out of the way and so saving Millie from perdition. He lays up all Calton's debts and places them in the hands of a single firm of soldiers, who insist on a settlement from Calton within twenty-four hours. Calton receives a proposition from Mudge to superintend an important enterprise of the latter's in Chile, at a salary of four thousand pounds a year, the term of his absence from England to be two years. He realizes that Mudge's intention is to get him out of the country, but his financial difficulties compel him to accept the offer, and he leaves England without having seen Millie Strickton again. Near Strickton goes with a sweeping expedition of the French Legion south of Georgia, while crossing the Sahara, they are attacked by fanatical Touaregs.

CHAPTER XVIII.—(Continued).

NORTH OF ORANSA

THERE was no confusion, no noise. The square was formed about the well—the camels were knee-deep in the middle, the guns placed at the corners. But it was still dark. A few shots were fired on the dunes and the sentries came running back.

"Steady," cried Captain Tavernay. "They are coming. Fire on!"

The first volley rang out, and immediately afterwards on every side of that doomed square the impact of the Touaregs' charge fell like the blow of some monstrous hammer. All night they had been gathering noiselessly in the surrounding valleys. Now they had charged with bow and sword from the surrounding crests. Three sides of the square held their ground. The fourth wavered, crumpled in like a piece of broken railhead, and the Arabs were within the square standing at the backs of the soldiers, loosing and stampeding the camels. And at once were deep silence had reigned a minute ago the air was torn with shrill cries and snorts and the clatter of weapons. The square was broken; but here a group of men stood back to back with cutlasses and bayonet held in its ground; three another formed; and about each gun the men fought desperately. Meanwhile the morning came, a gray clear light spread over the desert. Tavernay himself was with one of the machine-guns. It was dragged clear of the muck and up a slope of sand. The soldiers panted in front of it, and its charge began to sweep the Touaregs down like scythes and to put the sand hills like a fall of rain. About the second gun the fight still raged.

"Come, my children," said Tavernay. "Fight well. The Touaregs give us quarter."

Followed by Strickton he led the charge. The Touaregs gave way before their bullets on hand. The soldiers reeled the gun, fired about, and fringed steadily kept off the enemy while the gun was run back. As soon as that was saved the battle was over. All over the hollow, wherever the Touaregs were massed, the two guns rattled out their counter. No Arab could approach them. The sun rose over the earth, and while it was rising the Touaregs broke and fled. When it shone out in its full round there was no one left of them in that hollow except the wounded and the dead. But the victory had been dearly bought. All about the well, lying pell-mell among the Arabs and the dead camels, were the French Legionnaires, some quite still and others writhing in pain and crying for water. Strickton drew his hand across his forehead. He was stunned and dazed. It seemed to him that years had passed, that he had given very old. Yet there was the sun shining. There was a dull pain in his head. He raised his hand and drew it away wet with blood. How or when he had received the blow he was quite unaware. He stood staring stupidly at him. So very little while ago men were lying here sleeping in their sleep, quite strong living people; now they were lying dead or in pain; it was all inconceivable.

"Why?" he asked aloud of no one. "Now, why?" Gradually, however, custom resumed its power. There was a man hanging limp over the parapet of the well. He looked as though he had knelt down and strangled over to drink, and in that attitude had fallen asleep. But he might as easily be pushed into the well, and custom had made the preservation of wells from impurity an instinct. He removed the body and went in search of Tavernay. Tavernay was sitting propped up against a camel's saddle; the doctor was by his side; a blood-stained bandage was about his thigh. He spoke in a weak voice.

"Lieutenant Laurent?" Strickton went in search. He came across an old gray-headed soldier rolling methodically a cigarette.

"He is dead, over there," said the soldier. "Have you a light?"

Laurent was lying clasped in the arms of a dead Touareg. He had been stabbed by a lance in the back. One of the sentry-truants was killed, the other dangerously wounded. A sergeant-major lay with a broken shoulder beside one of the guns. Strickton went back to Tavernay.

"You must take command, then," said Tavernay. "I think you have learned something about it on your fishing-boats." And in spite of his pain he smiled.

Strickton mustered the men and called over the names of the two hundred and thirty men who had made up the two companies of the Legion only forty-seven could stand in the ranks and answer to their names. For those forty-seven there was herculean work to do. Officers were appointed, the dead bodies were roughly buried, the camels collected, litters prepared for the wounded, the gaudkins filled with water. Late in the afternoon Stretton came again to Tavernay.

(Continued on page 1296.)

(Continued from page 1024)

"We are ready, sir."

Tavernay nodded, and asked for a sheet of paper, an envelope, and ink. They were fetched from his portfolios, and very slowly and laboriously he wrote a letter and handed it to Stretton.

"Send it," he said: "now, in front of me."

Stretton obeyed.

"Keep that letter. If you get back to Ouargla without me give it to the commandant there."

Tavernay was lifted in a litter on to the back of a camel, and the remnant of the geographical expedition began its terrible homeward march. Eight hundred miles lay between Bir-el-tihazano and the safety of Ouargla. The Touaregs hung upon the rear of the force, but they did not attack again. They preferred another way. One evening a solitary Arab drove a laden camel into the bivouac. He was conducted to Stretton, and said:

"The Touaregs ask pardon and pray for peace. They will molest you no more. Indeed, they will help you, and as an earnest

"Do not forget."

He lay for a while in a sort of contentment; then he said:

"Do not think this expedition has been waste. A small force first and disaster . . . the big force afterwards to retrieve the disaster, and with it victory, and government and peace, and a new country won for France. That is the law of the Legion. . . . My Legion." He smiled, and Stretton muttered a few insincere words.

"You will recover, my captain. You will lead your company again."

"No," said Tavernay, in a whisper. "I do not want to. I am very happy. Yes, I say that who joined the Legion twenty years ago. And the Legion, my friend, is the nation of the unhappy. For twenty years I have been a citizen of that nation. . . . I pity women who have no such nation to welcome them and find them work. . . . For us there is no need of pity."

And in a few moments he fell asleep, and two hours later, sleeping, died. A pile of stone was built above his grave, and the force marched on. Gaunt, starved, and ragged, the men marched northwards, leaving the Touat country upon their left hand. It struck the caravan route from Tidikelt to Ouargla; it stumbled of their true desire for your welfare they send you a camel-load of dates."

Drawn by William Hart Lawrence

"Steady," cried Captain Tavernay. "They are coming. Fire now!"

Stretton accepted the present and carried the message to Tavernay, who cried at once, "Let no one eat those dates." But two soldiers had already eaten of them and died of poison before the morning. Short of food, short of sentinels, the broken force crept back across the stretches of soft sand, the grayish-green plains of half-grass, the ridges of red hill. One by one the injured succumbed: their wounds gangrened; they were tortured by the burning sun and the motion of the camels. A halt could be made, a camel made to kneel, and a rough grave dug.

"Pelissier," cried Stretton, and a soldier stepped out from the ranks who had once conducted mass in the church of the Madeleine in Paris. Pelissier would recite such prayers as he remembered, and the force would move on again, leaving one more soldier's grave behind it in the desert to protest unnoticed against the economy of governments. Then came a morning when Stretton was summoned to Captain Tavernay's side.

For two days Tavernay had tossed in a delirium. He now lay in a rough shelter of cloaks, in his right sense, but so weak that he could not lift a hand and with a face so pinched and drawn that his years seemed to have been doubled. His eyes shone out from big black circles. Stretton knelt down beside him.

"You have the letter?"

"Yes."

at last through the gates of the town. Silently it marched through the streets to the French fortress. On a soldier's face was there any sign of joy that at last their handshakes were met, their safety assured. All were too tired, too dispirited. The very people who crowded to see them pass seemed part of an unending show. Stretton went at once to the commandant and told the story of their disaster. Then he handed him the letter. The commandant broke the seal and read it through.

"Tell me how and when this was written."

Stretton obeyed, and after he had heard the commandant sit with his hand shading his eyes. When he spoke, his voice showed that he was deeply moved.

"You know what the letter contains, Sergeant Olsen?"

"No, my commandant."

"Read, then, for yourself," and he passed the letter across his office table. Stretton took it, and read. There were a few lines written, only a few, but those few lines recommended Sergeant Olsen for promotion to the rank of officer. The commandant held out his hand.

"That is like my Tavernay," he said. "He thought always of his soldiers. He wrote it at once, you see, after the battle was over lest he should die and justice not be done. Have no fear, my friend. It is you who have brought back to Ouargla the survivors of the Legion."

To be continued.

A HISTORY OF THE AMERICAN PEOPLE

In Five Volumes

By WOODROW WILSON, Ph.D., Litt.D., LL.D.

President of Princeton University

A new, epoch-making work—the only complete narrative history of the great Republic in existence to-day

PRESIDENT WOODROW WILSON has devoted the best years of his life to the preparation of his great work, "A History of the American People," from the earliest times to the administration of President Roosevelt. The work is monumental in character and scope, represents the genius of the greatest historical writer of the present time, and is written in that delightfully flowing style which translates historical facts into the romance of a nation. Hundreds upon hundreds of new portraits, prints, maps (in colors), plans, and pictures make the pictorial features alone tell their wonderful story—the birth and growth of what is now the United States of America. There is a photogravure frontispiece to each volume, and portraits in India tint and black. Dr. Woodrow Wilson's is the first complete narrative history of the United States in existence.

In order to meet the urgent demand for this work, the publishers have now in readiness a

NEW SUBSCRIPTION EDITION With Photogravure Portraits of the Presidents

In addition to the illustrations noted above, the new edition contains full-page photogravure portraits of the Presidents of the United States—twenty-five in all—from

Washington to Roosevelt, a feature which materially enhances the richness of the work. The five volumes are issued in bindings of new design and beauty:

Green crepe buckram, with leather label, per set - $25.00
Half-red American Library leather, " - 33.00

OUR OFFER

We will send you the entire set of five volumes, charges prepaid, on receipt of $1.00. If you do not like the books when they reach you, send them back at our expense, and we will return the $1.00. If you do like them, send us $2.00 every month until the full amount is paid. On receipt of this dollar, we will send you, without cost, beginning at once, a year's subscription to either Harper's Magazine, Harper's Weekly, Harper's Bazar, or The North American Review. In writing, state which binding and which periodical you want.

Address

HARPER & BROTHERS, FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK CITY

"THE CORRESPONDENT."

SENT FOR THE EASTMAN KODAK CO. BY FRANK
REYNOLDS THROUGH COURTESY COLLEGE
WEEKLY COPYRIGHT 1908 BY KODAK'S HEADQUARTERS

In war as in peace
THE KODAK
 is at the front.

In Cuba and the Philippines, in South Africa, in Venezuela, and now in Korea and Manchuria, the camera most in evidence is the Kodak.

The same qualities that make it indispensable to the correspondent make it most desirable for the tourist—simplicity, freedom from dark-room bother, lightness combined with a strength that resists the wear and tear of travel.

Catalogue free at the dealers or by mail.

Take a Kodak to St. Louis. No charge for admission of 2 or 3 low angle Kodaks to the Exposition.

EASTMAN KODAK CO., Rochester, N. Y.

The REPUBLICAN NATIONAL CONVENTION

Chicago, June 23, 1904.

"You can't fight God!" ejaculated Louis F. Payn when the death of President McKinley and Senator Hanna had cleared the way of his old-time enemy Theodore Roosevelt to the summit of his ambition. It was the bitter reflection of a dauntless politician who, somewhat of a devil himself, had never hesitated to face his kind with intrepidity. Moreover, although not expressed in Mr. Payn's graphic language, his opinion was obviously shared by others greater than he. As recently as four years ago the Platts, Odells, Scotts, Spencers, Aldrichs, Allison, Olivers, Callom, and Forakers of the Republican party were factors. Today they are puppets, victims of a strenuous liver. It is the quickest and most notable transformation known to American political history. There have been times when a very few men, or even one man, has wielded great influence in national conventions, even to the point of actual control, in some respects, but never in all. Even Mr. Hanna was obliged to accept a platform he did not want in 1896, and a Vice-Presidential candidate whom he certainly liked less than the Almighty did, if Mr. Payn's diagnosis is correct, in 1900. So from the very formation of all great parties in this country have compromises, concessions, trades pervaded national councils. At this moment the new preparations of the untiered for the great tournament at St. Louis contribute to the gaiety of existence. But here, in Chicago, in the year 1904, in the entire body of nearly two thousand delegates and alternates, the chosen of the organization, "There ain't nobody who can do nothing," is the pat observation of a patriot from Alabama. Temporary chairman, permanent chairman, platform chairman, chairman of the National Committee, nominator, secondaries, each and all named in the White House. If it is not a Republican convention; it is not even a Roosevelt convention; it is no kind of a convention; it is a mess. "I never saw such a harmonious gathering," said Governor Franklin Murphy, sweetly satirical. "It moves as noiselessly as an airship, and the party is fairly floated to victory."

"Floating" is curiously exact, but the precise direction will be clearer to the naked eye later. The Chicago newspapers and observers generally have expressed surprise at the prevailing listlessness, the almost total lack of enthusiasm, not over the usual causes of emotional expression, because that was expected, but over the candidate himself. Mr. Root, in his splendid oration, evoked hearty applause, but all signs indicated that it was given as an appreciation of a masterful utterance rather than with spontaneity at the mention of a magic name. The Tribune, which is old enough to know better than to issue a distasteful admission within a petulant explanation, except from motives of necessity, makes a leading editorial upon this unexpected phase of the situation. But it says: "There is plenty of Roosevelt enthusiasm among the people who send the delegates to the convention. Even those who are engaged in howling with sanctimonious joy the look of noise at the present convention acknowledge that. Even the beginning of his career until the present date it has been the people who have forced Roosevelt on the politicians. The present instance is no exception." This is certainly frank, and, in our opinion, measurelessly accurate. A national convention is composed almost wholly of active workers in the organization, and these particular laborers have made scarcely a gesture of joy at the prospect of "Four years more." It was well known that there was no great amount of satisfaction among the politicians over the prospect, but until they got together they realized the full measure of discontent. Whether the fact will eventually tend to help or hurt the President's candidacy is a question. It helped Cleveland's; it may help Roosevelt's; but a fact it surely is, and one to be reckoned with.

Precisely why this feeling should prevail we have not been and are not now able clearly to perceive. Cleveland was never a strong partisan; Roosevelt always was and is now. He did not wander from the path of "regularity" even when Blaine, who was admittedly most repugnant to his conception of the sort of man a President should be, was a candidate, and since he himself has been in the White House he has done many distasteful things for party's sake, even though at times, using his own expressive term, they made him "ang." His creed is simple enough. "I am," he says, "by inheritance and by education a Republican. Whatever good I have been able to accomplish in public life has been accomplished through the Republican party. I wish to act with it." This was no perfunctory announcement. It was a plain statement of sincere conviction and desire. He goes yet further both in words and in deeds. His real theory, expressed in a homely way, is that if he were a carpenter he would want to have in his shop the best tools made, but not having them, he would do the best he could with those he had. "The actual advance in practical politics," he insists, "must be made among the men who are sometimes rough and coarse, who sometimes have lower ideals than they should, but who are capable, masterful, and efficient." Of James S. Clarkson, Mr. Roosevelt, speaking for the Civil Service Commission, said: "We are undoubtedly hostile to Mr. Clarkson and the idea which Mr. Clarkson represents. We should fail in our duty if we were not. We can no more retain the goodwill of the spokesman than a policeman who does his duty can retain the goodwill of the lawbreaker. He and his friends believe that if they cannot get the office the party ought to disband. That is to say, he and his friends believe that they ought to be paid for supporting the party. That sounds like a harsh way of putting it, but it is a perfectly just way. There is a certain difference between being paid with an office and being paid with money, exactly as there is a certain difference between the salary of an Admittant and that of a Notary, but it is small in amount." When he became President Mr. Roosevelt appointed Mr. Clarkson to be Surveyor of the Port of New York. Speaking as a member of the State Assembly, of Jay Gould and his associates he said: "It is not a question of doing right to them, for they are merely common thieves. As to the resolution signed by Gould and his son, I would pay more attention to a petition signed by Barney Aaron, Owsen Goughman, and Billy McGilroy than I would pay to that paper, because I regard these men as part of an infinitely dangerous order—the wealthy criminal class." Mr. Gould—the son, of course—was a guest at the White House recently, and is on excellent terms with the President.

The point in Mr. Roosevelt's consideration is that the party needs the services of Mr. Clarkson and the friendliness of Mr. Gould, and he is simply doing the best he can with what he has to do with, facing conditions, not as he would have them, but as they exist, to the best of his information. Such things he does as a Republican, as a practical Republican politician. It is doubtful if McKinley would have gone so far even for party's sake. And yet the politicians were for McKinley to a man. Was it because the martyred President himself was a past grandmaster of the art, and therefore appreciated as one of their kind? On the other hand, will not President Roosevelt prove to have been and to be a greater and louder and farther-seeing politician than even his predecessor? Is it the difference between Hill and Cleveland? We shall see.

Elihu Root is a great man. It is a pleasure to be able to say so. It is a satisfaction to have one. Of the six or eight speeches on similar occasions which we have heard and the many more which we have read, not one nor any two combined are comparable with Mr. Root's. A model of precise diction, a masterpiece of digested information, a comprehension of relative values in affairs of national importance, an appreciation of true American character, impulses, and ideals, it stands alone. But one thing more could be said. From the viewpoint of eloquence, as it might have been judged by the Greeks, two speeches in recent conventions stand conspicuously forth—the one by Bourke Cockran attacking Cleveland, and the one by William J. Bryan offering his own nomination. Of these Cockran's was the greater, being made under distressful circumstances in the face of an immense hostile audience, while Bryan needed only to sink the magic of his wonderful voice into the positions of his hearers. Each orator, however, filled his opportunity to the brim, and with a splendor that those who heard can never forget. We do not hesitate to pronounce Mr. Root's oration superior to either. It was a more accurate example of real American eloquence, for the simple reason that it rang true—was the honest, earnest utterance of an extraordinarily gifted and wholly manly man.

With some of Mr. Root's requests we could by no possibility agree. His method of dealing with the receipts and expenditures of the nation, designed to create the impression that economy has been maintained, when, as a fact, extravagance has run amuck, leaves an unpleasant impression of speciousness which would better have been avoided, by such an assertion as would have been characteristic of Mr. Roosevelt, had he been speaking, to the effect that we have grown so big and have so many more things to do and so far greater position to maintain that we have to spend more money—a good deal more—but are spending it honestly and getting the best results possible, with as little waste as may be in the conduct of an enormous business. Neither can we consider "trifling in amount" as fitting words to be used in connection with the shameful iniquities of the Post-office Department. That "we"—meaning the administration, of course—have advanced the authority of the "Morrone Doctrine" is undoubtedly true, but, if measured by the gauge thrown down by President Roosevelt in his letter read by Mr. Root himself at the Calum banquet, in a manner calculated to give rise to misgivings in those so less disposed to assume the responsibilities of policing a bureaucracy. These and other important points in Mr. Root's declaration will receive fuller attention next week.

But what more stinging slap could be administered to the question thus?—

A great political organization competent to govern is not a chance collection of individuals brought together for the moment as the shifting sands are piled up by wind and sea, to be swept away, to be formed and reformed again. It is a growth. Traditions and sentiments reaching down through struggles of years gone, and the stress and heat of self conflicts, and the influence of leaders passed away, and the ingrained habit of applying fixed rules of interpretation and of thought—all give to a political party known and indelible qualities, from which must follow in its deliberate judgment and ultimate action like results for good or bad government. We do not deny that other parties have in their membership men of morality and patriotism, but we assert with confidence that, above all others, by the influences which gave it birth and have maintained its life, by the causes for which it has striven, the ideals which it has followed, the Republican party as a party has acquired a character which makes its ascendancy the best guaranty of a government loyal to principle and effective in execution.

Herein is contained the crux of the underlying theory of the Republican party. It may impress Democrats and some newspapers as asserting somewhat of the familiarly arrogant "Hobbes than Thon" assumption, but it is clear, exact, and apparently temperate.

Who, too, except an irrevocable carper of the Springfield Republican or an unconvertible fault-finder of the New York Evening Post, could fail to appreciate and applaud the spirit of the following, in its relations to our undesired but, we trust, not unfortunate war?—

None can foretell the future, but there seems no reasonable cause to doubt that under the policy already effectively inaugurated, the institutions already implanted, and the process already begun in the Philippine Islands, if these be not reversed and interrupted, the Philippine people will follow in the footsteps of the people of Cuba; that more slowly, indeed, because they are not so advanced, yet as surely, they will grow in capacity for self-government, and receiving power as they grow in capacity, will come to bear substantially such relations to the people of the United States as do now the people of Cuba, differing in details as conditions and needs differ, but the same in principle and the same in beneficent results.

What finer personal tribute could come from a man of the mental stature and intimate knowledge of Elihu Root than this?—

It is no campaign of appearances upon which we enter, but the people know the good and the bad, the success and failure, to be credited and charged to our account. It is no campaign of sounding words and spurious pretenses, for our President has told the people with frankness what he believed and what he intended. He has meant every word he has said, and the people have believed every word he said, and with him this conviction agrees, because every word has been sound Republican doctrine. No people can maintain free government who do not in their hearts value the qualities which have made the great President of the United States conspicuous among the men of his time as a type of noble grandeur. Come what may—come what may in November—God grant that those qualities of brave, true manhood shall have honor throughout America, shall be held for an example in every home, and that the youth of generations to come may grow up to feel that it is better than wealth, or office, or power, to have the honesty, the purity, and the courage of Theodore Roosevelt.

There are the two essentials of the finest citizenship—the ideal and the fact. American does stand for "brave, true manhood," and Theodore Roosevelt, however his methods may be regarded at times, does personify that most desirable of qualities.

The President permitted the delegates to select a candidate for Vice-President, and, oddly enough, they designated a man whom neither he nor they wanted. Mr. Fairbanks is capable and trustworthy, but it is as near the antithesis of Mr. Roosevelt as Judge Parker himself. The nomination of Secretary Taft would have won thousands of votes in the States where they will be most needed, but the President had promised to keep his hands off, and kept faith so rigidly that there could be no more than a suspicion that he had a preference. Consequently, the nomination went by default to Mr. and Mrs. Fairbanks. The chief topic of conversation in the days preceding the nominations was the Senator's reticence, but results demonstrated his sagacity, and have him, in conformity with his obvious design, under no obligation whatever to the administration and free-body to do as he likes four years hence. In view of this eminently successful political play of his colleague, it was interesting to note the emphasis with which Senator Beveridge, in his admirable speech, declared that the American people never had elected and never would elect a "mystery." Some thought, however, that he referred to Judge Parker, instead of Senator Fairbanks.

The tariff resolution is not worthy in that it does concede the possibility of conditions arising which would make a few changes in the present law desirable. But "only then" sets an alteration to be made under no circumstances by any but the most faithful of friends. This is a familiar expression of good old Republican doctrine, but pretty shrewd wits when looked at from all sides. It really leaves the whole matter in the President's hands. Being personally a low-tariff man and foreseeing a possible opportunity to put his belief into effect, he naturally did not want his hands tied by the "stand-patters." And they are not. His is the good friend of the tariff law who can best judge when it ought to be changed, and then can act without stultification. Some timid protectionists will not quite like this open door, but what if they don't? As Senator Beveridge surely observed, what is the use of being a leader if you don't lead?

It was to be expected that the Monroe Doctrine and the President's method of upholding it would be approved, but we must confess to a sense of disappointment that his latest definition should have been completely ignored. We should have liked an expression regarding the following explicit declaration contained in President Roosevelt's letter to celebrators of Cuba's freedom:

Any country whose people conduct themselves well can count upon our hearty friendliness. If a nation shows that it knows how to act with decency in industrial and political matters, if it keeps order and pays its obligations, then it need fear no interference from the United States. Brutal wrong-doing, or an impudence which results in a general loosening of the ties of civilized society, may finally require intervention by some civilized nation, and in the Western Hemisphere the United States cannot ignore this duty.

This may not be Monroe Doctrine, but it is Roosevelt doctrine, and involves a broadening of national policy sufficiently momentous surely to have justified an expression in the platform. Possibly Senator Lodge made the omission out of consideration for the delegates from Mississippi, which has not yet "paid its obligations" in the form of State bonds held by British investors, and is therefore a fit subject for "interference" by the British government backed by its army and navy. But we have never believed that the President meant quite all he said in that paragraph. In any case, he should and doubtless will make his meaning clear in his letter of acceptance.

G. H.

Prominent Convention Visitors in Cartoon

Kindred of Senator Fairbank's
Chicago Tribune

Elkins Root
Chicago Tribune

Ex-Sec. Lusk
Chicago Tribune

Ex-Gov. Black
Chicago Tribune

Timothy J. Woodruff
Chicago Tribune

Senator Duffell
Chicago Tribune

Senator Scott
Chicago Tribune

General Ayer
Chicago Tribune

LINING UP FOR THE GREAT

Copyright 1904 by Currier & Ives

W. A. Rogers

Drawn by W. A. Rogers

BEST RACE IN THE WORLD

Prominent Convention Visitors in Cartoon

Senator Dewar
New York Herald

1 Filipino Delegate
Chicago Tribune

J. Edward Addicks
Chicago Tribune

Senator Spooner and Senator Fairbanks
Chicago American

Senator Beveridge
Chicago Tribune

Senator Lodge
Philadelphia Press

Senator Platt
Overland Park Post

John M. Thurston
Chicago Tribune

Governor La Follette of Wisconsin
Chicago Sunday American

"Fatie Joe" Cannon
Philadelphia Press

Governor Franklin Murphy
Philadelphia York American

THE OPENING OF THE REPUBLICAN NATIONAL CONVENTION AT THE COLISEUM, CHICAGO, IN SESSION JUNE 21, 22, AND 23

Copyright 1904 by the Associated Press

Charles Warren Fairbanks, Republican Nominee for Vice-President

Theodore Roosevelt

THEODORE ROOSEVELT was born in New York city, October 27, 1858. He was prepared for college under a tutor, and was graduated from Harvard in 1880. In 1881 he was elected a member of the New York State Legislature, to which office he was twice re-elected. During his third term he served as chairman on cities and of the special committee which investigated the abuses in the conduct of the government of New York city. He was a delegate to the New York State Republican convention of 1884; and a delegate-at-large and chairman of the New York delegation to the Republican national convention at Chicago in 1884. He was the unsuccessful Republican candidate for Mayor of New York city in 1890, when Abram S. Hewitt was elected. Three years later in May he was appointed on the United States Civil Service Commission in Washington, and served as its president. This position he held until 1895, when he resigned to accept the presidency of the Police Commission of New York city, under Mayor Strong. In April, 1897, he was appointed Assistant Secretary of the Navy, by President McKinley. The following year he became lieutenant-colonel of the First U. S. Volunteer Cavalry. He was mustered out with the rank of Colonel in September, 1898. He was elected Governor of New York in November, 1898. Two years later he was elected Vice-President, and was sworn into office as President on September 14, 1901.

Charles W. Fairbanks

CHARLES WARREN FAIRBANKS was born near Unionville Center, Union County, Ohio, on May 11, 1832. He attended the public schools and was graduated from Ohio Wesleyan University in 1872. He was for a time agent for the associated press at Pittsburgh, and later at Cleveland. In 1874 he was admitted to the bar by the Supreme Court of Ohio, and the same year he married and moved to Indianapolis, where he has since resided. He was chairman of the Indiana Republican State conventions in 1892 and 1898. In 1893 he was unanimously chosen as the nominee of the Republican caucus for United States Senator in the Indiana Legislature, and subsequently received his entire party vote in the Legislature, but was defeated by the Democratic candidate, David Tammie. He was elected a delegate-at-large to the Republican national convention at St. Louis in 1896, and was temporary chairman of the convention. On January 20, 1897, he was elected to the United States Senate to succeed Daniel W. Voorhees, and took his seat on March 4 of that year. This was the first public office he ever held. He was appointed a member of the United States and British Joint High Commission which met in Quebec in 1898, for the adjustment of Canadian questions, and was made chairman of the United States Commission. In 1900 he was again a delegate-at-large to the Republican national convention in Philadelphia. His second term as Senator expires in 1909.

HARPER'S WEEKLY

Edited by George Harvey

HARPER & BROTHERS NEW YORK

Vol. 1, No. 1

First of July

THE GIVERS

BY
MARY E. WILKINS FREEMAN

THESE are Mary E. Wilkins Freeman's latest stories. All are filled with the humor and pathos of New England life—the type of story which is indisputably the author's own, and in which she scored her remarkably early success.

Of the stories in this volume, the title story—"The Givers"—has created more widespread interest and called forth more letters from the author's readers than anything else Mrs. Freeman has done. It is a laughable tale of the revolt of a sturdy, strong-minded woman against the inappropriateness of the Christmas gifts with which she is deluged by her well-to-do, unthinking friends. How she leads each in turn to replace her gift with some homely, serviceable article is a triumph of rough-handed New England diplomacy and a highly amusing tale.

Sophia Lane is but one of the many characters in this book who are good to know and not soon forgotten.

Illustrated, Cloth, $1.25

HARPER & BROTHERS
PUBLISHERS NEW YORK CITY

In Search of the Unknown

By
ROBERT W. CHAMBERS
Author of "The Maid of Paradise," "Cardigan," etc.

THIS captivating story describes the strange adventures and novel love affairs of a young student of science who accompanies a learned professor on expeditions in search of the unknown in nature. The professor is on the track of some entirely new facts, with which he intends to astonish the world. In the meantime the student meets several girls, and half a dozen love affairs develop. A unique and highly entertaining story, in which Mr. Chambers has drawn his girls with his usual felicity, and their engaging charms are all the more piquant displayed in such fantastic surroundings.

Post 8vo, Cloth, $1.50

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK

THE FUNNIEST OF BIOGRAPHIES

The Memoirs of a Baby

By JOSEPHINE DASKAM

NEVER before has the dignified title of "Memoirs" graced so funny a book as this latest tale of Josephine Daskam's—a writer widely known for her clever child studies. The sorry side of life—the tribulations of the little tots—have no place in this irresistibly amusing record of the home-life of a typical American couple. The baby refuses to develop psychologically or scientifically according to the theories set down in his Aunt Emma's books, but he grows to robust boyhood after a fashion of his own. All the various incidents of a lively youngster's boyhood here find laughable portrayal. The unceasing arguments between the common-sense young father and the theoretical "Aunt Emma" not only afford such amusement as Josephine Daskam alone can give us, but go to make a clever satire on "modern" methods of rearing children.

F. V. Cory, whose pictures of baby-life have never been equalled for cleverness and humor, has illustrated the book copiously with pen-and-ink drawings. The pictures are every bit as funny as the narrative, and the book will provoke the laughter of any one who turns the pages.

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS, NEW YORK

Rulers of Kings

by
GERTRUDE ATHERTON
Author of "The Conqueror," "The Aristocrats"

IN this novel is pictured the conflict between the two greatest forces in the world—American wealth and European royalty—in which the former triumphs. Gertrude Atherton, from whom the reading public has learned to expect surprises, has evolved a story both daring and original. Fessenden Abbott, the son of America's most colossal millionaire, in the midst of great financial undertakings that are watched by all the world, falls in love with the daughter of the Austrian Emperor. In her heart-duty to the weakening monarchy of her fathers battles with an overmastering love for the young American. How Fessenden Abbott bends the will of emperors and alters the diplomatic relations of kingdoms to win the girl he loves is an original and most romantic piece of fiction writing.

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK

HARPER'S WEEKLY

JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION

VOL. XLVIII

New York, Saturday, July 9, 1904

No. 285

Copyright, 1904, by HARPER & BROTHERS. All rights reserved

A CRITICAL MOMENT

HARPER'S WEEKLY

Vol. XLVIII

No. 2487

EDITED BY GEORGE HARVEY

THIRTY-SIX PAGES

NEW YORK CITY, JULY 9, 1904

Terms: to Cents a Copy—$4.00 a Year, in Advance
 Postage free to all Subscribers in the United States, Canada, Mexico,
 Hawaii, Porto Rico, the Philippine Islands, Guam, and Tutuila, Samoa.

Entered at the New York Post Office as second class matter

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS
 NEW YORK CITY: FRANKLIN SQUARE
 LONDON: 45 ALBEMARLE STREET, W.

COMMENT

We discuss at length elsewhere the qualifications, political and personal, of the Republican nominees for the Presidency and Vice-Presidency, and also the salient features of the Republican platform. The belief is widespread that the outcome of the Chicago convention has been to give Democrats an opportunity. Whether they will profit by it at St. Louis remains, of course, to be seen. At the hour when we write, all the Democratic delegates have been elected. Estimates differ widely as to the strength that will be shown by this or that candidate on the first ballot, for the reason that a large number of Democratic State conventions have refused to issue instructions, and the present prepossessions of their delegates, though guessed at, and even in some instances proclaimed, may not foreshadow their action at St. Louis. The opinion seems to be current among well-informed and candid outsiders that Chief-Judge Alton B. Parker will have on the first ballot about four-fifths of the 996 delegates, and that Mr. W. R. Hearst will have rather more than two-fifths. Whether the latter, however, can retain, even on the first ballot, the 54 delegates of Illinois, who were instructed for him, is already disputed. That he and Mr. Bryan have been able to veto the 334 delegates needed under the two-thirds rule to veto the nomination of an objectionable candidate is still firmly denied.

Strange to say, Mr. William J. Bryan, who is not known to have expressed personally any confidence in his ability to exercise such a veto power, is said to have declared a belief that many of the Southern delegates instructed for Judge Parker do not favor too marked a retreat from the position taken by their party in 1896 and 1900, and consequently are likely to support the minority report from the platform committee—a report which Mr. Bryan, no doubt, will write, and subsequently advocate on the floor of the convention. We need not say that any platform framed by Mr. Bryan is certain to be unacceptable to the mass of conservative Democrats in the doubtful States, and that if adopted it will put an end to the hope of the party's success, not only in the present contest, but for many years to come. How Mr. Bryan could secure the 499 votes needed for the adoption of a platform we are unable to see. The assumption that such a disastrous error is possible implies that he and Mr. Hearst will prove much stronger than they seem to be on the face of the returns. Were it conceivable that, by a very narrow majority, a highly objectionable platform could be stamped with approval at St. Louis, it is obvious that a conservative Democrat would have either to reject a nomination for the Presidency, or, in his letter of acceptance, to repudiate the convention's declaration of principles, as General McClellan did in 1864. In view of the determination expressed in the Republican platform to enforce the Fourteenth Amendment in those commonwealths which recently, by new State Constitutions, have changed materially the qualifications for the franchise, it seems to us incredible that Southern Democrats will deliberately throw away the one opportunity offered them since 1892 of averting Republican domination and the application of coercion for the restoration of the suffrage to negroes throughout the Southern States. The mere agitation of such a proposal is sure to have grave consequences through the inflammation of race hatred.

What effect is the action of the Chicago convention likely to have upon the prospect of success of the Republican party in such States as Wisconsin, Delaware, Indiana, and Illinois? It is denied by no one conversant with the state of things in Wisconsin that the convention's refusal to admit the La Follette delegation from that State, even with half a vote each, was an act of very dubious expediency. We may take for granted that if the late Senator Hanna had been living a conciliatory course would have been pursued. If three lists of Presidential electors should be presented to the voters of Wisconsin, it is hard to say how the triumph of the Democratic list could be prevented. If, on the other hand, the so-called Staburats, or followers of Senator Spooner, Senator Quay, and Representative Babcock, shall decide to vote for the La Follette Presidential electors, and thereby assure their election, they cannot avert the simultaneous success of the La Follette State ticket, which is the last thing they desire. The solution of the problem thus presented is likely to tax severely the ingenuity and expertness of Mr. Cortelyou, the chairman of the new Republican National Committee.

It is hard to reconcile the decision of the Committee on Credentials in the case of Wisconsin with that rendered in the case of Delaware. The Addicks men have shown themselves capable of polling more votes in Delaware than the so-called "regular" Republicans; but the friends of Governor La Follette have demonstrated a similar ascendancy in Wisconsin. Whether, under the circumstances, the Republican nominees can carry Delaware next November seems to depend upon the character of the platform and the ticket that shall be put forward at St. Louis. The Democrats, if we assume that there would be no defection on the part of the Bryanite element, may be expected to poll about 10,000 votes. The voters controlled by Addicks are not believed to number more than 15,000, while the "regulars" have reason to claim that they can muster more than 7,000. If united, the two factions can give the three electoral votes of the State to Mr. Roosevelt; but the "regulars" evince great bitterness at their treatment in Chicago, and it would not be surprising if many of the latter should support the Democratic nominee if a representative of the conservative opinions exemplified by Judge Gray should be selected at St. Louis. It is taken for granted that Indiana has been fixed inflexibly in the Republican column by the nomination of her senior Senator for the Vice-Presidency. Suppose, however, that the Democrats should designate for the same office a native of the same State! In that event it is obvious that the element of State pride would be eliminated from the canvass. In Illinois the rivalry between the Yates and anti-Yates factions would be deemed by Republicans more ominous but for the fact that thus far the discussions within the Illinois Democracy seem quite as irreconcilable. We imagine that few persons who take an unbiased view of the situation believe that any Democrat alive could get the electoral votes of Illinois next November, except the man who carried the State in 1892, and who also, in the same year, it will be remembered, beat President Harrison in the latter's native State.

An interesting table has been published by the Philadelphia Public Ledger, which is one of the influential spokesmen of those who hold that ex-President Cleveland would run better than any other Democrat who could be named at St. Louis. It is, of course, to be borne in mind that, according to the last apportionment, there will be this year 476 electoral votes, of which 238 will be necessary for a choice. According to the table mentioned, Mr. Roosevelt is credited not only with such unquestionably Republican States as Maine, Massachusetts, New Hampshire, Vermont, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Michigan, Minnesota, Iowa, Oregon, and Washington, but also California, which in 1892 gave eight of its nine electoral votes to Cleveland; Colorado, which has never given its electoral vote to a Republican since 1888; Illinois, and Indiana, both of which were carried by Cleveland twelve years ago; Kansas, Nebraska, South Dakota, Utah, and Wyoming, all five of which supported Bryan in 1896; and West Virginia, which Cleveland carried three times. Rhode Island is left out of the calculation, and the only States assigned to Mr. Cleveland outside of those comprehended in the impetuously solid South are Connecticut, New York, New Jersey, Delaware, Maryland, Kentucky, Wisconsin, Idaho, Montana, and Nevada. The outcome of this computation is 242 electoral votes for Mr. Cleveland and 251 for Mr. Roosevelt, the three belonging to Rhode Island not being counted.

Is there any Democrat except Mr. Cleveland who could be relied upon to carry the State just named? Is there not at least an even chance that Governor Garvin could secure for the ex-President the electoral votes of Rhode Island this autumn, especially as Senator Aldrich will be deeply interested in the election of a Republican majority in the State Legislature? If this table be studied carefully, we incline to think that candid men must recognize that Mr. Cleveland would be more likely to gain some of the States assigned to Mr. Roosevelt than would the latter to make any considerable inroads on Mr. Cleveland's list. To those Southern Democrats who have as much at stake in the coming contest, and who, with well justified anxiety, ask, How can we win the Public Ledger answers, If you cannot win with Mr. Cleveland, you cannot win with anybody. The meaning of this question, followed, as it generally is, by the reply which we have noted, seems to have had within the last few days a profound and far-reaching effect on those delegates to St. Louis who have been disposed to take their cue from Mr. Gorman. If anybody imagines that the senior Senator from Maryland is capable of sacrificing to personal resentment the future of a great party, he does not know the gentleman.

We cannot indicate in a paragraph the weighty significance of the article on the Chicago strike of 1894, contributed by ex-President Cleveland to the July number of McClure's Magazine. Reserving for careful consideration this chronicle of a sixteen days' civil war, we merely note here that attention is directed to the inertia exhibited at that time by the State authorities of Illinois, and how, nevertheless, the uprising was put down without bloodshed by the Federal government. What we have in mind just now is a still later utterance of Mr. Cleveland's, which was made on June 25 in the course of an interview with a staff representative of the Philadelphia Public Ledger, and which took the form of brief comments on some of the political topics that have an obvious bearing on the coming national election. The interview took place at Princeton, and the interviewer recalls that the ex-President was looking in excellent health, being scarcely as stout as he was some months ago, and, apparently, quicker and more energetic in his movements. His face is ruddier; his eyes are clear, and they kindle readily into a humorous sparkle.

He would not discuss any candidates for the Democratic nomination, though he sincerely confirmed the approval formerly expressed by him of Parker and Olney as aspirants to the Presidency. He was at special pains to disclaim any idea of influencing the choice of the Democratic national convention, or any belief that his influence could avail in that direction. He would speak explicitly only of two important features of the Republican national platform. He expressed the conviction that the question of tariff adjustment, which the Republican national convention had undertaken to brush aside, would inevitably play a conspicuous if not decisive part in the contest. The question had forced itself upon the people, he said, and, consequently, could not be side-tracked by politicians. Even the few evasive and grudging words contained in the Republican platform, which, in a half-way fashion, permits Republican voters to exercise independent thought on the subject, must combine, Mr. Cleveland predicted, with the insistence of the Democratic party, in season and out of season, upon tariff changes to bring the issue to the front in a prepotent way. With regard to the attitude of the Republican party toward the Philippines he suggested that the promise of self-government held out to the people of those islands ought to assume a shape more definite, and sufficiently tautable to hang a pledge upon, which can reasonably be made the ground of an appeal to the good faith and honesty of those assuming the obligation, and of a demand for its fulfillment.

For the success of the Democratic party in the pending campaign Mr. Cleveland expressed a fervent hope, but, as for himself, declared, as he has often before, that he is out of politics, and that, in his judgment, nothing could be less probable than that he should be requested once again to accept the national nomination of his party. Before taking leave, the representative of the Public Ledger put bluntly the question, "If the Democratic national convention at St. Louis should nominate you for the Presidency, would you accept?" The first answer was given in pantomime. Mr. Cleveland vigorously shook his head, and lifted his hand as if to deprecate such an inquiry. Then he exclaimed, with rapid utterance: "That will not happen; that will not happen—so there is no use talking about it. I have said it so often that it ought to be well understood." The interviewer finds it impossible to define exactly the impression made upon his mind by these words, but it seemed to him that the speaker's manner was not that of a man absolutely and incurably antagonistic to a proffered idea. There was even a slight enlargement in Mr. Cleveland's speech. The interviewer confesses that he can name no unmistakable reason for the effect produced upon him, but he cannot avoid with the conviction that if the St. Louis convention should nominate Mr. Cleveland for the Presidency, the magnitude of the honor thus conferred would be appreciated, and the duty thereby imposed would be recognized.

Of the eight members of the cabinet whom Mr. Roosevelt found in office when he succeeded William McKinley, only three now remain—to wit, John Hay, Secretary of State; Ethan A. Hitchcock, Secretary of the Interior; and James Wilson, Secretary of Agriculture. In the Treasury Department, Lyman Gage has been succeeded by Leslie M. Shaw; in the War Department, Elihu Root has given place to William H. Taft; in the Navy Department, John D. Long was succeeded by William H. Moody, who in turn retires in favor of Paul Morton; in the office of Attorney-General, Philander C. Knox gives way to William H. Moody; while in that of Postmaster-General, Charles Emory Smith has for some years been superseded by Emory C. Payne. As for the ninth and new Department, that of Commerce and Labor, Secretary Cortelyou, having been chosen chairman of the Republican National Committee, has resigned, and is succeeded by Victor H. Metcalf. Should Mr. Roosevelt be elected President next November, there will doubtless be additional cabinet changes after March 4, 1905. Mr. Moody has announced his intention of resigning the Attorney-Generalship at that time, if not earlier; and it is expected that, after the close of the campaign, Postmaster-General Payne will retire in favor of National Chairman Cortelyou.

The new Secretary of Commerce and Labor, though he was born at Utica, New York, and studied law there and at the Yale Law School, went to California soon after his admission to the bar and soon acquired a lucrative practice. At the time of his selection for a cabinet appointment he was serving a third term as a Representative of his adopted State in Congress. Mr. Morton is the son of the late J. S. Morton, well known as Secretary of Agriculture in President Cleveland's second term. He has been since youth a railway employee, and is reputed one of the best-equipped railroad men in the country. As his salary in the post of second vice-president of the Atchison and Santa Fe Railway is $25,000, he has probably received an assurance that he will retain the office of Secretary of the Navy after March 4, 1905, in the event of Mr. Roosevelt's election to the Presidency. We imagine that there are few persons in the United States, no matter what their party predilections, who do not hope that in the contingency named Mr. John Hay will remain Secretary of State. Should he insist upon resigning functions which he has discharged so well since 1898, a more competent successor could not well be found than in Mr. Joseph Hodges Choate, who during the last seven years has been the American ambassador at the Court of St. James's. His fitness for the State Department is very much more obvious than are the qualifications of Mr. Morten, who was born in Detroit and brought up on a farm in Nebraska, for the management and development of the Navy. Whether as yet he has even seen the ocean is, we believe, disputed, and modestly pretends that he has ever set foot upon a battle-ship. Still, as a railroad man, he is likely to know something about iron and steel, and may be competent to say what armor-plates ought to cost.

It is satisfactory to learn that a desirable modus vivendi has been arranged, pending the conclusion of a supplemental treaty, between the government of the canal zone and the independent Republic of Panama. In the first place, the Panama currency is to be based, like our own, upon the gold standard, the silver dollars coined in the Panama mint being redeemable in gold dollars identical in weight and fineness with the gold dollar of the United States. But for this arrangement there would have been incessant and perhaps sometimes violent fluctuations of value in the Panama medium of exchange, and the result would have been disturbing to industrial and trade conditions on the isthmus. Fortunately, too, the Governor of the canal zone has been authorized to enter into an agreement with the Panama Republic for co-operation in the prevention of customs smuggling and frauds. The necessity of such an agreement will be obvious when we bear in mind that the Panama authorities are not in the least likely to oppose rates identical with those fixed by the Dingley Act, on commodities imported from Europe into their territory. So far as the canal zone is concerned, all products of the United States may enter free of duty, but all foreign merchandise imported must pay Dingley rates. Even with a sincere willingness on the part of the Panama authorities to co-operate in the suppression of smuggling, it is likely to prove exceedingly difficult to prevent Havana rum and European alcoholic beverages from finding their way surreptitiously into the canal zone. We observe, further, that a postal service was inaugurated in the canal zone on June 25. Henceforth mails from the zone to the United States and vice versa will be carried at the domestic rates payable in the United States. It may have been observed that in the list of nine places where American post-offices have been opened, and where American custom-houses are to be organized, neither Panama nor Colon is included. That, of course, is because those towns are expressly excluded by the treaty made with the new republic, from the belt of territory ceded to the United States. That omission itself, it will be remembered, was not, in terms, absolute, the Republic of Panama retaining a nominal remnant of sovereignty. That this remnant is regarded by our government as a legal fiction is evident from the postal and revenue regulations which already have been imposed in the canal zone, and which quickly will be followed by the introduction of an independent judicial and police system.

The friends of woman's suffrage have had reason during the month of June to fix their attention on both Chicago and Berlin. To the Republican national convention four women were chosen as alternates from Western States, namely, two from Colorado, one from Utah, and one from Idaho. One of the delegates for whom the women were elected alternates did not appear at Chicago at all, and the three others were obliging enough to absent themselves now and then from the convention hall, so that their feminine substitutes might officially take part in the proceedings. At Berlin the International Council of Women held its third quinquennial meeting. This body is an outgrowth of the council which was held at Washington in 1888, and which itself was the product of the movement started in 1883 by Mrs. Elizabeth Cady Stanton and Miss Susan B. Anthony to bring the women of the civilized world together in an international association for the extension of the suffrage to their sex. The first president of the association was Mrs. Fawcett, wife of the well-known political economist, who was Postmaster-General in a Gladstonian cabinet, and whose daughter was officially rated ahead of the senior wrangler when she graduated from the English University of Cambridge. Her successor was the Countess of Aberdeen, wife of the Governor-General of Canada, who, in turn, gave place in 1892 to Mrs. May Wright Sewall, who, previously, had been vice-president. We learn with interest that, of all the twenty countries represented this year at Berlin in the International Council of Women, there are only two—namely, France and Switzerland—in which women have no franchise whatever. It is not quite right, however, to assert that in no other English-speaking nation have they as few electoral rights as they possess in the United States. It is only in the Commonwealth of Australia that women are better off politically than they are in our Federal republic. Certainly they enjoy much more extensive political rights in four of our States than they do in the United Kingdom, where the attainment by them of the Parliamentary franchise seems still far distant.

The latest sea-fight at Port Arthur once more demonstrates the extreme vulnerability of the battle-ship. For the third time, a battle-ship of the largest dimensions and the most modern defence is struck by a torpedo and sent to the bottom within a few minutes. The Pereveret goes the way of the Petrovsk and the Holms. Admiral Togo evidently kept his battle-ships well out of the way, and sent his destroyers in to do the real fighting. In this sort of fighting the battle-ship's heavy guns, intended primarily to pierce the armor of the enemy's battle-ships, are practically of no use. The only effective heavy gun-fire in the war was directed against the Tarvis; and this fine cruiser might have been required had she been within moderate distance of a dock; as it was, she sank because her captain blew her up, and not as a result of Japanese heavy gun-fire. The forts at Port Arthur have done no great damage to the Japanese fleet, perhaps because the fleet keeps carefully out of range; but the important point is that these heavy guns have not been able to hinder the torpedoing of ship after ship by the Japanese; they have not been effective as a defence, any more than as a means of attack. Neither on shipboard nor on shore do the twelve-inch guns make an effective figure, while against torpedoes attacks the finest battle-ship with a foot of armor is as vulnerable as an unprotected cruiser.

Mr. Balfour has just lost two more bye-elections, the ninth and tenth since the new year. Yet he sits tight, and the oft-forecast dissolution is evidently about as far away as ever. This is really an admirable triumph of English good sense, and of personal statesmanship in Mr. Balfour himself. He has no particular policy; he does not warmly endorse Mr. Chamberlain; nor is he a sound free-trader like the Duke of Devonshire. Yet he holds on, and the affairs of the British Empire continue to flourish and prosper, and the Empire itself continues to fulfil its great destiny among the nations. England is a living illustration of this kind of practical good sense in somewhat nebulous circumstances. Her Constitution has never been written down, nevertheless the Empire holds. English law is largely a matter of uncodified common sense, but no nation has a greater reverence for law than the English have. So the policy of Mr. Balfour has two good precedents, in the British Constitution and the Common Law of England; and, like them, it manages very well. In an undefined way, Mr. Balfour's policy is, to do as well as may be for the Empire. Mr. Balfour's party gets on from day to day with singular success—accomplishing no great things, it is true, but also making no startling blunders; with no particular policy on any given point, yet with much reserve power, and an abstention from doctrinaire pronouncements which is highly reassuring. To put it briefly, Mr. Balfour is showing the power of the English governing class to govern, independently of doctrinal specifics, and simply by a certain inborn gift.

England has survived the visit of King Edward to his imperial nephew, Wilhelm II. For weeks before that event, the Teutophobe press of Great Britain was full of vague forebodings of dire things to come—of a repetition of the Venezuelan imbroglio, which strained the good understanding between this country and England; of some new Bagdad railroad to be dumped upon the British exchequer; of some covert blow to be dealt at the Anglo-French catala cordiale. None of these dreadful things have happened, and King Edward returns none the worse from his visit to Kiel. The understanding with France is strengthened, rather than weakened, for it is felt that, in the person of King Edward, deference has been paid at Kiel to a friend of France, and that prestige is thereby added to the republic. In Germany itself there was an equally insistent tide of warnings against perfidious Albion. The Kaiser was asked, with the utmost deference, to beware of entangling alliances, and all the pitfalls set for him by the astute British were carefully and repeatedly pointed out. To tell the truth, there is something ridiculous in the spectacle of this annual suspicion, and it is possible that perception of it prompted King Edward to go to Kiel, even though he foresaw the misgivings of a certain section of the press.

June is the special season of discourse from the college professors and other educators. As the graduating classes go on into the world their preceptors give them, in baccalaureate sermons and like deliverances, such parting information as they can. It is interesting to observe how the times impress these speakers. Dr. Frissell, Principal of the Hampton Normal Institute, where Booker Washington was taught, was the baccalaureate preacher at Phillips Academy, Andover. He told the boys of that venerable school that we have a tremendous fight on our hands during the next forty or fifty years, and if we cannot give higher (governmental) efficiency and honesty with the mass in control than under any other form, "Cæsarism is certain under some new name, and the great experiment is a failure." He relied on the "flaming earnestness of small minorities" to win the fight, as in the past, against overwhelming odds; else, he said, the last century will be a mere gap like that between the Scipios and the Cæsars. Kindred anxieties seemed to stir Dr. Seligman of Cornell. He talked to his young men about the "profound unrest" that prevailed in the world they were about to enter. He thought it a "question whether the ancient landmarks will not be moved and the ancient moorings loosened." Is our republic, he asked, to remain a democratic organization under which men with equal rights govern themselves, or to become a tyrannical organization under which special interests like capital, labor, or the military spirit are to control the destinies of men?

Dr. Hadley of Yale showed no special alarm about the times, but issued a warning against making wealth and dominion a primary object and trusting to them as a source of national strength. With power there comes, he thought, some relaxation of discipline, and he declared that the attempt to make human selfishness the fundamental standard of right conduct was as disastrous as to make our unchecked human instincts the standard of right conduct. Almost every evil—political, social, or commercial—which seriously threatens our prosperity, can be traced, he thought, "to our tolerant acceptance of selfishness as a basis of morality." President Harris of Amherst found reassurance in the growing protest against corruption. He deplored the condition of these of our rich people whom, because of their extravagance, selfishness, and low moral standards, he called "the degenerates of our cities," but he was confident that the influence of educated men upon opinion would solve our problems. Dr. Wilson of Princeton sent his young men out with a good heart, telling them, in effect, that they had not been to Princeton for nothing, and that though wealth had accumulated vastly, and the material side of civilization loomed up big, they must not believe that this is an age debauched and material beyond precedent. Spiritual impulses, he said, were running in new channels; the spirit of man in our day is as strong as his hand, our life is greater than the things we handle, and that life is us, and where we go it goes with us. So spoke five baccalaureate preachers, and sufficiently indicate the direction and scope of this year's group of such discourses. Outside of the colleges, we observe that at Cleveland Mr. J. D. Rockefeller toured the Sunday-school of which he is still the superintendent that he felt better than he had felt in ten years. From Concord, New Hampshire, another leader, Mrs. M. B. G. Eldy, issued to her followers formal assurance of her continued ability to work for Zion, the published expectations of her enemies to the contrary notwithstanding.

Commencement at Boston College, a Roman Catholic institution, was furnished by an address by the Hon. Bourke Cockran on "The Conversion of the United States to Catholicity." Of course Mr. Cockran made a good speech; he always does. He encouraged his Catholic hearers to go ahead and convert the United States to their faith. He felt it to be important to the welfare and prosperity of the people that it should be done; he felt that it would afford security to the permanence of republican government on this continent, and he held that the conversion of the United States was not an extravagant conception, but a practicable enterprise well within the bounds of accomplishment. This was all good missionary talk and proper enough to the occasion, but did not Mr. Cockran's enthusiasm get a little the better of him when he went on to tell his young friends that the Catholic Church is not merely the friend of freedom, but its fountain; not only the friend of progress, but its light; not only the natural support of republicanism in the United States, "but the origin of the Constitution we value is here"? This was news in Boston, but the orator explained that the valuable features of the Constitution were derived from the gospel preached centuries ago on the shores of Lake Galilee, whereof the fundamental feature was that all men were born equal in the sight of God. Then he meant Christianity when he said Catholicity! Not quite, for if we get the drift of his thought from a very incomplete report of what he said, the Catholicity he speaks of is something to which Protestants as well as heathens are subject to conversion. Of course a Catholic orator speaking to a Catholic audience is out of range of outside criticism, and may say when he will as long as it suits his audience, and use his words in any sense that they understand. And yet Mr. Cockran knows as well as his hearers must have known that the "Catholicity" represented in the Constitution was Protestant by an overwhelming preponderance, and that when he spoke of our government as the fruit of Catholic instruction, he took an extremely long view. We hope "Catholicity" won't have things all its own way in this country, nor all Protestants be converted to it, for, as thoughtful Catholics realize, the open competition with Protestantism here has had a vastly useful and liberalizing influence on the American Catholic Church.

The Teconote Mail criticizes, grudgingly enough but with some feeling, Secretary Hay's order substituting "American" for "United States" on the seals, stamps, plates, and devices of the foreign representatives of the United States. It says, truly enough, that the United States are not the whole of America, and makes the natural and obvious objections to the monopolizing of a continental name by one of that continent's constituent nations. The Secretary's order is not political, but merely literary, and aims to make nomenclature follow usage and promote convenience. It is the rule—almost the universal rule—that the embassies, legations, and consulates of the United States are known as "American." Citizens of the United States are "Americans" as distinguished from Mexicans, Brazilians, Canadians, and other dwellers on this continent. An ambassador of the United States is "the American Ambassador." Custom and convenience have brought this about. Not only in Europe, but in South America, there has been an other compact name for us. When our forefathers signed their union the "United States of America," they did no more than was natural. There were at that time no other united states maintaining republican government in America. The name our fathers gave this country is all the same it has got, and all it seems likely to have. It cannot well be changed, but if any American nation really feels aggrieved by our having it, there is a possible remedy. She may plausibly hope to share it with us. We occupy the name, but our occupation is not exclusive. Canada, for example, would undoubtedly be welcome to join with us in the enjoyment of our national appellation.

A learned American, whose attainments and abilities are not less appreciated abroad than at home, is the Hon. Hannia Taylor, lawyer and law-writer, and lecturer on Constitutional and international law in the Columbian University in Washington. He comes from the South; a native of North Carolina; lately a resident of Alabama. He was Minister to Spain during Mr. Cleveland's last administration, and more recently has represented our government as counsel before the Spanish Treaty Claims Commission and the Alaskan Boundary Tribunal. Evidently his reputation as a lawyer is of the highest, but fame still more extended and sure has come to him as the author of two renowned works, The Origin and Growth of the English Constitution, and International Public Law. These books are now ranked as eminent—perhaps the highest—authorities in the great subjects of which they treat, and it is mainly because of them that on June 30 the University of Dublin made Mr. Taylor a D.D., and that on July 25 the University of Edinburgh will confer upon him the same honor.

The Republican Platform

If the managers of the Chicago convention had desired that the campaign now beginning should start exclusively on Mr. Roosevelt's personality and record, they would have framed a platform differing materially in respect, not only of beauty, but of three important particulars. After reciting succinctly the past achievements of the Republican party, and its resultant claim to the gratitude and confidence of the country, they would have recognized, as did William McKinley in his last public speech, that other times require other promises and other views, and they would have gratified the many revisionists in their own ranks by pledging themselves to bring about an early and substantial readjustment of the tariff to the material changes that have taken place in industrial and trade conditions since the Dingley bill became a law. They could also have made more definite, and, therefore, more satisfactory, the agreement to give the Filipinos self-government; and, finally, they could have refrained from demanding an immediate enforcement of the Fourteenth Amendment of the Federal Constitution. Had they adopted a platform thus conceived, they would have spared two of the enemy's guns: they would have avoided the tactical mistake of goading opponents to desperation; and, in a word, they would have done all that human foresight could suggest to restrict the field of controversy, and of prophecy to the past, present, and probable outcome of the peaceful, strongly marked, yet subtle engaging, individuality of their nominee for the Presidency. As it is, the Republican national convention has put forth a manifesto in which, though an avowed foe to many words, limitations of Mr. Roosevelt's administration as the platform of 1900 allotted to that of his predecessor, they have gone on to hound the nominee by turning a deaf ear to Republican revisionists and giving them a show when they ask for bread; by practically ignoring, instead of trying to conciliate, the anti-imperialist sentiment, and by committing both him and themselves to an ill-timed, a needless, an exaggerating, a detestable revival of race hatred and race war.

As a matter of fact, the platform constructed at Chicago, which might have been made almost unsalable, is vulnerable at many points. We glance at them in the order in which they will meet the reader's eye. The platform begins by challenging on behalf of the Republican party the entire credit for the recovery of American industry from the panic of 1893. Unshrinkable assurance is required to assert that this miserable crisis, and the industrial and business depression that preceded it, should be imputed to the Democrats, that only gained possession of the Federal government on March 4, 1893, instead of in the Republican party, that had held power during the four preceding years. Dates are awkward things, and they offer in this instance a nut that Republican stump-speakers may find hard to crack.

On the principle of "eliminating everything," the Chicago platform proceeds to annihilate all the honor earned by the liberation of Cuba. "We refused," it says, "to pelt her longer with the missiles of Cuba." The Cubans themselves know well that, up to the spring of 1898, it was in Democratic, rather than Republican, newspapers that they sought and found a generous aid that never flagged until it generated a tidal-wave of American sympathy for their oppressed and devastated island. They recall with equal vividness the fact that, from March 4, 1897, until February 15, 1898, when the battleship Maine was blown up in the harbor of Havana, they never had the slightest hope of securing intervention from the McKinley administration. Nor have they forgotten that, even after that deadly insult to our flag, Senator Hanna, the accredited mouthpiece of the administration, tranquillized Wall Street with the assurance that "There would be no war."

We venture to guess that Senator Quay, the present representative of Cuba in Washington, could testify that, during that eventful night of April 18-19, 1898, not a Democratic voice or vote opposed the liberationists, whereas most serious obstruction was offered by the Republican Speaker of the House of Representatives and by well-requipped mouthpieces of the Executive in the Senate. On the whole, it required a good deal of impudence for the authors of the Chicago platform to set up an exclusive title to Cuba's gratitude.

We pass to the equivocal, faint-hearted, and meaningless proposition which reads, rather than confound, the issues of revision and reciprocity. We are told that rates of duty should be readjusted only when conditions have so changed that the public interests demand their alteration. That is a truism: what not only Democrats, but scores of thousands of Republicans, believe is that the change has long since occurred. The Chicago platform goes on to say that the work of readjustment cannot "necessarily" be committed to any but Republican hands. It has been in their hands three years since President McKinley acknowledged the necessity of readjusting the Dingley tariff. We opine that if the American people want readjustment they will commit the task to public servants that will get it done. This is now the tenth year since the reciprocity clauses of the Dingley tariff act were placed upon the statute-book. If we except the stated enactment of reciprocity granted to Cuba in fulfillment of a solemn promise, no sincere attempt has been made by the Republican party to carry out the purpose of those clauses, although nearly three years ago President McKinley declared at Buffalo that "reciprocity treaties are in harmony with the spirit of the times," and that, "if, perchance, some of our tariffs are no longer needed for revenue, or to encourage and protect our industries at home, why should they not be employed to extend and promote our markets abroad?" All that the Chicago convention was willing to say by way of endorsement was: "We believe in the adoption of all practicable methods for the further extension of our foreign markets, including commercial reciprocity wherever reciprocal arrangements can be effected, consistent with the principles of protection, and without injury to American agriculture, American labor, or any American industry." Who are to be the champions for the prescribed course? The Democrats? Obviously not. The Republican revisionists? Oh, no. The stand-patists, of course.

According to the Chicago platform, no readjustment of the tariff can be entrusted to Democrats, because their attitude for the function has been demonstrated by history. "A Democratic tariff," we are told, "has always been followed by business adversity, a Republican tariff by business prosperity." This is history, "as she is written," by Republican national conventions. Was it not the Democrats who framed and enacted the tariff of 1890, which was followed by a decade of unprecedented prosperity? Were Democrats or Republicans responsible for the tariff legislation which for five years had provided the most fruitful crisis of 1873? Really these Republican platform-managers must have granted that the voters, whom they essay to guide, have needed a common school education.

Still pursuing the policy of "eliminating everything," the Chicago platform avers that the country is indebted exclusively to the Republican party for the establishment of the gold standard, the maintenance of which, it warns voters, cannot safely be committed to the Democratic party. If this means that the preservation of the gold standard cannot safely be entrusted to Republicans, the assertion is a superfluous platitude. If it means that the same thing can be said of the conservative Democrats, who were dominant at the White House in Mr. Cleveland's two administrations, and who are expected to dominate once more at St. Louis, the assertion is rank with mendacity and ingratitude.

As a matter of fact, Mr. Cleveland in his first annual message (1885) urged a repeal of the Bland-Allison silver law, which was calculated to pull down the gold standard by requiring the purchasing and coining of silver. His Secretary of the Treasury strongly supported the demand. It was not a Democrat, but a Republican, administration, which doubled the load of depreciating silver by the Sherman law of 1890. On the other hand, it was President Cleveland who, in August, 1893, convened Congress for the express purpose of stopping silver purchasing and coining, and kept the Legislature stalled to Washington till the gold standard got a chance to lift its head. If we come down to 1898, does the credit of being outspoken and inflexible champions of the gold standard belong to the Republicans, who that year inserted in their platform a disingenuous, dishonest plank in favor of international bimetalism which they knew they could never get, or in the gold Democrats, who, setting aside to a great principle above the duty of allegiance to party, unduried a hazard of their own, or went forth in solitude to obliquity and exile?

We believe, lastly, that no more serious tactical error has ever been committed by political commanders, on the eve of a campaign expected to be strenuous and heated, than the Chicago revisionists' endorsement of the demand for the enforcement of the Fourteenth Amendment.

The Republican plank dealing with this subject is open to grave objection on two grounds. In the first place, it ignores the constitutional limitation of the Federal Legislature from the Federal judiciary. The plank insists that Congress shall determine the question of fact and of law, whether in any State the elective franchise has been unconstitutionally restricted. That is to say, it arrogates to the Federal Legislature a function which is reserved to the United States Supreme Court. In the second place, the framers of the plank had not seen enough to heed the adage, Let sleeping dogs lie. The proposition to a re-endorsement of race prejudice and race hatred was given at a time when, practically, the Democrats seemed likely to let the election go by default; when a majority of the Southern Democrats, or, at all events, of their leaders, seemed disposed to accept a hopeless or a colorless candidate; and in pass over the one man who, as Republicans themselves forbade, might reach the White House, on which twice already he has upturned the Democratic standard.

It was, we repeat, the worst of bad tactics to administer at such a juncture an electric and eye-opening shock to Southern Democrats; and if Senator Hanna had been there he would never have countenanced such an act of folly.

The Republican Ticket

As we measure age in these days, it was a young man's ticket which the Republican party put forward at Chicago, for Theodore Roosevelt, of New York, is only forty-six, and Charles W. Fairbanks, of Indiana, is but a few years older. It is not, of course, the first time that a man under fifty has been nominated for the Presidency. William J. Bryan was but thirty-six when he was made the Democratic standard-bearer in 1896; Grover Cleveland was forty-seven when he was first nominated in 1884; Thomas C. Grant was forty-six when he was first named in 1869; George B. McClellan was only thirty-eight when he was put forward as the nominee of the Democratic party in 1864, and Frank Pierce was but thirty when he was elected to the presidency in 1852. Up to the present time, however, Theodore Roosevelt is the only man of whom it can be said that he was but forty-three when he entered the White House. Neither will it be disputed that in temperament he is even younger than his years. He is impulsive, sympathetic, magnetic. It is not surprising that such qualities should prove attractive to his rivals. They are characteristic of youth. If it be, as an English Lord Chancellor once ironically suggested, an "atrocious crime" to be a young man, Mr. Roosevelt must be acknowledged guilty of it. In our opinion, it is precisely his actual and temperamental juvenility that accounts for the extraordinary ascendancy acquired by Mr. Roosevelt over much of the Republican rank and file, an ascendancy to which veteran leaders found themselves compelled to submit at Chicago. South is the secret of his popularity. The inclinations and enthusiasms of the young are involved with the charms of surprise; even their weaknesses and foibles meet with forbearance and indulgence, because it is taken for granted that they will be eliminated by experience and maturity. How, otherwise, can we explain a performance unique in the history of Vice-Presidents? It is true that no fewer than three Vice-Presidents, to wit, John Adams, Thomas Jefferson, and Martin Van Buren, have become heads of the Federal Executive, but never before has a President by accident succeeded in obtaining a nomination to the Chief Magistracy from the party that elected him to the minor office. Every one of the four preceding Presidents by accident strove to gain that prize, but they all failed. Theodore Roosevelt, on the other hand, was nominated at Chicago without a dissenting voice. The significance of the phenomenon is not overclouded by a recognition of the fact that the conditions were circumstances have contrived to Mr. Roosevelt's elevation. More than any other man alive he has reason to believe in his star, and, like the dictator Sulla, to describe himself as "Felix." Literally kicked upstairs into the Vice-Presidency, for the undignified purpose of ending his political career, fate summoned him to the White House; and when, subsequently, by his own free offer, he accepted the nomination for President, the Republican success, the new public man, whose, possibly, they might have relied upon to block Mr. Roosevelt's further progress, was called away by destiny. As one of the bitterest and most implacable enemies of the President within the Republican ranks in his own State said, when he learned of the death of Senator Hanna: "It is all over. I surrender. I cannot fight against fate."

This is a one-sided view of the matter. To no other President by accident could have rendered such decisive help. Even had Senator Hanna lived, and had consented to organize the elements of opposition that existed in the background at Chicago, it is our firm conviction, in view of all the facts, that Mr. Roosevelt would have beaten him.

Does it follow that because Mr. Roosevelt, through his hold over the imagination and sympathy of the young men in the Republican party, was able to compel the unanimous endorsement of his candidacy at Chicago, he is equally certain to triumph at the ballot-box? It must be remembered that youthful voters, while usually enthusiastic, are as easily discouraged and depressed. Young soldiers have not the sturdiness of veterans. Nobody knows better than Mr. Roosevelt that, on the political battlefield, he has never yet been under fire. If we picture over such slight local contests as those in Assembly districts, we may say that he had been only three times a candidate for an elective office, and that in none of those cases were political battles turned on his personality or his record. When, in 1887, he was the Republican nominee for Mayor of his native city, he was totally overlooked, public interest being monopolized by the fight between the protagonists, Abram Hewitt and Henry George. In 1898, when he was put forward by the Republicans for the Governorship of New York, he was opposed by his political opponents, in whom it seemed ungracious and unwisely to wage furious and ill-rewarded warfare on a man who, but yesterday, had risked his life against a foreign foe, and sought glory at the cannon's mouth. We need not say that in 1900 the Democrats were less much absorbed in their desperate and hopeless effort to stem the stupor of McKinley's victory than the Republicans were the Republican nominee for the Vice-Presidency. Yet it must be noted that, on the three occasions named, although he was exempt from attack, and his vote-getting qualities had a perfectly free field for exercise, Mr. Roosevelt failed signally to prove the possession of any power of adding strength to a ticket. In 1887 he was not only distanced by Hewitt, but outperformed considerably by Henry George. In 1898, when he was fresh from San Juan Hill, he got a plurality of only 17,700, which presented an astonishing contrast with the plurality of 264,468 given to McKinley only two years before. In 1900, though the presence of Mr. Roosevelt's name on the Republican ticket should presumably have appealed to State pride, McKinley's plurality in New York under went a drop to 143,000. From the precedents just cited, the inference seems justified that Mr. Roosevelt's ascendency is an intermittent, a transmissible, a neutralizable force. The effect is short-lived, the victory when he sought the country in contact with his gleaming eye and glad hand gets stopped and dissipated between the convention hall and the ballot-box. The truth, of course, is that in 1887 and 1898, though nobody then took the trouble to suggest criticism or distrust, the voters had time to think whether, on the whole, it would be safe to entrust young Mr. Roosevelt with the functions of Mayor or of Governor. In the campaign now begun, they will not only have time to think, but Mr. Roosevelt's Democratic opponents may be relied upon to give them something to think about. For the first time in his career the President will learn what George Eliot meant when she said that hostile scrutiny is torture.

As for the nomination of Senator Fairbanks for the Vice-Presidency, it may have been a judicious move for the Republicans from one point of view, and it certainly was a clever one from another. It is the policy of Mr. Roosevelt's friends if it be true that the present Chief Magistrate already has his eye on the Republican nomination for the Presidency in 1904. There is no doubt that Senator Fairbanks—rather than Mr. Dick or Mr. Herrick, though the two last named are critics of Ohio—is the true political representative and legation of Senator Hanna. He is the man upon whom many powerful but just now reticent Republicans, that look with some confidence on Mr. Roosevelt, would have united this year had circumstances been propitious. Had Mr. Fairbanks retained his seat in the Senate, and therewith the control of the party machine in his State, he might reasonably have looked forward to becoming the spokesman and champion of conservative Republican interests during the next quadrennium. By his acceptance of the Vice-Presidency he has sacrificed himself to an eligible factor, even if it be the shadow of accident. We do not credit Senator Fairbanks with preternatural sagacity when we opine that a recognition of this fact had something to do with the address, and to say no more, with which he regarded the proposal to give him the second place on the Republican ticket.

In the other hand, if the Republican managers regarded Wisconsin and Illinois as comparatively safe, and thought it regrettable to use all the ammunition left at their disposal in Indiana as being a State exceptionally doubtful—and if they also deemed it prudent, with an eye to the other second thought of the electorate at large, to counterbalance Mr. Roosevelt's effusive personality with a resounding antithesis—they could have hit upon no better choice than they actually made. In outward aspect and habitual demeanor, in temperament, in character, there could be no sharper contrast than that offered by the Republican nominees for the Presidency and the Vice-Presidency. Mr. Roosevelt is still "one of the boys." Mr. Fairbanks embodies the ideal of a "grave and revered senior." There is something portentous in his seriousness. His taciturnity and his solemnity seem at once congenital and studied. He makes on a close observer the impression of having modified himself from youth on Milton's occupation of "stagnant, deep on whose begraven eddies deliberate soul and purple care."

On the whole, there is a good deal to be said for both ends of the Republican ticket. The question for the Democrats to ponder is, How can they best it?

The Papacy and the Republic

Zola in his novel—Rouge—makes Abbe Pierre Fremont, curé of the Roman Catholic Church in America as "overdone with sap and upheld by intense hopes, as at the moment of the rejuvenated Christianity of tomorrow." "The freedom of the republic is against Rome. The Mississippi will not be dominated by the Tiber," said Oliver Wendell Holmes, the son of a Puritan minister. Here is the hope of far-seeing European Catholics, albeit expressed by an laudatory character in a story by an author whom Catholics detest, set over against the dogmatic statement of an old-fashioned New-England. Do they conflict, or has each an element of truth?

Such a question is inevitably suggested by recent happenings. Never before in the history of the national capital have two members of the cabinet, a justice of the Supreme Court, and represensitive legislators and military and naval officials sat down at a dinner with an Italian member of the College of Cardinals, at which he was the guest of honor and a member of the cabinet the host; nor has any previous President ever formally welcomed a Roman Catholic Italian prelate as cordially as President Roosevelt recently welcomed Cardinal Satolli.

In explanation of Secretary Taft's unusual courtesy to Cardinal Satolli, it may be said that he was but returning courtesies received by him when in Rome, as special commissioner deputed to deal with the Vatican and the Philippine matters. President Roosevelt's exceptional treatment of Cardinal Satolli is but natural in view of his other dealings with Roman Catholics since he became President. For, more than any of his predecessors, his friendships and acquaintances have been with men of all sects and conditions, all races and all religions, and since becoming President he has put into practice a catholicity of action conformable to the ideals of the republic such as none of his predecessors have ever shown. Benjamin Harrison, elder in a Presbyterian Church, William McKim, confidant and advisor with Methodist Episcopal bishops, were typical of a long line of Protestant Presidents who theoretically believed that Roman Catholics were Christians and that they were entitled to offices under the republic, but as for having personal friends among Roman Catholics, as for putting them in places of responsibility, as for living up to the spirit as well as the letter of the law which guarantees parity of standing between Christian and Jew, Roman Catholic and Protestant, they could not; their antecedents, training, tastes were all against it.

President Roosevelt, on the contrary, has been more of a "mixer": his political and army experiences have bound him close to men of all faiths and all religions, and his religious affiliations have been with the more liberal sects, less ruffled in their hostility to Romanism. Consequently, for this reason, as well as for others, his advent to the Presidency may be said to mark a new era. He will not run contrary to the traditions and convictions of the country, to the extent of giving the papacy a status at Washington which it would like, namely, the right to be represented diplomatically. Neither, on the other hand, will he be deterred by any fear of Protestant criticism from dealing fully and fairly with problems as they arise at home or abroad—problems that affect the welfare of the increased Roman Catholic population of the nation. He will do this not from policy, but from principle, but in doing it he will be politic nevertheless.

This new attitude on the part of the national Executive will be but the reflection of an altered attitude by the Protestant majority of the churches. Not that the time has come yet when most of our voters will vote as readily for Roman Catholic candidates for office as they will for Protestant candidates, not that the A. P. A. spirit has passed away entirely, but there is a lessened spirit of antagonism to Roman Catholicism among Protestant thinkers and leaders, more harmony of effort between Protestant and Roman Catholic clergymen in civil reform movements, and less and less criticism of recognition of Roman Catholic worth by executives who dare to appoint them to administrative or judicial positions.

Not every Protestant is prepared to say, with Senator Hoar, that he believes that "if every Protestant were to be stricken down by a lightning stroke, that our brethren of the Catholic faith would still carry on the republic in a spirit of true and liberal freedom." But it is significant that in such a book as Mr. Sellick's recent one The Spiritual Outlook for this country, this Universalist clergyman should praise the Roman Catholic Church as he does and predict a greater future than ever for it in the future, and that Rev. S. D. McConnell, one of the ablest and most thoughtful of Protestant Episcopalian clergymen, in some of his recent writings on the future of Christianity in this country, should have recognized so clearly the potency of a closely articulated church with a uniform message at a time of transition like the present, and the attraction it will have for society at a future date in affairs of state the separating principle is coming to be dominant, the cardinal claim authority, and the cardinal virtue obedience.

If on the side of the state and of society in general there is a more tolerant spirit toward Roman Catholicism due to various forces obvious and some not so apparent, it is because here, by the admission of Roman Catholic prelates like the late Archbishop Corrigan, competition with Protestantism has produced a very much more liberal type of Catholicism than Europe or South America know, and because the American hierarchy, from Cardinal Gibbons down to the presbytery, have more and for all given up the claims of the Church on the state which are still made in Europe.

It is in the avowed ambition of Roman Catholics here to conquer the country, but in a spiritual, not political, way. "For my part," says Cardinal Gibbons, "I vastly prefer the system obtaining in these United States by which the Church is supported by voluntary contributions, rather than as in European countries, where the state supports the Church; and where, as in consequence, the Church has to suffer in her liberty. . . . I hope the day may never come when the state here shall build our churches and salary our clergy." Had France cardinals and archbishops equally in sympathy with republican ideals, how different the state of affairs in France might be. It is useless to deny that many of the Roman Catholic prelates of the country look forward to a time when the state shall support their parochial schools and eucharistic institutions; and some of them would like to see the American Federation of Catholic Societies turned into an instrument for securing legislation along this line by political pressure. But the more and more far-sighted minds among the hierarchy realize that such a policy would be fatal to that peace and prosperity which now comes to the Church in this country through its perfect liberty, its sympathetic recognition by an ever-increasing number of Protestants, and by the sturdier type of laity that are developed by the regime of self-support that is necessary now. Temporal power mingled with spiritual authority has been the curse of the papacy in Europe and none know it better than the leaders of American Catholicism.

The Uses of Adversity

To find a magazine article that one reads and then reads it these days of swift production is a phenomena worth recording. Doubtless those who read Professor Lloyd Morgan's article in "The Middle of the Universe," in the June Contemporary, will read it. The whole article deserves close attention from the beginning with its incisive distinction between the field for scientific investigation and the field for metaphysical speculation in the last paragraph on the problem of evil.

The old-fashioned subject of the uses of adversity has been much lost sight of in recent years, while there has been a quick growth of athletic Christianity and a spread of facile optimism, and it is well to be reminded by Professor Morgan that the great human type was the Man of Sorrows. "What would Christ be to you if he were not this?" he asks.

Perhaps sorrow as a means to consciousness can afford to be emphasized. Not only is a noble discontent the high road to moral and spiritual growth, but a capacity for suffering, agape, actual suffering in itself is the chief way of enlarging the consciousness and developing the soul. "The soul," Rosmini tells us, "is the capacity for feeling." "If," he says, "the soul feels itself, it is in its essence, feeling, since it is only feeling that is felt by itself, and if bodies are felt by the soul and the soul is felt by itself, the soul is the principle of feeling." Now, in order to develop a faculty we exercise it, and the exercise of the soul is love and suffering. So far as we know this is what Christ did upon earth.

"Let us be unshaken of soul," writes Browning, and the rest of his gospel is let us be unafraid of suffering. When a man looks upon his past from a vantage-point of ten years it is never the regrets of fate he regrets unless he was a coward and ran from them. If he met them, equal with them, and conquered, it is of such stuff that strength is made. The true dignity of human nature lies in its power of meeting evil and transforming it into good.

After all, good and evil are relative terms, not absolute, they exist interrelated, as do dark and light. Good means simply that figure that stands with its back on the neck of a struggling wrong. As the nature of the delinquent evil reveals in the scale of the loss and of power so does the good show it. To hold drunkenness and ordinary self-indulgence under any seem but a lot achievement, but to hold under all desire of self-aggrandizement, all envy, malice, hypocrisy, and revenge is literally to love our enemies and do good to them that despitefully use us, and this is making gradually for the type set for humanity. But it is not done without suffering. The very conditions of growth are struggle and the process is pain.

If this seem to be a plea for wanton sorrows it is not a plea for complaining. The soul as we have been taught by all prophets, is very silent. If we cry out upon life, the essence of our experience is masked and the resultant strength is dissipated. That sorrow only gives the full moral that we have lived with alone, that we have never uttered, shared, or hinted at. If this could be realized the world's clamor would be almost hushed. This is the secret of the serenity of the sage, and the very soul in which the seed of wisdom bursts and sends forth shoots.

A finer peace shall be wrought out of pain

Than the stars that the darkness know;

Ah, and but my soul is in sorrow till then

And the feet of the years more slow.

It is the whole philosophy of Rabbi Ben Ezra that the great from which we rise with silent will of acquiescence is the rest that binds us to a larger world of deeper insight.

The great point in life is not to escape sorrow, but to have a soul of so noble and exalted a form that whatever sorrow flows into it will be transformed into the beauty of the vessel which holds it.

AN INCIDENT OF THE EVACUATION OF NEWCHWANG—RUSSIANS REMOVING SIEGE-GUNS FROM THE MANCHURIAN STRONGHOLD

Recent news of events in the neighborhood of Newchwang is contained in a dispatch from Admiral Togo, reporting the evacuation of Yinkow, the port of Newchwang. The latter was evacuated in May, but was subsequently recaptured by the Russians. The Togo's forces at Yinkow are said to have numbered about two, with heavy guns.

A RECENT PHOTOGRAPH OF THE CZAR—NICHOLAS II. HOLDING A REVIEW AT THE NAVY-YARD, ST. PETERSBURG

The photograph was taken recently during a review held by the Czar at the St. Petersburg Navy-yard, and is the latest picture of him that has appeared. The photograph has an additional interest from the fact of the Czar's reported desire to take an active part in the Far Eastern conflict. It has been stated that it is not unlikely that he will go to the front.

By R. E. PERRY

Wellman, and presumably Mr. Zeigler are advocates of this route. The brilliant young Duke of Abruzzi, who reached 86° 33' N. latitude, the highest north yet attained, 300 miles north of Franz-Josef Land, is the only one of all the explorers by this route who has gone beyond or even reached the northern cape of the Franz-Josef

This has been the favorite route for American expeditions. It has lifted the coast line out of the very northern Ultima Thule, the purview of Arctic explorers and Arctic, concede this route to be the advantages are, a land base

A Nature of the Arctic Regions—a Male Hunt

100 miles nearer the pole than on any other route, a firmer ice-pack to traverse, a wide coast-line to which to return, and the opportunity for doing the work in one year.

It has the disadvantages of a somewhat greater difficulty in getting a ship to a high latitude and the rugged character of the ice. This is the route which I propose to utilize, and to its utilization bring an extended experience, personal familiarity with every foot of the region, and the ability to utilize the utmost efforts of the Eskimos in aid of my plans.

The crucial part of the project is the traverse of what may be called the ice-bridge division of the route—i. e., the ice-encumbered channels between Cape Sabine and the northern coast of Grant Land, a distance of only 350 miles, which has already been accomplished by four vessels. One of these, the little Polaris, made the entire run without ever seeing ice.

North of this is a sledge journey of less than 500 miles to the pole, but of which I have already traversed, and the total of which is no greater than the length of four sledge journeys already made by me in that region.

South of this is a stretch of some 3000 miles of navigation between Cape Sabine and New York, which can be accomplished by any suitable ship in August of any year.

As the reach of ice navigation from Sabine to North Grant Land is the crux of the project, for it is I need the best Arctic ship that can be built. Not like Nansen's Fram, or the German Gauss, a stoutly built tub with no power, nor like the English Discovery, a fine sailing-ship, but one with no power.

My ship (and she is not a dream, but a carefully worked out proposition with the drawings completed) must be of a strength to resist and a shape to lift in the pressure of the ice, and with power to smash and wedge and squeeze her way through the ice-floes. A sloop, a powerboat, a motor, a sailing-ship with auxiliary engines.

My ship will be the only expensive tub I require, and she must be the best. I had contemplated sending a ship north this summer to establish a coal depot, and instruct the Eskimos in regard to assembling dogs, sleds, and furs, to readiness for my next summer, but I have found the expense too great, and have been obliged to abandon the idea.

The coal depot, which I shall establish at Etah, where I had my depot in '98, will be established by an auxiliary ship accompanying the main expedition steamer next summer, and returning early in September. I expect soon to place the contract for the hull of my new ship, and the supervision of this and the raising of the keel of the funds will occupy me fully for the next few months. There will come the repeated trials of the ship and its engines to be sure that everything is just right, and the assembling of the supplies and equipment.

Early in July, 1903, I shall steam north, establish my coal depot at Etah and my outposts of provisions at Cape Sabine, take on board my Eskimos and dogs, and attack the key of my project.

The strike of the ice navigation north of Cape Sabine.

I hope to reach the northern shore of Grant Land in early September, winter there with my ship, and very early in February begin the sledge journey which, God willing, shall attain the pole, and perhaps hit a new land out of the 500,000 square miles of utter ignorance which at present challenges our inshore in the polar basin.

And what for, all this effort and expense? Because of the accessions to scientific and geographical knowledge; because it is the privilege and the duty of this great country to capture the last great geographical prize the world has to offer; this prize which will signify man's final physical conquest of the globe. And if there were no other reason, because of the added feeling of pride that will be experienced by every American citizen if the Stars and the Stripes are the first to reach the pole.

And that increment of pride to millions of people to add to our national record.

The "Hawthorn" making the Passage through the Polar Sea just that added acreage will ten times outweigh the cost of the expedition.

I doubt if there is one intelligent person in a hundred when the subject does not interest, and who does not wish that the Stars and Stripes may win, but interest and good wishes do not fit out ships or buy provisions.

The inducements are that there is no second Henry Grinnell of New York, or Oscar of Sweden to see this project through. The funds for its materialization must come in small amounts from thousands, tried to impress upon my mind that I should regard it as a special favor on the part of the "benevolent government."

"Now, young man, you must appreciate this favor and show yourself worthy of it. We know that you are a student of social and economic sciences and an idealist in political affairs. Science and ideals are all right in their place. What the government objects to is the enervating of science and ideals into the street. At least as long as you remain in the army forget all you know of state, human rights, and all such things, and try to be a soldier like all other soldiers. Do not attempt to enlighten anybody. Mind your own business. However, if you attempt to spend inconsiderate and government ideas in the barracks, you are bound to get into trouble. I want you to know it, and be prepared to take the consequences of your department."

I took leave of the general and went in the evening after

My Service in the Russian Army

By Isador Ladoff

THE tempting privileges granted to educated volunteers in the Russian army induced me to enlist in it before my turn to serve as a soldier arrived.

The red tape of Russian officialdom demanded, among other documents, a certificate of my "political trustworthiness" from the police authorities. This certificate at the start threatened to become eventually a serious standing-block on my road to a military career. An "administrative" political process against me was pending in St. Petersburg, and I was under secret police surveillance. However, here in Russia, as elsewhere, are created mainly to be transmuted "in special cases," and the chief of the grandrums (political police) of the Livland district, his Excellency, General Lachs, in his "infinite wisdom" decided that my case was a "special" one. He therefore used his personal discretion in the matter, and I was fortunate enough to be taken into the rank and file of the defenders of the White Czar's throne, of my fatherland, and of the Orthodox Greek Church, without a certificate of "political trustworthiness."

General Lachs, when announcing to me that I would be accepted as a volunteer in the Russian army in spite of my political wickedness, tried to impress upon my mind that I should regard it as a special favor on the part of the "benevolent government."

"Now, young man, you must appreciate this favor and show yourself worthy of it. We know that you are a student of social and economic sciences and an idealist in political affairs. Science and ideals are all right in their place. What the government objects to is the enervating of science and ideals into the street. At least as long as you remain in the army forget all you know of state, human rights, and all such things, and try to be a soldier like all other soldiers. Do not attempt to enlighten anybody. Mind your own business. However, if you attempt to spend inconsiderate and government ideas in the barracks, you are bound to get into trouble. I want you to know it, and be prepared to take the consequences of your department."

I took leave of the general and went in the evening after

The impressions I received in the enlisting office, where the recruits—mostly young peasants—were subjected to a searching physical examination and either rejected or accepted into the army, according to the results of the examination, will never be effaced from my memory. The anguish and despair of the poorest relative of the accepted recruits were beyond all description. The peasants, especially the women, children of nature as they were, expressed their feelings in heart-rending wailing, as if the enlistment into the Czar's army were equivalent to being buried alive. In general, the conduct of the people in the enlisting office did not in the least harmonize with the official and officious stories concerning the inherent patriotism of the "faithful subjects" of the "little father," the Czar.

Indeed, there is more than one reason why the Russian peasant, the "muzhik," should dread and abhor the cruel blood tax called compulsory military service. The Russian "muzhiks" are an affectionate people and love their children dearly. At the same time the peasants have no feeling toward the Czar's government other than the semi-superstitious fear usually entertained by unenlightened people toward an exacting master. Like all agriculturists, the "muzhiks" are peaceful and peace-loving in their mode of life and aspirations, in their ethics and creeds. The forced departure of a young member of the patriarchal Slavic family—commence, of the "air" from his native village into the unknown cold and cruel outside world, with its numerous perils and temptations, must be considered by the peasants as a calamity almost as fatal and sad as death.

In my own physical examination was dispensed with, as I presented a duly certified document, testifying that I was fit to serve. I took the official oath in the church in the presence of the chief of the squad in which I was to serve. I came to the barracks in the evening. A cot was assigned to me, and I was prepared to pass my first night there.

I was gradually falling asleep when suppressed sobs struck my ear. The heavily drunk sergeant-major was the disturber of the quiet in the barracks. He approached some of the sleeping young soldiers, woke them rudely, and asked them:

"Who is our present Secretary (Minister) of War? What is his name, surname, full title?"

"Was to those who did not answer promptly and correctly. They received a sound lashing with the buckled end of a heavy soldier's belt.

"What does this mean?" asked I of my friend Ivan Ivanoff.

"Is that allowed in our squad?"

"Allowed! Of course it is contrary to all laws and regulations. But our sergeant-major is a personal favorite of the chief of our regiment, and may do what he pleases with impunity. It is his title. The recruits punished by the sergeant-major are poor devils who failed to pay the customary tribute when entering the squad. The sergeant-major is a brutal and greedy fellow half-crazed with drink. He feels dry and wants to get some money."

"How high is the tribute paid by the recruits to the sergeant-major?"

"Not less than three rubles, at any rate. Yes, bitter is the life of a young soldier," concluded my friend, meditatively.

"Tell me some of your experiences as a recruit," asked I. The sob of the poor recruits drew my sleep away.

"Well, sir! There is not much to tell," said Ivanoff. "You will see yourself in a few days what it means to be a recruit. We peasants are treated without mercy by the drill-sergeant (drabik). Kicks, jabs, arrests, and other severe punishments follow each other, as day follows night, at the slightest pretext, and sometimes without any pretext. A wrong turn of the body during the drill, an awkward motion when engaged in gymnastics, clumsy handling of arms, in a trice brings upon us various blows and abusive language. Such is service!" Ivan Ivanoff sighed deeply when he finished his sentence.

"But why do not you protest against such inhuman treatment?" "Protest? Try it!" he replied, ironically. "Good night, sir!" He covered his head with his coarse gray blanket and our conversation ended for the night.

At six o'clock in the morning we rose and dressed hurriedly. We then cleaned our ammunition, polished our buttons, buckles, and shoes. He who had time and means drank tea.

"Na prazdnik!"—i. e., "In your morning exercise!"—commanded the drill-sergeant. The "prazdniks" intended to be an airing of the soldiers for hygienic purposes, was turned by the sergeant into a rather heavy drill. The actual exercises started at eight o'clock in the morning. They consisted chiefly of gymnastics. What surprised me was that all the instruction of the recruits and young soldiers was left in the hands of old soldiers, who were in all respects, except mechanical training, just as grossly ignorant as their pupils. The result was apparent. Military instruction, instead of being pleasant, healthy, and developing body and mind, was turned by the irrational methods of teaching practiced by the drill-sergeants into a tedious drudgery, having the tendency of crippling the body and stunting the mind. The commissioned officers of the Russian army considered it below their dignity even to teach the common soldiers to read and to write. The barracks were ruled by the sergeant-major, as Russia is ruled by the Czar, with the iron hand.

We had in our squad a young soldier, Peter Kolento, who belonged to the category of "shtrafnoye." This category of soldiers is treated with particular severity. Their slightest error, their most trifling transgressions are punished with draconian cruelty. They are particularly at the mercy of every old soldier in the squad.

A few words about the kind of food given to the Russian soldier will be of interest. The principal meal of the day—the dinner—consists invariably of some cabbage soup (kash) and black bread (kasha), with some sweet and meat. According to rules each soldier has to get daily one-half of a pound of meat, twenty-two subalkis in pound contain ninety-six subalkis of black-bread, and three pounds of sweet-tye bread. The daily ration of a soldier are calculated so as not to exceed four and one-fourth of a kopek (about two cents) for each soldier. The sloshing propensities in the army are, however, so great that the quantity and quality of the soldier's food is considerably below the legal norm. Besides this, the food for the soldiers is prepared in a very uncleanly way and served in an unattractive manner.

A soldier of the rank and file gets the magnificent salary of forty-five kopeks (twenty-two cents) every two months, while a non-commissioned officer gets sixty-seven kopeks (thirty-three cents). Each soldier is responsible for his meal appearance. As the uniforms, boots, etc., he receives from the administration are in most cases of a poor fit and quality the soldier is compelled to spend his own money in order to mend them and keep them in proper shape, or be severely punished. Smoking is therefore considered as a matter of course in the barracks. Official Russian boasts that the soldier in the army is a powerful civilizing agent, lifting the peasantry up from mediocrity.

However, the fact is that the service in the army is a school of demoralization for the peasants. What the peasants acquire in the barracks are the repulsive ideas of the barbaric civilization of city slummers, callousness toward the suffering of their fellow beings, an enhanced spirit of abject servility, and a pronounced aversion to the patient, plodding work of an agriculturist. My army service terminated earlier than I anticipated on account of my defective eyesight, and I left it with not little regret.

Russian Cossack Soldiers grooming their Horses

Copyright by C. B. Green

A Squad of Russian Soldiers at Guard Drill

Copyright by H. C. Ross Co.

Penniless London

By Sydney Brooks

London, June 21, 1934.

LONDONERS will not readily forget the last three seasons. In 1931 Queen Victoria passed away, and the season died before it was born. The court went into full mourning for a period of six months that did not expire, if I remember rightly, till July 24. Society suffered from the effects of a direct intimation of what the King expected of it either in the way of dress or entertainment. Mourning was pretty generally observed on all public and semi-public occasions for at least four or five months after the Queen's death. It was obligatory in the royal enclosure at Ascot, and the opera was never without the fair sprinkling of black gowns. At court it was, of course, rigidly maintained. At private dinner-parties, of the kind that are not announced in the Evening Post, black was definitely discarded before the season was a fortnight old. At more weighty gatherings and receptions the hostesses were usually in half-mourning at least, and the guests played their wiles. Nobodies who wanted to appear somewhat achieved a sentimental importance by appearing in full mourning as long as the court did. Lesser mortals, thinking that they had no position to keep up, gave up black before the middle of June, and joined the morning and afternoon parties in Hyde Park unshamed. Hardly less puzzling than the problem of dress was that of entertainment. Throughout May and June society gave dinners by stealth. Invitations were short and their object disguised in pretexts. The venue d'être was lashed upon "the young people," an announcement that would have scared away any one not versed in the complexities of social life under a monarchy in mourning. But even on the spot it was found that "the young people," for whose benefit the affair was ostensibly arranged, took no more part in it than "the young people" usually do in England—that is to say, none at all. It was not until the end of June, when the King accepted one or two invitations, that society threw off the mask and began to enjoy itself openly. Even then the enjoyment was fragmentary and spasmodic. The floor was not still on, and while it lasted there was a something in the atmosphere, as well as occasional unexpected gaps at the table, not conducive to festivity. There was, in consequence, an unusual number of half-mourning charities in the form of banquets and fetes on behalf of soldiers' and sailors' institutions and so on. A fair number of state pageants broke into the monotony, but even though full mourning came to its official death in time to make Goodwood a feast of color, the season was, on the whole, a failure, commonplace, and under a cloud.

In 1932 it was even worse. The fiasco of the coronation killed what started out to be the most brilliant season London had ever known. The popular wife of a popular admiral also regards herself with justice as a sort of social barometer assured me that her engagement-list for the 1932 season was twenty per cent heavier than in 1931, the year of the Diamond Jubilee, and thirty per cent heavier than in any ordinary season. But nothing could surmount the shock of the King's illness on the very eve of his coronation. People with one second bid to the country, but without wholly rising their town houses. Two days after it was known that the coronation was to be postponed there was an August desolation over everything: mere handbills, and those mainly of American origin, in the parks; the West End an uninhabited as a village again street; Piccadilly as deserted as Fifth Avenue on a hot July afternoon. Never had June closed in such a social chaos. No one knew what might happen. Few, therefore, left England. Society oscillated uneasily between London and the country, prepared for everything or nothing. Thousands of engagements were being cancelled at the last moment. It was the exception to find anything taking place as it had been planned. Hostesses also included holding their dinner or reception or garden-party had to put notices in the papers to that effect. No society can exist on such terms. The result was an overwhelming rush out of town, until things should settle down.

A week or so before the season's close they did, to some degree, settle down. The King made a marvellous, a surprising recovery. Society began feeling its way back again. Entertainments multiplied, but mainly entertainments of a public or semi-public order—reviews of colonial troops, endless dinners to the colonial premiers, a gorgeous reception to the Indian princes at the India office, a coronation banquet opened by the Queen, Lord Kitchener's home-coming, and so on. Any one but a Londoner might have said that the season was a splendid success. But in such matters the London standard is a high one. Judged by it, the season of 1932 was nothing less than catastrophic.

Last year things were more normal. We had President Londe with us and the King of Italy; and society got into its stride again. It was an average, but by no means a brilliant season. The weather was suicidal, and the losses of the trades that flourish on society something appalling in consequence. So much of the social life of London is enacted in the open air, at Kew, Ascot, Goodwood, Newmarket, at Ramsgate and Hurlingham, at Cowes and Brixley, that a dripping summer, such as we had in 1933, prevents any season from accomplishing its best. When August came and society awoke again it was with the belief that the new reign, socially speaking, had yet to begin, and that all would be well in 1934. And now 1934 is here, but only, it would seem, for the purpose of disappointing all the hopes that have been built upon it. True, there seems little falling off in the number of engagements. Pick up the Evening Post any day and you will find that the list of events for the next twelve hours runs to well over half a column. Take, for instance, one day's programme. There is a concert at the Queen's Hall in aid of the London Lifesaving Saturday Fund at which the Prince and Princess of Wales will be present. The Prince and Princess of Wales receive the members of the League of Mercy in their robes at Marlborough House. The Duchess of Cornwall gets upon a three days' leave in aid of a hospital. Princess Henry of Battenberg attends the annual meeting of the Colonial Nursing Association, with Earl Grey in the chair. Princess Christian presides at a sale bid by the Royal School of Art Needlework. The heir apparent to the throne of Austria-Hungary arrives in London. The Duke of Norfolk is presiding at one meeting and the Archbishop of Canterbury at another. There are a dozen dances and receptions announced for the evening. His Majesty's judges are dining with the Lord Mayor at the Mansion House. Six regimental dinners take place at night. The most fashionable flower show of the season opens in the afternoon. The first meet of the Four-Hand Club assemblies in Hyde Park at noon. Half a dozen bazars and sales of work, each under the presidency of some titled woman, several charitable meetings similarly embellished, and other meetings of learned and literary societies, are also on the list; and, in addition, there is the Royal Military Tournament, the Earls' Court Exhibition, the May week at Cambridge University, some fifteen concerts, polo games, and automobile games at Ramsgate, Hurlingham, and the Richmond Club. Theatres and music halls all going full blast, and innumerable private dinner-parties and receptions and balls that never find their way into the papers.

It is a lovely list, and no more than a fair sample, if anything a little below the average, if what has been going on for six weeks and will continue to go on for six more weeks. It does not, at first glance, appear at all consistent with a nation in mourning. And yet on all sides one hears the bitter wail that there is no money about, that every one is starving, that London, in short, is penniless. The West End shopkeepers, who should just now be working overtime, declare unanimously that business was never so slack, that people are spending nothing but buying, and that they are ruined by a winter of extended credit. In the West End the credit system obtains on a scale that I believe is unapproached elsewhere on this planet. Even discounts of ten and fifteen per cent, for prompt settlements do not tempt, and never have tempted, customers into paying cash. A woman who has paid for dressmaker within twelve months thinks herself a model of punctuality. It is the usual thing for accounts to run on for three and four years—tailors and dressmakers dining, but never during to sue, and their hair customers meeting all requests for payment with references to her firm in "the city. Whenever there is a slump this treasury of a credit system brings mindless concern to a practical adversary.

But the present depression extends far beyond dressmakers, though they are the first to suffer by it. Theatres are feeling the pinch severely. The hall-guinea stalls are showing disastrous gaps, and Mr. George Edwards declares that in one of his apparently most successful productions he has already dropped $25,000. Book-sellers and art dealers join in the cry. Restaurant managers go on record with the statement that the slump has begun to affect the tips given to waiters, that people are cutting down on social and economical by giving dinners at home instead of at Claridge's, Prince's, the Savoy, or Carlton. Very few companies are being booked, and "the City" is discharging clerks right and left. There can be no question that the past season has been and will be much more agonised than usual, and that the reason for the change is primarily financial. It is possible that both England and the United States may be entering a continuous zone of commercial depression; but so far the disturbance, on this side of the Atlantic, at any rate, seems to be mainly local. The causes of it are chiefly South African. Ever since the South bought Rand shares the war ended is now holding onto them, in spite of depression, in the hope that the advent of Chinese labor will lead to a boom. The financing of the war was and the immense increase in financial indebtedness have also added to the stringency. The Rand boom has possibly done something, the Russo-Japanese war has certainly done much to unsettle things, and besides all this there is the motor boom. All the spare money has gone into motor-cars, and the other necessities of life will have to wait their turn—it, indeed, their turn ever comes again. Meanwhile, do not be deceived by the list of engagements and entertainments. London does will not show it, but actually, on credit, and with not much more than sixpence in its pocket. To 1931, the season of mourning; 1932, the season of chaos; 1933, the season of rain; in now added 1934, the season when London was penniless.

Snaps of Miss Mabel Biggins playing in the British Ladies' Championship

American Golfers in Britain

By van Tassel Sutphen

THE recent victory of Mr. Walter J. Travis in the British Amateur Golf Championship is, all things considered, the most notable athletic achievement on record. Let it be remembered that Mr. Travis was an alien and (always a real handicap), and he had barely a fortnight's leeway in which to get acclimated and put himself on edge. At first, indeed, the prospects were not bright. In a private letter, written a few days before the beginning of the championship, he describes his playing as atrocious, and his position in the medal competition for the St. George vase was only respectable. But those who knew the American champion will understand that he was merely working up his resources for the final pinch. When the occasion was actually at hand he rose to it.

In the second place, it is well known that Mr. Travis never touched a golf-club until seven years ago, and he was then over thirty-five years of age. Yet he was called upon to face a field of players who, almost without an exception, had played the game in and since their boyhood. It used to be held an incontrovertible dictum that no man could hope for success at golf unless he had played from youth up. When Mr. Huthinson, who is a grandfather of several years standing, won the British title in 1902, the axiom received a nasty jar, and Mr. Travis's success has put an end to it altogether. But, then, to a certain extent, golf is an old man's game; the older players hold their own in it, as they cannot pretend to do in any other purely athletic sport. Doubtless it is the judicious mixture of force and art in golf that accounts for this exception to the general rule. In the winning of a hole the two-hundred-yard drive and the fourteen-inch putt count the same.

Although Mr. Travis did not meet the title-holder, Mr. Maxwell (put out this year by Mr. Hutchinson), he did beat some high-class men, among them Mr. James Robb, Mr. Harold Reade, an ex-Irish champion, Mr. H. H. Hilton, and Mr. H. G. Hutchinson, while in the finals he defeated easily Mr. Edward Blackwell, who for years has been credited with driving powers well nigh supernatural. Nor did he belie his reputation on this occasion. At every tee he would have the best of the long game by from forty to sixty yards. But when it came to the delicate operation of putting the ball in the hole Mr. Travis was his undisputed master.

The English papers and golfing critics have spoken, for the most part, very fairly and generously of Mr. Travis's win. Yet it is, unquestionably, a bitter pill to the British golfer to see the blue ribbon of goldmine go across the water, and at the first time of asking. It recalls almost too vividly the sad fate of the Amateur's cup.

The remarkable picture of Mr. Fry playing out of a bunker recalls the fact that when Mr. Travis was in England three or four years ago Mr. Fry was one of the few players whom he beat. Mr. Hilton, commenting upon Mr. Travis's visit, remarked, somewhat superciliously, that Mr. Fry was only a second-rate player. Mr. Fry's friends revealed this classification, and a merry newspaper war followed which, as usual, settled nothing. However, Mr. Fry made good for himself by taking second honors in the Amateur Championship of 1902.

None of the other American players who accompanied Mr. Travis got very far along in the tournament. It simply goes to show that while we have turned out one player of the very highest class, our average standard does not as yet approach that of Great Britain.

Miss Higgins, of Chicago, was a contestant in this year's Ladies' Championship of Great Britain. In one of the early rounds she met and was rather easily defeated by Miss Adair, the title-holder, who had in turn to Miss Herbert. Miss Higgins has a fine long game, but her approaching and putting are weak. Only as other argument for the theory as duly worked out and practised by her masculine compatriot, Mr. Travis.

Mr. Fry playing out of a Bunker

Mr. Travis in the Rough

Mr. Blackwell at Finish

RACE-TRACKS—THE "GRAND NATIONAL"

Three important steeple-chase events during the season at the large race meetings, some of the most important Grand National Steeple-chase, run at Morris Park. The Interstate Hunters' Steeple-chase, with gentlemen on the race-tracks, instead of, as heretofore, in ploughed country, where they were trained for the big races.

room within was entirely unlighted, so that for the first few seconds the window seemed a dead and opaque surface, as dark as a strip of slate. Then came a realization which, though in a sense general, made us stop back and catch our breath. Two large blue human eyes were so close to us that the window itself seemed suddenly to be a mask. A pale human face was pressed against the glass within, and with increased distinctness, with the increase of the opening came the words:

"When shall I get out?"

"What can all this be?" I said.

Report made no answer, but lifting his walking-stick and pointing the ferrule like a fencing sword at the glass punched a hole in it, a smaller and more accurate than I should have supposed possible. The movement of his hand done so the voice ejected out of the hole, as to speak, piercing and quivering and clear, making the same demand for liberty.

"Can't you get out, madam?" I said, drawing near the hole in some perturbation.

"Get out?" Of course I can't," moaned the unknown female, bitterly. "They won't let me. I told them I would be let out. I told them I'd call the police. But it's no good. Nobody knows, nobody comes. They could keep me as long as they liked only—"

I was in the very act of breaking the window finally with my stick, increased with this very sinister mystery, when Report held my arm hard, held it with a curious, stiff, and secret rigidity as if he desired to stop me, but did not desire to be observed to do so. I passed a moment, and in the next swung slightly round, so that I was facing the supporting wall of the front door steps. They set from me into a sudden stiffness like that of Report, for a figure almost motionless as the pillars of the portico but unmistakably human, had put his head out from between the doorposts and was gazing down into the area. One of the lighted lamps of the street was just behind his head, throwing it into abrupt darkness. Consequently nothing whatever could be seen of his face beyond one fact that he was intently staring at us. I must say I thought Report's eagerness magnificent. He rang the area bell quite idly, and went on talking to me with the easy end of a conversation which had never had any beginning. The black shining figure in the portico did not stir. I almost thought it was really a statue. In another moment the gray area was golden with sunlight as the basement door was opened suddenly and a small and devious housemaid stood in it.

"Tray excuse me," said Report, in a voice which he contrived to make somehow or other at once affable and underlined, "but we thought perhaps that you might do something for the Waifs and Strays. We don't expect—"

"Not here," said the small servant, with the incomparable severity of the moral of the non-philanthropic and slammed the door in our faces.

"Very sad, very sad—the indifference of these people," said the philanthropist, with gravity as we went together up the steps. As we did so the motionless figure in the portico suddenly disappeared.

"Well, what do you make of that?" asked Report, sleeping his glance between us when we got into the street.

I do not mind admitting that I was seriously upset. Under such conditions I had but one thought.

"Don't you think," I said, a trifle timidly, "that we had better tell your brother?"

"Oh, if you like," said Report, in a hoarse way. "He is quite new, as I promised to meet him at Gloucester Road Station. Shall we take a cab? Perhaps, on your say, it might amuse him."

Gloucester Road Station had, as it by accident, a somewhat deserted look. After a little looking about we discovered Basil Tierce with his great head and his great white hat blocking the ticket-office window. I thought at first that he was taking a ticket for somewhere and being an astonishingly long time about it. As a matter of fact, he was discussing religious views with the booking-office clerk and had almost got his head through the hole in his excitement. When we dragged him away it was some time before he would talk of anything but the growth of an infinitesimal fatalism in modern thought, which had been well typified by some of the official's ingenious but perverse fallacies. At last we managed to get him to understand that we had made an astounding discovery. When he did listen, he listened attentively, walking between us as the lamplight struck his religious views in a rather feverish dart of the great house in South Kensington, of the equivocal wisdom, of the lady imprisoned in the basement, and the man staring from the porch. At length he said:

"If you're thinking of going back to look the thing up, you must be careful what you do. It's no good you two going there."

To go twice on the same pretext would look dubious. To go on a different pretext would look damnable. You may be quite certain that the inquisitive gentleman who looked at you looked thoroughly, and will wait, so to speak, your portraits next his heart. If you want to find out if there is anything in this without a police raid I fancy you had better wait outside. I'll go in and see them."

His close and reflective walk brought us at length within sight of the house. It stood up modern and purple against the fast pallor of twilight. It looked like an owl's castle, and so apparently it was.

"Do you think it's safe, Basil?" said his brother, pausing, a little pale, under the lamp. "To go into that place alone. Of course we shall be near enough to hear if you yell, but those devils might do something—something sudden—or odd. I can't feel it's safe."

"I know of nothing that is safe," said Basil, composedly, "except, possibly—death," and he went up the steps and rang at the bell. When the massive respectable door opened for an instant, cutting a square of daylight in the gathering dark, and then closed with a bang, hurrying our friend inside, we could not repress a shudder. It had been like the heavy gaping and closing of the dim lips of some evil Leviathan. A freshening night breeze began to blow up the street, and we turned up the collars of our coats. At the end of twenty minutes, in which we had scarcely moved or spoken, we were as cold as leopards, but more. I think from apprehension than the atmosphere. Suddenly Report made an abrupt movement towards the house.

"I can't stand this," he began, but almost as he spoke sprang back into the shadow, for the panel of gold was again cut out of the black house front, and the hairy figure of Basil was silhouetted against it coming out. He was moving with laughter and talking so loud that you could have heard every syllable across the street. Another voice, or, possibly, two voices, were laughing and talking back at him from within.

"No, no, no," Basil was calling out, with a sort of hilarious hostility. "That's quite wrong. That's the most ghastly heresy of all. It's the soul, my dear chap, the soul that is the arbiter of cosmic force. When you see a cosmic force you don't like, trick it, my boy. But I must really be off."

"Come and pick into us again," came the laughing voice from out of the house. "We still have some bones unbroken."

"Thanks, very much, I will—good night," shouted Gryce, who had by this time reached the street.

"Good night," came the friendly call in reply, before the door

Drawn by Will Cornish

Report Gryce had bounced on him from behind closed. Their benedictions were as stentorian and almost as distant as those of ships hailing each other in a stormy sea.

"Basil," said Rupert Gryce, in a hoarse whisper, "what are we to do?"

The elder brother looked thoughtfully from one of us to the other.

"What is to be done, Basil?" I repeated in uncontrollable excitement.

"I'm not sure," said Basil, doubtfully. "What do you say to getting some dinner somewhere and going to the Court Theatre to-night. I tried to get those fellows to come, but they couldn't."

We stared blankly.

"Go to the Court Theatre?" repeated Rupert. "What would be the good of that?"

"Good? What do you mean?" answered Basil, staring also.

"Have you turned Puritan or Passive Resister, or something? For fear of course."

"But, great God in Heaven! What are we going to do, I mean?" cried Rupert. "What about the poor woman backed up in that house? Shall I go for the police?"

Basil's face cleared with immediate comprehension, and he laughed.

"Oh, that," he said. "I'd forgotten that. That's all right. Some mistake, possibly. In some quiet trifling private affair. But I'm sorry those fellows couldn't come with us. Shall we take one of these green omnibuses? There is a restaurant in Blooms Square."

"I sometimes think you play the fool to frighten us," I said, irritably. "How can we leave that woman backed up? How can it be a mere private affair? How can crime and kidnapping and murder, for all I know, be private affairs? Shall we take a refuge in a man's drawing-room, would you think it had taste to talk about it just as if it was a damned shade or an infernal etching?"

Basil laughed heartily.

"That's very forcible," he said. "As a matter of fact, though, I know it's all right in this case. And here comes the green omnibus."

"How do you know it's all right in this case?" persisted his brother, angrily.

"My dear chap the thing's obvious," answered Basil, holding a return ticket between his teeth while he fumbled in his waistcoat pocket. "These two fellows never committed a crime in their lives. They're not the kind. Here either of you chaps got a half-penny? I want to get a paper before the omnibus comes."

"Oh, curse the paper," cried Rupert, in a fury. "Do you mean to tell me, Basil Gryce, that you are going to leave a fellow creature in pitch darkness in a private danger, because you've had one?"

"Ten minutes' talk with the keepers of it and thought them rather good men?"

"Good men do commit crimes sometimes," said Basil, taking the ticket out of his mouth. "But this kind of good men doesn't commit that kind of crime. Well, shall we get in this omnibus?"

The great green vehicle was indeed plunging and lumbering along the dim wide street towards us. Basil had stepped from the curb, and for an instant it was touch and go whether we should all have leaped on to it and been borne away to the restaurant and the theatre.

If it had been any mere project of Basil's, however bizarre, if it had been any theory, however monstrous, we should have followed him, as we always did, through the interdicts. I must confess, were always cowed by his in hours of high excitement. But common-sense are the same everywhere, and there is a moral equality of all men.

"Basil," I said, taking him firmly by the shoulder, "I simply won't leave this street and this house."

"Nor will I," said Rupert, glaring at it and biting his fingers. "There's some black work going on there. If I let it I should never sleep again."

Basil Gryce looked at us both seriously.

"Of course if you feel like that," he said, "we'll investigate further. You'll find it's all right, though. They're only two young Oxford fellows. Extremely nice, too, though rather infected with this pseudo-Darwinian business. Ethics of evolution and all that."

"I think," said Rupert, darkly, ringing the bell, "that we shall enlighten you further about their ethics."

"And may I ask," said Basil, gloomily, "what it is that you propose to do?"

"I propose, first of all," said Rupert, "to get into this house, second, to have a look at these nice young Oxford men, third, to knock them down, bind them, gag them, and search the house."

Basil shared indignantly for a few minutes. Then he was shaken for an instant with his own sudden laughs.

"Poor little boys," he said. "But it almost serves them right for holding such silly views, after all."

"There's something damned Darwinian about it."

"I suppose you mean to help us?" said Rupert.

"Oh, yes, I'll be in it," answered Basil. "If it's only to prevent your doing the poor thing any harm."

He was standing in the rear of our little procession, looking indifferent and sometimes even sulky, but somehow the instant the door opened he stepped first into the hall, glowing with urgency.

"So sorry to haunt you like this," he said, "I met two friends outside who were much wiser to know you. May I bring them in?"

"Delighted, of course," said a young voice, the unmistakable voice of the Isis, and I realized that the door had been opened, not by the devious little servant girl, but by one of our hosts in person. Wife was a short, but shapely young gentleman, with curly dark hair and a square, sun-kissed face. He wore slippers and a sort of blazer of some incredible colored pattern.

"This way," he said; "mind the step by the staircase. This house is more crooked and old-fashioned than you would think from its snailish exterior. There are quite a lot of odd corners in the place really."

That, said Rupert, with a savage smile, "I can quite believe."

We were by this time in the study or back parlor, and by the young inhabitants as a sitting-room, an apartment littered with magazines and books ranging from Dante to detective stories. The other youth who stood with his back to the fire smoking a cigarette, and had, and fairly, a head like a hair-brushed forward and a Norfolk jacket. He was that particular type of man whose every feature and action is heavy and clumsy, and yet who is, you would say, rather exceptionally a gentleman.

"Any more arguments?" he said, when introductions had been effected. I must say, Mr. Gryce, you were rather were were again somewhat out of action such as mine. I've half a mind to chuck my D.S. and turn minor poet."

"Bosh," answered Gryce. "I never said a word against eminent men of science. What I complain of is a vague popular philosophy which suggests itself to be scientific when it is really nothing but a sort of religion, and an unconsciously self-right one. When people talk about the fall of man they know they were talking about a mystery, a thing they didn't understand. Now that they talk about the survival of the fittest they think they do understand it, whereas they have not merely no notion; they have an elaborately false notion of what the words mean. The Darwinian movement has made no difference to mankind, except that, instead of talking unphilosophically about philosophy, they now talk unscientifically about science."

"That is all very well," said the big young man, whose name appeared to be Burema, "Oh, of course, in a sense, science, like mathematics or the study, can only be perfectly understood by specialists. Still, the rudiments may be of public use. Good-bye here," indicating the little man in the blazer, "don't know me none of mine from another. Still, he knows something. He knows enough to take off his hat when they play 'God Save the King.' He doesn't take it off by mistake when they play 'Oh, den tubler Slippers.'"

He turned to the study in the same way, saying—

"Here Mr. Burema stopped abruptly. He was interrupted by an argumentation in philosophical controversy and perhaps not wholly legitimate. Rupert Gryce had bounded on him from behind, flung an arm round his throat, and bent the great backward."

"Knock the other fellow down, St. Albans," he called out, and before I knew where I was I was locked in a grapple with the man in the purple blazer. He was a wiry fighter, who bent and sprang back like whiplash, but I was heavier and had taken him utterly by surprise. I twitched one of his feet from under him; he swung for a moment on the single foot, and then we fell with a crash amid the fitter of the study, myself on top.

To be concluded.

A Unique Musical Exhibit at St. Louis

By Gustav Kobbe

MRS. J. MITCHELL CLARK, of New York and Newport, has a unique exhibit at the Louisiana Purchase Exposition in St. Louis.

It is in the musical section, in her own invention, and, according to autograph letters which she has from Felix Weingartner, Richard Strauss, Reiner, Gieseler, and others, who have tested the invention practically, it is destined to work a revolution in an important branch of music. When Mr. Clark attended the last concert which Frederic gave in this country, she stepped a box on one side of Carnegie Hall. It did not seem to her that the sound of the piano reached her with the richness or the equalization of tone that would be expected when so great a virtuoso as Frederic was playing.

She thought the matter over, and finally concluded that the fault lay with the flat lid, which served simply as a guard against dust, but which she believed might be made into a wonderfully effective sounding-board. As soon as she reached this conclusion, she went to work and solved her problem scientifically, provided her from the basis that the sound of the month, the greatest of all sounding boards, is curved, and that all musical instruments, except the piano, have curved sounding boards.

The result of her calculations and the apparatus based upon them are to be seen in the musical section of the Exposition. When she has an organ, a grand and an upright, which have attracted the attention of many musicians. A glance shows that the lids of these pianos are unlike those attached to any others. Instead of being flat, they are curved and shell-like in appearance. These lids are far more graceful to the eye than the old style, especially the interior, which is constructed of strips of spruce running lengthwise in the grain and radiating in parallel curves. Not only has the wood a soft, satinelike appearance, but the parabolic surface results in a remarkable resonance. It distributes the sound evenly in all directions. A person seated at a distance from the piano and at a point which ordinarily would be out of the direct line of sound, receives the same volume and quality of tone as if near by and right in front of the instrument.

F. A. Bridgman's Portrait of Mrs. Sarah Wood Clark, showing her new invention for the Piano, the "Tone-Reflector"

The tone-reflector, as Mrs. Clark rolls the curved lid which she has invented, results in a thoroughly equalized distribution of sound in all directions and to a great distance. Richard Strauss was amazed, particularly with the result of the curved lid on the upright piano, which he declared gained a volume of tone equal to that of a grand.

Mrs. Clark comes naturally by her inventive turn. She was Miss Sarah Wood, whose grandfather, Abner Wood, invented the cottonwood plough and was decorated by the Czar and presented with an historic diamond valued at $15,000. Commissioner Allen has written that in the United States Patent Office Wood is ranked with Fulton and Morse as one of the three great inventors. Mrs. Clark's father, the late Albert H. Wood, was not only a musician, but also an inventor, several of his inventions having contributed to make the modern piano what it is.

The Humor of Political Campaigns

By George Barton

EVERY political campaign has its humorous side and its humorous incidents, and this is an aspect of our national life that is thoroughly appreciated and enjoyed by the people. The average American citizen loves the snap and bustle of an exciting campaign, but he rarely permits himself to take fleeting or ephemeral issues too seriously.

The late Benjamin F. Butler was one of those tactful speakers who kept an audience in a roar, and who won their good will, even if he did not capture their votes, by the unorthodox character of his political preaching. During one of these good old-fashioned political meetings for which Massachusetts was noted, Butler in an outburst of patriotism truly "made the eagle scream." Then, for a diversion, he engaged in the delectable occupation of "pulling the tail" of the British lion just for the pure enjoyment of hearing that bad tempered and sorely harassed animal growl. At one point in his address he quoted a certain English newspaper as authority for his assertion:

A burly red-faced man in the audience, who had interrupted him once or twice before, cried out, in a heavy bass voice:

"I don't know of any such paper."

Butler paused in his remarks; and after the silence had become impressive, he walked to the center of the stage, and pointing the forefinger of his right hand at the offender, said, slowly and emphatically:

"Pray, my dear sir, do not interrupt the proceedings of this meeting, for, if you begin to tell us what you don't know, there will be no time for anything else."

The roar of genuine laughter that followed this thrust completely squelched the disturber, who kept silence during the remainder of the meeting.

On another occasion, within the memory of the writer, General Butler was addressing a meeting at Horticultural Hall, in Philadelphia, during his campaign for the Presidency. He had been nominated by the People's party—a popular, if somewhat misleading title—and was making his appeal for votes to the men who earned their living by the sweat of their brows. His speech was a harangue against both the Republican and Democratic parties, and was disastrous to the greater part of those in the audience. He was interrupted constantly, but kept heavily on. In the midst of his remarks some rascals, who filled the ends of the galleries on both sides of the stage, suddenly threw a shower of tin spoons on the platform in front of the speaker. General Butler, renowned as he was to the vulgarity of politics, turned scarlet and seemed nonplussed. The reference was obvious. When Butler was in control of New Orleans during the war his drastic measures brought down upon him the vials of wrath of the opposition; his integrity was questioned, and although there was no proof of the allegation, he was charged with appropriating silver spoons belonging to the citizens of the town to his own use.

But Butler, who had fired many a shower of bullets, was too experienced and too resourceful to remain disconcerted long by a shower of spoons. At first the audience had peered with delight; but after that, realizing the gravity of the insult, waited in almost breathless silence for the rejoinder. Butler stooped down and picked up a handful of the spoons and slowly advanced to the front of the stage. A long defence of his conduct during the war would have been inopportune at such a time and place. He would treat it with contempt. He held the spoons above his head, and said, with a roar that could be heard outside the hall:

"The only argument of the two old parties."

The tones of emphasized disgust that he employed in using the word "argument" completely captured the audience, and his reply of a single sentence was greeted with loud and prolonged cheering.

A McKinley Anecdote

The late President McKinley was a man whose charming personality made itself felt during his numerous campaigning tours. He was an kind and generous and considerate of the feelings of others that few could say him nay. He indulged in few flights of violence; but he made sure of his facts, and then he presented them with such logic and with such evident sincerity that his addresses were always convincing. While he employed few of the flowers of oratory, he was a master of the art of public speaking, as he was a master of every duty or task that he was called upon to perform. He made it a point to know and understand his audience, and he handled the men and women in front of him as so much raw material which he enjoyed molding into a desired shape.

The night Major McKinley was delivering an address on the tariff before a large audience in Pittsburg, he was constantly interrupted by a coarse-looking man in the gallery. Finally, weary of these persistent outbursts at the fellow, and there were loud cries of "Put him out," "Put him out." Simultaneously there was a rush toward the part of the gallery where he was located. An incident not new was in progress. The audience, in the excitement of the pursuit of the purpose of the meeting. But Major McKinley soon rallied his auditors to their senses.

"Stop one moment," he shouted, in a ringing and commanding voice.

Attention was arrested immediately. The fight stopped, and all strained their ears to listen. The silence was broken by a voice shouting:

"Put that man out first."

"No," replied Major McKinley, "don't put him out. I want him to stay here. Most of you already think as I do. He does not. I would like to convince him. If he will give me his attention and you will remain quiet, I will do my best."

That ended all danger of a panic and won the audience completely. All through the evening Major McKinley addressed his remarks to the man in the gallery, calling him "My Democratic friend." He was not answered by either interruption, and the meeting was over the most successful one of his entire campaign.

Major McKinley and the first strumpet speaker to employ these tactics to quiet an audience and win its attention; but his air of kindness, no less than his manner of authority, gave him control over a public gathering, such as few men in our times have possessed.

Secretary Shaw and the Rats

Leslie M. Shaw, the present Secretary of the Treasury, is one of the men who made a big hit as a campaigner in the McKinley and Roosevelt campaign of 1896. Most of his speeches were made in the far Western States where the free silver levying was so pronounced. Imagine an ardent advocate of the gold standard addressing men whose entire material interests seemed dependent upon the success of the 16 to 1 platform, and it will be possible to understand the relations between Secretary Shaw and his auditors. But he feared nothing—not even physical violence—and thus he won the day. He had the happy faculty of relieving a strained situation with a good story. One of his favorite anecdotes concerned the Western farmer who had built a beautiful barn, only to find, after its completion, that it was infested with rats. After some difficulty they were hunted by a little incident in the floor about the sides of a small hole. In order to exterminate the pests the farmer purchased a cat that had the reputation of being the best "rat" in the country. But, alas! it was found that the cat was too large to get through the hole to reach the rats, which sported in the space beneath the floor. Then it was decided to saw a hole in the floor big enough to admit the cat. This was done, but, unfortunately, it was made so large that all the rats escaped before the cat got through. The moral of the story was to apply, in several ways, to the existing political situation.

How Ingersoll Squashed Him

The late Robert G. Ingersoll was an unusually successful campaigner. During the Illinois campaign, in 1894, he was invited to address the citizens of a certain town in Illinois upon the issues of the day. He sent a reply to the chairman of the political committee, saying that he had once attempted to speak to the people of that place upon a non-political question, but because of the religious feeling in the community he had been biased down and not permitted to finish his remarks. If he was a younger man, he wrote, he would be delighted to try it over again, but as he was advancing in years and preferred to take his ease rather than to engage in violent controversies, he respectfully asked to be excused.

The chairman, however, would not take no for an answer. He replied to Colonel Ingersoll at some length, saying that the people were really anxious to hear him; that he was invited to talk upon a political and not a religious theme, and that, in any case, he would guarantee—if the invitation be accepted—that the speaker would suffer no interruptions. Such a request, made in such a way, could scarcely be declined, so it was accepted. The meeting was held in the largest hall in the town, and so great was the interest in the event that many were unable to gain admittance. The chairman, in introducing the star of the evening, referred in grave language to the correspondence that had passed between himself and Colonel Ingersoll, and called upon those present to cooperate with him in keeping the compact. The audience signified its assent by hearty applause.

Colonel Ingersoll began his address with a brilliant summary of the achievements of the Republican party. He had not gone far when a man in a front seat, who was under the influence of liquor, snapped out "chevrons." The speaker, pretending not to hear this, proceeded with his address. In a few minutes the man broke out with the opening lines of "We shall meet in the court by and by." Colonel Ingersoll was visibly annoyed at this, but said nothing. And then the disturber of the peace, further emboldened, shouted, "Oh, let up on politics and tell us a story." The chairman was about to interfere, when Ingersoll, sleepily pausing in his remarks, said, dramatically:

"My friend, I will tell you a story."

The Fable of the Hound

There was instant silence; and then the speaker, after pausing for a moment as if to collect his thoughts, spoke substantially as follows:

"There is a general proverb saying was proclaimed by all of the assembly. It was agreed that all hostilities should cease, that the lion and the fox, and the goose and the elephant, and the hound and all of the animals should wander about in sweet fellowship and with the distinct understanding that no one animal should injure or disturb another. The day began charmingly. An old fox and a young goose sat together, an antiquarian and a student, almost as happy as could be, telling one another stories and dilating upon the sweetness of peace and harmony. Suddenly the fox halted and began to look around in a furtive way.

"Why, what's the matter," said the goose to the fox: "I have never seen you trembling all over."

"Listen," said the fox, in a low voice, "and you will understand."

"Both listened intently, and from the distance came the baying of the hounds."

"Why," said the goose, smiling with goose-like wisdom, "there is no occasion for alarm."

"But there is," said the fox. "I must get away from the hounds. I think I shall elude the nearest tree."

"But," returned the goose, "you forget that this is the day of the general peace. You know the agreement."

"I do not," said the fox. "It's all right with the other animals, but there is always some dirty hound that will break the agreement."

The roars of laughter and applause that followed the story nearly took the roof of the building. It is unnecessary to state that the noisy man in the front seat was squelched, and that no one else attempted to break the agreement that night.

One on Greeley

Women usually have a keen sense of humor, and the prohibition and woman's suffrage movements have brought forth incidents which have been productive of more than one hearty laugh. Elizabeth V. Stanton was once discussing most eloquently upon the right of woman to the ballot when she was interrupted by Horace Greeley, who exclaimed, in his high-pitched falsetto voice:

"What would you do in time of war if you had the suffrage?"

This seemed like a poser. But the lady had been before the public too long to be disconcerted by an unexpected question, and she promptly replied:

"Just what you have done, Mr. Greeley—stay at home and urge others to go and fight."

There was a jester in a certain New England town who was noted for his humor, and who was especially noted in his denunciation of those of the fair sex who contended for the right to vote. He had been advertised to address a public meeting in Boston; and on the morning of that day a prominent woman suffragist came into the hall from one of the outlying towns, bringing with her a great New-England dog named Abe, who was the pride of the family and the pet of the neighborhood.

A good-natured friend, who was also associated with the woman's suffrage, meeting the suffragist, exclaimed:

"Why are you bringing him here to town?"

"Oh," she replied, innocently, "I heard the judge was going to lecture to-night, and I thought I would take him there to have him learn him how to growl."

An Effective Rejoinder

A few years ago there was an exciting campaign for an important State office in Kansas. The nominee who was looked upon as a sort of second Lincoln, had energy and ability, but was not able to boast of the possession of much of this world's goods. However, he had made a good start in the profession of the law and had laid outstripped most of the neighbors in the town where he was born and raised. During the course of the campaign he was called upon to deliver a speech in this town. The affair took place in the court-house, and the candidate appeared upon the stage on that evening attired in a frock coat and carrying a high silk hat.

This apparent evidence of wealth and respectability seemed to amuse some of the old farmers who sat in the audience. One

(Continued on page 1063.)

Correspondence

Opinions of Dr. Abbott's Advice to "A Troubled Wife"

PHILADELPHIA, June 10, 1894.

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

Sir,—You ask for your readers' opinion of Dr. Abbott's advice to the heartbroken wife. I do not think it very sound. I could imagine such advice given and received in an amiable frame of mind by Wife No. 1, of a Man who had just married, or was paying attention to the person who would become Wife No. 2, and such a situation might be expected by Wife No. 1.

No man ever loved two women equally, and the fact that he came to love this woman being married shows that he loves her more than his wife, or at the first feeling of love toward that creature who allowed him should have warned him. He was no avicer in love matters, and should have known the signs. Dr. Abbott is in error when he says that there is always wrong on both sides. I knew a woman, a saint on earth, who had a wretched of a husband.

He—Dr. Abbott—says, Your husband's actions, you say, were innocent, why not his motives? But! The wife does not know if his actions were innocent. All she has is his word. Besides, a man in this position of complicity is not material. That woman probably was the cause of her own marital unhappiness and wasted cheap sympathy. He, the husband, is most likely a "wretched creature" who wants his wife to stay with him as well as to hate and shield him from public opinion, then, when he has her suspicious killed, will exhibit again with that creature. He would her watching, and if she—the wife—had the energy, I think a good few whippings would work wonders with such a selfish, selfish creature of a man.

I have my opinion of Dr. Abbott, and he is not very high in it. I pity his wife—if he has one—reading his advice (!).

I am, sir,

Mrs. C. E. BATHURST.

ASHGROVE, MASS., June 11, 1894.

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

Sir,—Perfection does not belong to men and women. It is an attribute of God. Admitting that he created them in his own image, then the qualities of love, justice, right, etc., which exist in him are an excellence that cannot be increased, are possessed by them only to a greater or less degree.

Such being the fact, no human being can expect of another absolute perfection in any direction. All the relations of life are entered into with this knowledge. Even that of marriage is no exception. The husband has no right to expect that his wife will be perfectly faultless, nor the wife to demand of her husband love without blemish. "Forsaking all others," etc., is a promise, but it is made by both husband and wife, with the knowledge that neither has perfect control over himself or herself.

Love in a man is inspired by the woman whom he loves. While she remains lovely he delights in her presence. It is possible that he may be thrown in contact with another more lovely. In such a case what is his duty? Obviously to "cleave to his wife." This the husband of the wife who sought the counsel of Dr. Abbott did. He broke off all intercourse with the other woman, and "strive by every tenderness to win back to cheerfulness" his wife. The advice, therefore, of Dr. Abbott was "wise and reasonable."

The statement of Dr. Abbott, however, is open to criticism. He says, "Even if you have to pretend to some fondness which you do not feel, it were better than to impose upon him the gloom of a morbid sorrow which you ought not to feel." When SI, (Paul says, "Let her be without dissimulation," he is the better advised."

I am, sir,

ISAAC DELANEY.

TOVONIA, MASS., June 10, 1894.

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

Sir,—In reading the Rev. Dr. Lyman Abbott's reply to the unhappy wife, published in your last number, it seemed to me that his advice was not sound. The dictum of Umar is a safe rule for the husband as well as for the wife, and if followed faithfully by both the divorce court would have fewer cases. The husband, as well as the wife, must be "above suspicion," and separate "sympathetic friendships" should be avoided.

I am, sir,

"BOKKA."

NEW YORK, June 11, 1894.

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

Sir,—I once heard a very witty, if worldly, woman remark, "I believe that men and women are capable of a genuine love twice in their lives, once in youth and once in maturity, and they are fortunate if the object is the same on both occasions." Possibly this view of the case may throw some light on Dr. Lyman Abbott's conservative advice to a "troubled wife." Dr. Abbott, in his capacity as a minister of the gospel, has doubtless been brought in contact with many phases of life. He has known the hearts of men and women, and he knows some of their hidden tragedies. It is not an strange that he submits to what seems the inevitable in the case of this wife, and counsels her to be resigned and to try to win back her unfortunate but not wicked husband by the most saintly charity and love of which the human heart is capable. As to the marriage and other carnal vows, one word. A human heart can no more fulfill perpetually a promise to love than it can fulfill a promise to believe, yet we marry in immaturity and are consecrated to some religious belief during the same unformed and inexperienced period, and we expect, and others expect, that we will have these verbal promises through years of mental change, as it either being or believing were matters of will power only and not the outcome of irresistible forces within ourselves. When one partner in a marriage contract grows or grows away from the other, the case is bad enough. It is infinitely worse when he or she meets in disconnected maturity a man or woman who is infinitely satisfactory to every mental demand, in sympathy, in sympathy frequent, and in a position of gigantic difficulty which nobody living in the present state of society—not even Dr. Abbott—has yet succeeded in solving.

I am, sir,

WOMAN.

ASTORIA, MASS., June 11, 1894.

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

Sir,—In regard to the letter of advice from Dr. Lyman Abbott, which you invite criticism upon, I would say, that while I could not hope to be classified as one of your most intelligent readers, the letter presents itself to my mind so clearly, in a twofold aspect, that I venture to send you my opinion.

It is to be regretted that such a letter from Dr. Abbott should be made public. Those inclined to be too free with their affections will find here much that they can use to justify themselves in wrongdoing. However, since only one letter of advice to the grieved woman, I not only find no fault with it, but I fail to see how it could be improved upon. Any condemnation of the husband's actions would only make the wife's position the harder to bear. So he gives them the more favorable possible interpretation. And he tries to tell her what she can do to make the best of what, admittedly, is a hard situation.

The woman's letter has in it such a note of deep sorrow that it is not strange that Dr. Abbott, in his endeavor to say the words most helpful to her, should attempt to consider the latter pretension that might be given to them by the public. Other than this reasonable regret I do not see how that he can be judged at fault. At any rate, it is unjust to infer from this letter, that Dr. Abbott's views as regard to the social relations are any more lax than those entertained by the most strict.

I am, sir,

N. R. BROWN.

PERRY POINT PARK, CAMDEN, N. J., June 11, 1894.

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

Sir,—A constant and we would like to believe intelligent reader of your paper is interested in Dr. Lyman Abbott's letter in your last number. His advice to the lady in question to "lay aside her tears, shunning no evidence of gloomy feeling," is, beyond question, wise. Shunning never field any man. It is a woman's duty to cheer and brighten and lead her way to making him, her husband, happy. The lady says of her husband that he was a strong and good character. She also says "he struggled," also that this other line that he knew or felt was strong enough to need "struggling" against, "still claims a place in his heart," and that he and the other woman "had exchanged declarations of mutual love." Why, then, does Dr. Abbott say, "What your husband's fault is in this case we cannot judge?" Why can he not judge? No morbid weakness on the part of a woman is the position that the doctor admits should be "suppressed" can declarations of a love that the man felt should be "struggled against" to another woman. Simple friendship needs no such struggle. Conjugal love thus married is never the same again.

A wife may and can take up her life directly and, with God's grace, cheerfully, but, like a gay old of china, which has been cracked, it is, though possible for husband and wife, never again perfect. In this, as in much of Dr. Abbott's teaching, the reality true and false are woven together with his own peculiar and delicate spirituality. Such people do not rise true.

I am, sir,

L. C. W.

TOVONIA, N. Y., June 10, 1894.

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

Sir,—I am so far from anxious to assume that I am one of "the most intelligent readers" of your paper; but, none the less, I have my opinion concerning the question of the soundness of Dr. Abbott's advice to "A Troubled Wife," and it is as follows:

The good doctor was not attempting to declare the right or wrong of the question, but to give advice that, both as to matter and manner, would be most apt to help his correspondent. It was wise for him, therefore, so far as possible, to turn her thoughts from herself and her troubles by minimizing somewhat the seriousness of the situation, inasmuch as he could have no influence over the other party.

Reduced to its bare bones, his reply was: "Perhaps you are not so badly off as you think; make the best you possibly can of your circumstances"; just as we say to a child, "There, there; you are not so badly hurt; don't cry."

I think his course admirable, while at the same time I condemn most strongly the act of the husband, as being extremely prejudicial to both women concerned.

I am, sir,

R. W. LOBB.

Correspondence.—(Continued)

LEFT-HANDED COMPLIMENTS

BRACHTENTVILLE, KEN., June 6, 1914.

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

SIR,—We are so glad the author of the article "Capacities and Incapacities of Women," which so recently appeared in your valuable paper, repressed his glorious name. We congratulate him on his felicitous wording. The superlatives are quite good, but how poor the furnishings! How sadly has thought been sacrificed! Poor, poor inequalities, placed before the ignorant darkness in the political world, how can they develop their stonemasonlike abilities—but, can they have any? Does that become the living affluence entirely upon men? I grieve for more fragrant, lovely home bodies among women, but as women train the rising men, and as men must grapple with governments, principalities, and powers, let her have a chance in the world.

It will not make the truly womanly Christian woman any the less womanly. The violet stands true. Queen Wilhelmina is a lovely violet in the sunshine. The light doesn't hurt her. I know that women are capable of producing great harmonies. Her music, which is often great glimmers, comes softly down the corridors of time. Do you not feel the tender touch of the strong woman's hand upon history's brow? If you do not, information may be easily obtained by a careful research of both sacred and profane story. I am, sir,

A KENTUCKY INCAPABLE.

"HOLY WILLIE'S PRAYER"

511 WEST STREET.

PHILADELPHIA, PA., June 9, 1914.

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

SIR,—In your editorial article in the WEEKLY of June 4, "The Vatican in Politics" you speak of "Holy Willie's Prayer." Will you kindly tell me where I can find this prayer? My looks of reference do not seem to give any light upon the subject.

I am, sir,

Jas. R. RHOADS

Some time in the autumn of 1784, Gavin Hamilton, one of the friends of Robert Burns, was asked by a beggar to contribute to his needs. Hamilton, forgetting that it was the Sabbath-day, replied that if any man will not work, neither shall he eat, and turned the man into his garden, to earn a meal by digging potatoes. For this sin of Sabbath-breaking, Hamilton was put under the same excommunication, and baptism was denied to his child. To atone this outrage on his friend, Burns wrote the famous "Prayer," the petitioner of which is one William Fisher, elder in the Old Light Church, and very valuable on the doctrine of original sin and foreordination. The prayer begins:

O Thou, who in the heavens dost dwell,
Who, as it pleases thee thyself,
Sends one to heaven, and ten to hell,
A' for thy glory,
And no for any gain or ill
They're done afore thee!

I bless and praise thy matchless might,
When thousands thus hast left in night,
That I am here, afore thy sight,
For a grain an' grave,
A burnin' an' a shinin' light
To a' this place.

What was I, or my generation,
That I should get sic exaltation?
I, who deserve sic just chastigation,
For broken laws,
Five thousand years' fore my creation,
Thou' Adams' cause. . . —EPIGRAM.

AN ENGLISHMAN'S VIEW OF OUR WOMEN

NEW YORK, June 10, 1914.

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

SIR,—I was interested in reading the letter by A. C. H., regarding American women and their foreign titles. The letter seemed so genuine that I felt impelled to reply to it. I am an Englishman, and strive as I may, I cannot admire American women. I have no personal spite against them, or prejudice; in fact, before I came to America I held the women of this country in the highest esteem. Sensible and jolly, without being unbecomingly, was the idea I held. I imagined them as thorough good wits, with a broad healthy view of life and a great ability to look after themselves. How different they seem to me now. I see all around me women as shallow and empty-headed as one could find anywhere. Their very attitude of frankness and candor seems to be a pose. I cannot feel somehow that they are genuine. They say they are lovers of their country but they go away to Europe for months and leave their husbands behind. They take no interest in his business and don't enter a vent whether he's making his money in a mean manner or not. A man may be as despicable a cad as one could find, but he can always get a wife here (yes, and find three or four more to take her place afterwards, if he has money and can satisfy all her whims. American women care less what a man really is, provided he is to some extent companionable. Your correspondent speaks also of the protection American men afford their women. I cannot understand that statement, when I observe every day women standing in cars and being picked and jostled by men. The adulations and cold blooded desecrations have made my blood boil at times. I say, unhesitatingly, that English girls are protected and looked after far more than American. I assure you there is nothing in this letter prompted by personal spite, it is an honest opinion, and I would feel glad if I could think different.

I am, sir,

ENGLISHMAN.

IN MEMORY OF JACOB ABBOTT

CAMPDEN, MASS., June 10, 1914.

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

SIR,—On several accounts I believe you will be pleased to know that steps have been taken to lay Fessenden—the little property at Farmington, Maine, where our father, Jacob Abbott, spent the last years of his life, and where he died in 1879—and to restore and preserve it as a memorial of him. An option has been secured on the property at the very reasonable price of something less than $2000, and besides the remaining members of our family, including my brother Lyman and the children of our brother Benjamin, Vaughan, and Augustus, it is believed and hoped that there are others of the public who, as former pupils of Jacob Abbott at the Boston and New York schools, or as readers of his books, will be glad of the opportunity to aid in carrying out the plan by contributions to the purchase money. As soon as the purchase can be effected it is proposed to have the property divided to three trunks to hold for the purpose stated, and in some sort of practical way as an adjunct to the Abbott School for boys directly opposite the premises, known as Little Blue, founded by my father in 1838. At Little Blue, and later at Fessenden, many of his books were written. A "Jacob Abbott prize" was founded at the school last year to consist of a set of some one of Jacob Abbott's works, or similar writings, to be conferred at the close of each school year on the pupil adjudged to have made the nearest approach during the year to the ideal of an all-round Christian manhood. At the closing exercises of the school last Tuesday evening, I had the pleasure and honor of bestowing on a boy from Orange, New Jersey, as the "Jacob Abbott prize" for 1914, a complete set of the histories bearing your imprint and in their original bindings.

I have thought that your house, by reason of long connection in the past with Jacob Abbott and his works, would be interested at least to know of this commemorative enterprise.

I am, sir,

REV. EDWARD ABBOTT.

A CIVIC MEMORIAL IN NEW YORK

THE PENNSYLVANIA SOCIETY.

NEW YORK, June 10, 1914.

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

SIR,—I write to ask your interest in a plan to create a civic museum in New York as a memorial to the late Andrew H. Green, and to suggest that you make some editorial comment on the proposal in the next issue of the WEEKLY. This suggestion has been made to the Andrew H. Green Memorial Association as the best form for a memorial, and the committee is now awaiting expressions of opinion before taking any action, either on this or on the other suggestions that have been made to it.

I venture to bring this directly before you in the hope of soliciting your interest in the plan, since the idea is one that most greatly interested early New Yorkers. The most noteworthy civic museum in existence is the Musée Carnavalet in Paris, which is a museum of the history of Paris, and which must be familiar to every American who has visited the French capital. A civic museum in New York would have the wealth of curious and artistic objects which make the Musée Carnavalet so interesting, but it would, nevertheless, be a museum of vast interest and a most important centre in furthering civic pride in our city. This is the aspect of the proposal which must appeal to the patriotic New Yorker, and it is this which would make the proposed museum so valuable and so helpful.

Mr. Green was intimately associated with the growth of New York throughout his entire life. His conception of the duties of citizenship were of the loftiest description. A memorial that was directly concerned with city life and history, which would illustrate its growth, which would keep the proposals made for its establishment and improvement, and which would promote the idea that New York itself, the city, was something to be proud of, would surely be the fittest that could be devised.

A work of art, be it ever so elaborate, is finished and completed when the last stone has been set and the last figure put in place. But a museum is a matter of daily and yearly growth. It is only as Mr. Green realized in his city would be perpetually alive by an institution and has been proposed, and which needs only to be begun under proper auspices to win universal respect and consideration. Not the least valuable feature of the proposal is the fact that the idea of a civic museum must appeal to many who otherwise might not be especially interested in Mr. Green and his work for our city.

I venture to hope that the plan is one in which you will be personally interested, and for which you will speak a good word in your influential paper.

I am, sir,

HALE FRANK.

A Prince's Discovery

WHALING is a business has been on the decline during recent years, but lately it has been found by the Prince of Monaco that the pursuit and capture of whales opens up many possibilities for increasing our knowledge of marine biology, and that it is a method which enables the student to learn of parts of the ocean hitherto unknown. The prince, whose reputation among scientific men is no less than that of his princeliness on which is situated Monte Carlo among the public generally, found while residing in the capture of a calmar or squid, which the prince, which is the name of its death struggles it vomited great quantities of the prey which it had taken during its last descent to the depths. Realizing that the cephalopods, which are the main food of these whales, and other marine life of the intermediate depths was but imperfectly understood, the prince determined to equip the vessel in which he has conducted his oceanographical investigations for whaling, and the results he has obtained have been most satisfactory. Not only in the Atlantic Ocean, but also in the Mediterranean, where whales had previously never been hunted, were specimens of these great cetaceans captured, and on dissecting their stomachs many new specimens of ocean fauna were brought to light. It was found that each variety of whales differed as regards their food. The right whale consumed the plankton or sea animals proper, as distinguished from those of the bottom or the coast, and as these are small for the most part its jaws are provided with spines to keep out what is too large, and this furnishes the well-known whalebone. The grampus, glaucus, and calmar go deeper for their food, which consists largely of the cephalopods, or swimming mollusks, supplied with tentacles or arms often having suckers at their extremities. It was the cephalopods in particular which the Prince of Monaco desired to study, as these animals exist only at considerable depths, and he was able to obtain many new and rare specimens. One, Lycoteuthis grimaldi, is a whale which is so small a cephalopod of large size, it has scales like a fish and indicates an interpenetration of types. The whales feeding on the cephalopods were provided with fresh teeth, but their prey, which is a whale, which preys on dolphins, has its teeth composed entirely of cartilage so that it can devour one of its prey in three or four mouthfuls. The value of the Prince of Monaco's mission is that a beginning is made in the study of a large number of animals that inhabit neither the upper part of the ocean illuminated by the sun nor the extreme depths and bottom. As the cephalopods are of considerable size they must require smaller animals for food, and the existence of such is practically unknown. The prince considers that he is justified in believing that the sea may have been the theatre of organic life when the cooling of the atmosphere determined the precipitation of the waters.

An Electric Bakery

While seeking for electricity possesses many advantages, it has never been adopted generally or on a large scale on account of the lack of economy. Recently in Montauban, France, a bakery has been equipped to operate by electricity, being so arranged that at any time a return may be made to the usual method of heating the oven by wood. The establishment the oven is circular, but, but in diameter and 1 foot 7½ inches high, with a single opening at the top. The electric current passes through a series of resistance formed of wire and arranged on a frame which may be raised or lowered by an arrangement of pulleys. The resistances are divided into four groups, two of which, consuming the most current and therefore producing the least heat, are placed in the centre of the oven. At the bottom the resistances are hinged, connected for me heat and the current passes through the proper temperature for baking. It was inserted after the bread was then inserted after the bread entering the resistances has been raised. Naturally, when the oven is now heated there is required less expenditure of energy to maintain the temperature, which may be regulated at the will of the baker. The current is derived from an ordinary 110-volt street circuit, and must be given to the bakery at an advantageous price to make the experiment successful.

Some Railroad Yarns

A Record-Breaker

THREE foolish travellers in the smoking-room of a fast train were discussing the speed of trains.

"I was in a train once," said the first man, "that beat everything I ever rode in for speed. Why, it went so fast that the telegraph poles at the side of the track looked like an immense fire-whisk broom."

"That's nothing," said the second traveller: "I remember riding in an express on the ——— and ——— that went at such a pace that the telegraph poles looked like a solid board fence."

The third man made an exclamation of impatience.

"Ah, you fellows don't know what high speed is on a railroad. Why, I travelled west from Chicago last month in a train that went at such a pace that when we passed some alternate fields of corn and beans they looked like haystacks!"

Pretty Far Gone

"I think the swiftest railway line in the world is the one that runs between ——— and ———," said West, "a travelling man who recently returned from an extended trip. "We were crossing a stretch of prairie-land near ———, when the train suddenly stopped, for an apparent reason. After a wait of about an hour the conductor came smoking through the train, glancing furiously at the exasperated passengers as he passed. When he came to me he stopped and looked down."

"Say," he said, in a whisper, "have you got a piece of string? We want to fix the engine."

A Measurum of Precaution

READING THE LADY (trotting train of attention). "Cushabeta, which is the most dangerous car on the train?"

"Cushabeta," said the lady. "The last car is supposed to be, madam."

"F. T. L." "Then why don't they leave it off?"

What He Meant

A diner at a modest restaurant not far from Washington Square beckoned to the waitress who was serving his dinner.

"Please bring me a cream-tea," he said, after finishing his dinner.

The waitress looked completely nonplussed—cream-tea was not in her vocabulary. At that moment, though, the head-waitress, who was passing the table and overheard the order, came to the rescue.

"He means a siphon," she explained, in a stage-whisper.

Quite Himself

THIS story is going the rounds of one of the Eastern news posts: A young lieutenant was in dinner before his commanding officer on account of a charge of having been drunk and disorderly. His name was called to testify for the defence, and deposed that he had seen his master early that morning, and that he had been perfectly sober.

"And you say," asked the examiner, "that you believe your master to have been perfectly sober because he was dressing himself to go out, and had a entirely clear idea of what he was about and where he was going?"

"Yes, sir."

"Did he say what he was preparing to do?"

"Yes, sir; he told me that he was going to be Queen of the Map."

Columbia

Electric and Gasoline Automobiles present the most perfect combination of the art of vehicle and motor building. The body and furnishings of each COLUMBIA, no less than its locomotive power, reflect the best ideas of the best designers, and the highest order of skilled workmanship.

ELECTRIC VEHICLE CO., Hartford, Conn.

Financial

Letters of Credit.

Brown Brothers & Co.,

BANKERS, NO. 60 WALL STREET.

THE AUDIT COMPANY OF NEW YORK

110 NASSAU ST., NEW YORK. Auditors, Accountants, and Tax Collectors.

Investigations for Merchants, Bankers, Corporations, and Companies, N.Y. & Foreign.

Metropolitan Buildings, 4 Cedar Street, New York.

Philadelphia, Pa. Chicago, Ill. New Orleans, La. St. Louis, Mo. San Francisco, Cal.

The

Light of the Star

By

HAMLIN GARLAND

Author of "The Captain of the Gray-Hover Troop" "Hesperus"

Hamlin Garland brings to this romance all the vigor of style displayed in his Western tales, and pictures stately in New York Broadway with the same convincing touch with which he has written of the plains.

The glitter of the stage, the interesting episodes of life behind the scenes, and the surge of life upon Broadway are drawn with a master touch.

Cloth, $1.50

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK CITY

RELIABLE MAN WANTED

Any man who is capable of doing a reliable man wanted for a position of a reliable man. Address: Managers, Box 114.

Reliance, Mich.

Reliable man from one half way. Reliance grows throughout the West. To secure, please send in a letter to the Editor, Reliance, Mich.

Send 2¢ for postage and get our booklet "A. M. telling all about it." Reliance, Mich.

Mark Twain's Six Funniest Books

Tom Sawyer

Innocents Abroad

Vol. 1

Innocents Abroad

Vol. 2

Pudd'nhead Wilson

Roughing It

Vol. 1

Roughing It

Vol. 2

Six Beautifully Bound Books

*With Illustrations by E. W. Kemble, Peter Newell,
B. West Clinedinst, and J. G. Brown*

Of all the books of the great humorist these are the ones that have made his name a household word wherever the English language is spoken.

Their Fun is Immortal—Worth Reading Twice

This is the first time that these volumes have been put within the reach of any but the rich, and published in a uniform low-priced set.

Everybody Can Afford Them

OUR OFFER—We will send you the entire set of six volumes, charges prepaid, on receipt of $1.00. If you do not like the books when they reach you, send them back at our expense, and we will return the $1.00. If you do like them, send us $1.00 every month for 11 months. In order to keep you in touch with us during these months, on receipt of your request for these books we will enter you as a subscriber for one year, without additional cost to you, for either HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, HARPER'S BAZAR, or THE NORTH AMERICAN REVIEW. In writing, state which periodical you want.

Harper & Brothers, Publishers, New York City

What Sterling is to Silver
What Bessemer is to Steel
PRUDENTIAL is to Life Insurance

'Tis the sense of saving that lays the Rock foundation of Prudential Protection. It will be a pleasure to explain
if you will write us.

The Prudential

INSURANCE CO. OF AMERICA.

JOHN F. DRYDEN, President.

Dept. T.

Home Office: NEWARK, N. J.

"Visit The Prudential's Exhibit Palace of Education, World's Fair, St. Louis"

HARPER'S WEEKLY

Edited by George Harvey

HARPER & BROTHERS NEW YORK

July 16 1904

Price 10 Cents

HARPER'S BAZAR

AUGUST NUMBER

The frontispiece of the August BAZAR is the fourth of MISS CORY's delightful pictures, The Innocent Pleasures of Childhood. These drawings have already aroused enthusiastic interest.

The leader of the number is a delightful paper, The Management of Wives, by LILIAN BELL. Other strong features will be: A Fourth of July Anniversary, a story by KATHERINE HATES, illustrated by LESTER RALPH. The Canton Flannel Rabbit, a poem by FRANCIS MARINE, illustrated by FANNY Y. CORY. The Story of a Pond Lily, by JENNIE FERGUSON, with very charming illustrations by the author. My Oriental Dressmaker, by LAURA B. STARR, illustrated by GEORGE F. KERR. The Dream Baby, a story by OLIVIA HOWARD DUNBAR, illustrated by JOHN HARDY.

The August BAZAR will also contain a large and brilliant department of Midsummer Fashions, conducted by A. T. Ashmore, with numerous illustrations by ETHEL and GUY ROSE, of Paris. A timely chapter discusses Japanese Wraps, and is illustrated with excellent photographs. FLORA McDONALD THOMPSON writes another of her delightful letters from Paris.

Among the strong practical features of the issue will be the following:

Furniture of Yesterday

By J. W. GUTHRIE

Illustrated with photographs

Italian Peasants in a New-Law Tenement

By LILLIAN W. BETTS

Summer Recipes

By MARIA BLAY

Photographic Possibilities

By LOUISE E. DEW

Illustrated with photographs

Notes of a Mushroom Hunter

By GRACE BIRD GAINES

Lace Making

By LILLIAN SIEGFRIED

Illustrated with photographs

Talks to Girls and

Hints to Housewives

By MARGARET HAMILTON WELCH

Midsummer Luncheons

By JOSEPHINE GRENIER

Illustrated with photographs

and the usual admirable departments of Household Decoration, Answers to Questions of Good Form, Humor Department, Editorial Comment, etc.

The BAZAR is for sale on every American newspaper at the price of fifteen cents.

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS, FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK CITY

THE GIVERS

BY

MARY E. WILKINS FREEMAN

THESE are Mary E. Wilkins Freeman's latest stories. All are filled with the humor and pathos of New England life—the type of story which is indisputably the author's own, and in which she scored her remarkable early success.

Of the stories in this volume, the title story—"The Givers"—has created more widespread interest and called forth more letters from the author's readers than anything else Mrs. Freeman has done. It is a laughable tale of the revolt of a sturdy, strong-minded woman against the inappropriateness of the Christmas gifts with which she is deluged by her well-to-do, unthinking friends. How she leads each in turn to replace her gift with some homely, serviceable article is a triumph of rough-handed New England diplomacy and a highly amusing tale.

Sophia Lane is but one of the many characters in this book who are good to know and not soon forgotten.

Illustrated, Cloth, $1.25

HARPER & BROTHERS
PUBLISHERS NEW YORK CITY

In Search of the Unknown

By

ROBERT W. CHAMBERS

Author of "The Maid of Paradise," "Cardigan," etc.

THIS captivating story describes the strange adventures and novel love affairs of a young student of science who accompanies a learned professor on expeditions in search of the unknown in nature. The professor is on the track of some entirely new facts, with which he intends to astonish the world. In the meantime the student meets several girls, and half a dozen love affairs develop. A unique and highly entertaining story, in which Mr. Chambers has drawn his girls with his usual felicity, and their engaging charms are all the more piquant displayed in such fantastic surroundings.

Post 8vo, Cloth, $1.50

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK

HARPER'S WEEKLY

JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION

VOL. XLVIII

New York, Saturday, July 16, 1904

No. 547

Copyright, 1904, by HARPER & BROTHERS. All rights reserved

THE "TRUST-BUSTERS" AT WORK

HARPER'S WEEKLY

Vol. XLVIII.

No. 2282

EDITED BY GEORGE HARVEY

THIRTY-SIX PAGES
AND SUPPLEMENT

NEW YORK CITY, JULY 16, 1904

Terms: 10 Cents a Copy—$4.00 a Year, in Advance

Postage free to all subscribers in the United States, Canada, Mexico, Hawaii, Porto Rico, the Philippine Islands, Guam, and Tutuila, Samoa.

Entered at the New York Post office as second class matter.

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS
NEW YORK CITY: FRANKLIN SQUARE
LONDON: 43 ALBEMARLE STREET, W.

COMMENT

As might have been expected, in view of the doubt clouding Judge Parker's prospect of winning the race for a nomination, a number of "dark horses" were unblatantly in the foreground of the meeting of the St. Louis Convention, to say nothing of entries which were not supposed to be seriously "meant," but which suddenly received some backing ostensibly genuine. There is no doubt that dark horses have played memorable parts in more than one national convention. It would be absurd, of course, to say that James K. Polk was unknown in 1844, for he had been Speaker of the House of Representatives; nevertheless, it is true that, when the Democratic national convention of that year was called to order, no one conversant with the situation could have believed him likely to secure the nomination for the Presidency. The South could have named a dozen Democrats far more conspicuously qualified for that high office than he; but he had no personal enemies, and it was known that the contest would be very close, as, indeed, it proved, and that State pride would probably suffice to give Polk the electoral votes of Tennessee, which otherwise would go to the Whig nominee, Henry Clay. So the well-meaning but commonplace and light-weight Tennesseean was sent forward against the veteran Van Buren, and won at the post. Then, again, in 1852, when the Democratic national convention came together, most of the delegates and all onlookers took for granted that the contest for a nomination would be a duel between Lewis Cass and James Buchanan. This proved to be the case; for no fewer than forty-nine ballots were taken, and it was not until both factions were exhausted and exhausted, that a compromise candidate was accepted in the inoffensive personality of Franklin Pierce. In 1868 it is probable that no delegate to the Democratic national convention, except Vallandigham, believed that Horatio Seymour would be the nominee; and it is certain that the eminent and high-minded New-Yorker had no such expectation, otherwise he never would have accepted the post of permanent chairman. We need not say that, of all dark horses, William J. Bryan, in 1896, was the most phenomenal surprise.

In Republican national conventions also the unexpected has occurred. At Cincinnati, for instance, in 1876, James G. Blaine was far in the lead, and among his competitors were men prominent in the public eye, like Bristow and Conkling. Nevertheless, the nomination went to Rutherford B. Hayes. In 1880, at Chicago, the principal avowed aspirants were Grant, Blaine, and Sherman, named in the order of their strength; that Garfield was not a candidate, except possibly in his own mind, was evident from the fact that no State had been instructed for him, and that he had been selected to make the nominating speech for John Sherman. Never would Benjamin Harrison, in 1888, have been made the Republican standard-bearer had James G. Blaine openly and earnestly sought the nomination.

Seldom, however, has there been more uncertainty regarding the outcome of a Democratic national convention than prevailed this year, in the interval between the election of the last State delegation, that of Missouri, and the convening of all the party's representatives at St. Louis. Thus we were told on the one hand that the Radicals had made up their minds to go for Richard Olney, on the ground that, of all Cleveland's friends, he was least unacceptable to Bryan. On the other hand, the startling news was circulated that Olney could not even hold the Massachusetts delegation, a majority of which was anxious to disregard instructions and support Edward C. Wall, Wisconsin's "favorite son." Then it was again announced that plans had been matured in the South for the nomination of Senator Bailey of Texas, should the Parker forces be repulsed. With straight faces some Pittsburg delegates launched a boom for Colonel Guffey, regardless of the chagrin which such jouncing on his prowess would cause ex-Governor Patterson. The madair of absurdity was reached when it was announced by telegraph from San Francisco that Jesse R. Grant, son of the late General Grant, and the only Democrat in the Grant family, would be a candidate for the Democratic Presidential nomination at St. Louis. The humor of the situation was enhanced by the avowal that behind the movement in Jesse Grant's behalf were some of the most distinguished and influential Republicans in the country. We need not say that the proper place for launching a boom in Grant's favor was the Democratic convention of California, of which State he is a resident.

Another quaint and curious late entry for the Presidential nomination was Judge Judson Harmon, of Ohio, who was appointed United States Attorney General by Mr. Cleveland in 1895. An amusing household was also tacked together for the pronounced Gold Democrat, David R. Francis, of Missouri, who was made Secretary of the Interior by Cleveland in 1885, and who is now president of the Louisiana Exposition. We need not say that, if any one associated with the Cleveland administration is to be put forward as the Democratic standard-bearer at St. Louis, it will be Cleveland himself. There is no call for any of Alexander's lieutenants while Alexander survives. More sensational, because not in the least ludicrous or chimerical, was the rumor that William J. Bryan would nominate, and Horace Cookman would second, Joseph W. Folk, who, as circuit attorney at St. Louis, has gained, as a champion of administrative and legislative purity, a national reputation only second to that possessed by Samuel J. Tilden in 1876. As for Senator Gorman, who forged abruptly to the front in public discussion during the week ending July 2, he could be no sinner, of course, be described as a dark horse, not only because the delegates from West Virginia were instructed for him, but because he is known to be the second choice of many other and far more influential delegations. There is no doubt that the St. Louis Convention will pass into history as one of those meetings of the Democracy's apoplexy with regard to the issue of which onlookers were long in doubt.

From the moment that the delegates to a national convention are pretty well convinced that a particular candidate will receive the nomination for the Presidency, their minds, naturally, are concentrated on the composition of the platform, and the selection of a nominee for the second place on the ticket. Theoretically, of course, the framing of the platform should precede the designation of the man who is to stand on it, and, in the official proceedings of a convention, the logical order is followed. But well-informed politicians know that, although a nomination to the Vice-Presidency was once made by a great party, but rejected by the recipient of the honor, we refer to the case of Silas Wright—no man ever yet repudiated a nomination for the office of Chief Magistrate after it had been definitely tendered by one of the principal parties, on the plea that he did not approve of the platform adopted by the party. Such disapproval may not only be felt but expressed, as it was in 1864 by George B. McClellan, who, nevertheless, permitted his name to remain on the ticket. Until, therefore, a convention has actually been called to order, delegates are quite right in giving most of their attention to the attempt to agree upon a nominee for the Presidency. They may take for granted that the "next friends" and trusted counsellors of the several candidates are lavishly engaged in platform framing and adjusting.

It was known, for instance, at St. Louis, that ex-Senator Hill had brought with him the draft of a platform, supposed to be framed upon the lines of the programme recommended by the New York State convention. The views, on the other hand, of Representative John Sharp Williams, who is another of Judge Parker's most influential supporters, were known to have been expressed in the platform adopted by the State convention of Mississippi. Senator Gorman, also, was believed to have sent by the hand of his aide, Colonel John T. Poe, a draft of a platform which had the merit of being short; for the purport of it could be summed up in a demand for the maintenance of sound money and for a revision of the tariff schedule. If Mr. Gorman were the nominee, it would be superfluous to insert in the St. Louis platform a denunciation of the Chicago demand for the enforcement of the Fourteenth Amendment, for the reason that the Senator from Maryland was the leader of the memorable fight made in the United States Senate under the Harrison administration against a Force Bill. It may be remembered that the platform under which in 1876 the Democrats carried the country, so far as the popular vote was concerned, was succinct and pointed, laying stress on two issues, namely, tariff revision and a purification of the Federal offices. There are those who think that this year the Democracy might have done wisely to put forward no platform at all, provided ex-President Cleveland were made the nominee. Had the Whigs in 1840 committed themselves to any definite programme, they might have failed to beat Van Buren. As it was, they went to the country without any platform whatever, and gained an overwhelming victory.

The list of names suggested at St. Louis for the nomination for the Vice-Presidency is even longer than that of the candidates put forward for the higher office. The former catalogue naturally includes some of the so-called "favorite sons," as, for instance, Edward C. Wall, of Milwaukee, Francis M. Cockrell, of Missouri, Richard Olney, of Massachusetts, and ex-United States Attorney General Judson Harmon, of Ohio. Comprehended in it also are ex-Vice-President Adlai E. Stevenson, of Illinois, ex-Representative Benjamin F. Shively, of Indiana, Joseph W. Kern, of Indiana, Marshall Field, of Chicago, Senator Joseph W. Bailey, of Texas, and ex-Governor James S. Hogg, of the same State, Representative John Sharp Williams, of Mississippi, Allen C. Braxton, of West Virginia, ex-Secretary of the Interior David R. Francis, of Missouri, Circuit-Attorney Joseph W. Folk, of the same State, and ex-Senator William A. Harris, of Kansas. It is said that on Sunday, July 3, Senator Dubois informed Messrs. Hill and Sherman that a promise to nominate Senator George Turner, of Washington, to the Vice-Presidency would give Judge Parker sixty additional votes, including those not only of the State of Washington, but of California and Oregon. It is well known that the selection of a nominee for the Vice-Presidency is absolutely unrestricted, though if the nominees for both places on a ticket should be taken from the same State, the Presidential electors of that State would be deprived by the Twelfth Amendment of the Constitution from voting for one of them. It is customary, however, when the nominee for the higher office has been selected, to choose the nominee for the lower from the other side of the Potomac or the other side of the Alleghenies. Since the civil war, the Democracy have had no ammunition to spare, and have deemed it prudent to take nominees for both offices from doubtful States at the North.

The notion that the relative age of candidates plays an important part in the selection of a nominee for the second place does not seem to be borne out by the facts. An assertion has of late been current in the press to the effect, first, that Theodore Roosevelt and John C. Breckinridge are the only men who, when they were inaugurated Vice-Presidents, could fairly be described as young; and, secondly, that, most frequently, Vice-Presidents have been older than the corresponding Presidents. It is true that Theodore Roosevelt was but forty-three, and John C. Breckinridge only thirty-six, at the date of inauguration; but John C. Calhoun was only forty-three, Schuyler Colfax only forty-six, and Millard Fillmore only forty-nine. As regards the second statement, George Washington, John Adams, James Monroe, John Quincy Adams, Andrew Jackson, William H. Harrison, Zachary Taylor, James Buchanan, and William McKinley were older than their respective Vice-Presidents. Thomas Jefferson was older than Aaron Burr, and younger than George Clinton. Abraham Lincoln was of the same age as Hannibal Hamlin, and only one year younger than Andrew Johnson. Grant was older than Colfax, but younger than Wilson. Garfield was just one year younger than Arthur. Evidently, it is not the consideration of respective age, but the question of locality and political expediency that determines the designation of a nominee for the Vice-Presidency.

The English contributor to the North American Review who signs "Anglo-American" to an estimate of Mr. Roosevelt surprises his American readers with the observation that "no President ever brought to the discharge of his executive duties anything like Mr. Roosevelt's varied experience and thorough qualifications." It is perfectly true that Mr. Roosevelt served for a time in the Assembly at Albany; that he was Police Commissioner in New York city, a United States Civil Service Commissioner, and, for a year, an Assistant Secretary of the Navy; that he served for some months in the Spanish War, and was for one term Governor of his native State. Considered as a whole, his experience may undoubtedly be described as extensive and varied, and from this view-point he was better qualified for the Presidency in 1901 than was Cleveland in 1884; but it is simply absurd to say that no preceding President ever equalled him in this particular. As a matter of fact, there have been but few Chief Magistrates who have not surpassed him in respect of their practical acquaintance with public life. For breadth and diversity of experience, indeed, he would not be compared by well-informed persons with his predecessor, who saw service in our civil war, and who for many years had been one of the most influential members of the House of Representatives, before he became Governor of Ohio.

Mr. Balfour will be kept in power, it is now declared, by the jealousy of the Liberals, who do not wish to see Lord Spencer made Premier. The feud between the Liberal leaders—Lord Rosebery, Sir William Harcourt, and Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman—has weakened the party beyond measure, and its bad results are sufficiently apparent. Yet the lesson seems still insufficiently learned. Sir William Harcourt is out of the running. Lord Rosebery has the admiration of every one, and the friendship of the King; but he has the confidence of no one in the Liberal ranks, and, worst of all, he has no real confidence in himself. Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman is a worthy but vacillating and voluble person, whom everybody likes, to a certain extent, but as for being a great political leader, a worthy successor of Gladstone and Bright, not even Sir Henry himself can believe that he is that.

The obvious conclusion is that the Liberal Premier would be Earl Spencer, who was Mr. Gladstone's choice as his successor, according to Mr. Morley's Life. Lord Spencer has the respect of every one, and is just such a typical aristocrat as every good Englishman loves to be governed by; but there are the unconquerable jealousies, or at least still unconquered jealousies, of Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman and Lord Rosebery to contend against. There are also Mr. Asquith and Mr. Morley, both possible future Premiers. The Liberals, with their Radical wing, are, after all, the democratic party, at least in tradition. And the democratic party by no means relishes the idea of being led in the House of Lords. The official Liberals in the Commons would immediately feel their glory diminished, and it would be palpable to all that the centre of gravity of the party was elsewhere. There were the considerations which led Mr. Gladstone persistently to refuse a peerage, just as similar considerations kept Disraeli out of the Lords, until he felt himself close to the end. The Liberals are always weak and comparatively impotent in the Upper House, which is, by every instinct of its being, conservative; therefore a Liberal Premier in the House of Lords is a fish out of water. If we add personal jealousy, it is easy to see why the Liberals may not be in a hurry to see Mr. Balfour dissolve Parliament, especially so long as Mr. Chamberlain is kept on the shelf.

Word comes from London that the English shipping industry is suffering from a depression unequalled during the last century. Should this depression prove more than temporary, it may have a wide-spread effect on English policy, and may also touch nearly the tariff issue. Mr. Joseph Chamberlain may find himself unexpectedly reinforced, and the doubting hearts in the Unionist party may be forced to join the ranks of the protectionists. For the connection between England's shipping and protection is immediate and obvious. England, as has so often been pointed out, imports a great deal more than she exports. So strange is this, at first sight, that alarmists have seen in it a certain threat of national bankruptcy; and there is no doubt that Mr. Chamberlain inclines to this view. But the truth is, that England pays for her surplus imports by the services rendered, the money earned by her world-wide shipping, which gains wealth in all the seven seas. If the earnings of British shipping fall off, she will no longer be able to buy the large surplus of imports, and the pinch will immediately be felt.

Local option in Vermont, following half a century of prohibition, has proved at first somewhat too indolgent. Two years ago the change was made, and at the next election sixty-seven towns voted "yes" on the license question. Thirty-six of these towns, after a year's experience of license, voted "no" last March. The vote in the city of Rutland changing from "yes" to "no" showed a loss of 1297 votes. The "yes" vote in the State fell off 12,000, and of this loss 10,000 was in towns that had had saloons. Apparently rum has not been making itself entirely agreeable in Vermont, but there is no sign that the State is dissatisfied with its new law, or wants to go back to prohibition. On the contrary, the way the new law enables local communities to express their minds, and to change them annually if they like, seems to be much appreciated. The law works with easy flexibility, and the Vermonters look or quibbel the saloon doors according to the impressions the saloons make on the voters. The voters are experimenting. A letter from Montpelier to a Boston paper speaks of the need of more alternatives—of some form of liquor-supply that is more restricted than saloons, and not so strictly limited as that provided by a druggist's license. Rutland, a city of 11,500 population, changed from "yes" to "no" this year, but is expected to be dissatisfied with "no" as it was with "yes." Second-class licenses which allow the sale of liquor in bottles, not to be drunk on the premises, are found to produce more drunkenness than saloon licenses, and are unsatisfactory. The Vermonters want just the right law—a law that will provide just the right amount of the right kind of liquor to the right man at the right time,—and they are disposed to experiment until they come nearer to it than they have come yet.

Two hundred teachers from Porto Rico reached New York on an army transport, on July 2, bound for Cornell University. Four hundred on another transport disembarked at Boston about the same time on their way to Harvard. The six hundred are to spend six weeks in summer study, and then a fortnight in travel, and are expected to go home in September with some new knowledge and many new ideas, which, in due time, they are expected to impart to their pupils at home. Among the million inhabitants of Porto Rico there is much room for every kind of education, and the lively demand for it appears in the fact that one-fourth of the revenues of the island is devoted to the support of the schools. Education has been found, since the Americans came, to be necessary to any kind of success, and the islanders are represented to be extremely eager for it. The present importation of teachers—a consequence, no doubt, of the visit of the Cuban teachers five years ago—has been made possible by private subscription here, and by the sacrifices of the teachers themselves, who devote one month's pay to the expedition. The government has helped directly by sending transports to bring them here and take them back, but the whole expedition is due to labors of government officials—Commissioner Lindsay and Assistant Commissioner Lord—who are at the head of the Porto-Rican school system. About two-thirds of the teachers are men. What they all want more than anything else is to learn our language and our ways. Most of the lecture courses which they are getting in Cambridge are history courses, treating of Cuba and South America, the Philippines, the United States, and Mexico. To these are added courses in hygiene, geology, and the American educational system.

Colonel Thomas Wentworth Higginson, past this year of the Harvard Phi Beta Kappa, proposes to Harvard to put the names of her graduates who fought on the Confederate side in the civil war along with her Union soldiers on the tablets of her Memorial Hall. He says:

Forgive, and let their names, too, deck the walls;
Those who once fought for what we held a sin
Obeyed their State's and not their nation's calls;
They died for that sad cause. Now let them in!

There are a good many of them, for many Southern lads came North for their education before the war. Those who fought on Dixie's side in the civil war helped to fight out a question that had come down to them through three generations, bequeathing their shoulders equally with their Northern brethren to an inherited burden. That is the view that prevails now and will prevail, and those—a great majority—who accept it will find no serious fault with Colonel Higginson's proposal, though they may doubt its expediency and deprecate the possibilities of a discussion springing out of it.

Next to the horse-cars, which are still conspicuous in some of the most-travelled cross-roads in New York, the most surprising antiquities of the town are the little, old Long Island ferry-boats. They carry passengers from Thirty-fourth Street and from James Slip to Long Island City—a lot of passengers every day, for the ferry is one of the most important that touches New York, and that means one of the most important in the world. It is so important that some time or other it is to be superseded by a bridge, or a tunnel, or both, and plans to that intent are understood to be in process of execution. But it will be years before they are done, and meanwhile these little, old antiquities attempt to carry load and forth the swarms of people who must as Forty or fifty years ago when the boats were young they were fairly well up to their business, but New York has gained millions of population since then, and its passenger traffic with Long Island City has increased enormously. To see the same little veterans walk up to their loads is one of the signs of the town, and travellers stopping at the nearby Astor often go down to the ferry-house to look on. It is hard, though, on the people who have to use the boats, for they are jammed in together and mixed up with one another, and with the horses and drays and heaves and funeral heaves, and with the smells, and all in a very sticky and harassing way. The passengers don't like it. They express wonder that the great Pennsylvania Railroad, which maintains on the North River the handsomest ferry-boats in the world, should run on the East River these unsightly curiosities of transportation. Since the Strom boomed some attention has been paid to East River boats, but the Thirty-fourth Street veterans still stagger to and fro, swarming with enforcers.

It is a popular superstition that great disasters come, not singly, but in groups, and especially in groups of three. It gives new backing to this whim to have the deplorable Strom disaster, with its thousand deaths, followed by the sinking on June 28 off the coast of Scotland of the Scandinavian liner Norge, bound from Copenhagen to New York, and carrying 765 passengers and a crew of sixty-five. The ship got out of her course in thick weather, struck on Rockall Reef, and went down in twelve minutes. She carried eight life-boats. Such of them as have got to land at this writing have brought ashore 145 survivors, and it is possible that others will be heard from, but the loss will probably exceed six hundred lives. Nearly all the Norge's passengers were emigrants, the majority of them women and children. The ship was lately inspected in New York by the same officials who inspected the Strom. Her American certificate allowed her to carry 765 passengers. She had aboard many more than that number, but possibly not more than her Danish certificate permitted. She was an old ship, built without compartments, and evidently filled at once when a hole was stove in her bows.

How Cleveland Dealt with the Chicago Strike

No more timely and valuable service could have been rendered at this juncture to the Democratic party and to the country than is embodied in the lucid, authentic, and convincing narrative of the relation of the Federal government to the Chicago strike of 1894, which is contributed by ex-President Cleveland to the current number of Harper's Weekly. To appreciate the opportunity and the usefulness of this authoritative recital of often misinterpreted facts we should bear in mind that the national convention of the Democracy, which meets at St. Louis on July 6, will be asked to reaffirm the platform adopted by the party at Chicago in 1896, and endorsed at Kansas City four years later. A plank in that platform was a passionate protest against what was termed "governmental interference," by which term was signified a proceeding which has been unanimously declared by the United States Supreme Court to have been constitutional and necessary. For eight years a dishonest and mischievous effort has been made to mislead the American people to the true character of the circumstances and motives which impelled and justified the course pursued with reference to the Chicago strike of 1894 by the second Cleveland administration, and to misrepresent it as an arrogant usurpation of authority and a wanton invasion of the sovereign rights of Illinois, for the purpose of aiding employers to crush their employees by the military arm of the Federal Executive. It was high time that such gross perversion of the truth in relation to the matter—perversion even broadcast by unscrupulous agitators for sectional and sectional ends—should be sternly and definitely brushed aside, and no man was so qualified to perform the purging and clarifying function than he in whom an unerring perception and an unflinching exercise of the rights and duties of a Chief Magistrate under the Constitution and the laws were not found wanting in the hour of trial. By Mr. Cleveland's calm, exhaustive, and disinterested statement of the facts, the campaign of false teaching, misinterpretation, and defamation which has been waged against him for a decade has been brought to an abrupt and ignominious close.

Mr. Cleveland begins by reminding us that, in the last days of June, 1894, there broke out in the city of Chicago a determined and ugly labor disturbance, which grew almost in a night to proportions of violence and danger. The violence and rioting, by which the outbreak was characterized, spread so swiftly that, in a few days, they had pervaded nearly the whole of the western and southwestern sections of our country. Especially was railroad transportation obstructed by the obstruction of order. The carriage of the United States mails was interrupted. Interstate commerce was blocked, and the property of interstate railways destroyed. The truth is that, although this law-breaking disturbance is known as the "Chicago strike," because it originated in that city, the term is a grotesque misnomer, so far as the scope of the trouble is concerned. In no fewer than twenty-seven States and Territories were railroad operations more or less affected; and in all these parts of the republic the interpretation of the general government was, with more or less exactness, invoked. On June 28, two days after a general strike of the American Labor Union had been ordered from the headquarters of that labor organization at Chicago, information was received by the Federal Executive at Washington from the Post-Office Department that on the Southern Pacific system, between Portland and San Francisco, Ogden and San Francisco, and Los Angeles and San Francisco, the carriage of the mails was completely stopped by strikers, who refused to permit trains, to which Pullman cars were attached, to run over the lines mentioned. Thereupon Attorney-General Olney ordered by telegraph the United States district attorneys in the State of California to see that the passage of trains conveying the United States mails in the said territory, unimpeded by acts of violence, should not be obstructed. To that end they were ordered to procure warrants, or any other available process, including, of course, that of injunction, from the United States courts, against any and all persons engaged in such obstructions, and to direct the United States marshals to execute the same by such deputies or powers as might be needed. On the same day, and during a number of days immediately following, similar complaints, accompanied by charges of forcible seizure of trains and other violent disorders, poured in upon the United States Attorney-General from all parts of the West and Southwest. In all cases of substantial interference with the carriage of mails a telegram identical with that, the purpose of which we have given, was sent to the United States district attorneys in the disturbed localities; and this remedial action was supplemented, whenever necessary, by such other measures as the varying emergencies required. In the city of Chicago the United States marshal found it impracticable to carry out his instructions with the civil force at his disposal, and on July 3 notified the United States Attorney-General in a despatch endorsed by Judge P. N. Grosvenor, of a United States court, that on emergency he had caused the employment of United States troops for the enforcement of the law and the restoration of order. Thereupon Colonel Croft's command at Fort Sheridan was ordered to Chicago, and on July 5 General Miles assumed direction of military movements in that city. On the day following, twenty-four hours after the Federal soldiers reached Chicago, President Cleveland received a long despatch from Governor Altgeld, in which the latter declared that the commonwealth of Illinois was fully competent to maintain peace and order within its limits, and, consequently, the immediate withdrawal of Federal troops from active duty in that State was demanded. Mr. Cleveland, on July 6, replied that he was persuaded that he had transcended neither his authority nor his duty in the situation presented at Chicago and elsewhere. Two days later the President issued an Executive proclamation warning all persons engaged in unlawful combinations and obstructions to disperse within a twenty-four hours, and on July 10, Eugene V. Debs, the president of the American Railway Union, together with his wife, his president, general secretary, and one of the active directors were arrested upon indictments for conspiracy in the obstruction of mails and interstate commerce. As soon as the riotous employees learned that their leaders had been arrested and removed from the scene of action they became demoralized and the strike came to an end.

On what ground did Governor Altgeld protest against the interposition of Federal troops for the restoration of peace and order in the State of Illinois? It is well known that the Federal Constitution requires the United States to protect each of the States, not only against invasion, but also "on application of the Legislature or of the Executive (when the Legislature cannot be convened)" against domestic violence. Now it is undeniable that there was plenty of domestic violence in the city of Chicago and in many other parts of Illinois during the early days of July, 1894; but Altgeld laid stress upon the fact that no application for assistance had been made to the Federal government on the part of the State's Legislature or Executive. Altgeld, consequently, challenged the "constitutional" right of the President to employ Federal troops for the enforcement of the orders of a United States court. The question of constitutionality was raised on an appeal to the United States Supreme Court from the decision of the United States Circuit Court, sitting at Debs and his associates guilty of contempt of court, which decision was expressly based upon the provisions of the law of Congress passed in 1893, and entitled: "An act to protect trade and commerce against unlawful restraint and monopolies," sometimes called the Sherman Anti-Trust Law. The case was elaborately argued before the United States Supreme Court in March, 1895, and on May 27 of the same year the members of that tribunal unanimously upheld the decision of the United States Circuit Court. Justice Brandeis, in delivering the universal opinion of the court, said that two questions of importance were presented in the proceedings against Debs and his associates, namely: First, are the relations of the general government to interstate commerce and the transportation of the mails such as authorize a direct interference on the part of the Federal Executive to prevent a forcible obstruction thereof? Second, if such authority exists—can authority in governmental affairs imply both power and duty—has a court of equity (like the United States Circuit Court) jurisdiction to issue an injunction in aid of the performance of such duties? Both of these questions were answered in the affirmative. In the opinion read by the learned justice and concurred in by all his colleagues, the inherent power of the Federal government is extended by means of physical force through its official agents, on every foot of American soil, the powers and functions belonging to it, was vindicated by a process of reasoning simple, logical, unhampered by fanciful distinctions, and conclusive; and the Federal government's resort to the United States Circuit Court, the injunction issued in its aid, and all the proceedings thereon, including the imprisonment of Debs and his accomplices, were fully justified.

There could be no greater mistake than the assumption, which some commentators on Mr. Cleveland's narrative have made, that "the obstruction of the mails" was the sole ground for the course pursued by him with reference to the Chicago strike. On the contrary, Mr. Cleveland expressly says that the suggestion made by Attorney-General Olney on June 28, in his instructions to the special counsel for the United States at Chicago, contemplated the inauguration of legal proceedings to restrain those conspicuously concerned in "interference with the mails and obstruction of interstate commerce," such proceedings being based on the assumption that, under general principles of law, the Federal courts were competent to interfere by injunction; and on the further ground that, under the act of Congress passed July 2, 1893, commonly known as the Sherman Anti-Trust Act, conspiracies in restraint of trade or commerce among the several States were declared to be illegal, and the circuit courts of the United States were therein endowed with jurisdiction to prevent and restrain such conspiracies. Mr. Cleveland twice reiterates in his narrative that to safeguard the operation of interstate commerce was one of the objects contemplated by the Federal intervention, and Justice Brandeis, in his recital of the facts, recognizes that Debs and his associates were arrested on the charge that the interstate transport-time of persons and property, as well as the carriage of the mails, was forcibly obstructed. There can be, therefore, not the slightest doubt as to the soundness of the decision unanimously rendered by the United States Supreme Court.

Taft and Olney on the Philippines

It is evident from the weighty speech delivered by ex-Secretary Taft at the Chicago convention that some of the wisest heads in the Republican party feel grave misgivings about the expediency of retaining the Philippines for an indefinite period, not only as a matter of dollars and cents, and as one of the inalienable opposition of protectionists to the admission of the products of those islands duty free, but also with an eye to the effect on our political policy of the assumption embodied in the decision rendered in the Insular cases—a decision reached by five justices of the United States Supreme Court against four—that a strong people has a moral right to hold a weak people in permanent subjection. That is a question of which we have by no means heard the last; as is plain from the keen interest with which, on June 28, the members of the Harvard Law Association listened to the discussion of the subject by Secretary William H. Taft on the one side and by ex-Secretary Richard Olney on the other.

We say discussion, because, although Judge Taft's address in defense or palliation of the course thus far pursued in the Philippines was pronounced at the formal meeting of the association, over which, by the way, I had-Justice Fuller presided, Mr. Olney's responsive speech was made at the subsequent dinner. It was not difficult for the present Secretary of War to show that, at the time when our treaty of peace with Spain was negotiated, there was really nothing for us to do but to take over the sovereignty of the Philippines. From a humanitarian viewpoint, that had come to be recognized as less clearly duty than was the demand for the evacuation of Cuba. Not will many fair-minded persons deny that to have surrendered the Philippines forthwith to the undisciplined and predatory hordes under Aguinaldo would, in the interest of the islands themselves, have been an act no less foolish and hurtful than would have been the contemporaneous abandonment of Cuba to the marauding and lawless hands under Gomez. It is probable that a still further admission would generally be made, namely, that, owing to the relative backwardness of the Philippines in civilization, the concession of absolute independence could not prudently be made with so much promptitude as was rendered the case of the colonies.

It may make all the difference in the world, however—as ex-Secretary Taft perceived, though the Republican platform did not reveal the same perception—not only to the Filipinos themselves, but also to those American citizens who desire to maintain intact their old political ideals, whether or no we shall proclaim, distinctly and unequivocally, in the case of the Philippines as in that of Cuba, our determination to grant absolute independence to the islands, from the moment that they should appear reasonably well qualified to exercise the functions of self-government under the same spirit of protection against foreign aggression that we have stretched over the Pearl of the Antilles. We need not say that such a declaration, in the one case as in the other, would be tidings of great joy; that therefore distrust and rancor would give place to confidence and gratitude; and that all the encouragement and aid with which we should try to speed the Filipinos in the path of self-direction would be turned to account by them with the fervor born of a splendid hope, and inspired by an act of high beneficence that would set, as we act in Cuba, an example to mankind.

Will it be said that this is a counsel of perfection, which it would overtax weak human nature to follow? As a matter of fact, the value of the Philippines, which, for the present at least, is disputable, would, under any circumstances, be insignificant compared with that which had attached to Cuba in the eyes of American statesmen for more than half a century before that memorable night of April 18-19, 1898, when Congress, by a self-denying ordinance, proclaimed our determination to liberate the latter island, not for our own benefit, but in the exclusive interests of the Cubans themselves. From that auspicious precedent we are bound by self-respect, and by our passionate desire to uphold the nation's dignity and honor, even to recede or derelict. To those, however, who would brush aside such considerations as sentimental, and who insist upon transferring the discussion from moral to material grounds, may be commended Mr. Olney's warning that, in the interests of American citizens themselves—the mass of whom will always be poor, absorbed in the daily struggle for existence, and, therefore, relatively ignorant of self-defense—it behooves us to see sharply and anxiously the possible effect upon ourselves of subjecting to the principle which was pronounced by the United States Supreme Court in the Insular cases, and by virtue of which we keep the Philippines in their present position—the principle, namely, that the strong have a moral right to rule the weak, either in the name of "collective civilization," or under some other spurious plea or pretext.

Is not, asked ex-Secretary Olney, a rule, which is pronounced good for nations, good also for individuals, and may not the lives and property of feeble and inferior citizens within any given community be rightfully appropriated for the benefit of the superior and stronger? If it be true that in our Constitution, or in the extra-constitutional rights alleged to be inherent in every nation, there exists any authority for the sacrifice of American lives and American treasure to purely philanthropic enterprises—any warrant for the conversion of our government into a mission-ary to languishing islands in the South Seas thousands of miles away, may we wonder to find the tolling minarets of this country for the benefit of the wretched heathen people of the islands, whom and our taxpayers have no community of interests or sympathy—then, at all events, let us embrace our new role with our eyes wide open, and recognize that the political ideals, which to our fathers seemed august and precious, are outworn, homely, and unworthy to the superb expansion of an empire.

Mr. Taft and Philippine Dependence

In his speech at the dinner given by the New York Chamber of Commerce to the commissioners from the Philippine Islands on June 17 Secretary Taft said: "If the time comes when the Filipino people are prepared for independent self-government and desire it, God knows I want to give it to them." The New York Evening Post immediately seized upon this expression as one eminently satisfactory to the Philippine Independence Committee, saying editorially: "If both parties would simply echo Secretary Taft's phrase, and call God to witness that they desired to give the Filipino independence, the prayer of the committee would be practically granted."

But a moment later, in the course of the same speech, the Secretary declared: "What I cherish in my soul as a hope is that the Filipinos will become so attached to America that they will never consent that the mole light bond, like that which connects Canada with England, shall be severed, but that it may always remain to remind them of the great good which association with the United States has done for them." And immediately the New York Herald seized upon this expression as the more important, saying in its news columns that Mr. Taft "resented earnestly" a suggestion of the speedy establishment of an independent republic in the Philippine Islands, and "imposed upon the minds of his auditors the impression" that this country could not surrender the islands.

Quoted separately, these two expressions will lend themselves to the uses of persons who hold diametrically opposite views, and it is already apparent that, from this circumstance, a good deal of needless mystification may arise in the United States, the Philippines, and other interested communities.

We call the mystification needless, because it is possible to show beyond a doubt that the latter of the two expressions truly conveys the Secretary's meaning, and it is fair to assume the intention of the present administration. To make this conclusion entirely clear we have only to develop briefly—yet so that it can no longer be either slighted or misunderstood—the common significance of apparently unrelated passages in the "Report of the Civil Governor of the Philippine Islands for the period ending December 23, 1903," which accompanies the fourth annual report of the Philippine Commission.

On page 102 of the report we read Mr. Taft's more carefully chosen words: "The Filipino people will accept this conversion [i. e., the general assembly which, if all goes well, it is to be opened in 1904] on the part of the Congress of the United States as a professed test of their capacity to avoid judicial and impetuous legislative measures and of demonstrating the existence among them of that self-restraint which is indispensable in the growth of popular and effective self-government." The duration of the period of probation, then, cannot be forfeited; neither its beginning nor its end can possibly be foreseen by the author of a report in which both are calmly, judicially viewed as probabilities or possibilities, not as certainties. What if the islands shall—the judgment of some future administration, or even, as we shall see, of some future generation of Americans—not be able to furnish the required proof of capacity for self-government? Therein lies one uncertainty. Another lies herein: The views of Americans as to what constitutes a capacity for self-government have undergone changes in the past; are not at present clearly defined or held by both political parties and all sections of our country equally; are likely to be modified more than ever before by future exigencies of our remote dependencies. If the Filipinos are obliged to accept an assurance so doubly uncertain, they will either be content, in which case they may say that to discriminate their condition from that of absolute dependence; or they will be dissatisfied, in which case they will naturally try to raise the American estimate of their self-governing ability by excluding our occupation of the islands unprofitable. When we realize this we are ready to look in the report for other measures of time, or intimations of its author's actual attitude toward the question of withdrawal.

As for the period required for the completion of the work which began with the purchase of the friars' lands, we are not left wholly to conjecture. Mr. Taft writes: "The acquisition of the lands in the treaties on contracts of sale with many payments for a number of years entails a work of tremendous labor upon the insular government and will necessitate the organization of a separate bureau for that purpose. . . . We may reasonably hope that in a decade the agrarian and political questions of the friars in the Philippines will have been completely removed from among the obstacles to good government with which the Americans, in coming to the islands and assuming control thereof, were confronted." Ten years for bringing this preliminary task to a satisfactory termination is indeed a short time, relatively. Now, let us ask, what reasonable hope may be entertained in regard to the new underwriting for the Mohammedans in the southern parts of the archipelago? The bill for the government of the Moro provinces, which took effect on July 15, 1903, provides, among its radical measures of reform, for the abolition of slavery and the suppression of all slave-hunting; the governor of the province and his five assistants being authorized to enact laws for that purpose. Mr. Taft writes that: "The Moro does not understand popular government and does not desire it, and he is not likely to desire it until he is changed by education and the introduction of civilized life in his neighborhood." In July, he writes, "We have a condition that needs thorough and drastic treatment"; in the province generally "present conditions are not as satisfactory as they might be." From this showing the task of weaning down the stubborn pioneer Moro institutions would seem likely to outlast the present generation of slave-traders and slaves, even though we assume that "the introduction of civilized life" in July and Mindanao will be as well retarded by war-clouds hanging low over all the Far East. But during a still longer period, it seems, the United States should not only control the islands, but also take a lively and very practical interest in their welfare. The period during which our government must be concerned about the fulfillment of the terms of contracts to be made with corporations (if American corporations and the American government accept one of the most urgent suggestions contained in the report) will extend far beyond the present generation. Mr. Taft writes (page 57) that the time is "ripe for a period of great construction. For the first time, the great railroads, cable, and steamship companies should revolutionize the interior trade of the islands. . . . It seems to me wise that the commission be authorized, with the approval of the Secretary of War and the President of the United States, to enter into contracts of guaranty with railroad companies to whom a franchise for the construction of a road shall be granted by which an income . . . shall be guaranteed on the interest of the road." It is quite certain that the United States will ever obtain release from obligations to those who may thus secure franchises, and whose property must be protected if its earning power is guaranteed? The commission as a whole recommends (page 101) "that authority be given by Congressional act to the Philippine Commission, with the approval of the President and Secretary of War, to encourage the investment of capital" in the manner just described. The term of a charter which has been granted to a Detroit company, awarded the franchise for an electric street-railway in Manila, is fifty years. Of a different kind, though also inviting us to look quite far into the future, is the undertaking mentioned on page 89: "It is hoped that we may be able to make the city of Manila the handsomest city in the Orient. Improvements are expensive, however, and must be accordingly. Finally, in the schools conducted by Americans a vast educational process has begun. The report does not treat of this as a thing to be interrupted or a duty sometime to be transferred to an independent Filipino government. Positively and expressly the contrary. The page 59 Mr. Taft writes about "our purpose of giving primary English education to every child of school age in the archipelago." Moreover, fair inferences from what Mr. Taft says at the end of the same paragraph are that this process of educating the masses must be continued with largely increased resources, and that not before Filipinos of school age shall have (perhaps not universally, but at least in controlling numbers) learned English and other things, and then in due course shall have grown to be Filipinos of voting and office-holding age, will an assembly of activists be predisposed to shun "projects that our land is nothing but disaster."

The Secretary of War, who has lately intended to convey the impression that any man now in authority would live to see the Filipinos "prepared for independent self-government" and be privileged "to give it to them." That is wholly inconsistent with his matured, carefully stated opinions. He did mean that he cherished in his soul the hope that a bond connecting the Philippine islands with the United States "may always remain." And if we add that he must be regarded as one who confidently expects that the bond will always endure, it is because the imputed confidence is wholly consistent with his last official report, civil governor of the Philippines.

Overtures of Peace

From London and Paris come vague and persistent rumors that King Edward and the Kaiser have at last approached some project of peace. It is said, with growing assurance, that the King desires to use his good offices with his nephew the Czar, to secure some kind of compromise, by which a ruinous and destructive war may be brought to an end. It is certainly the interest of many nations that peace should be made.

France is peculiarly apprehensive for her southern ally. It has been stated, though without just cause, that the republic was anxious to be off with the old love, in order to be on with the new; that France felt her heart growing cold towards Russia, as it grew warm towards England. But this is absurd and untrue. France has a genuine and sincere feeling for Russia, a feeling based on very serious grounds. For to Russia she owes her restoration to a place of honor and dignity among the nations, her rescue from the humiliation and obscurity in which she was cast by the Prussian invasion. France is not ungrateful and has not forgotten. Besides this question of gratitude there is that of interest. France holds, too, many Russian securities, and has, too, large sums invested in Russian industries, to view without dismay the interests made on her ally's resources by a long and costly war.

Germany would be equally glad to see the contest in the Far East closed, especially if it could be made to appear that this consummation had been brought about by Germany. With England and Italy drawing closer and closer to France, with the powerful rivalry of the United States, which bars Germany's schemes of colonial empire in the New World, Germany is forced to perceive the high value of Russia's friendship. Even Bismarck was profuse in professions of friendship with Russia, though they did not bring conviction to the hearts of the Czar's subjects. Kaiser Wilhelm desires the friendship of Russia far more sincerely than Bismarck did, for he feels that, in recent years, the political predominance of Germany in the councils of Europe has sensibly weakened.

There are certain reasons why England would also be set unwilling to see peace made. It will be remembered that, in the days of the Mahdai Fife, Germany seized Kiao-chow, giving a ninety-nine years' lease for that region in January, 1898, the March 27, 1904, Russia, as a counterweight, obtained a lease of Port Arthur, which was to run until 1923, and might then be renewed. Great Britain immediately claimed compensation, at the expense of China, and got a lease of Wei-hai-wei, on April 2, 1901, by agreement with China. Great Britain holds this region so long as Russia holds Port Arthur and so longer. There is the rub. To complete the story we should add that France was "compensated" by the cession of Chinese territory, on the coast of the Lien-Chai Peninsula, opposite the island of Hainan. While neither the German nor the French lease is directly dependent on the Russian lease, it cannot be doubted that the position of these two countries would be greatly weakened were the Russian occupation to come to a forced conclusion. But the English lease would lapse outright. That is one among many reasons why Great Britain would not be unwilling to see the war end at this point, when Russian prestige has been so deeply injured in the eyes of all Asia.

But how about the combatants themselves? Is Japan willing to cease fighting? Would Russia consent to receive offers of mediation? As for Japan, the question is easy. Japan has already won immense prestige, while she is straining her financial resources to the breaking point, and will have to live sparsely for years to repay the cost of this war. Moreover, she is losing Asia trade and markets are slipping into the hands of Germany and England. But she is ambitious, and believes Port Arthur to be within her grasp; she even counts on the defeat of Karsnikoff and the surrender of Mukden as long-range conclusions. For Japan, therefore, the temptation to go on is very strong.

It is least likely of all that Russia would be willing to accept overtures of peace. It is not that her prestige is destroyed, for recent successes of Admiral Skrydloff's squadron, the repair of the Port Arthur squadron, and the retaking of certain bases in the Manchurian mountains have given a more favorable complexion to the war, and have led to some extent to early defeats. The difficulty is deeper. If the war were to stop now, Russia would remain firmly convinced that, had she continued, she could have defeated Japan decisively, and this conviction would prevent a genuine and lasting settlement from being reached. The wound would be shinned over, not healed. It may be however, that the strong peace sentiment which the Czar shares with the masses of his people would outweigh these considerations, and that Russia would be willing to seek peace.

The Proposed Cuban Loan

In the old days of Spanish rule Cuba paid, as interest on the enormous debt from which the war brought relief, so many millions annually that it seems easy for her now to carry a moderate financial burden. But her friends will be sorry to hear that, even before leaving lands on the moderate sum of $35,000,000 so recently negotiated for, she has begun to think of raising another loan.

General Máximo Gómez writes from Havana that the Lower House, instead of making provision for the proper use of the $35,000,000, is "disturbing and in a high degree prejudicing the interests of the people by nullifying the effort to pay off the army." He expresses the fear that when the sum of money destined to cover the first instalment of the payment of the army arrives it will be impossible to devote it to that purpose, owing to the inaction of the Congress. Now, according to advices received at the executive department of the Cuban republic, not so early the first instalment, but the entire amount of the loan will reach Havana toward the end of July. Such, then, is the indefensible situation. Approximately $35,000,000 will soon be in hand; authorization is still lacking to stimulate the development of the island's industries—to put that sum into circulation by dividing it among the old soldiers; and yet a proposition to borrow about $15,000,000 more, ostensibly for the same purpose, is already the subject of general discussion in Havana!

How many of the Cuban officials are reaching out after still further commissions? Will the $15,000,000 be enough to pay for the passage of the required measure? Or is the proposed $15,000,000 loan, and that only, destined for the army, while the $35,000,000 is employed to stimulate the industry of the legislature?

Skrzydloff's First Exploit

THE recent sortie of the Vladivostok squadron results an act of singular daring which made Skrzydloff's name first familiar to the Russian people. In this exploit, curiously enough, he was associated with Vassili Verestchagin, the great painter, who went down in the Petravskobrod with Admiral Makarov, and who was thus linked by destiny with the opening of one brilliant career and the close of another.

The mission of Skrzydloff's first exploit was the passage of the Danube by the Russian army of liberation, which went in past a top to the Bulgarian atrocities made famous by Mr. Gladstone's tongue and pen. Russia had no Black Sea fleet. Turkey had a number of powerful ironclads and monitors, under the command of a renegade Englishman, Horatio Pasha. These monitors were in the Danube, and threatened the crossing of the Russian army—in fact, until they were disposed of en masse was not possible.

The story of what followed has been well told by Alexander Verestchagin, brother of the famous painter, who commanded a squad of Cossacks, and was later on Skobeleff's staff. He begins his account thus: "My brother Vassili, with his friend Lieutenant Skrzydloff, came some to Paragan, as if for a walk, and told me, as a secret, that early the next morning the actual men had determined to plant mines in the Danube, almost opposite Paragan, and that in case any of the Turkish ironclads tried to prevent this, Skrzydloff would go for it with the torpedo-launch skufia (skuter), and try to blow the ironclad up. My brother Vassili was going to take part in this attack. He asked me to tell no one about it, as he was afraid that his superiors would forbid it. Skrzydloff incited me to drive over with him to see the skufia, and so we went."

Alexander Verestchagin goes on to describe the fait of the Danube, in which lay the diminutive steam launch, pointed the color of the water; the crew was protected by an iron roof, on which sacks of coal and sand were being laid as an additional protection. Skrzydloff characteristically exhorted him to be up betimes in the morning, to be sure to see the fun.

The narrative next introduces us to an upper room, in which there were two beds. One was empty, for his previous occupant, Vassili Verestchagin, had leaped up. "In a blood-stained shirt," and was postulating and speaking excitedly to the occupant of the other bed, who was Skrzydloff. The latter was severely wounded in both legs by a rifle-ball, and was quietly expostulating with Verestchagin, and advising him to lie down again and keep quiet. They were disputing about the exact details of their torpedo attack, and the reasons for its partial failure. It seems that they had approached the Turkish ironclad, and that, as soon as their launch was discovered, the Turks opened fire with practically every weapon on that side of the ship, as well as rifles, and, later, even pistols. A hail of shot and shell was poured against the little launch, but Skrzydloff pushed on cheerfully, as if nothing was happening. They finally got in close quarters and pushed their torpedo, a mere charge of gunpowder at the end of a pole, as they could in the Turkish ironclad. Then they turned on the electric current, only to find that the connecting wires had been cut, presumably by a bullet, and they had no course left but to retreat. Skrzydloff and Verestchagin were already wounded; the latter somewhat graphically describes his feelings as he discovered his wound. He felt a sensation of warmth in his side and feeling with his hand found he could put a finger into the rent in his flesh. He went on exploring, and found that he was only one finger, but two could quite easily go into the wound, and he further ascertained that his fingers were wet with blood. Then a revelation of the grim curiosity which made of Verestchagin a pointer of the realism of war, and which led him to Port Arthur, to the side of Admiral Makarov.

The latter was making history on the Black Sea, with Skrzydloff made a name on the Danube. With nothing but a few launchers, a few spurs, and a few packets of gunpowder he was out against the powerful ironclads of the Turkish fleet, with their English or American officers. For the most part, the "torpedoes" was fastened to a spar, pushed against the hull of the enemy, slipped, and exploded, to the imminent danger of the torpedo-launch which carried it. Sometimes the gunpowder was tied to a rope between two launches, and towed against the enemy's ship; but the danger was tremendous in either case, for the slight and almost wholly defenceless launches were exposed to a whole hail of shot from the Turkish war-vessels, besides the danger from their own steel weapons.

Skrzydloff was decorated for the exploit described. He was later posted on the Baltic, the Pacific, and the Black Sea; at the second of these three stations he became familiar with the region in which his Vladivostok squadron has so recently been making history. From a little steam-launch he is transferred to one of the most grandiose armed cruisers in the world, but he is still the same daring spirit who slipped forth in the end of the morning over the blue Danube in the early summer of 1877.

The English in Tibet

In the July number of the North American Review Prof. Euper Oukhtomsky expresses his fears that Tommy Atkins will plunder the Lamaist monasteries in Tibet, and that priceless documents of Buddhism will be lost forever to the world. The truth is that the English in India have done everything to protect the ancient faiths and literature of the East, and the Calcutta government has been foremost in the task. To begin with, England has from the outset upheld the principle of absolute religious toleration in India, allowing no faith to attack or revile any other faith, excepting toleration of Brahmanism and Mohammedanism from the Christian missionary, while compelling Moslems and Hindus to respect each other's religion, drama, and festivals. Indeed, the Indian government keeps the holidays and holy days of all faiths, observing the Muharram and the Ganga Snana of Mohammedanism and Brahmanism not less than King's and New Year or civil feasts like the coronation and the Empire's birthday. This absolute toleration is as fine as anything of the sort in history; but the government of India has gone much farther than this. It has worked unceasingly for the preservation of the sacred books of the East, and, for the most part, with success. British supremacy in India. Sir William Jones, Thomas Colebrooke, and Charles Wilkins, the fathers of Sanskrit learning, were all Bengal civilians, and Warren Hastings took a lively interest in the founding of the Royal Asiatic Society in Calcutta in 1785. The foundations of the world's Sanskrit studies were laid by these three Bengal civilians, and this fact remains, even though obscured by the subsequent activity of learned Germans like Max Müller, Boethling, Roth, and Weber. Even here, all the manuscripts which the Germans worked with were brought to Europe by the men who governed India; Max Müller met not only his manuscripts, but the money to pay the printing bills of his great edition of the Rig-Veda, from the India Office, which was also one of the great supporters of his "Sacred Books of the East" series of translation.

As far as northern Buddhism is concerned, for which Prince Oukhtomsky is especially apprehensive, it should be remembered that the world knew practically nothing at all of Buddhism before a Bengal civilian, Brian Houghton Hodgson, made his latest discoveries in the libraries of Nepal while he was resident at Kathmandu in the Himalayas. He discovered left after text, and the most recent of which is Professor Cornhill, with his first text and translation of Asha Ghosh's Life of Buddha. The Calcutta government has for years spent considerable sums on the formation and completion of a great Tibetan dictionary, with a special view to the texts of Buddhism, and this work will reach the science of the whole world.

Prince Oukhtomsky's misgivings are, therefore, quite unfounded. Far from indulging in vandalism, the influence of the English in Tibet will be conservative; they will secure new editions of Buddhist texts which have been known to the world, and as they did with the Sanskrit texts which record the glory and wisdom of ancient India.

SENATOR FAIRBANKS OPENING THE REPUBLICAN CAMPAIGN IN INDIANA

The photograph is a snapshot taken at Indian, Indiana, showing Senator Fairbanks, the Republican nominee for Vice President, addressing his first speech of the campaign on the return to Indiana from the Chicago Convention. It is noted that Senator Fairbanks will take an active part in the campaign, driving most of his energies to speaking in Indiana.

Prince Adalbert Reviewing German Troops at Tientsin—the Prince is among the Group at the Right

The Review in progress before the Prince

GERMANY AND THE FAR-EASTERN SITUATION—PRINCE ADALBERT REVIEWING THE KAISER'S TROOPS AT TIENTSIN

The photograph shows a portion of German troops at Tientsin, China, who are being reviewed by the German Emperor, Kaiser Wilhelm II. The Emperor is in the foreground, and the troops are in the background. The Emperor is wearing a military uniform and is holding a sword. The troops are standing in formation and are wearing German military uniforms. The scene is outdoors, and the ground appears to be a mix of dirt and grass.

The Freshman Crews at the Start

The Fleet of the Varsity Race, won by Syracuse

THE INTERCOLLEGIATE ROWING REGATTA AT POUGHKEEPSIE-SYRACUSE WINNING THE FOUR-MILE 'VARSITY RACE

The feature of the annual intercollegiate rowing regatta, held over the Poughkeepsie-Highland course on the Hudson River, June 28, was the victory of Syracuse over Cornell, the favorite, in both the four-mile 'varsity' race and the two-mile Freshman race. In both events the Syracuse crews won over Cornell by four lengths. In the 'varsity' race the time of the winning crew was 20:22 3/4, which does not equal Cornell's record time, 18:35 1/4, made by the Ithaca 'varsity' crew in 1901.

Are Americans Popular in England?

By Sydney Brooks

London, June 29, 1934.

ARE Americans, in America, popular in England? That perhaps is rather a precise way of putting a question that rarely more than half turns itself in the minds of Americans who have made London their home or include England in their yearly trip abroad. Indeed, in too many cases, it is too blunt. Let us take it as we see it. What is the general attitude of Englishmen towards the United States, towards Americans as a nation? That in itself is a question that might be divided and subdivided indefinitely. If I were asked to answer it roughly and in a single sentence, the reply would be something like this: Englishmen are extremely fond, extremely ignorant, and in some ways extremely jealous of the United States. In one of his neatly pointed essays Stevenson complains that while the Englishman will voraciously examine any statement that may be made concerning the customs of the Wild Coast or the native habits of Tibet, he will swallow at once and without inquiry the wadded yarns about Scotland and the North. Stevenson, as we know, had his own heightened and telling way of putting things; but at bottom there was a good deal in what he said. The average Englishman, though largely governed by Scotchmen, known as little of Scotland as the average New-Yorker of Kansas, Mr. Barrie's lady who wanted to know what the natives of Inverness had when the bears rampaged through their streets all the winter long, and was entirely content to hear that they shot them with claymores, was really an exaggerated type. But America, if you should judge, runs Scotland pretty hard as a favorite field of British ignorance. What the ordinary Englishman does not know about the United States is almost as astonishing as what he thinks he does know. Mr. Justin McCarthy used to tell a tale under this head of an Englishman who is now a cabinet minister and was a member of Mr. Balfour's government. "I believe you have visited America, Mr. McCarthy?" "Oh yes, several times." "Ah! And did you go to Chicago?" "Certainly." "Now, let me think, Chicago is on Lake, is it not?" "Yes, it is." "And is it a pretty little city?" "Remember, that this gentleman, who thought Lake Michigan was something like the Scipitine, was a university man, a man of considerable knowledge and culture, and an authority on European and imperial affairs. Due has to multiply his acquaintance with American progress by the number of voyages to reach the average Englishman's height of ignorance. During the civil war it was an article of faith among English editors that the Mississippi flowed east and west, and formed a real dividing line between North and South; and I remember that at the time of the Vancouver and the great London annual described that British news-wire might easily be sent down the St. Lawrence and into Lake Erie, taking Niagara one promontory, at a jump. Such things are amazing enough, but they only just hint at the magnitude of English misinformation. An Englishman who has visited America and who is staying in London is bound to be harassed with questions of a kind that would tax the patience of an angel. "Isn't every one corrupt over there?" "Aren't all the papers sensational?" "Did you ever meet an American who didn't speak through his nose?" and so on and so on. And if you attempt to give a picture of the country as it really is, you are greeted with the petted kind of incredulity that breaks out into some frank comments on your powers of observation directly your lack is turned and not infrequently before. It is difficult enough to explain England to Americans, but that is child's work by the side of attempting to explain America to Englishmen. Personally, I have given it up altogether. On no other theme is social poise to be had.

Towards political America there has, of course, been an immense change of sentiment within the last thirty-five years. The paper as Rodin somewhere says, that best represents the English middle classes is unquestionably Punch, and the atmosphere of Punch is intended to be non-partisan. Nevertheless, if one picks up any of the columns of the sixties, and especially of the early sixties, when the civil war was raging, one finds the knowledge of American affairs was only qualified by the bitterness of expression given to it. The ignorance largely remains, but the bitterness has vanished altogether. And not only the bitterness, but the old superciliousness. Even the London papers no longer patronize the United States as they used to. True, there are wars in which England still refuses to take America seriously. She makes larger allowances for American statesmen than for any others, rather expects them than otherwise to lack force from the small diplomatic traces, and only smiles when the process ends in her receiving an unexpected blow. England will take from America what she will take from no one else. This is not because America is more powerful than any one else, or because England has so much to gain by keeping on good terms with her. The average Englishman is too American to regard his international questions and antipathies by considerations of policy. It is because of the very genuine friendliness which has grown up among all classes of Englishmen for the United States. It is an avowal over here that there can never be serious trouble between the two countries, and this comfortable feeling is held by all Anglo-American questions not only of their danger, but of their interest. Every one takes it for granted that the affair, whatever it may be, will be satisfactorily smoothed over and settled. Practically nobody in England, for instance, took any real interest in the Alaskan canal question, and nobody will take any real interest in the Alaskan boundary difficulty when it comes up again. Journalists will write leaders about it, and there will be articles in the monthly reviews, but the man in the street will remain profoundly unmoved. Nothing can disturb his belief that England and America, though they may squabble now and then, can never really quarrel. As for a war between the two nations, it is to him simply as unthinkable, as fratricide. He would bound out of public life any minister, any member of Parliament, who dared even to hint at it.

As a matter of fact, no English politician ever thinks of mentioning the United States in a speech without some complimentary adjective, and the British public, which has long ceased to be the most critical public in Europe, and become instead a cheering, roaring, one of the most hysterical and sentimental, always shows heartily any allusion to "our cousins beyond the sea," and agrees rapturously with the speaker that "blood is thicker than water." An American who tries to persuade himself that his country has a political foe in England had better stop in America if he wants to keep his faith whole. It would hardly survive a fortnight in England itself. Englishmen treat no grudges. They are as proud of Washington as Americans themselves; most of them are not even aware that there was such a thing as a war of 1812; while they quite cheerfully admit that all through the civil war and the Alaskan business they were in the wrong, and were rightly made to pay for it. In the visitors' rooms at the Reform Club on Pall Mall you will find over the mantelpiece a facsimile of the Declaration of Independence, and about it medallions of Washington, Lincoln and Grant. There is something rather like a worship, even thus candidly published and acknowledge two of the greatest blunders in their history. But the English have grown into a big habit of always exempting Americans from the ordinary divisions of nationality. Cecil Rhodes was far from being the only English-American nationalist sent beyond the seas, and indeed, the race. The least imaginative Londoner feels himself and his country in a very special degree united to America. It is the nation of all others he would most like his own to be on friendly and even intimate terms with.

Politically, then, things are as they should be. It is in the social field outside that British ignorance still holds its own. No tale is less extravagant of American doings and sayings to be accepted as gospel in England. In American life Englishmen still know nothing. The reasons for this are on the surface. Englishers live outside the world of the holiday resorts. An Englishman who visits it simply for pleasure, to see the country as a tourist, is a rare being. His knowledge of American manners and customs and ways of doing things is therefore based on what he reads in the papers, the books and the travel. There would hardly be less trustworthy sources of information. The English journals pay less attention to America than to any other country, and their New York and Washington correspondents are generally speaking, so objective that even a well-informed American would be hard to know who was right and who was wrong. Half the news coming over from New York is simply an echo of the "fake yarns" and impossible trivialities with which a certain section of the American press delights to pad out its columns. Reading it and it alone an Englishman easily gets the impression that he is getting up to date on the subject of American life. Many towns, and millmeters who line up with their pet monkeys. Things like these, just because they differ so utterly from English standards, are held to be "typically American," just as Wall Whinn is still the "typically American" post. Nor does the ordinary American traveler whose the Englishman meets in England or on the Continent, tend to put things straight. A good many Americans spend most of their time in Europe running down their country, its politics, and society, and general tone. Others, displaying of being able to be light into the subject, are so sure that serious things do not trouble the statements they hear. Others, unhappily, supply by their behavior confirmation of an Englishman's worst estimate. Every nation finds its tourists—or at least the tourists who attract notice—its most confident and its most national, but no nation is more so in this respect as the United States. What the loud-voiced, loud-backed Englishman of a generation ago was to the Continent, that a section of American tourists is to the England of today. The romping American girl who roves up and down the corridors of London and provincial hotels or walks the Strand and St. James's Park, the American man who puts sugar in his claret and chews an unlighted cigar—these are the sort of people who too much represent America in the eyes of the average Englishman. It is of no use assuring people that they come from Oklahoma. The English must have his head of Osoboko, and judge the entire country on his worst specimens.

Ignorance does not matter so much. What does matter is the refusal to be enlightened. Englishmen seem at times almost to hate the thought that America has emerged from the dark ages of anything (but America) of American crudeness or "commercialism" they fasten on all the more readily as a suspicion is beginning to arise that in other ways the United States is getting ahead. With American steel rails, machinery, bridges, locks, ironclad ships, the Englishman, even the Englishman who is a business man, feels they have to get even somehow. They accordingly "take it out" in comments on American manners and social life, and are petulantly resentful and suspicious of all attempts to put things as they really are. There is a sort of national prejudice, and not only will not admit that it will not admit that the English ways of doing things are not the best; and from no one is instruction less willingly received than from Americans. One sees at times a curious proof of this in the way the English will spoil American inventions by only adopting them in part, mechanical inventions, such as railroad-car couplings, radiators, soda fountains, and so on. They never like to confess that they cannot do better whatever Americans have done well, and they would sooner fail in the attempt and ruin everything rather than take the American advantage just as it stands. I remember last year being in the House of Commons when Colonel Lee, the late military attaché at Washington, was holding up the American army system for imitation by the British War Office. He spoilt his case by doing so. The judges against such an admission of inferiority by the side of Americans in prejudice felt in regard to no other country, was strong enough to condemn his proposals, and counteract even the excellent and persuasive way in which he put them forward. And in social life one finds the same spirit at work. Englishmen feel very cordially towards Americans both as a nation and as individuals. They receive and welcome them just as warmly, only in another way, as Americans receive travelling or domiciled Englishmen in the States. But, if he is in the company of average Englishmen, the American in London will find it better—unless he has a position for international recognition as a little as possible about America. It is only when he dwells on his best pleasing side that he is sure of a sympathetic hearing. Let him tell the truth, and he is certain to receive a more generous measure of discretion seems therefore the better, at any rate the most expeditious and peaceful, course.

Tibet and the British

By C. H. Forbes-Lindsay

Author of "India, Past and Present," etc.

TIBET has been a factor in the politics of the Indian Empire since the earliest days of the East India Company's establishment. The late Governor-General of India, that extraordinary genius Warren Hastings, was fully alive to the advantages which might have been expected to accrue to Bengal from the establishment of trade relations with Tibet, and under his direction the expeditions ofINGLE and Turner were undertaken in the close of the eighteenth century.

From time to time the endeavor to create commercial connections between Hindustan and Tibet has been renewed with uniform facility. More than once negotiations have led to agreements which seemed to signalize the insertion of the entering wedge, but in every such case, as soon as the British proceeded to drive it home they encountered an insuperable obstruction. From the first it was suspected that the adverse influence at work emanated from China, the suzerain of Tibet, and, despite the emphatic denials of the highest Chinese officials, the fact has long since been proved beyond a peradventure.

In 1858, Mr. Colman Marsden, the secretary to the government of Bengal, procured from the Chinese a passport to Lhasa and a letter commanding him and his mission to the third lama. In the year following Mr. Marsden, well equipped, as he fully expected, to insure a successful issue, started upon his commercial expedition to the Tibetan capital. Meanwhile, China had sent secret instructions to Lhasa to oppose the progress of the mission, with the result that the secretary and his suite were confronted at the border with an armed force and compelled to turn back. China professed to be deeply concerned and chagrined at the turn of affairs. She protested her inability to control the Tibetans, and in support of the incredible contention insisted in the manner in which the imperial passport and credentials had been treated. If the expedition persisted in its project the Chinese government could not protect it, nor would it be responsible for its safety. As a token of their sincere regret for the incident and as compensation for the withdrawal of the expedition, the Chinese government voluntarily ceded to Great Britain some territory contiguous to Burma. Incidentally, they deposed the King of Sikkim, a vassal of the British, who had been privy to the conspiracy and to some extent instrumental in its success.

In 1862 the Tibetans came into direct conflict with the British by invading Sikkim and erecting fortifications upon their joint border. The little joint British and Chinese force which entered Tibet on a mission to consult the great lama, the result of which was the Chinese embassy at Lhasa, and on behalf of Great Britain, Lord Lansdowne, the Viceroy of India, signed a convention defining the boundary and appointing a commission to establish commercial relations. Twelve years have elapsed, and not a single article of that agreement has been carried out. Almost before the ink was dry in the signatures, Chinese obstructive tactics were in operation. The boundary posts have been thrown down as soon as set up. A trading caravan and a trade mart for Indian products, but a devotee of the third lama's forbade Tibetans to live at Yatung under penalty of death. The commissioners for Tibet, although nominated, have avoided meeting the British members of the commission. It is assumed to entwine the terms of the convention of 1862 that Colonel Younghusband's "mission" has entered Tibet. The active opposition of the Tibetans to the progress of the expedition will now furnish the British with a valuable pretext for carrying out their designs to a greater extent than they could have hoped for when the movement was initiated.

The British ministry has in view the attainment of two principal objects, to wit, the opening up of unrestricted trade between India and Tibet, and the acquisition of a very desirable slice of Tibetan territory. Russia is a factor in the problem only so far as her influence might prove detrimental to the commercial interests of Great Britain. India has no reason for fear military aggression on the part of the Muscovites, from that quarter, and, in truth, little enough from any quarter.

The trade of Tibet is much larger than is generally supposed, but it is capable of development to an immeasurable degree under favorable circumstances. China enjoys by far the greater part of it, and her jealousy of British encroachments upon her provinces is not difficult to understand. On the other hand, the losses here the trade of the country in their hands, and would be directly benefited by its extension. It is certain, then, that if they understood the true political and commercial significance of the situation they would be likely to favor the British designs, but the most enlightened of them is incredibly ignorant of the outside of his own country. They all believe that China is the greatest power in the world, and that Russia ranks next to it. A British officer who related to an exceptionally intelligent Tibetan, the presence of a provision of the fact of the occupation of Peking by the European allies was met with a polite smile of incredulity. Your general no doubt reported that he had

It should be understood that the third lama is more a figure in the hands of China. During the past fifty years the nominal suzerain of Tibet has been without exception, a puppet of the several great powers has all been a puppet and has been a puppet of the great powers.

Map showing the Route of the Mission's advance into Tibet entered Peking," said the lama, "but he could not have done so. It would be impossible."

What trade exists between India and Tibet is carried on exclusively by natives of the latter country, for an foreigner is allowed to cross the Tibetan frontier, and all the passes are jealously guarded. The exports consist mainly of gold, silver, wool, salt, and yak's tails. Gold is only mined in one place, the limitation being due to the government policy, directed by China, of restricting the output. The gold deposits are extremely rich; indeed, there is good ground for the belief, expressed by experts, that upon development the Tibetan mines would prove to be the richest in the world.

Wool is the staple product of the country. It is of a very superior quality, and with encouragement the quantity produced might easily be trebled. India needs the wool of Tibet, and would like to give tea in exchange. The Tibetans consume large quantities of tea, and the principal tea districts of India are at their doors, but at present China supplies the demand with bricks composed of compressed dust and tea-leaf leaves.

The prospective opening up of Tibet to the commerce of the world (for such will in effect be the result of the British plans if carried to completion) should not be entirely without interest for Americans. It is not likely that the manufacture of the United States will find a market in Tibet to any considerable extent, but the development of the vast mineral resources of the country may afford a profitable field for American capital and enterprise.

Projecting southward between Sikkim and Bhutan is a triangular tongue of Tibetan territory upon which the British have cast an eager eye. The district of Lhasa, as its strategic and commercial advantages begin to be realized, has excited the keen desire of Indian statesmen of the present day, and it is not to be predicted that when the existing difficulty is adjusted that coveted valley will become a British possession.

To begin with, Lhasa affords the most direct and the easiest route from Hindustan to central Tibet, the way from Bengal through the south-western corner of Bhutan pursuing an easy gradient devoid of difficult ridges. The Jelep Pass could be brought by railroad within a few hours' journey of Calcutta, and there to Lhasa would be no more than an eight days' march for troops. However, it would be an great engineering feat to extend the railroad up through the Lhasa to the Tsangpo, which river pursues its course into British territory as the Brahmaputra. This is the direct overland route to Peking and the only one through the Himalayas which avoids snow passes. The Jelep Pass, although nearly 15,000 feet above the sea, has a gradual slope on both sides—the name signifies "Lovely Level"—and is practicable for horsemen or even artillery.

The climate and scenery of Lhasa have been compared to those of Kashmir. Its soil is equally fertile, and its people are as contented and well fed as those of the "Happy Valley." The Tibetan of Lhasa is in every respect better off than his fellow countryman of the interior. As a satisfaction for invalid British troops Lhasa would probably surpass any of the health resorts of India, and, under proper cultivation, the valley would supply the cities of Bengal with an abundance of fruit and vegetables.

During recent years British writers have advocated the annexation of the district on the ground that it is "and geographically a part of Tibet at all, but lies within the Himalayan watershed, like Sikkim and Bhutan." However, a better pretext will be found in compensation for the Tibetan resistance to Colonel Younghusband's mission.

View of a British Encampment among the Mountains of Tibet

Japan versus Russia

A Personal View of a Wonderful Oriental Development

By Henry Clews, L.L.D.

THE Russo-Japanese war has been full of surprises, and has given rise to a vast amount of discussion as to its influence and consequences and the relation of the rest of the world to the two contending nations. It has therefore been a great international educator, all the more so because the strife has been so swift and deadly.

It has exposed the astonishing inefficiency and weakness of both the army and navy of Russia, that before were dreaded by other powers, and has shown the superior strength, mobility, and military and naval skill and pushing force of Japan. One result is that the prestige of Russia, both on sea and land, has suffered very severely, so severely that it will probably never be fully regained.

On the other hand, the prestige which Japan gained in its war with China has been immensely increased. We see a reflection of it in the avility with which its ten million sterling loan was recently taken, both in New York and London, half being allotted to each city. The amount, equivalent to fifty millions of dollars, was many times over-subscribed.

The great success of this loan was a practical pledge of international amity between the three countries concerned—England, America, and Japan—for there is a tie of interest established between a country that sells its bonds and the countries to which it sells them. Therefore, the larger our holdings of Japanese bonds become the more we shall be interested in the welfare of Japan, and other conditions being equal, the more friendly and obligated Japan will feel towards us.

Consequently, our investments in her securities will be productive of international good feeling. They will thus tend to stimulate our trade with Japan, as well as to induce Japanese investments in this country, for we are geographically nearer than Europe to her open door.

The fact that our sympathies are with Japan in her contest with Russia is very largely due to the liberal and progressive open-door policy of Japan and the narrow, restricted, and monopolyistic shut-door policy of Russia, particularly as shown by her arbitrary, grasping, and encroaching course in Manchuria.

Her persistence in demanding there after repeated promises to withdraw constituted a breach of faith towards Japan, and clearly indicated her intention to retain it as a province and a stepping-stone to further territorial acquisitions. Yet her claims on Manchuria were merely based on certain rights over the Manchurian Railway, a very unsubstantial foundation and justification for her pretensions and occupancy of the country.

It was that unjustifiable occupation of Manchuria and practical refusal to release her hold upon it that forced Japan to make war upon her as an aggressor, and practically an invader. Japan wanted peace with honor, and long and patiently conferred and negotiated with Russia in the hope of averting war, and only resorted to it when Russia studied procrastination and subterfuge became so wearisome and exasperating that they exhausted patience, and patience ceased to be a virtue.

Russia's object was to tire out Japan without forcing her into war, her belief being that Japan would ever dare to fight so great a power, much as she might, by Russian injustice, be provoked to do so. But Russia has been undeceived, and had her eyes opened at great cost.

Japan has good reason to feel proud of her exploits and achievement in this great contest. Not alone is physical strength necessary to success in war, but science, money, and an intelligent application and utilization of resources. Although Japan had a great advantage over Russia, in being much nearer her base of supplies, she had still a very formidable adversary.

Yet this purely Oriental nation showed, to the wonder of the world, its superiority over its powerful foe from the beginning of this heroic struggle to drive away an intruder whose ultimate design was to accomplish its destruction as an independent nation.

Against this aggressor the Japanese people are united in a man, with a patriotic and devoted heart, and every one of them not only willing to fight, and sacrifice his property, for his country, but to lay down his life for it, deeming death in its defence itself glorious. Such patriotic willingness to sacrifice everything for the national cause makes every Japanese soldier and sailor more than the equal in strength and resolution, and fighting force, of each of his antagonists. He knows and feels that his family will be well provided for in his absence, and that his country is in the right, but that, with justice on its side, its rights and possibly even its existence are still gravely menaced.

So he proves by his prowess that "There is he armed who hath his quarrel just."

Whether in the army or navy the Japanese are active, energetic, fearless, and determined, and these qualities, combined with their love of country, have done wonders against the Russians, who are mostly unwilling hirelings without a spark of patriotism, or men who are in heart hostile to their own government. The military and naval tactics, discipline, and equipment of the Japanese are also superior to those of Russia, and their movements far quicker and distinguished by greater dash and spirit.

Their officers, too, are well trained. Most of them have been educated in the best colleges and naval and military academies in this country and Europe. Indeed, the almost universal spread of education among the Japanese has been their remarkable. Their desire has been to learn all that the rest of the world knows, and so place themselves in a position to utilize their knowledge, besides gratifying a laudable curiosity. European and American colleges are, and have been for many years, thickly sprinkled with Japanese students, and Admiral Togo was educated for the navy at the United States Naval Academy at Annapolis.

Japan has, therefore, a great link of strength in the devoted patriotism, education and intelligence of her people, for she has become an educated nation, the percentage of illiteracy there being small. Yet the marvelous revolution by which she emerged from Oriental seclusion and obscurity, and gradually developed into her present national and international importance, only began in 1869. Her transformation reads like a romance.

A Wonderful Transformation

In that year, following our naval expedition to Japan, under the command of Commodore Perry, who in 1853 made a provisional treaty with her for opening certain ports, Japan sent an embassy to the United States, and by this initiation, on our side, of our ships of war. This was really the beginning of modern Japanese intercourse with the rest of the world, and its wondrous change from Eastern to Western civilization. The Dutch traders and missionaries, were tolerated and then massacred at Nagasaki had been almost forgotten.

There were in Japan in 1869, as there had been from time immemorial, two emperors, one spiritual and the other temporal, known, respectively, as the Mikado and the Shogun, and a host of feudal lords as powerful as those of England in the days of King John, when history was made at Runnymede. These feudal lords, the Mikados, carried swords, and held the power of life or death by their kind over their vassals, and, and regarded the trading and working classes as inferior beings, of no social importance. They were entirely subservient to these feudal lords—the Mikados—and had no political voice or power whatever.

The change from that feudal age to this in government, manners, and customs, solely by the will of Japan herself, is entirely unexampled in all history. But it was a grand and wise progressive movement by her ruling class which brought Japan from her ancient isolation into the bright light of Western civilization and made her one of the foremost nations of the world. Now her government is representative, like that of the British Parliament or the Congress of the United States.

The Commission of Inquiry

But before dissolving the old empire and adopting the new system of government, Japan sent a commission, of which the Marquis Ito was one, to this country and Europe to examine and inquire into, and report upon, the existing system of government in different nations; and I, among others, gave the commission full information as to our government and national finances. From what this commission learned in both hemispheres, and reported on its return to Japan, the new constitution, and new order of things, in Japan were formulated and adopted, with such radical results and such great success as to astonish the rest of the world. The Japanese seemed to have acted on our own maxim—first be sure you are right and then go ahead.

They took the United States for their model in the main, and sent me instructions to be, as they expressed it, "in their different denominations of bonds and currency, after they had translated the lettering of ours, that I sent them, into their own language. I had this work done by the [lowest] bidder, and my relations with Japan have been very friendly ever since."

In making this great change Japan indeed showed so much wisdom, prudence, and sound statesmanship as greatly to surprise all other nations, for blindness were expected where she had so much to learn from us. But she was as quick to learn as to unlearn, and the newly established order of things seemed to fit her even better than the old, like the new Western clothes that her people took on, when they cast aside their ancient costume and native hair dressing.

She has been fortunate in the statement that have piloted her ship of state so safely through difficult waters, for they have been themselves the equal of any in Europe or America. This is particularly true of their great leader, the Minister Imperial of Japan, the Marquis Ito, who has been very appropriately described both as the Marquis and the financier of the Orient.

Next to him in power and sagacity comes Count Okuma, the Rousseau of Japan. These two men led and really made the revolution.

A Letter from Marquis Ito

I had the good fortune to become acquainted with the Marquis Ito when he visited this country and brought us an introduction to me thirty-five years ago, and we have since corresponded. A letter from him to me, dated as recently as April 14, 1904, throws so much light upon the war, from the Japanese point of view, as to make it highly interesting for, coming from this high official source, it may be considered the voice of the government of Japan. It reads as follows:

TOKYO, April 14, 1904.

DEAR SIR,—In answer to your letter of February 17 let me first of all thank you most sincerely for the constant sympathy you have shown to our country's cause. Your friendly efforts on the occasion of the Sino-Japanese war are still fresh in my memory, and the memory of them has been a source of encouragement to me. The sympathy of public opinion of your country is a great encouragement to us in our faith that in fighting for our own future security and undisturbed enjoyment of the fruits of civilization, we are to a certain extent fighting also for the common cause of all. Just as you say, the supremacy of Russia in Korea would mean not only a constant menace to the very existence of our island empire, but would also mean the wholesale destruction of our commercial and industrial interests already legitimately vested there in the past, not to mention the loss of a natural outlet for our expanding people. The constant policy of Russia in this part of the globe has steadily increased its insatiable monopolization of natural resources of the country she conquers and annexes. Her Manchurian policy is the irrefutable evidence of the above statement. So that in fighting for our own interests we are at the same time fighting for the principle of "fair competition" for all peoples of the world. I am indeed very sorry that the negotiations carried on our side, with sincere "bona fide," were not crowned with success as currently desired. If the Russian government were a little more disposed by the spirit of reciprocity to the satisfaction for the legitimate interests of others, things would not have come to this pass. As it was, there remained no other way for us but to try to enforce by arms what we could not do by reason. As you have said, we have in doing so we are becoming too late, for Russia was steadily and rapidly augmenting her fighting forces available in this part of her empire, so that before long the sheer mass of her fighting power would have made it a folly for us to attempt the uncompleted conquest of the peninsula. It is nothing but a costly thought-out step in the cause of state necessity. And I am much gratified to see that you, as well as the general public opinion of your country, have understood our motive in their true light.

Hoping that you are enjoying no robust health as when I saw you last in New York, and also taking to be able to see you again in no distant future, I remain, Yours sincerely, MARQUIS ITO.

This letter, in clear and temperate language, shows that Japan was justified in her course towards Russia, and that Russia's course was the reverse of this. It correctly says that the policy of Russia in the East has always been to monopolize the resources of the country she conquers, and her career in Manchuria offers indisputable evidence of this fact. Hence for Japan to have allowed her to remain as she is, and to let her empire would have been to pave the way to the destruction of the Japanese trade and commercial interests already established there, besides creating a standing menace to the security and very existence of the government of Japan itself.

The alliance between England and Japan, was a great triumph for Japanese statesmanship, and the credit for this diplomatic achievement is very largely due to the Marquis Ito; and never were popular rejoicings greater than when it was officially announced to the people of Japan. They celebrated it with enthusiasm and loudly cheered Ito.

The Question of the "Yellow Peril"

As for the so-called yellow peril, those who know the Orient best know it to be a baseless fear, and it obviously is so. But it is reasonable to expect that, if Japan comes out of this war with the eastern despotism, the domination of China and Korea will follow under the influence of Japan. This will be a great triumph for Western civilization, as well as Japan, for those countries will then be Japanese, or rather, Japanese, and not subject to an oppressive and tyrannical alien empire.

They will, consequently, all be miners by a Japanese victory over Russia, and the United States will be one of the chief gainers by it in trade and commerce. Then, too, Russian desert would open Manchuria and afford very early access to the Pacific by Russia.

(Continued on page 1108.)

THE TRAINING OF JAPANESE SOLDIERS.

The photograph shows a drill in progress at the Peer's School, Tokyo. The fact that this is not the system of military training in the Japanese army is similar, in many respects, to that Japan frequently comment on the Teutonic appearance of the army as shown in the military academies and schools. Tokyo is the centre of one of the great military districts

RIFLE-PRACTICE BY STUDENTS AT TOKYO

Government institution is further evidence of the extent of military enthusiasm among the Japanese. The recruits to the Mikado's army live the lives of Oriental Germans, and visitors to arms and accoutrements, the organization of the military districts, the general staff, and the its up-to-date arsenal, which turns out ammunition at the rate of a million rounds a day

THE CLUB OF QUEER TRADES

The Eccentric Seclusion of the Old Lady

by
G. K. CHESTERTON

Part II.

MY attention for a moment renewed by victory, I could hear Basil's door finishing under long snoring of which I had not heard the beginning.

"... hullo, I must confess, multi-fiditate to me, my dear sir, and I had not any unpleasant, still one must side with one's old friends against the most fascinating new ones. But not here, there, here, in tying you up in this antimatras, to make it as comfortable as handkerchiefs can reasonably be while..."

I had staggered in my feet. The gigantic burrows was foiling in the garret of Rupert, while Basil was striving to master his mighty hands. Rupert and Basil were both particularly strong, but so was Mr. Burrows; how strong, we knew a second afterwards. His head was held back by Rupert's arm, but a convulsive heave sent over his whole frame. An instant after his head plunged forward like a bull's, and Rupert threw one strong head over heels, a rattling-wheel of legs, on the floor in front of him. Simultaneously the bull's head lashed Basil in the chest, bringing him also to the ground with a crash, and the monster, with a betterer kick, leaped at me and knocked me into the corner of the room, smashing the wicker paper basket. The bewildered Greenwood sprang furiously to his feet. Basil did the same. But they had the best of it now.

Greenwood dashed to the left and pulled it violently, sending peals through the great house. Before I could get pausing in my feet, and before Rupert, who had been literally stunned for a few moments, could even lift his head from the floor, two footmen were in the room. Dejected even when we were in a majority, we were now outnumbered. Greenwood and one of the footmen flung themselves upon me, crushing me back into the corner upon the wreck of the paper basket. The other two flew at Basil, and pressed him against the wall. Rupert lifted himself on his elbow, but he was still dazed.

In the strained silence of our helplessness I heard the voice of Basil come with a loud incoherent cheerfulness. "Now this," he said, "is what I call enjoying oneself." I caught a glimpse of his face, flushed and forced against the bookcase, from between the straying limbs of my captors and his. To my astonishment his eyes were really brilliant with pleasure, like those of a child heated by a favorite game. I made several apoplectic efforts to rise, but the servant was so top of me so heavily that Greenwood could afford to leave me to him. He turned quickly to come to reinforce the two who were manhandling Basil. The latter's head was already sinking lower and lower, like a burning ship, as his enemies pressed him down. He swung up one hand just as I thought him falling and hung on to a huge totem in the bookcase, a volume, I afterwards discovered, of St. Chrysostom's theology. Just as Greenwood bounded across the room towards the group, Basil plucked the ponderous totem bodily out of the shelf, swung it, and sent it spinning through the air, so that it struck Greenwood flat in the face and knocked him over like a rolling pin. At the same instant Basil's stiffened body, and he sank, his enemies closing over him.

Rupert's head was clear, but his body shaken; he was hanging as best he could on to the half-prostrate Greenwood. They were rolling over each other on the floor, both somewhat embroiled by their falls, but Rupert certainly the more so. I was still once-cautiously held down. The floor was a sea of torn tumbled papers and magazines, like an immense waste-paper basket. Burrows and his companion were almost up to the knees in them, as in a drift of dead leaves. And Greenwood had his leg struck right through a sheet of the Pell-Mell Gazette, which clung to it ludicrously, like some fantastic trouser flail.

Basil, shut from me as a human prison, a prison of powerful bodies, might be dead for all I knew. I fancied, however, that the brutal back of Mr. Burrows, which was turned towards me, had a certain tend of effort in it as if my friend still needed some holding down. Suddenly that brutal back swung hither and thither. It was saying to me: Basil, you had had hold of the other. Burrows's huge feet and those of the footmen were battering Basil's sunken head like an anvil, but nothing could get the giant's ankle out of his sudden and savage grip. While his own head was forced slowly down in darkness and great pain, the right leg of his captor was being forced slowly in the air. Burrows swung to and fro with a purple face. Then suddenly the floor and the walls and the ceiling shook together, as the columns fell, all his laugh seeming to fill the floor. Basil sprang up with dancing eyes, and with three blows like battering-rams knocked the footman into a cowed hat. Then he sprang on top of Burrows, with one antismatras in his hand and another in his foot, and bound him hand and foot, and then he knew clearly that his head had struck the floor. Then Basil sprang at Greenwood, whom Rupert was struggling to hold down, and between them they secured him easily. The man who had told me to let go and turned to his room, but I leaped up like a spring re-bell, and, to my infinite satisfaction, knocked the fellow down. The other footman, kneeling at the mouth and quite demoralized, was standing out of the room. My late captor, without a word, shook after him, seeing that the battle was won. Rupert was sitting astride the pinioned Mr. Greenwood. Basil asked the pinioned Mr. Burrows:

To my surprise the latter gentleman, lying bound on his back, spoke in a perfectly calm voice to the man who sat on top of him.

"And now, gentlemen," he said, "since you have got your own way, perhaps you wouldn't mind telling me what the deuce all this is."

"This," said Basil, with a radiant face, looking down at his captive, "this is what we call the survival of the fittest."

Rupert who had been steadily collecting himself throughout the later phases of the fight, was intellectually altogether himself again at the end of it. Springing up from the prostrate Greenwood, and knocking a handkerchief round his left hand, which was bleeding from a blow, he sang out quite calmly:

"Basil, will you mount guard over the captives of your bow and spear and antismatras? Ninelimb and I will clear out the pinioned Mr. Burrows."

"All right," said Basil, rising also and seating himself in a leisurely way in an armchair. "Don't hurry for us," he said, glancing round at the litter of the room. "We have all the illustrated papers."

Rupert latched thoughtfully out of the room, and I followed him even more slowly; in fact, I lingered long enough to hear, as I passed through the room, the passages, and the kitchen stairs, Basil's now continuing conversation:

"And now, Mr. Burrows," he said, settling himself sociably in the chair, "there's no reason why we shouldn't go on with that amusing argument. I'm sorry that you have to express yourself lying on your back on the floor, and, as I told you before, I've no more notion why you are there than the man in the moon. A conversationalist like yourself, however, can scarcely be seriously handicapped by any bodily posture. You were saying, if I remember right, when this incidental fracas occurred, that the rudiments of science might with advantage be made public."

"Precisely," said the large man on the floor in an easy tone. "I hold that nothing more than a rough sketch of the universe as seen by science can be of any use."

And here the voices died away as we descended into the basement. I noticed that Mr. Greenwood did not join in the amiable controversy. Strange as it may appear, I think he looked back upon our proceedings with a slight degree of resentment. Mr. Burrows, however, with all philosophy and rhinoceros. We left them, as I say, together, and sank deeper and deeper into the underworld of that mysterious house, which perhaps appeared to us somewhat more Tartarus than it really was, owing to our knowledge of its semicriminal mystery and of the human secret locked behind.

The basement floor had several doors, as is usual in such a house; doors that would naturally lead to the kitchen, the scullery, the pantry, the servant's hall, and so on. Rupert flung open all the doors with indescribable rapidity. One of them, after six seconds on entirely empty apartments. The sixth was locked. Rupert broke the door in like a handbell, and we fell into the sudden blackness of the sealed, unlighted room.

Rupert stood on the threshold, and called out like a man calling to an abyss:

"Wherever you are, come out. You are free. The people who held you captive are captives themselves. We heard you crying and we came to deliver you. We have bound your enemies up stairs hand and foot. You are free."

For some seconds after he had spoken into the darkness there was a dead silence in it. Then there came a kind of muttering and crouching. We might easily have taken it for the wind or rals if we had not happened to have heard it before. It was unmistakably the voice of the imprisoned woman, clearly demanding liberty. Just as we had heard her demand it.

"Has anybody got a match," said Rupert, grimly. "I fancy we have come pretty near the end of this business."

I struck a match and held it up. It revealed a large, bare yellow-papered apartment, with a darkened figure at the other end of it near the window. As an instant after it barred my fingers and dropped, leaving darkness. It had, however, revealed something more practical than the brown background behind my head. I struck another match and lit the gas. And we found ourselves suddenly and solemnly in the presence of the captive.

At a sort of worktable in the window of this subterranean break-room sat an old, old, old woman, with a silver head and almost startling silver hair. She had, as if designedly to relieve those effects, a pair of Mephistophelian black eyebrows and a very neat black dress. The glare of the gas lit up her piquant hair and face perfectly against the brown background of the shutters. The background was blue and not brown as one place; at the place where Rupert's knife had torn a great opening in the wall about an hour before.

"Madam," said he, advancing with a gesture of the hat, "permit me to have the pleasure of announcing to you that you are free. Your complaints happened to strike our ears as we passed down this street, and we have therefore ventured to come to your rescue."

The old lady with the red face and the black eyebrows looked at us for a moment with something of the appoplectic stare of a parrot. Then she said, with a sudden gasp or breathing of relief: "Rescue! Where is Mr. Greenwood? Where is Mr. Burrows? Did you say you had rescued me?"

"Yes, madam," said Rupert, with a beaming countenance. "We have very satisfactorily dealt with Mr. Greenwood and Mr. Burrows. We have satisfied affairs with them very satisfactorily." The old lady rose from her chair and came very quickly towards me.

"What did you say to them? How did you persuade them?" she cried.

"We persuaded them, my dear madam," said Rupert, laughing, "by knocking them down and tying them up. But what is the matter?"

To the surprise of every one the old lady walked slowly back to her seat by the window.

"Do I understand," she said, with the air of a person about to begin knitting, "that you have knocked down Mr. Burrows and tied him up?"

"We have," said Rupert, proudly; "we have resisted our oppression and conquered it."

"Oh, thanks," answered the old lady, and sat down by the window.

A considerable pause followed.

"The road is quite clear for you, madam," said Rupert, pleasantly.

The old lady rose, rocking her black eyebrows and her silver head at us for an instant.

"But what about Greenwood and Burrows," she said. "What did I understand you to say had become of them?"

"They are lying on the floor upstairs," said Rupert, chuckling.

"Tied hand and foot."

"Well, that settles it," said the old lady, coming with a kind of bang into her seat again. "I must stop where I am."

Rupert looked bewildered.

"Stop where you are," he said. "Why should you stop any longer where you are? What power can force you now to stop in this miserable cell?"

"The question rather is," said the old lady, with composure, "what power can force me to go anywhere else?"

We both stared wildly at her and she stared very tranquilly at us both.

"At last I said, 'Do you really mean to say that we are to leave you here?'"

"I suppose you don't intend to tie me up," she said, "and carry me off? I certainly shall not go otherwise."

"But, my dear madam," cried out Rupert, in a radiant exasperation. "We heard you with our own ears saying because you could not get out."

"Rascaldroppers often hear rather misleading things," replied the captive, grimly. "I suppose I did break down a lot and lose my temper and talk to myself. But I have none sense of honor for all that."

"Some sense of honor!" repeated Rupert, and the last light of intelligence died out of his face, leaving it the face of an idiot with rolling eyes.

He moved vaguely towards the door and I followed. But I turned yet once more in the trile of my conscience and curiosity.

"Can we do nothing for you, madam?" I said, forlornly.

"Why," said the lady, "if you are particularly anxious to do me a little favor you might ante the gentlemen upstairs."

Rupert plumped heavily up the kitchen staircase, shaking it with his vague violence. With mouth open to speak he stumbled to the door at the sitting-room and scene of battle.

"Theoretically speaking, that is an 'ouch' term," Mr. Burrows was saying, lying on his back and arguing coolly with Basil.

"but we must consider the matter as it appears to our noses. The origin of morality..."

"Basil," cried Rupert, gasping, "she won't come out."

"Who won't come out?" asked Basil, a little cross at being interrupted in an argument.

"The lady down stairs," replied Rupert. "The lady who was locked up. She won't come out. And she says that all she wants is for us to let her go. I believe her."

"And a jolly sensible suggestion," cried Basil, and with a bound he was on top of the prostrate Burrows once more and was unknitting his bonds with hands and teeth.

"A really brilliant idea," Basil said, just as Mr. Greenwood.

In a dazed and automatic way I released the little gentleman in the purple jacket, who did not seem to regard any of the proceedings as particularly sensible or brilliant. The gigantic floor-scraper, with his other hand, was leaving us with Hercules himself.

"Well," said Basil, in his cheerful way. "I think we must be getting away. We've an much enjoyed our evening. Far too much regard for you to stand on ceremony. If I may so express myself, we are all very much at home. Good night. Things like this."

One thing, Rupert.

"Basil," said Rupert, desperately, "for God's sake come and see what you can make of the woman down stairs. I can't get the disconcert of my mind. I admit that things like this."

If we had made a mistake. But these gentlemen won't mind perhaps...

"No, no," cried Burrows, with a sort of Babalanian uprightness. "No, no, look at the poetry, gentlemen. Examine the oval clock. Make a tour of the chimney. There are corpses all over the house. I assure you."

This adventure of ours was destined to differ in one respect from others which I have narrated. I had been through most wild days with Basil Gryce, says for the first half of which the sun and the moon seemed to have gone mad. But it had almost invariably happened that towards the end of the day and its adventures things had cleared themselves like the sky after rain, and a dimness and quiet evening had gradually descended upon me.

But this day a week was destined to end in confusion were unfounded. Before we left that house, ten minutes afterwards, one half of which took us which rolled all our minds in cloud. If we had begun to speak out of Greenwood's shoulders we could scarcely have been more subtly stricken. And yet of this we had no explanation.

We had to go to bed that night with the prodigy and set up next morning with it and let it stand in our memories for weeks and months. As will be seen, it was not until months afterwards that by another accident and in another way it was explained. For the present I only state what happened.

When all five of us next down the kitchen stairs again, Rupert leading, the two hosts bringing up the rear, we found the door of the prison again closed. Throwing it open we found the place again as black as pitch. The old lady, if she was still there, had turned out the gas, she seemed to have a weird preference for sitting in the dark.

Without another word Rupert lit the gas again. The little old lady turned her head like head as we all stood forward in the strange darkness. "Two, with a question that almost made me jump, she sprang up and heard a sort of old-fashioned curtsy or reverence. I looked quickly at Greenwood and Burrows, to whom it was natural to suppose this subterranean had been of long standing. I felt irritated at what was in this column, and desired to see the faces of the tyrants as they received it. To my surprise they did not seem to have seen it at all; Burrows was jarring his nails with a small pickaxe, Greenwood was at the back of the group and had hardly entered the room. And then an amazing fact became apparent. It was Basil Gryce who stood foremost of the group the golden gaslight lighting up his strong face and figure. His face wore an expression indescribably conscious, with the surprise of a very grave man. His head was slightly bent with a constrained tone. It was he who had acknowledged the lady's chinaman. And it was he, beyond any shadow of reasonable doubt, to whom it had really been directed.

"See I hear," he said, in a kindly yet somehow formal voice, "I hear, madam, that my friends have been trying to rescue you. But without success."

"No one, naturally, knows my faults better than you," answered the lady with a high color. "But you have not found me guilty of treachery."

"I willingly admit it, madam," replied Basil, in the same level tones, "and the fact is that I am so much gratified with your exhibition of loyalty that I permit myself the pleasure of exercising some very large discretion."

"I am very much obliged to you," said the lady, "and I leave this room at the request of these gentlemen. But you know that you can safely leave it at mine."

The captive made another reverence. "I have never complained of your justice," she said. "I need scarcely say what I think of your generosity."

And before our staring eyes could blink she had passed out of the room, Basil holding the door open for her.

"I turned to Greenwood with a relieve into joviality. 'This will be a relief to you,' he said, with a smile."

"Yes, it will," replied that immovable young gentleman with a face like a sphinx.

We found ourselves outside in the dark blue night, shaken and dazed, if we had fallen into it from a high tower.

"Basil," said Rupert at last, in a weak voice. "I always thought you were my leader. But are you a man? I mean—were you only a man?"

"At present," replied Basil, "my mere humanity is proved by one of the most unimpeachable symbols—hunger. We are too late for the theatre in Square Square. But we are not too late for the restaurant. Here comes the green combs!" and he had begun to sit before the green combs.

He sat, it was months after. Rupert Gryce suddenly entered my room, swinging a match in his hand, and with a general air of having jumped over the garden wall, and inspired me to go with him upon the latest and wild-est of his expeditions. He proposed to himself no less a thing than the discovery of the actual origin, whereabouts, and headquarters of the source of all our joys and sorrows—The Club of Quiver Traders. I should expand this story forever if I explained how ultimately we ran this strange entity to its lair. The process meant a hundred interesting things—the tracking of a member, the breaking of a rumour, the getting of roughs, the lifting of a peevish anger, the finding of a cellar, the finding of a cellar below the cellar, the finding of a subterranean passage, the finding of the Club of Quiver Traders. I have had many strange experiences in my life, but never a stranger one than that I felt when I came out of those rambling, sightless, and seemingly hopeless passages into the sudden splendor of a sumptuous and hospitable dining room, surrounded upon almost every side by faces that I knew.

As we entered, all the members seemed to sink suddenly into their chairs, and, with the very action, the vacancy of the presidential seat gaped at us like a missing tooth.

"The president's not here," said Mr. P. G. Northover, turning suddenly to Professor Chubb.

"No," said that philosopher with more than his ordinary sagacity. "I can't imagine where he is."

Report and I were hardly left before the beginnings of a sort of wonder as to whom this person might be who was the first member of this league brotherhood. Who, we thought distinctly, could be modest in this world of modernity; what fantastic was it those shadowy figures of all these fantastic with so local an expectation?

Suddenly we were answered. The door flew open and the room was filled and shaken with a shout, in the midst of which Basil Greyer, smiling and in evening dress, took his seat at the head of the table.

How we ate that dinner I have no idea. In the common way I am a person particularly prone to enjoy the long luncheon of the club dinner. But on this occasion it seemed a hopeless and endless string of courses. Hot draughts, sardines, seemed as big as herrings. Soup seemed a sort of death. Ladies were ducks; ducks were ostriches, until that dinner was over. The cheese course was unending. And all the time Basil Greyer went on laughing and eating and drinking, and never threw one glance at us to tell us why he was there, the king of those expectant idiots.

At last came the moment which I knew must in some way enlighten us—the time of the club speeches and the club toasts. Basil Greyer rose to his feet and a surge of song and cheers.

"Gentlemen," he said: "it is the custom in this society that the president for the evening preside, and by my general bad of sentiment, but by calling upon each member to give a brief account of his trade. We then drink to that calling and to all who follow it. It is my business, as the senior member, to open by stating my claim to membership of this club. Years ago, gentlemen, I was a judge; I did my best in that capacity to do justice and to administer the law. But it gradually dawned on me that in my work as it was I was not touching even the fringe of justice. I was seated on the out of the majesty. I was ruled in red scarlet and ermine, nevertheless, I held a small and lonely and futile post. I had to go by a man only as much as a postman, and my red and gold was worth no more than his. Daily there passed before me test and passion, and problems, the stringency of which I had to pretend to solve by silly improvements or silly denials, while I knew all the time, by the light of my living common sense, that they would have been better relieved by a kiss, or a thrashing, or a few words of explanation, or a duel, or a tour in the West Highlands. Then, as this grew on me, I had increasingly the sense of a monstrous frivolity. Every word said in the court, a whisper or an oath, seemed more connected with life than the words I had to say. Then came the time when I publicly displayed the white wash, was chosen as a madman, and retired from public life."

Something in the atmosphere told me that it was not only Report and I who were listening with intensity to this statement.

"Well, I discovered that I could be of real use. I offered myself privately as a purely mortal judge to settle purely mortal differences. Before very long these unofficial courts of honor (kept strictly secret) had spread over the whole of society. People were here to defend me, not for the practical trials for which society cares, such as committing a murder or keeping a dog without a license. My criminals were tried for the faults which really make social life impossible. They were tried before me for self-interest, or for an impossible vanity, or for scandal-mongering, or for slowness to guests or dependents. Of course these courts had no sort of coercive powers. The fulfillment of their punishments rested entirely on the honor of the ladies and gentlemen involved, including the honor of the culprits. But you would be amazed to know how completely our orders were always obeyed. Only lately I had a most pleasing example. A maiden lady in South Kensington, whom I had condemned to solitary confinement for breaking off an engagement, dropped back into, absolutely refused to leave her prison, although some well-meaning persons had been importuning enough to rescue her."

Report Greyer was staring at his brother. His mouth flew open. So, for the matter of that, I expect, was I. This, then, was the explanation of the old lady's strange discontent, and her still stranger content with her lot. She was one of the culprits of his voluntary criminal court. She was one of the clients of his queer trade.

We were still dazed when we drank, amid a crash of glasses, the health of Basil's new judiciary. We had only a confused sense of everything having been put right, the sense men will have when they come into the presence of God.

"Mr. P. G. Northover will now explain the Adventure and Romance Agrees."

And we heard, equally dazed, Northover beginning the statement he had made long ago as Major Brown. Thus our epic ended where it had begun, like a true cycle.

"In a Hard Row for Stumps"

By Joaquin Miller

Y'oll ask for mud-suck, martial deeds—
Go back to Ohio's natal urn—
Go back to Kentucky's fields of corn
Just weeds and stumps and stumps and weeds!
Just red men blazing from stump and tree
Where buck-skid prophets' words stride and stress
Came crying, came dying in the wilderness,
That bark, first, cruel half-century!

What posies they sang! what prayers they said,
Cabin or camp, as the wheels rolled west;
Silently leaving their heaved, last—
Paving a Nation's path with their dead!
What unmaned battles! what thumps and lumps!
What satire clothes with the loud, bright hue!
What words in phantoms! what stumps in row!
What rank vines interwoven in rows of stumps!

Just stumps and nettles and weed-shaded corn
Tiptoeing to wave but one blade in air!
Dark noisened here, and rank, hardback, there
Boasting and storming that blade broke!
Such weed-kind legends, slow sapping the heaven—
The homestead heart and the asking head!
The hoe and the hoe, 'till the man lay dead
And the great weed wheels rolled over his grave,

And the saying grew, as sayings will grow
From hard endeavor and lungs and lumps;
"He got in a mighty hard row for stumps;
But he tried, and died trying to hoe his row."

O brighter and better that iron pound hoe,
Than brightest, broad-saw of Waterloo!
Nor ever fell sadder more truly true
Than he who died trying to hoe his row.

The weeds are gone and the stumps are gone—
The huge hop-land and the copperhead land
And a million heart-ache, black triumph instead
From stumps, clean torn in the diamond-sown dunes.
But the heroes have vanished, save here and there,
For out and aside like some storm-driven tree,
Leaves a last survivor of Thermopylae,
Leafless and desolate, lone and bare.

His hands are weary, pat by the hoe!
His ear is dull and his eyes are dim.
Give honor to him and give place for him,
For he bled and he bled us, how long ago!
And ye who inherit the fields he won,
Worn graves where the Wabash slips away,
Go fashion green parks where your hoes may play
Unhindered of stumps or of weeds in the sun.

I have seen some weeds, sowing a heavy, head-
Such weeds! such a mighty hard row for stumps!
Such up-hill struggles, such down-hill slumps
As you, please that, may never come know!
But the sea lies yonder, just a league below.
All down-hill now, and I go my way—
Not far to go, and not much to say.
Says that I tried, tried to hoe his row.

Books and Bookmen

By James MacArthur

THE pleasures of an old reviewer are mainly reminiscent, and the pleasures that he recalls with fondest remembrance are oftentimes associated with the books that came earliest under his eye. The first book that fell to my lot to be reviewed led to an intimacy which was marked in after years by the dedication of another book from the same author "in memory of a golden friendship." Those early reviewing days added another interest to my bookshelves, and brought me into instant and helpful relationship with one of our finest minds. The only other book of that early period of reviewing that has found a lasting place in my affection, and has followed me up and down the country through the years is an edition of James Whitcomb Riley's poems in the volume called Afterchiles, which was issued in 1890, but it was only the other day that I met the gentle humorist and poet for the first time. If you conceive a passion for an author in the first book of his that you read, the chances are that that book will always remain the favorite. Since Afterchiles came into my hands, I think I have read everything Dr. Riley has printed, but with the exception of the story called "Where is Mary Alice Smith and the lines 'The EM Child' which prefix it, nothing that he has written is so dearly cherished as the poems in that worn and thumb-matched little volume. Coming from the land of Burns, there was something of the deep and elemental, the "joy in wisest comestly speed," the rare sincerity of feeling, the simplicity and stark honesty of the Scots peasant-poet about the Illinois singer that appealed to the stranger within the gates and made him feel less of an alien. One could not be ashamed to say that there are lines in Afterchiles that cannot be read without a sense of tears—without that thrill of emotion which comes of the glad recall of the heart's empire in former days. You remember "The Waltons' Prayer"? It begins:

I cross, dear Lord,
No kneeling board
Of gold and gray.
Nor jewels line.
Nor tresses hang of blue.
Nor treasure heap of anything.—
Let but a little hat be near Where at the heart's ease I may
The cricket sing.
And have the child
Of one glad woman's eyes to make.
For my love sake,
Your simple house a place
driest
Just like you cut the cricket's chirp—
Love, and the smiling face of her.
And "The Harper," with the poet's vision transforming the devotion of the parrot:

And there was the little window
Thick, and drip, and drip—
The rain above, and a mother's love,
And love's companionship:

And the lines in which love clings to the hope of immortality, begins:

I cannot say, and I will not say
That he is dead—He is just away:

Among the dishevelled poems in this little volume there are two which represent Dr. Riley at his best—the one in strained pathos, the other in that luminous vein which is native and original with him. For sheer pathos, restrained and poignant, it would be difficult to find anything that would surpass "Nothin' to say," in which an old man is brought suddenly face to face in a helpless, desolate, awkward way with the fact that his daughter is about to marry:

I wish your mother was [here]—but I hain't got nothin' to say!
Twenty year! and as good a girl as parent ever found!

There's a straw hatched onto yer dress there—'Til hosh I off—'tans
(Her mother was [at twenty when as two can as say])
Nothin' to say, my daughter? Nothin' at all to say!

The humorous poem is "Jim"—familiar to many readers, I dare say, who never heard of the author—with Wigner's famous remark:

It says, "When God made Jim, I bet you He didn't do anything else that day
but just around and feel good!"

There was one poem in Afterchiles which always colored my anticipations of a meeting with the poet; it is called "Knee-Deep in June":

Tell you what I like the best—
Long about knee-deep in June,
'Taint the time strawberries sell.

On the vine—some afternoon
Like to get 'em and eat,
And not work at nothin' else!

June wants me, and I'm to stand there shudders anywhere,
I'll get down and suffer there,
And oblige to you at that!

Now, when a poet tells you plainly what he is in his best mood, and is "he spere," it would be a clear case of neglecting Providence not to take advantage of it. It was just such a dusty June afternoon when we drove out to the Country Club in the environs of Indianapolis.

Jim's made dry overnight,
And the whole air's underneath—and sprawled out 'neath the grass. June never proved so infectious with business before, as I lay along side my companion in the clover bloom, and listened to his gentle persuasive talk as humors showed up with his sentiment caught up with his mood, and blended in a harmony that gave to earth and sky, and flowers and birds, and all created a new meaning; his low pipes, like those of Pan to quote from his own sonnet, catching hints of a joy unfathomable, dragging memory as if with the dawning sun of bees and the taste of wild honey. But the most wonderful thing about the poet is the light that shines in his eyes and brings all over his face when he smiles. Without that smile all his pictures were but a veiled countenance. It is the key to the nature of the man; his cheerful optimism, his love of mankind, of mother earth, of his firm conviction that "what began best, can't end worst, nor what first blissed most, prove sweetest."
The way a face becomes transfigured, and, in a flash, reveals sometimes what else had remained hidden and unguessed, is matter of common observation, but I have never seen so wonderful an exemplification of Browning's "flashing line,
"How soon a smile of God can change the world!" as in the smile of the poet who has spread sunshine in so many hearts and set them singing to a note of gladness:

There is ever a song somewhere, my dear,
For the child alone to duck or to
There is ever a song that our hearts may hear—
There is ever a song somewhere, my dear—
There be ever a song somewhere!

"The distinguishing quality of Indianapolis is its simple dominicity," says Mr. Meredith Nicholson in an excellent article on "Indianapolis: a City of Homes" in the June Atlantic, and the homely fact is strong in the poet. He has wandered a bit in the past, but he clings all the more now to the old scenes, where the roots of his affections are laid deep and enduring. With Stevenson, he finds that, after all, the most beautiful adventures are not those we go to seek.

The latest photograph of James H. Whitcomb Riley

WHY THE ENGLISH NEED SKY-SCRAPERS—SKETCH MADE IN NEW YORK BY TOM BROWNE, THE ENGLISH CARTOONIST

Cockney, "Think the Lord there is one thing we've not got in England."

New-Yorker, "Say, what's that?"

Cockney, "My scrapers."

New-Yorker, "Well, you want 'em; your skies are so bad they need scraping."

Correspondence

Opinions of Dr. Abbott's Advice to "A Troubled Wife"

FAIR CHAIRS, WIS., June 11, 1891.

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

SIR,—It is difficult for a sober-minded outsider to find any element of tragedy in the letter which an unhappy woman has written to Dr. Abbott or to discover anything but kindness and wisdom in his reply. There are three reasonable beings: a husband who, although he confesses to another love, yet realizes where his duty lies and acquiesces like a gentleman; a wife who respects her husband's honor, and the "other woman," who resigns herself heavily, let us suppose, to the inevitable. This is no cloying or mawkish situation; no material here for the sensational divorce court or for the still more sensational divorce trial. The wife, in a moment of despair, craved to know she has not all of her husband's love, writes for advice to Dr. Abbott. Her, a fourth reasonable being, old in knowledge of human nature, reminds her that she has a duty as well as her husband: to be a cheerful companion to him as he is endeavoring to be to her. This is easy enough. Indeed, one might go further and say to her: "Come, we are none of us children to cry for what we cannot have. We know how strange and envious are the ways of love in this world. But if I may wake any morning in your husband's predicament, you will realize that we are human beings, all of us, and let us thank God we are, for they are miserable creatures who are not. This is only a tragedy as we make it so. It is nothing so horrible and overwhelming that we, like Edipus, should put out our eyes. Rather should we have completely reason our domination; how it can use us as we have thought and restore our happiness;—that divine reason which can be greater than hate."

I am, sir,

GEORGE H. HOLLOWAY.

OSHAHA, NEB., June 11, 1891.

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

SIR,—Is not Dr. Abbott (in your number of June 11) writing with the object of reassuring a woman in trouble and closing a breach, and sacrificing a sincere expression of his convictions for the sake of that object? If so, I am writing to you, not in relation between man and wife, in the abstract. I hardly think he would uphold the opinions expressed in his letter. If, for example, it were suggested that he, in the last degree, excused a man for a deliberate act of violence to his wife, even though the wife continued to be "first and supreme in his regard," I think Dr. Abbott would be rightfully indignant.

That a frank, sincere friendship should exist between a husband and a woman, not in the way of trust and power, but that a man should allow such a friendship to even approach him, such a love as should exist between man and wife, must surely offend the principles of any right-thinking person.

I am, sir,

RATCHELSON.

BUTLAND, MASS., June 11, 1891.

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

SIR,—To me, three things stand out plainly in the Rev. Lyman Abbott's counsel to the woman. First,—it is a marvelous thought,—that the Rev. Lyman Abbott has preached for many years the gospel of the Nazarene, has gone down among the people, presumably, has seen them in the shadows, has ministered unto them, and yet arrives in his laison severally a heart-scientist. Second,—it is equally marvelous,—the Rev. Lyman Abbott can live to a full of true and great and good human heart and counsel it and always it is a hundred times, and yet give to it not one word of compassion, nor of tenderness, nor one word of pity, not one tear. And third,—most marvelous and most glaring of all,—is the comparison that arises inevitably in the mind of the reader between these words and the words Christ would have spoken in their stead,—the Christ to whom was brought that woman taken in adultery, and in whose footsteps the Rev. Lyman Abbott walks.

I am, sir,

MARY MACLEAN.

CONCORD, N. H., June 12, 1891.

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

SIR,—When I read Dr. Lyman Abbott's answer to the unhappy wife, I said, "Well, that is a man's idea of it. The wife is sure to read of heartily sympathy than of advice, while the husband and the interfering woman need advice."

Again and again has it been demonstrated that platonic friendship is dangerous. I think the truth of the matter was well expressed by a husband who was discussing the subject with his wife, when he said, "It is not that I am afraid you do or will think more of this man than you do of me, but I hate to have him thinking that perhaps you do. There's the rub, even to him is sure of his partner's love, though that another and still others may think otherwise, stings and riddles."

If a man has been so stupid and blind as to choose a wife who does not sufficiently answer to the various requirements of his nature the least he should do is to make the best of it. Men should learn to beware of what I call the "bawling" woman—the respectable woman, past her first youth, who has never had her share of attention and appreciation, and who, appealing to sympathy or advice, or by cultivating his tastes and by the most subtle arts of flattery, almost imperceptibly draws a man into confidential relations, and sometimes makes him think she loves her. Even if the "bawling" woman does not go so far, the man's wife sees what is going on,—she knows her woman's friends see it, and she is miserable with a misery she is almost powerless to combat. There should be a special place of honor prepared for the woman who "bawls" about a married man.

And the poor man—he seldom sees through it. He can see nothing out of the way in the "bawling" behavior.

The poor wife in the case in question certainly should try to forget her sorrow, accept, and give love, and try to be kind instead of to see that this second love was all a mistake, that there is nothing stronger than his love for his wife, for I truly think the other woman just had him on, because she was miserable herself.

I am, sir,

J. H. H.

EDMONT, ALB., June 11, 1891.

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

SIR,—In the letter of a troubled wife to Dr. Abbott, quoted in HARPER'S WEEKLY, June 11, I fail to see any manifestation of a snubbed or jealous disposition. It seems to me to be the letter of a woman who is endeavoring to be fair and just under very trying circumstances, and I do not think Dr. Abbott's advice to her reasonable or sound.

Dr. Abbott asks her in his letter if the fact that her husband has ceased all social relations with the woman with whom he had fallen in love is not sufficient evidence that she—his wife—holds the supreme place in his affections.

I do not think that it is. The fact that he has ceased all social relations with the other woman proves nothing about the state of his affections. It might be considered as evidence that he regards his former action in relation to this woman to have been wrong, and that he is now trying to do right. Dr. Abbott advises the distressed wife to lay aside her tears, to banish her sorrow, and to try to appear cheerful, even if she does not feel so. This advice, I think, is what would mostly be termed "cold comfort."

If she had been able to do all this cheerfully she would have done so, and would not have been in need of Dr. Abbott's advice. He tells her to stop thinking about herself and think about her husband. Does he really imagine she has not been thinking about her husband? It would have been more sensible to advise her to think about something quite outside her family—the war or the St. Louis Exposition.

Dr. Abbott tells her if she thinks her husband has done wrong, to win him back to righteousness, to love him, and try to make him happy. By this course of denial and restraint for the man, and overlooking and forced cheerfulness for the woman, Dr. Abbott apparently hopes that everything may be brought back to the former state of happy married life. But I do not believe it could ever be so. "There would be doubt, hesitation, and pain."

If there is any solution of the problem it lies in the wife's hands; if she can so lift herself above all selfishness as to be her husband's friend, cherish the love he has for her, and yet recognize that other love which has come into his life, ask no denial of it, be willing to grant her husband and his other woman all the privileges of an open and avowed friendship, she may save three people much suffering, and growth and development will be possible for these three who would else have cramped and stunted lives. Would it not be well for people to realize that whether the marriage service may require man and woman to vow, Blake is right when he says

Love, free love, cannot be bound
To any tree that grows or ground

I am, sir,

A WESTERN WOMAN.

TORONTO JEWELERS, CAN., June 11, 1891.

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

SIR,—Dr. Abbott's logic is most certainly sound and unfeared. Nearly every man would object to his wife having a very close friendship with a male friend who was privileged to come as often as he pleased, no matter whether the husband was absent or present (one can readily understand that it was generally in his absence). Most certainly the man of the house would try to stop the affair. And how long would it take the world to misconstrue? The result, it is just as unreasonable. The assertion, "What there is wrong on both sides" does not condemn the root of the business. The sentiment expressed is wrong that would permit the growth of any feeling which would only too soon find itself unprincipled. The love of the man and wife is all right, even if it does not fill all the little cells which call for different stores. The emotion of the advice "to stop thinking about herself and think about him" is the sinistral.

I am, sir,

E. W. McCALLUM.

Correspondence.—(Continued)

AN EX-SENATOR ON DEMOCRACY

OCEANOGRAPHIC, O. T., June 25, 1904.

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

SIR,—Notwithstanding my positive aversion to my prominence in the politics of the present day, I am admonished by a sense of duty and by the importance of the subject involved to pen these few lines.

Having been a life-long Democrat, supporting the Democratic ticket from the nomination of Mr. Greeley in 1872 to 1900 for Mr. Bryan, no one can truthfully say that I am not a true and loyal Democrat. While this is so, I do sincerely say that I am pained and even mortified at the course of Mr. Bryan and a few of his present followers in attempting to divide, distract, and disintegrate the party by his unjust, unmanly, and uncharacteristic criticisms of Judge Parker and the New York platform.

Mr. Bryan is possessed of that supreme egotism that teaches him that, having once twice nominated and twice defeated, that he is the party's sole adviser and dictator both as to platform and the candidate. The gentleman should be taught that the great Democratic party in this hour of trial will not be led by him or any other one man, however so eminent and worthy, and especially by one who claims that he will not support the party unless he purchases the platform and candidate suits his taste.

My Democracy teaches me to abide by the result of the party in convention assembled, while sure may not do this, nevertheless that does not afford me an excuse to violate my party principles. Mr. Bryan charges Democrats with dishonesty. If he carries it and his threats will be not be guilty of the crime he charges others guilty of. He complains of Judge Parker not talking enough. That, in my opinion, exhibits the very genius of common sense in Mr. Parker. The crowd clearly understands his position on all public questions. He has been tried on many occasions and never found wanting, being on the bench for several years. It would have been unwise and highly improper for him to have made himself conspicuous and active in political meetings. I voice the sentiment of thousands when I say that his silent course was commendable.

The necessity of the occasion imperatively demands the cooperation of all Democrats at the St. Louis convention without stopping to inquire whether he is from the East, West, North, or South, or how he stands on one question or another; but will be for the nominee, whoever he may be, should be the sole test.

I write this not for controversy or ill feeling toward anyone, and not for office or political promotion, as I have had all the official and political honors I desire, but solely in the interest of peace and success of the Democratic party.

I am, sir,

J. P. ALLEN.

THE FRAY OF IT

PHILADELPHIA, June 22, 1904.

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

SIR,—I read in this morning's paper (the Public Ledger) the report of a speech made in Chicago last evening by Secretary Shaw, in which he makes the following statement:

"It is a well-known fact that sugar, which sells in the United States at 10 cents per pound retail, is worth in the country of production 7½ cents per pound wholesale. The very men who grow the beets from which sugar is made pay 10 cents per pound retail for the same sugar which we get at 5 cents per pound, and the foreign beet grower is stiff-necked enough to approve the policy. He is willing to pay a higher price for the small amount of sugar which he consumes, on condition that the producer of his field shall supply the American table. For our part I am willing to pay any reasonable price for the small amount of beets which I consume, provided the cost goes out from my field, and the beets products from my field and the meat from my stall shall feed the men who mine the coal and iron and the artisans who produce the wire to fence the farms of South America."

It seems to me that Secretary Shaw uses it in the people of the United States to furnish a detailed account showing definitely how the people of Europe are benefited by the above species of statesmanship. Our duty on pure sugar, or on sugar treating after No. 10 Dutch standard of color, is 100-100 cents per pound. In practice, the sugar is imported into the United States in a raw, or impure, state, and the duty is graded according to the amount of sucrose in each sample, ranging from 35-100 of a cent per pound, on a low grade of raw sugar, to 100-100 cents per pound on pure sugar. As the retail price of refined sugar in this country is about 5 cents per pound, and as the duties on the profits of the various jobbers and dealers, and the cost of transportation must be deducted from this retail price, it is obvious that the European manufacturer cannot receive much. If any, more than 3 cents per pound for the sugar which he sends to this country. Now, if the European manufacturer can produce sugar so cheaply that they derive an adequate profit from that which they furnish the American people at 3 cents per pound, what kind of statesmanship is it that compels the people of Europe to pay 7½ cents per pound wholesale, and 10 cents retail, for the same kind of sugar, as Secretary Shaw says they do? If, on the other hand, the European manufacturer sells the sugar to the American people at 10 cents, which is made up to him by an export bounty derived from the taxation of the people of Europe, what kind of statesmanship is it that compels the people of Europe to furnish sugar to the people of the United States at less than the cost of producing it in Europe? Does it promote the prosperity of the people of Europe to be taxed for the purpose of furnishing sugar to the people of the United States at less than cost? How is it that this kind of statesmanship, which experts suggest at 3 cents per pound, and compels home consumers to pay 10 cents per pound, happens to prevail in the same part of the earth which produces the "pauper labor of Europe," which we hear so much about? If the policy is not the cause of the "pauper labor of Europe," it certainly has not prevented it.

When a commodity can be sold in a foreign market at a price which affords the producer an adequate profit there is no need of either a bounty or a protective tariff. But when commodities are exported at less than cost, the wealth and prosperity of the nation which exports them is seriously diminished. The only purpose of a protective tariff which is even plausible is to compel home consumers to pay more for a commodity than the price for which it can be imported. This is really the taxation of the people—the consumers—in order to maintain industry which is inherently less profitable than other available industries. The only purpose of an export bounty is to enable the producer to supply goods to foreigners at less than cost, and to obtain his profit by the taxation of his own fellow citizens.

Now Secretary Shaw really believe that the people of the United States would be benefited by taxing themselves for the purpose of giving a bounty to export beets in order to furnish it to the people of South America at less than the cost of producing it in this country? If this kind of statesmanship is beneficial why have our American statesmen neglected to promote the prosperity of the American people by giving such a bounty to exported sugar as would enable our own beet sugar producers to sell sugar to the rest of the world without money and without price? This would only be following the theory to its logical conclusion. If a nation is benefited by making goods to be exported at less than cost, why would it not be benefited still more by making goods to be exported at a gift? Let Secretary Shaw do a little double ciphering in accordance with the rules laid down in the old arithmetic which he discarded when he graduated at the crossroads schoolhouse, and, perhaps, he will then be able to give us some reliable information in regard to protective tariffs and bounties and subsidies. That old arithmetic doctrine, that the value of information is increased by subtraction. The true character, and the actual results, of the above-mentioned measures of governmental discrimination and favoritism have been obscured by random speculations, and by the exploitation of ill-informed consumers, about long enough.

I am, sir,

JOAC W. GIBSON.

A JAPANESE CRITICISM

LOS ANGELES, June 25, 1904.

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

SIR,—I have read "Trials of the War Correspondent" with great interest, and wonder why Mr. Dickinson did not use more severe words to criticize Japanese selfishness. I am a Japanese newspaper man, and my patriotism and national pride are not stirring up my fellow countrymen at the front. But I have no words for Japanese official world, civil or military. They have too many regulations, too much fussiness, too much officiousness. They make rules for everything and want to execute them to the letter. They are said to be to their lives for orderliness and exactness. But where economy of labor, time, and necessary tension is essential, exactness and completeness must give the first place to simplicity and efficiency. However adrover and terrible the Japanese may be, the pity is that they do not know how to go to the point directly, in business, without much ado. And I heartily wish that your correspondents, as well as those of other papers, would mercilessly attack Japanese "love for minutiae or exactness," and let the others see their own folly exposed before your people.

I am, sir,

D. T. SUTHER.

ROOSEVELT IN THE WEST

LOS ANGELES, June 24, 1904.

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

SIR,—I enclose a review in popular words, 16 to 1 silver and Democracy.

	1900.	1904.	1900.	1904.
California	146,808	144,768	164,755	124,723
Colorado	28,271	161,269	99,818	121,437
Idaho	6,224	73,192	29,967	29,414
Montana	16,491	42,527	23,773	37,146
Nevada	1,038	8,377	3,849	6,345
Oregon	48,779	46,662	46,528	55,765
Utah	12,491	64,597	47,128	43,865
Washington	30,123	91,446	51,486	44,823
Wyoming	10,622	10,833	14,482	10,164
Total	303,210	533,611	479,679	634,012
Bryan's plurality, 239,401.			McKinley's plurality, 23,666.

In view of the State elections since 1900 and the transcendent popularity of President Roosevelt, I predict his plurality in the States next November at over 130,000, and that he will carry every State save named except Nevada—and possibly Montana.

I am, sir,

P. P. STOUT.

Was She Complimented?

A CERTAIN literary woman, feeling herself under an obligation to a very eminent author and wishing to show her appreciation, bought a box of candy, meaning to present it to the novelist at the earliest opportunity. On the same shopping excursion she bought herself a box of tooth-powder, the two purchases making packages of similar size and appearance. Then she sought out her benefactor.

"Have you a sweet tooth?" she inquired, and presented one of the neatly wrapped packages. The offering was accepted gratefully, and the donor departed, much gratified at the accomplishment of her act of recognition. When she got home she unwrapped her remaining package to try the new tooth-powder. Removing the last piece of wrapping paper she read on the box cover, "Chamblair Bonbons—Extra Quality."

An Interrupted Lesson

THIS story is told of a Washington school principal who was trying to make clear to his class the fundamental doctrine of the Declaration of Independence:

"Now, boys," he said, "I will give you each three ordinary buttons. Here they are. You must think of the first one as representing Life, of the second one as representing Liberty, and the third one as representing the Pursuit of Happiness. Next kindly I will ask you each to produce the three buttons and tell me what they represent."

The following Monday, in accordance with his plan, the teacher interrogated his class on the subject of the buttons.

"Now, Johnnie," he said to the youngest member, "produce your three buttons and tell me what they stand for." Whereupon the youngster began to weep.

"I can't get 'em all," he sobbed, holding out two of the buttons. "Here's Life and here's Liberty, but mamma sewed the Pursuit of Happiness on my pants."

He was Reminded

A WASHINGTON politician tells this story of a friend who is famous for the "whoppers" he is in the habit of telling. This man's incident, it appears, finally demonstrated to the raconteur, and warned him that the next time he overheard him enlarging on facts he would remind him of it in an unambiguous way. His opportunity came at a dinner at which they were both present. The story teller, who sat beside his brother at the table, was describing a remarkable stork which a friend of his had just built.

"Why," he was saying, "it's simply huge—at least a thousand feet long, a hundred feet high—ouch!" (reaching down and rubbing his shin)—"and three feet wide."

Enterprise

A WELL KNOWN novelist told the following story the other evening at an author's dinner:

An Irishman who had been out of a job many weeks found in the river that flowed through his town the body of the keeper of the railroad drawbridge. He immediately looked himself to the superintendent of the division and applied for the vacant job, saying that he had seen the body of the former keeper in the river.

"Borry," said the superintendent, briefly: "the place has been filled. We gave it to the man who saw him fall in."

His Own Invention

A man agent recently obtained admission to the office of Thomas Edison, and assailed him with such an accumulation of arguments in favor of the publication which she represented that the famous inventor hurriedly subsided. After a gradual restoration of his energies, Mr. Edison asked:

"How did you ever succeed in mastering such a long and crackling speech as that?"

"Oh, our speeches are taught us at the home office," responded the lady, sweetly, "by means of the phonograph."

Immediate Deliveries

Pope Tribune

Pope Hartford

A light,
stylish, speedy

Gasoline
Runabout

Engine in front
Bevel gear drive
Wheel steerer
Simple construction
Easy to operate

A type of car
that appeals to those desiring a reliable gasoline
runabout

6 Horse Power,
$650.

A modern

Gasoline
Touring Car

A powerful hill
climber
Each part as true
to measurement as a chronometer

Backed by the Pope reputation for quality

Model B—like
illustration—

10 Horse Power,
$1,200.

Without tonneau,
$1,050.

POPE MANUFACTURING CO., Hartford, Conn.

BRANCHES

New York—10 Warren St.
Baltimore—100 Calverton Rd.
Chicago—Chicago Motor Co.

Washington, D.C.—1015 14th St., N.W.
Portland, Me.—1015 14th St., N.W.

Pittsburgh, Pa.—1015 14th St., N.W.
San Francisco, Cal.—1015 14th St., N.W.

Representative Dealership: Universal Distributors, New York, N.Y.

Rulers of Kings

By GERTRUDE ATHERTON

Author of "The Conqueror" and "The Admiralty"

It acts upon the reader like a series of detonations. The very first paragraph is enough to set your blood tingling.—New York Herald.

It possesses a supreme interest over the fiction of the hour because it has crystallized the momentous questions that are stirring men's minds. Nothing so highly romantic has appeared since "The Prisoner of Zenda."—Book News.

This colossal world drama grips the interest and is as tremendously absorbing as is all of Mrs. Atherton's work.—Boston Herald.

HARPER & BROTHERS, FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK

I.W. HARPER
R.Y.E
ON EVERY TORQUE

Everybody who knows, knows that good whiskey is the best stimulant. Everybody who knows I. W. Harper, knows the best whiskey for beverage, stimulant or other medicinal use. Sold by leading dealers everywhere.

BERNHEIM DISTILLING CO., Louisville, Ky.

(Continued from page 1164.)

"I told him that I would not call him in the morning until he rang, as he wanted a good rest."

"What did he say?" asked Warriden.

"Nothing, sir. As often as not he does not answer when he is spoken to."

A sudden fear seized upon Warriden. He ran out of the room and up the stairs to Chase's sitting-room. He knocked on the door; there was no answer. He turned the handle and entered. Chase had not gone to bed last night. He was still sitting in his armchair before the grate. One arm was extended along the arm of the chair, with the palm turned upwards, and in the palm lay an apple. Chase was sitting huddled up, with his head fallen forward upon his breast like a man asleep. Warriden crossed the room and touched the hand which held the apple. It was quite cold. The apple rolled on to the floor. Warriden turned to the housekeeper. She was standing in the doorway, and staring over her shoulder were the two undergraduates.

"He was an hour dead," said Warriden, "when you looked into the room an hour afterwards."

The three people in the doorway stood stupidly agast. Warriden pushed them out, locked the door on the outside, and removed the key.

"Mr. Pinckley, will you run for a doctor?" he asked.

Pinckley nodded his head and went off upon his errand.

Warriden and Stiles descended the stairs into the dining-room. Mrs. Withers, for her part, walked out of the house as quickly as she could. She hardly knew what she was doing. She had served as housekeeper to Mr. Chase ever since he had come to Newport, and she was stunned by the sudden calamity. She was aware of a need to speak, to find the neighbors and speak.

"I think you had better take the news at once to the mission," said Warriden; and Stiles in his turn went off without a word.

Warriden was thus left alone in the house. It had come about without any preparation of time upon his part. He was the oldest man of the three who had been present, and the only one who had kept his wits clear. Both Pinckley and Stiles had looked to him to decide what must be done. They regarded him as Chase's friend, whereas they were mere acquaintances. It did not even occur to Warriden at first that he was alone in the house, that he held in his hand the key to Chase's room. He was thinking of the strange perplexing life which had now so strangely ended. He thought of his first meeting with Chase in the mission, and of the disaster which he had felt; he remembered the array of liquor bottles on the table and the half hours during which Chase had talked, and of morbid pleasures—that had been Warriden's impression. Yet there were the years of work here, amongst these squalid streets. Every August had seen him clanking to-day, dying at his work. As Warriden looked out of the window he saw a group of men and women and children gather outside the house. There was not a face but wore a look of consternation. If they spoke, they spoke in whispers like people overheard. A very strange life! Warriden knew many—a man who does not—who saw the high road distinctly above their heads, and could not for the life of them but walk upon the low one. But to use both deliberately, as it seemed Chase had done. To drop from the high road into the low, and then painfully to scramble up again and again willingly to drop, as though the air of those steeper heights were too rigorous for continuous walking; to live the double life because he could not entirely live the one and would not entirely live the other. Thus Warriden solved the problem of the dilettante curate and his devotion to his work, and his solution was correct.

But he held the key of Chase's room in his hand; and there was no one but himself in the house. His thoughts came back to Pamela and the object of his journey up to town. He was sorely tempted to use the key, since now the means by which he had hoped to discover in what quarter of the world Stretton wandered and was killed were tragically closed to him. Chase could no longer speak even if he would. Very likely there were letters upstairs. There might be one from Tony Stretton. Warriden was sorely tempted. If only he could be sure that Chase would a second time have revealed what he was hidden to keep hid, why then—must it not be just the same thing as if Chase was actually speaking with his lip? Warriden played with the key. He went to the door and listened. There was not a sound in the house except the ticking of a clock. The front door still stood open. Outside in the road a little knot of people had gathered. He must be quick if he meant to act. Warriden turned to the stairs. The thought of the dead man huddled in the chair, a silent guardian of the secret, weighted his steps. Slowly he mounted. Such serious issues hang upon his gaining this one piece of knowledge. The fortunes of four people—Pamela and himself, Tony Stretton and his wife—might all be straightened out if he only did this one thing—which he had no right to do. He heard voices in the hall while he was still upon the stairs. He turned back with a feeling of relief.

At the foot of the stairs stood Mr. Pinckley and the doctor. Warriden handed the key of the room to the latter, and the three men went up. The doctor opened the door and crossed to the armchair. Then he looked about the room.

"Nothing has been touched of course?"

"Nothing," replied Warriden.

The doctor looked again at the dead man. Then he turned to Warriden, mistaking him, as the others had done, for some private or near friend.

"I can give no certificate," said he.

"There must be an inquest!"

"Yes."

Then the doctor moved suddenly to the table which stood a few feet from the armchair. There was a decanter upon it half-filled with the liquid his brown sherry, only a little darker. The doctor removed the stopper and raised the decanter to his nose.

"Ah!" said he, in a voice of comprehension. He turned again to Warriden.

"Did you know?" he asked.

"No."

The doctor held the decanter towards him.

Warriden took it, moistened the tip of a finger with the liquid and tasted it. It had a bitter and acrid flavor.

"What is it?" he asked.

"An overdose of it."

"In the glass, then, in which it was taken?"

A tumbler stood upon the table close to the decanter-stopper.

The doctor took it up.

"Yes, I noticed that," said Warriden. "I noticed that it is clean."

The doctor took the glass to the window, turned it upside down and held it to the light. It was quite dry, quite clean.

"Surely it's evident what happened," said Warriden. "Chase came into the room, opened that euphoric door in the corner there. His keys are still dangling in the lock. He took the decanter and the tumbler out, placed them on the table. He sat down in his chair with his apple in his hand, leaned back and quietly died."

"Yes, no doubt," said the doctor. "But I think here will be found the reason why he leaned back and quietly died," and he touched the decanter. "Opium poisoning. It may not have been an overdose, but a regular practice."

He went to the door and called for Mrs. Withers, as Mrs. Withers had now returned to the house. When she came upstairs into the room he pointed to the decanter.

"Did you ever see this before?"

"No, sir," she answered.

"Or that euphoric open?"

"No, it was always locked."

"Quite so," said the doctor. "You had better get some women to help you here," he went on, and with Warriden's assistance he lifted Chase from the chair and carried him into his bedroom.

"I must give notice to the police," he went on, and again he

Drawn by William Wood Lawrence

Chase was sitting huddled up, with his head fallen forward upon his breast like a man asleep.

"I noticed that," said Warriden. "I noticed that it is clean."

"You had better get some women to help you here," he went on, and with Warriden's assistance he lifted Chase from the chair and carried him into his bedroom.

"I must give notice to the police," he went on, and again he

THE DEMOCRATIC CONVENTION

St. Louis, July 9, 1904.

Four weeks ago we printed upon this page the following:

We now reckon it a virtual certainty that Judge Alton B. Parker will be the nominee of the Democratic party in opposition to Theodore Roosevelt. That he will have a long lead on the first ballot everybody concedes; that a great many delegates, not instructed, are privately but definitely pledged to his support as happen to know to be a fact. The astute managers of Judge Parker's candidacy predict his nomination on the second ballot. We venture the prophecy that there will be an acrid ballot, Massachusetts, Delaware, Wisconsin, all of the "favorite son" States—even, in our judgment, Maryland—will change to the New-York before the result is announced, and Parker will enter the lists with the prestige of a nomination as closely approaching Roosevelt's in stability of circumstances and free expression of opinion could make possible.

That is, of course, what happened.

It was too much to expect that the Democratic party, or any party for that matter, could purge itself of adopted heroes in the four years which correspond to a day in the life of an individual. But for the absurd two-thirds rule, a straightforward declaration in favor of the maintenance of the present monetary standard might have been obtained from this convention. A certain amount of compromise, however, was essential to the candidacy of Judge Parker, and Mr. Sheehan bowed to the inevitable. The result is satisfying in one sense, namely, that a sane, able, good, trustworthy man has been named for President. That in itself is an extraordinary achievement when one stops to consider the dominancy which had been exercised for eight years by the fascinating fanatic who during this time has held the fate of a great party in the hollow of his hand. When, some months ago, we printed a picture in this paper depicting Mr. Bryan as a dog in the manger we received so many protests that it seemed possible that injustice might have been done; but when in the protracted session of the committee on resolutions, Senator Daniel stood squarely on his feet and said to the man whom, with all his earnest eloquence, he has supported twice for President, "You have reviled every man whom any State has recommended and have presented no candidate of your own," and the assertion was accepted in grim silence by all present as the plain truth, there was left no cause for musing. The picture was exact, the man himself knew it. But votes were essential to make two-thirds. Having a clear majority from the outset, Mr. Sheehan implored the sound-money supporters of other candidates to cease obviously futile hectoring and make more feasible the construction and adoption of a candid, direct, and fitting platform. But the appeal was not heeded, and the inevitable compromise ensued.

The finality is an admirable candidate upon no platform at all. We do not mean to say that no great, sound and satisfactory assertions can be found in the official declaration of so-called principles. There are several well meant, however insincerely expressed. But the main heresy, the one vile, sinful, disgusting subject, is ignored utterly. What are we to assume that, saying nothing, the party virtually reaffirms the obvious doctrine that the vote of Hawaii forced upon the reluctant delegates in Kansas City, four years ago; that is Mr. Bryan's interpretation, naturally. Or that an explicit pledge may be expected from the candidate in his letter of acceptance. This doubtless is Mr. Sheehan's desperate hope of a solution. But, assuming its feasibility as judged from successful precedents, is Judge Parker sufficiently grounded in the confidence of the people to do it? And will he dare? We doubt it. Those Democrats who feel that the stability and progress of the country depend upon a rigid maintenance of the gold standard will have to rely solely upon the probity and conservatism of their candidate, or vote the ticket of the party which at least was not afraid to make a positive commitment. The Democrats, therefore, have failed miserably to reduce the issue to a choice between candidates—the only hope they had—and are doomed, rightfully in our judgment, to respectable defeat. It will not be a money campaign. There will be no panic or fear of panic, because there is no danger. Mr. Roosevelt, from the viewpoint of the vast financial interests, may not seem altogether safe, but he is getting safer all the time and incidentally is inevitable. Those who apprehend that Mr. Belmont is going to raise, or could by any possibility raise, a mighty campaign fund are deluded. He can do nothing of the kind, for many reasons, one of which is that those most largely and seriously concerned will behold no necessity for paying tribute to what they will regard as a losing cause, and another of which is that Mr. Belmont as a collector is neither practical nor popular. Mr. Bliss is an old hand at the game, and Mr. Cortelyou is still a welcome visitor in the curious Department of Commerce and Labor. They therefore should do fairly well, especially as they will start with the agile support of Mr. Snyder and the substantial aid of Mr. Schiff. But there will be no outpouring of money such as Mr. Hanna revealed in 1896, when even banks and trust companies openly charged up handsome contributions to expense account. With two such candidates as Roosevelt and Parker fear cannot be created, predilection of panic and destruction of values can produce no more than a shrug of the shoulders; therefore it will not be a money campaign. For this much Heaven and Roosevelt and August Belmont be praised. They talk of Roosevelt luck. Why not Parker luck? Was ever an aspiring man more fortunate? As Chief Judge of the Court of Appeals he was enabled to screen his opinions behind his votes. How could anybody criticize what nobody knew? Uncle David Hill solemnly, and quite likely truthfully, declared to the committee on resolutions that he had not the most remote idea of what "the Judge's" financial views might be. Neither had Mr. Sheehan any body. His principles he was imperious. And then the blossoming of the famous opposition of Taftism in Hall, with its untired leader, under the tutelage of saintly Crocker, the thoughtful Sulzer, and the impeccable Crane, supplemented by its ridiculous train-loads of silk hats and checkered trousers! What else could have distracted attention from the distracted, discredited, and disappointed David? If more were needed, how quick were the Cleveland conspirators to fill the vacuum with their mysterious rumbles of impending land-slides, thus reuniting the South in sheer fright and loyalty to Gorman, to the one man who could beat "the big fellow," as Mr. Sullivan affectionately derided him. How fortunate also in enlisting the really unselfish and wholly devoted services of three men of so widely varied and genuine abilities as Mr. Sheehan, Mr. Belmont, and the shy old master from Wolcott's, to say nothing of the worthy, cheerful, and convincing members of the "judicial trio" headed by Morgan J. O'Brien, and flanked by Delaney Nisell and William Travers Jerome, apostles of arbitration and subtle persuasion. It was a combination irresistible. But was it attributable to luck? We are not sure. He is a wise Judge.

Of the platform much might and little will be said by any supporter of "the Judge." We thought we had acquired a certain tolerance in the consideration of a mixture of notions and phraseology, but it is plain now that we had only scratched the surface of intemperance. Godhood knows the Republican platform was foolish enough in many spots and wrong in a few, but it was at least coherent. This is a more hodge-podge in perfect harmony with the management of the show. Apparently, as at the Coliseum, nobody required a card to inject himself into the platform; all one had to do was to walk in. Think, for example, of finding in the declaration of principles of a great party praising six millions of voters a grave injustice. What? We believe that one of the best methods of procuring economy and honesty in the public service is to leave public officials, from the occupant of the White House down to the lowest of them, returned as nearly as may be to Jeffersonian simplicity of living! A very ordinary imagination might run amuck in an attempt to decipher this utterance. It may be that President Roosevelt was caught in the act of wearing a dress-suit and merits a savage rebuke. But was there notably on the committee on resolutions who was not aware that Thomas Jefferson also was a gentleman and lived in a manner becoming one? And who of the office-holders in this great, free, and all-equal democracy are "the lowest"? But time is required to analyze the extraordinary document. For the moment in an atmosphere laden with coal dust the perusal merely serves to intensify the aching of the eyes.

Mr. W. J. Bryan, of Nebraska, comes out of the scrimmage with colors flying. Having nothing, he compromised. If Mr. Hill would admit to no repudiation of the Kansas City platform he would accept no reaffirmation. Also as high degree, and in addition he has a reasonable, if not an excessive, amount of patience." The elemental virtues no one denies to him. We do not recall so much stress having been put upon the physical qualifications of a satisfactory executive before, but whether or not they be as important relatively as Mr. Roosevelt believes, the Judge fills the bill. In the language of former Senator Edward Murphy, a shrewd estimator of true form, he is a good man. While Mr. Roosevelt has been wrestling with Japs the Judge has been pitching hay. He could not receive his call to duty after the traditional manner of Mr. Cincinnati and Uncle Isead Putnam because, as everybody knows, this is not the ploughing season. But to true and tried Democratic eyes he certainly does present a great appealing picture standing in the meadow patch, a single snapper securely upholding his blue overalls, and the perspiration rolling down his tanned cheeks as, ever and anon, with graceful ease he tosses haycock after haycock upon the waiting cart. No effete dumbbells for the Judge. The implements of the farm are his. He may not be as handy with his fists as his rival, but, catch as catch can, in our dispassionate and unprejudiced judgment, he would win out.

But let not Mr. Cortesou be deceived by the notion that the Judge is expert only with the shovel and the hoe. He is equally at home with the fiddle and the bow. A great surprise awaits those who have formed the opinion that Judge Parker is of a temperament so judicial that he lacks the more engaging qualities. Of all the men occupying or seeking high political positions whom we have known, we cannot recall one possessing a more attractive personality than Judge Parker. He is a real man, honest, intelligent, tolerant, and kindly, yet clear in his convictions and firm in fidelity to them. He, too, possesses the "elemental virtues" ascribed to Mr. Roosevelt along with many others of material service to the country in a President. Nobody need apprehend an absence of personal honor in the White House in the improbable contingency of his election. Nor will the Democrats of the West or South find any cause of disappointment when they come face to face with their leader. He can speak as well as he thinks. While less vivid in a personal way than his bewitching opponent, he will be found quite as satisfying in both word and deed.

The ways of politics, after all, are inscrutable. It was the oddity, dignified, well-mannered Chicago convention that should have nominated Judge Parker. The result would have harmonized perfectly with the proceedings. This, on the other hand, has been an ideal Roosevelt convention—vague, turbulent, twice as big, four times as enthusiastic, splendidly chaotic. It was precisely such a crowd as the President would have revelled in attacking and conquering. The tannerness of Chicago would have pulled upon him, but here, in the seductive language of a showman on the Pike, he would have found a collection of "Awfully Wild Animals" that would have delighted his heart.

G. H.

Cartoons of Prominent Men at the Convention

Governor Vandenberg
Ohio State Journal

Champ Clark
Philadelphia Press

Former-Controller Eobler
St. Louis Globe

Jim M. Gaffey
Philadelphia Press

David R. Hill
Philadelphia North American

Thomas F. Ryan

Alton Brooks Parker

CHIEF JUSTICE ALTON BROOKS PARKER, of the Court of Appeals of New York, was born in Cortland, New York, May 14, 1852. He was educated at the Cortland academy, the Cortland normal school, and the Albany law school, from which he was graduated in 1872. He held the office of Surrogate of Ulster County from 1877 to 1883. In 1884 he was a delegate from New York to the Democratic national convention. In 1885 he managed David B. Hill's successful campaign for Governor. Following this campaign he was appointed a justice of the Supreme Court by Governor Hill, and in 1886 was elected without opposition. Three years later he was appointed to the Second Division of the Court of Appeals, after which he became a member of the general term of the Supreme Court of New York. From 1896 to 1897 he was a member of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court, and in November, 1907, was elected Chief Justice of the Court of Appeals, the office which he holds at the present time.

Henry G. Davis

HENRY G. DAVIS, Democratic nominee for Vice-President, the son of Caleb and Louisa DAVIS, was born in Howard County, Maryland, November 16, 1825. He was educated at the county schools, and was subsequently superintendent of a plantation, sea-beeman, conductor, and agent on the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad at Piedmont, West Virginia. He afterwards became a merchant and prominent coal operator, was president of the West Virginia Central and Pittsburg Railroad, and of the Davis National Bank of Piedmont. He was a member of the House of Delegates, West Virginia, in 1863; was State Senator from 1867 to 1869; and United States Senator, 1871 to 1883. He has been a delegate to six national Democratic conventions, and was one of the American delegates to the Pan American Congress. He is a member of the United States Intercontinental Railroad Commission, and is a large stockholder in the Davis Coal and Coke Company. He is eighty-one years old.

Cartoons of Prominent Men at the Convention

National Chairman Jorg
Washington Post

Senator Rouse
Washington Post

William F. Sherman
New York Herald

Ex-Senator Turner
Philadelphia Press

Ex-Senator Allen
Philadelphia North American
Copyright, 1904, by the North American Co.

Guffy, Sherman, and Murphy
Philadelphia Press

Martin W. Littleton
Philadelphia Press

State Senator McCarren
Brooklyn Daily Eagle

Mayor Tom L. Johnson
Chicago Daily Tribune
Copyright, 1904, by the North American Co.

"Tom" Tappert
Chicago Examiner

Mayor Carter H. Harrison
Cleveland Leader

minent Men at the Convention

August Belmont
Cleveland Examiner

Norman K. Mark
Boston Daily Globe

Sec. Charles A. Walsh
Pittsburg Dispatch

"Joe" Bailey
Philadelphia Press

William J. Stone
Philadelphia North American
Chicago, Ill., by the North American Co.

John R. Williams
Cleveland Post

"Ham" Lewis
Indianapolis News

Chief Steward-at-Arms Martin
Cleveland Plain Dealer

Mayor Ross
Cleveland Leader

Jos. W. Folk
Ohio State Journal

W. J. Brown
Philadelphia North American

A View of Judge Parker's Home, "Rosemount"

Judge Parker's Granddaughter, Mary McAlister Hall

The Farm Buildings, Garden, and Poultry-Yard at "Rosemount"

SNAP-SHOTS TAKEN ON JUDGE PARKER'S ESTATE.
"ROSEMOUNT," AT ESOPUS-ON-THE-HUDSON

Photographs by Fiedfeld

HISTORY OF THE AMERICAN PEOPLE

In Five Volumes
 WILSON, Ph.D., Litt.D., LL.D.
President of Princeton University

A new, epoch-making work—the only complete narrative history of the great Republic in existence to-day

PRESIDENT WOODROW WILSON has devoted the best years of his life to the preparation of his great work, "A History of the American People," from the earliest times to the administration of President Roosevelt. The work is monumental in character and scope, represents the genius of the greatest historical writer of the present time, and is written in that delightfully flowing style which translates historical facts into the romance of a nation. Hundreds upon hundreds of new portraits, prints, maps (in colors), plans, and pictures make the pictorial features alone tell their wonderful story—the birth and growth of what is now the United States of America. There is a photogravure frontispiece to each volume, and portraits in India tint and black. Dr. Woodrow Wilson's is the first complete narrative history of the United States in existence.

In order to meet the urgent demand for this work, the publishers have now in readiness a

NEW SUBSCRIPTION EDITION With Photogravure Portraits of the Presidents

In addition to the illustrations noted above, the new edition contains full-page photogravure portraits of the Presidents of the United States—twenty-five in all—from

Washington to Roosevelt, a feature which materially enhances the richness of the work. The five volumes are issued in bindings of new design and beauty:

Green crepe buckram, with leather label, per set - $25.00
 Half-red American Library leather, " - 33.00

OUR OFFER

We will send you the entire set of five volumes, charges prepaid, on receipt of $1.00. If you do not like the books when they reach you, send them back at our expense, and we will return the $1.00. If you do like them, send us $2.00 every month until the full amount is paid. On receipt of this dollar, we will send you, without cost, beginning at once, a year's subscription to either Harper's Magazine, Harper's Weekly, Harper's Bazar, or The North American Review. In writing, state which binding and which periodical you want.

Address

HARPER & BROTHERS, FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK CITY

Schlitz

at St. Louis Exposition

When tired and exhausted from sight-seeing, you will find nothing more reviving and refreshing than "Schlitz."

When the nerves need food, beer is the usual prescription. So in insomnia; so in nervousness.

The doctor knows that malt and hops are nerve foods and tonics. He knows that pure beer is good for you.

That is why he says "Schlitz."

Schlitz Pale and Export Bottled Beers and Schlitz Famous Atlas Brand Draught Beer are on sale exclusively at—

Administration Restaurant, located between the Forestry, Fish and Game and Administration Buildings.

Fleischman's Vienna Restaurant, located in the Model City, north of east corner of Manufactures Building.

Schlitz Export Bottled Beer and Schlitz Wiener Draught Beer are on sale at—

The Firmin Michel "Hot Roast Beef Sandwich" Cafe, located in the Philippine Exhibition.

Government Restaurant and Cafe, conducted by Firmin Michel, located northeast of the Liberal Arts Building.

The Beer That Made Milwaukee Famous.

HARPER'S WEEKLY

Edited by George Harvey

HARPER & BROTHERS NEW YORK

July 23 1904

Price 10 Cents

In Search of the Unknown

By
ROBERT W. CHAMBERS
Author of "The Maid of Paradise," "Cardigan," etc.

THIS captivating story describes the strange adventures and novel love affairs of a young student of science who accompanies a learned professor on expeditions in search of the unknown in nature. The professor is on the track of some entirely new facts, with which he intends to astonish the world. In the meantime the student meets several girls, and half a dozen love affairs develop. A unique and highly entertaining story, in which Mr. Chambers has drawn his girls with his usual felicity, and their engaging charms are all the more piquant displayed in such fantastic surroundings.

Post 8vo, Cloth, $1.50

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK

They Know in Texas

If you have occasion to carry a revolver, you should remember that, like the Texan of fable, "when you need your gun you will need it bad," and you should also remember that gunsmiths are scarcest where revolvers are most needed.

Choose, therefore, a revolver that will not need a gunsmith; one that will not fail in the hour of need. Quality, strength, simplicity in action, must be your motto in selecting your fire arms. Human beings are fallible, and the personal equation enters into the use of the weapon, but, other things being equal, the best protection will be guaranteed you by the best weapon—

A COLT

Complete Catalogue on Request.

Colt's Patent Fire Arms Mfg. Co.,
HARTFORD, CONN., U. S. A.

London Office, 26 Glasshouse St., London, W., England.

The August Fiction Number of HARPER'S MAGAZINE

Mark Twain
Margaret Deland
Robert W. Chambers
Mary E. Wilkins
Elizabeth Stuart Phelps
Alice Brown
John Burroughs
Austin Dobson
Thomas A. Janvier
Sir Oliver Lodge
Mrs. Humphry Ward
W. D. Howells

9 Complete
Short Stories

24 Pages in Color
by
HOWARD PYLE,
W. T. SMEDLEY, CASTAIGNE,
ORSON LOWELL,
CHARLOTTE HARDING, ETC.

A De Luxe Volume of 175 Pages of Text and Pictures

HARPER'S WEEKLY

JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION

VOL. XLVIII.

New York, Saturday, July 23, 1904

No. 2415

Copyright, 1904, by HARPER & BROTHERS. All rights reserved

A NOBLE EFFORT

HARPER'S WEEKLY

Vol. XLVIII.

No. 2493

EDITED BY GEORGE HARVEY

THIRTY-SIX PAGES

NEW YORK CITY, JULY 23, 1904

Terms: 10 Cents a Copy—$4.00 a Year, in Advance

Postage free to all subscribers in the United States, Canada, Mexico, Hawaii, Porto Rico, the Philippine Islands, Guam, and Tutuila, Samoa.

Entered at the New York Post office as second class matter.

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS
NEW YORK CITY: FRANKLIN SQUARE
LONDON: 43 ALBEMARLE STREET, W.

COMMENT

WE supposed we had told the full story of the Democratic convention when, on the morning of July 9, we telegraphed the account which appeared in the preceding number of this journal. To the unamused, however, of the convention itself, the party, the country, and indeed the world, only the preliminaries had transpired. The real event, the most dramatic and thrilling in our political history, was yet to take place. The convention had met at two o'clock, to proceed in a discouraged and disheartened manner with the nomination of a candidate for Vice-President. The delegates had converged to New York the night of election. Presumably Judge Parker was to be consulted, but if his opinion was sought his response had been received. Mr. Sheehan, after having seen his candidate triumphantly nominated at six o'clock in the morning, and whose choice for second place the convention stood ready to confirm, had conferred with Mr. Belmont, Senator Murphy, and Mr. Hill without reaching a conclusion. At one o'clock he had called into consultation Mr. Thomas F. Ryan, of New York and Virginia, who, although at that moment disheartened by his failure to accomplish the nomination of his friend Senator Gorham and the insertion into the platform of a suitable money plank, was, nevertheless, destined to play the second most important part in this memorable convention. The merits and availabilities of the various men whose names had been mentioned were considered, but no agreement had been reached when at half past two o'clock they reached the Convention Hall. As they entered the building a messenger of the Western Union Telegraph Company handed to Mr. Sheehan a telegram. He had already received during the morning a score or more of messages, and listlessly opened the envelope. His attention was riveted instantly by the signature. By a glance the contents were graven upon his mind. An ejaculation brought Mr. Ryan's quick attention to his when face. Without a word they withdrew to a corner of the wide corridor, and, with slinking hand, Mr. Sheehan passed the telegram to his companion. It read as follows:

ROOSEVELT, N. Y., July 9, 1904.

I regard the gold standard as firmly and irrevocably established, and shall act accordingly if the action of the convention to-day shall be ratified by the people.

As the platform is silent on the subject, my views should be made known to the convention, and if it is proved to be unsatisfactory to the majority, I request you to decline the nomination for me at once, so that another may be nominated before adjournment.

ALTON R. PARKER.

Meanwhile their hurried withdrawal from the centre aisle had attracted attention. Before Mr. Ryan had reached the signature, Mr. Hill had joined them. Not a word was said until he also had read and reread the despatch. Then Mr. Hill turned to Mr. Sheehan, and demanded that the telegram be suppressed. Judge Parker must be saved from the effect of his own hasty act. Mr. Sheehan vehemently refused. Mr. Hill then insisted that it must be a fabrication—a hoax—designed to create confusion and bring ridicule upon both the party and the candidate. Mr. Ryan suggested that it would be easy to determine whether or not this was so. Until the telegram was found to be genuine or false, its contents should not be divulged.

With this understanding, Mr. Hill returned to the hall to give the word for an adjournment of the convention, and Mr. Sheehan and Mr. Ryan hurried to the office of the telegraph company. An hour was required to establish the authenticity of the telegram. Meanwhile, an-swing that this would be the result of their investigation, they had decided upon a course of action, namely, to call into counsel immediately the leaders of the various State delegations who had cooperated with Mr. Sheehan in effecting the nomination of Judge Parker. While messengers were scurrying about the city, Mr. Sheehan outlined the situation to Mr. John Sharp Williams, and Mr. Ryan explained it to his friend Senator Daniel. Surprise, amazement, and resentment were the first sensations of these two Southern men, but before the other leaders who had been summoned had gathered in Mr. Sheehan's room they had become convinced that there was but one course to pursue, namely, to accept the ultimatum.

Eventually, as everybody knows, their efforts were crowned with success, and despite the heroic efforts of Mr. Ryan, in the long evening session which ensued, the party recognized and approved the unequivocal position of their candidate by an overwhelming majority, and Mr. Ryan named the candidate for Vice-President. For the sake of historical accuracy these facts relating to the most complete and extraordinary reversal of the position of a great political party ever known are set down. Primarily the party and the country have to thank for the result the straightforward and unswerving fidelity of Mr. Sheehan, the quick appreciation of the opportunity by Mr. Ryan, who, in view of his previous support of Senator Gorham, was beyond the suspicion of playing a part, and the breadth and tolerance of mind demonstrated by Mr. Williams and Senator Daniel, and ultimately, after much raging and vain reasoning, by Senator Tillman.

The result and its effect are too well known to require more than a reference. Never has an act of the highest moral courage met with greater acclaim. Instantaneously the name of Judge Parker became a household word, not only in this country, but in every English-speaking, courage-loving land. Even the Bourbon Trilune forgot for a moment its inbred patriotism, and paid a hearty tribute to the nobility of character which signified itself by such an act. The two rival personalities—President Roosevelt and the Emperor William—who for three years have been most conspicuous upon the stage of the world faded, temporarily at least, into insignificance. The pen of the Judge proved to be mightier than the sword of the Colonel.

It is not to be expected that this stupifying effect upon the amazed directors of the Republican party will continue. The old-time politicians, quicker to recover from such a blow, and more ready than President Roosevelt, and those like him, to devise a manly act, have already done their utmost to create a suspicion of deceit. The silly Trilune is squirming under the lash of its own frank avowal. All are exploiting in every way possible the discontent of Mr. Ryan, whose worst to say is that Judge Parker should have made his declaration before. All this is in vain. The Republican leaders may as well recognize the fact that the American people cannot be deceived in a man. That President Roosevelt would, if fitting, express unqualified admiration of Judge Parker's action we have not the slightest doubt. He is that sort of man himself.

So much for the moral aspect of this unexpected outcome of a turbulent and disheartening convention. What, after all, is the practical effect? In the first place, it is undeniable that a possibility of success has supplanted the certainty of defeat. Behold the ghosts that are laid: free silver, William J. Bryan, David R. Hill, Tammany Hall. But most potent of all is the convincing evidence to the Democratic masses that they have an opportunity to vote for a man instead of for a Judge. The outcome is most encouraging to all lovers of good government. However earnestly one may desire the election of President Roosevelt, it is absurd to deny the advantage to the country of a worthy antagonist. The issue resolves itself into a choice between a candidate believed by some to be unsafe and a reasonably sound platform on the one hand, and a candidate known to be safe, and a wretched, heretical make-shift of principles, on the other. Whatever may be the outcome, no danger threatens the republic, and no apprehension of serious menace in the next four years can be instilled into the minds of the people. The country, therefore, may continue to prosper serenely without let or hindrance by the politicians.

It is a mistake to say that Chief-Judge Parker is the first member of a State or Federal court to receive electoral votes for President or Vice-President. We have just seen that John Jay received electoral votes in 1790 and in 1796, and one electoral vote as late as 1800. Now John Jay had been made Chief Justice of the State of New York in 1777, and Chief Justice of the United States Supreme Court, by George Washington, on the organization of the Federal government under the Constitution in 1789. Oliver Ellsworth, of Connecticut, who received 11 electoral votes for President in 1796, was made Chief Justice of the United States Supreme Court in the same year, and at the same election James Iredell, of North Carolina, then an associate justice of the tribunal just named, received 3 electoral votes. Daniel T. Tompkins, of New York, twice elected Vice-President, had been a Judge of the Supreme Court of his native State. In 1816, John Marshall, Chief Justice of the United States Supreme Court, received 1 electoral vote for Vice-President. In 1822, 30 electoral votes for Vice-President were given to Judge William Wilkins, of Pennsylvania. To come down to more recent times, we note that Stephen Arnold Douglas, who, in 1860, received upwards of 1,275,000 popular votes, had obtained a seat on the bench of the Illinois Supreme Court in 1841, and was almost always referred to by Lincoln in conversation as "Judge Douglas." David Davis, who was an independent candidate for the Presidency in 1872, and who then received 1 electoral vote, was a justice of the United States Supreme Court. We may mention further that in 1856, Judge McLean, of the United States Supreme Court, had been the principal competitor of John C. Fremont for the Republican nomination for the Presidency. We scarcely need add that in 1868 Chief-Justice Chase was a candidate for the Democratic nomination for the Presidency, and doubtless would have been selected had the convention not been stamped for Horatio Seymour. The designation of Chief-Judge Almon B. Parker for one of the two highest Federal offices is thus not a unique phenomenon in the political history of the United States.

It is not true, either, that Judge Parker's refusal to accept the Democratic nomination for the Presidency unless it should be made with the distinct understanding on the part of the St. Louis convention that he is, and intends to be, a staunch upholder of the gold standard, is an incident without precedent or approach to a parallel in our national annals. In 1814 Silas Wright, of New York, declined the Democratic nomination for the Vice-Presidency, after it had been actually made and announced to him by the Democratic national convention. In 1846, ex-Speaker Nathaniel T. Banks declined the nomination for the Presidency, which had been given to him by a wing of the Native American party. In 1864, General George B. McClellan did not, indeed, refuse the nomination for the Presidency, which had been tendered to him at Chicago in that year, but, in his letter of acceptance, he repudiated the peace plank which constituted the backbone of the Democratic platform. Judge Almon B. Parker, of New York, is, however, the first American citizen to decline the nomination of one of the two great political parties unless it should be made with a distinct understanding of his personal attitude toward a question regarded by him as paramount.

To have in our family a member whose years have been extended beyond the usual limit has the happy effect of keeping all the juniors young. To see statements of advanced years still active in the public service has a like effect. Mr. Hildesone and Pope Leo, while they were still with us, made eighty seem no more than a moderate maturity. But the world's supply of octogenarian statesmen is not as ample just now as it sometimes is. King Christian of Denmark is eighty-six, Senator Pettus of Alabama is eighty-three,

Senator Morgan of the same State is eighty, but there seems to be no one else of full fourscore who is still both active and conspicuous in the business of government. It is the more reassuring to all voters whose boards are gray to have a lively politician of nearly eighty-one appear as Judge Parker's mate on the Democratic ticket. Mr. Davis, after sitting twelve years in the United States Senate, declined reelection in 1882 because of the pressure of private business. He has not held office since, but he has been very active and successful in business, and no doubt feels now that he can well afford to work another spell for the people. Out of the seven or eight million voters who will vote for him next November, there will certainly be a million who will reflect with satisfaction that none who are ten, twenty, thirty years younger than the Democratic candidate for Vice-President are still sincerely young and fit for any honor, duty, or profit that comes their way. This sort of reassurance will be all the more welcome in a year when a President aged forty-six is running for a second term.

In the interest of economy and honesty in the public service, the Democratic platform recommends "able officers, from the acquiescent of the White House down to the lowest of them, to return as nearly as may be to Jeffersonian simplicity of living." They do it now "as nearly as may be." The times have changed and the standard of living has been raised for every one, but Jefferson lived well up to the standard of his time. The wide scope of his intelligence included an unusual taste and proficiency in architecture. He was a good builder and liked to build. He was hospitable and entertained freely; more freely, indeed, than he could afford, for he died poor. Jefferson was a great man, but economy in his private expenditures was not his strong point. Mr. Williams was right enough to enjoin simple living on office-holders, for the salaries of those who have to live on their salaries can very rarely support anything else. But it is a mistake to hold Jefferson up as an example of thrift. In his way, and according to the standards of his time, he was certainly as profuse as President Roosevelt. Indeed, we have read somewhere that when the apostle of democratic simplicity was called upon to produce the first draft of a declaration of independence, he performed his task exceedingly well in a blue silk waistcoat after having removed a coat of crimson velvet, and knee-banded at that.

Governor Vandeman of Mississippi has conferred a new title on President Roosevelt. He spoke of him at St. Louis as "the National Peril." Without doubt that is how he feels about him. The earnestness of the desire of the Southern leaders to beat Colonel Roosevelt appeared in the constraint those fiery gentlemen put upon their tempers. They would not fight with any one who could help beat Roosevelt, not even with one another. They would be reconciled to any one and to anything which would help Democratic success, unless the reconciliation, dispensationally considered, seemed to cost more than it was worth. So it came about that the host of Southern feeling against Roosevelt not only held the South solid, but helped to solidify the whole Democratic party. Parker's telegram, mis-timed in the beginning, stirred Southern ire not a little, but Senator Tillman's speech showed anger resolutely suppressed, and reason and argument in complete control of action. And that suppressed anger will not smother. It is gone. Long before this the Southern leaders have realized how enormously Judge Parker's stand has helped the prospect of Democratic success. They cannot but feel now that the Judge worked for them when he worked for himself. But the sentiment that held them in the interval of uncertainty when their wrath burned was a sentiment that did not exist when McKinley fell and Colonel Roosevelt moved into the White House.

Speaking at St. Louis, of the President, the elegant Clump Clark declared: "He is in the hands of the Philistines, and they will bind him with their wills." Maybe so; maybe so; but what happened to Samson—whom Mr. Clark evidently had in mind—under like circumstances? It says in Holy Writ: "He brake the wiles as a thread of tow is broken when it toucheth the fire." Wiles won't hold the Colonel, Mr. Clark.

Keep an eye on him and you will find him streamers still until the pesky Philistines cut his hair.

Except war, there is hardly any test of physical endurance so searching as a hot political convention, such as that at St. Louis. The strain on the leaders is deadly. The seasoned warriors seem to stand it best. Bryan, at St. Louis, was handicapped by a cold, yet his labors were prodigious. Fighting is hard work, but it was one long three days' fight for Bryan, with scarcely any sleep. Yet his Saturday early morning speech in the convention into which he seemed to put the very last ounce of his physical strength, was as good a speech as he ever made. The lucky moment out stood at St. Louis, Tillman, rock-ribbed and copper-fastened, sang out particularly big and resourceful at the end, and had energy enough left to visit the Fair Grounds on Sunday in an automobile with Senator Bailey, and be injured in collision with a street-car on the way home. The Chicago convention of 1896 killed William E. Russell. The Minneapolis convention of 1892 killed Emmons Blaine. No important fatalities are reported at this writing as a consequence of the convention at St. Louis, but the strain was tremendous. Colonel Bryan took to his bed after the last fight was over, and is recuperating slowly.

It appears to be generally acknowledged by unbiased observers that in Wisconsin the Democrats will elect the Governor this year, and that their Presidential electors will also be chosen, provided the La Follette and Stewart factions of the Republican party keep separate electoral tickets in the field. If we look back over the record of Wisconsin since 1872, we find that in 1876 the Republican electors were chosen by a plurality of only 6150, that in 1880 the Democrats elected a Governor by a plurality of 28,280, and returned their Presidential electors two years later by a plurality of 6544. In 1895 they secured a plurality of 9049 for their candidate for a seat on the bench of their State Supreme Court, but in 1900 McKinley had the impressive plurality of 100,581 over Bryan. In Indiana, the Democrats returned their Presidential electors in 1876, 1884, and 1892, and in 1888 General Harrison only carried the State by a plurality of 2148. It seems to be generally conceded, however, that the nomination of Senator Fairbanks for the Vice-Presidency will this year give the State to the Republicans. In Illinois, the result appears to hinge on the answer to the question whether in that State internal dissension is more pervasive and ineradicable within the Republican or within the Democratic ranks.

An analysis of the first ballot in the St. Louis convention indicates that the nomination of Chief-Judge Parker might have been delayed, if not frustrated, should a combination have been effected for dilatory and destructive purposes between the anti-Parker conservatives and the Hearst-Bryan radicals. There was a widespread impression among the on-lookers that such a combination could have been effected by Senator Gorman, had he been present. There is reason to believe, for instance, that he might have kept the 68 votes of Pennsylvania out of the Parker column, and that there would have been also a good deal of defection in some of the Southern delegations, which, as it was said, polled their full strength for the New York candidate. Why did Senator Gorman persist in remaining at a distance from the field? The most plausible explanation of his absence is that which imputes to him a dread that, should he succeed in defeating the nomination of Judge Parker, either the friends of Bryan or the friends of ex-President Cleveland would reap where he had sown. The alternatives were to him equally distasteful. He preferred Parker to either.

It is not true, though we have seen the assertion repeated by newspapers usually well informed, that since 1872, when both States gave their electoral votes to Grant, up to 1896, when both voted for McKinley, both New Jersey and New York have invariably supported the Democratic nominee for the Presidency. It is true of New Jersey, but Garfield carried New York in 1880, and Harrison carried it in 1888. Connecticut was carried by the Democrats in 1876, 1884, 1888, and 1892, but gave its electoral votes to Garfield in 1880. The Connecticut Democracy, however, was much more united and much better organized before 1896 than it has been since that eventful year, while, on the other hand, the Republican machine, under the management of Samuel B. Fessenden, has exhibited a remarkable degree of efficiency.

It is interesting to compare the dimensions of the latest White Star steamship Baltic with those of the Great Eastern. The last-named vessel, which was designed, it will be remembered, by Brunel nearly fifty years ago, was 692 feet long and 82½ feet wide, exclusive of the width of her paddle-boxes. She could carry 12,000 tons of coal, 6000 tons of cargo, and passengers and crew to the number of 4260. She was sent to the scrap-heap in 1896-7, after having been employed for years in laying ocean cables—a function for which she was much better fitted than she was for the transportation of passengers and freight. The Baltic is 726 feet long and 75 feet wide. According to the technical system of measurement, her gross tonnage is 24,000, but she has an actual capacity of 28,000 tons. She is not intended to vie in respect of speed with the so-called "five-day" boats. Her transatlantic voyage is expected to require seven or eight days. On the other hand, she will consume less than 250 tons of coal a day, as against some 700 tons of the combustible needed by the ocean greyhounds, and her engine-room crew is only half as large. Owing to her greater capacity and to the much smaller space required for coal, she will be able to carry a vastly larger cargo, and no fewer than 3000 passengers. In a word, it will cost much less to run her, while both her gross and her net earnings will be far greater. Even the Baltic will be surpassed in size by the turbine ships now building for the Cunard line, for these are expected to approximate 800 feet in length.

It is a question of obvious interest and serious importance that is discussed by Brigadier-General P. C. Hains, U.S.A., in the July number of the North American Review. The author, a graduate of West Point, and a veteran of the civil war, has rendered conspicuous engineering service in connection with various works of harbor and river amelioration and of harbor defence, and as the engineer-in-charge of the Potomac Flats improvements. Of late years he has become well known to the community at large as a member of the Nicaragua Canal Commission, which completed its labors in 1899, and since then, as a member of the Isthmian Canal Commission. In the article to which we have referred he invites attention to a matter of direct and material bearing on the plans in process of formulation for the sanitary control of the canal zone. It is plain that the scope and, to some extent, also, the nature of those plans would be affected by the number of laborers that will be needed for the completion of the inter-oceanic water-way. It is commonly taken for granted that from 40,000 to 50,000 laborers will be required. General Hains, who speaks as a student of the ground, and of the work thus far accomplished, does not believe that the necessary number will reach anything like that figure. He points out that of the total forty-seven miles of the canal, about thirty-five will be excavated chiefly with dredges, the operation of which will call for relatively few hands. Then again, on the Culebra Cut, situated between Bas Obispo and Pedro Miguel, it will be impossible to employ to advantage a very large amount of machinery, and, manifestly, the number of employees will be correspondingly limited. Such other works as the Bahia Dura, the locks, and the spillway need not be hurried, inasmuch as their completion in advance of the main channel would not hasten the time of opening the canal to navigation. It will suffice if they are finished simultaneously with the principal excavation. On the other hand, the work on the Great Cut cannot be pushed with too much energy; but, from his inspection of the locality, General Hains is able to testify that the conditions here are such that rapid progress cannot be made. Instructive is the comparison with the Chicago Drainage Canal, which is thirty-four miles long. The maximum number of laborers employed on that water-way at any time was about eight thousand. General Hains deems it improbable that the ratio of the number of employees to length of canal at Panama will exceed that exhibited at Chicago. The ratio is more likely to be less, because of the proportionately larger amount of work that can be done with dredges.

The number of men lately employed by the French Canal Company was seven hundred, who, with their defective applacers, were able to remove less than four cubic yards of earth per day per man. It is computed that with good machinery the average laborer would be able to excavate ten cubic yards per day. At that rate of excavation, two thousand men at work on the Culbert Cut should effect an output of about six million cubic yards per year, which would complete the cut in about seven years. General Haines, therefore, thinks it safe to say that not more than three thousand men will be employed at any one time on the Great Cut. We turn to the amount of labor that may need to be expended upon locks. Here, again, there is a suggestive precedent in the Poe Lock at Saint-Sainte-Marie. During 1892 and 1893, the two years when the greatest number of men were employed on this lock, the average for the working months was only about five hundred men. Even if double that number be allowed for the locks at Bohio, Pedro Miguel, and Miraflores, not more than three thousand men would be needed for lock construction. If, in addition, one thousand be employed in dredging, one thousand on the Bohio Dam, one thousand on Alhajuela Dam, one thousand on Gigante Spillway, and one thousand for other miscellaneous work, there would be a total of eight thousand. Even if this figure be increased by twenty-five per cent, the aggregate would be only ten thousand. According, then, to the most liberal estimate, not more than eighteen thousand, or, say, twenty thousand men, will be employed at any one time in the completion of the Panama Canal.

General Haines next proceeds to examine the question where the required labor is to come from. The Panama Canal Company tried coolies brought from China, and also negroes imported directly from Africa. The workmen of neither class gave satisfaction, and with both classes came diseases which carried off many laborers, and rendered others useless. But few laborers can be secured on the isthmus itself, and of Jamaica negroes, who are good workers, not more than fifteen hundred or two thousand could be obtained. Under all the circumstances, General Haines opines that the best solution of the labor problem would be to procure the needed workmen from the United States. The negro of the Southern States being, like the Jamaica negro, accustomed to a warm climate, would be able to do the unskilled work needed on the isthmus. He is amenable to discipline, temperate in his habits, not harrassed by disease, industrious, and relatively intelligent. Of course, however, as the work of excavation and construction would be done largely by machinery, a considerable number of experts in the various mechanical trades, including many engine-men, will be needed. Such mechanics will, necessarily, be white men, but the stay of any given individual on the isthmus need not be prolonged. In a word, white mechanics and colored laborers from the United States and the West-Indian Islands should be relied upon for the building of the canal. Of course such an organization will need to have a single head in order to insure harmonious action. There should be, in other words, one chief engineer having entire charge of all matters relating to the structural execution of the plans. Should he at any time need counsel on matters within the scope of his duties, he should be able to refer to a board of experts, whose functions, however, in General Haines's opinion, should not extend to executive work. We note with satisfaction that since this article was written for the North American Review a chief engineer has been appointed.

The war in the Far East is already bringing a healthy awakening within the Russian Empire. The Czar has already initiated or assented to four important reforms, all of them matters which have been cardinal grievances against the autocracy. The last is the most noteworthy: the old, bad system of administrative condemnation for political crimes, is swept away by a stroke of the pen, and the epoch, which began early last century with the Decembrist crimes, and continued through the days of Bakunin, Levoff, Stepaniak, and Iubergound Russia, and which furnished so many heart-rending stories of Siberian exile, is closed forever. At last the great principle of open trial, which is the bulwark of civil liberty in every country on earth, and the establishing of which in the modern world is one of the chief glories of England, is extended to those political malecontents in Russia, who are often merely impulsive Radicals, too much ahead of the times, and in bad odor with the autocratic authorities. A second step of vital importance was taken a few weeks ago, when the Czar referred to the zemstvos of all Russia certain questions which go to the heart of Russia's national organization, questions which mark the passage of the old Slavonic, or even primitive Aryan, communism into the sharply defined personal property and responsibility of the modern world. It is significant that such a question should be raised, marking as it does the farewell of Russia to a part of her most ancient past, and her determination to walk on the modern ways. But much more significant is the general reference to the whole people, through their local elected bodies. It is the first step towards a national parliament. It is only needed to assemble the zemstvos in a single place, through their representatives, and the national parliament of Russia will already be an accomplished fact.

In two other vital directions, Russia has swept away old abuses of the past, at least in a partial degree. These two directions refer to the Jews and the Finns, and it is easy to see that a sincere and effective measure of advance in these two directions will do much to abate the widespread unpopularity of Russia abroad. For that unpopularity is largely the work of Jews and Finns, who have left Russian territory because they found the conditions of life intolerable there. The Jewish question was inherited by Russia, when she acquired a series of territories which formerly lined her western boundary—Courland, Livonia, Poland, and Little Russia, a strip of territory stretching from the Baltic to the Black Sea. To this borderland the Jews had gravitated, when they were driven by persecution from Western Europe, from Spain and England, France and Germany. Great Russia, the Russia of the Middle Ages, had no Jewish question, because it had no Jews. The old pronouncement "His blood be upon our heads and upon our children's" was taken literally, and carried to its logical conclusion. Therefore, the Jewish question is, in Russia, quite a modern one, dating only from the period of advance westwards toward Europe. There are signs that the Russian government is at last making up to its full moral duty towards the five or perhaps ten million Jews within its dominions, and that their lot will presently be made more bearable. The Finns are also receiving their measure of reform, and it would be idle not to see in this a result of the killing of General Bobrikoff. The Czar's recent rescript was very conciliatory in tone, and we are now told that he has ordered the Finnish language to be substituted for the Swedish, in the commercial school at Helsingfors. A patriotic Finnish journal declares that the Czar's recent rescript comes like a refreshing breeze to Finnish hearts.

Mr. Joseph Chamberlain gave a birthday party the other day, to which two hundred members of Parliament were invited. It is interesting and somewhat startling to learn that Mr. Chamberlain was born in 1838, when William IV. was king over England, and when his successor, then Princess Victoria, was a girl of seventeen. Mr. Chamberlain has had two years of the Psalmist's "threescore years and ten," and it is marvellous and a wonderful tribute to his vitality that, at sixty-eight, he somehow manages to give the world at large the impression that he is a young man. Most recent political forecasts from England make it probable that there will be no general election in the present year. We are further assured, and the testimony of the last ten by-elections goes a long way to confirm it, that the Liberals will undoubtedly win at the election which may take place in the spring or autumn of next year, or may even be postponed to the year after. By that time, Mr. Chamberlain will be seventy. He is said to look forward to a Liberal victory at the coming elections, but to hope that, in the mean time his fiscal gospel will make converts, and that he will win the next election after that, and carry his proposals to a triumphant conclusion. It is interesting to note that Mr. Chamberlain made some references to his fiscal gospel at his birthday dinner. He told his assembled guests that he had not wavered in his conviction that the policy he advocated was necessary in order to prevent the loss of British trade and prestige. He said that the British people should follow the example of the United States, and make a united empire out of scattered sister states. How keenly it would interest the framers of the American Constitution, to hear the mother country advised by one of her foremost statesmen to exchange English colonial principles for American federation!

The Democratic Ticket

ALEXIS BRIDGES PARKER, the nominee of the Democratic national convention for the Presidency, will be less than fifty-three years old should he be inaugurated on March 4, 1883. That is to say, he will be of the age which Abraham Lincoln had attained when he entered the White House. Only nine Presidents, whether elected or accidental, have been younger at the time when they assumed the office of Chief Magistrate. Judge Parker is of Revolutionary stock; his great-grandfather, John Parker, before he came from Massachusetts to settle in New York State, had been a soldier in the Continental army. The Democratic nominee was born on a farm in Cortland County, New York. He attended the nearest district school until he was thirteen years old, when he went to the Cortland Academy for the autumn and winter terms, continuing, meanwhile, to spend the spring and summer at work on his father's farm. Even after he began to teach a district school, with the aim of making a further contribution toward the maintenance of the family, he returned each summer to aid in the farm work. He had the usual experience of young teachers in country schools, but, after "licking" the biggest boy, he had no more trouble. Subsequently, he taught schools of a higher grade at Hinghamton and Rochester, and, in the latter town, made the acquaintance of Moses I. Schoonmaker, a well-known lawyer of Ulster County, whose daughter the Judge subsequently married. After studying law in Mr. Schoonmaker's office, he attended the Albany Law School, and was admitted to the bar in 1872. Five years later he was admitted and elected Surrogate of Ulster County. He was elected to that office in 1882. In 1884, Surrogate Parker strenuously favored the nomination of Grover Cleveland for President, and represented the Ulster County Congress district as a delegate to the Democratic national convention at Chicago. Mr. Cleveland, on becoming President in 1885, recognized Surrogate Parker's service by proffering him the post of First Assistant Postmaster General, but the offer was declined on the ground that the offer suggested was not of a judicial character. In the summer and autumn of the year named, Judge Parker for the first and only time in his life, took a leading part in the management of a campaign, the outcome of which was the election of all the candidates on the Democratic State ticket. Thereupon he retired permanently from active participation in political affairs. His advancement to high judicial position was now rapid. In the autumn of 1885 Surrogate Parker was appointed to fill a vacancy on the bench of the Supreme Court of the State, and when, in the following year, he was nominated by the Democrats to be his own successor, the Republicans of the judicial district declined to put forward a candidate against him. Persisting in the determination to confine himself to a judicial career, he refused to be a candidate thereupon, and was re-elected in 1891 or a candidate for United States Senator in the same year. When the Second Division of the Court of Appeals was organized in 1890 he was appointed a member of it, and held the office until the dissolution of the court in 1892. He was then, at the request of many judges, appointed by Governor Flower a member of the General Term of the Supreme Court of the First Judicial District, after which, in 1897, came his election as Chief Judge of the Court of Appeals. That was the last victory gained by the Democracy at the ballot box in the State, as distinguished from the city of New York. There is no doubt in the mind of any shrewd, Republican or Democratic, that had Chief Judge Parker been nominated for the Governorship in 1892, instead of Mr. Bird S. Odell, he would have been elected.

The fact that Surrogate Parker was the chief manager of David B. Hill's campaign for the Governorship of New York in 1883, and that, in the same year, he moved to Mr. Hill the appointment to the bench of the Supreme Court of the State, has led some persons unacquainted with him, personally or professionally, to infer that if elected President he might show himself too deferential to the views and wishes of the ex-Senator. No such assumption has found credence among those who have followed Judge Parker's course upon the bench or among those who have marked the earnestness with which his candidacy has been supported by Mr. Cleveland and the closest friends of the ex-President. No man believed or suspected of subservience to Mr. Hill could have received their outpourings and hearty commendation. Those who have had the best opportunities of judging have proclaimed Judge Parker a man of exceptional soundness of character, and have given emphatic assurance that, when the right time came, there would be nothing timid, time-serving, or equivocal in his attitude and attitude. On Saturday, July 9, there came to Chief Judge Parker one of the most that try men's souls. The national convention of a great political party had named him for the Presidency of the United States, but, simultaneously, it had refused to make any declaration whatever in its platform concerning the vital and paramount issue which had divided the country for eight years, and as to which the Democracy had twice professed officially its adherence to the wrong side. It was not by any means the first time that a great party has invited a citizen to stand on a platform which he gladly would have changed. (No more than one occasion, a nominee, having waited until a convention had adjourned non die, and its decision was irrevocable, has signified in his letter of acceptance his unwillingness to approve of this or that plank in his party platform. It will be remembered, for instance, that General George B. McCall in 1864, though he accepted the nomination for the Presidency from the Democratic national convention held at Chicago in that year, repudiated distinctly the peace plank in that convention's platform. It is also true, as we have elsewhere pointed out, that, in 1848, while the Democratic national convention was still in session, Salas Wright, loyal to his friend Van Buren, whose claim on the Presidency had been ignored, refused the nomination for Vice-President, of which he had been notified. Not once before, however, in the history of the United States has an American citizen been actually nominated for the highest office in the gift of the people—the highest elective office that has ever been known on earth—and then deliberately declined the nomination, unless it should be confirmed by the convention still in session, with the full knowledge of his personal opinions and his personal determination concerning the overshadowing issue on which it had maintained a suspicious silence. It must have been well known to Judge Parker that the plank accepting the gold standard as an established fact had been stricken out by a majority of more than two to one in the committee on resolutions, and that on the floor of the convention hall the same majority would have in W. J. Bryan a formidable spokesman. Under all the circumstances, the voters were there to see the effect of a declaration of a disunion, and the disunion plank, in all things, in all men, and ready to smother convictions for advancement—they had secured for a standard-bearer the noblest work of God, an honest man, who would not accept even the prize of the Presidency on a misunderstanding of his firm-rooted belief and his unshaken intention. Under such a captain a party may be beaten, but never dishonored.

In the nomination of ex-Senator Henry G. Davis, of West Virginia, for Vice-President, the Democratic national convention has broken the record in respect of the age of nominees for either of the two highest posts under the Government, inasmuch as he is eighty-one years old on the fifth day of next November. The old ex-President we have ever had was William Henry Harrison, who was sixty-eight when he entered the White House. The next oldest was James Buchanan, who was sixty-six when inaugurated. The oldest Vice-President was Elbridge Gerry, who was sixty-six at the date of his inauguration. W. H. Harrison, however, lived but a month, and Gerry only about a year. William R. King, who was sixty-seven when elected Vice-President, did not live to be inaugurated. The three examples last named seem to afford some warrant for Mr. Russell's age limit for the holding of national office. That objection troubles us, however, that the rule, which in this country has barred men over threescore and ten from the highest political posts, is one that has measurable exceptions. If rigorously applied during the last century in England, France, and Germany, it would have excluded Gladstone, Palmerston, Thiers, and Mettke from posts of supreme usefulness. There is no doubt that ex-Senator Davis is a more robust and vigorous man than Gladstone was at the same age. He does not look a day over sixty, and few men of sixty can ride, as he rides, forty miles on horseback a day. He has had an extraordinary career, having begun as a bricklayer on a freight train, and having ended by becoming one of the most successful railroad men and coal men in the United States. He is credited with the amassing of a fortune of forty million dollars. It is unquestionably true that no man has done more to make West Virginia the great wheat-producing State that she now is than Henry G. Davis. He has played a part in the politics of the State with which he is identified since 1866, when he entered the Lower House of its Legislature. Five years later he became a United States Senator, and six years later was re-elected. During a part of his second term, when the Democrats controlled the Senate, he held the important post of chairman of the Committee on Appropriations. Though he voluntarily retired from politics in 1883, he was one of the foremost candidates for Vice-President in the Democratic national convention of 1884. He threw his strength, however, to Mr. Hendricks. There is reason to believe that Mr. Davis would have been made Secretary of the Treasury in Mr. Cleveland's first cabinet had it not been deemed expedient to give that portfolio to a representative of New York. He has been a delegate to seven national conventions of his party, holding this year the West Virginia delegation in St. Louis. He was one of the United States delegates who helped to formulate the scheme for bringing together the commonwealths of North, Central, and South America, a scheme the outcome of which is the Bureau of American Republics. He was a delegate to the second international conference held two years ago in Mexico, and, with Mr. Andrew Carnegie, is interested in the project which contemplates a continuous international railway from Boston to Santiago in Chile, and to Buenos Ayres. We add that had not Mr. Davis been nominated for Vice-President, he would have been the Democratic candidate this year for Governor of West Virginia. His party believes that, under his experienced and magnetic leadership, his State will be transferred next November from the Republican to the Democratic column.

The Democratic Platform

It is a review of the declaration of principles and purposes made by the Democratic national convention at St. Louis, we reserve for a closing word the failure to make any reference to the issue which has divided the country for eight years, and to Judge Parker's attempt to minimize by his personal utterance the effects of that failure. The document, on the face of it, lacks the merit of brevity. If such a manifesto is not merely academic and perfunctory, it is meant to be acted upon by voters at the ballot box, but, in order to be so, it must be read. The St. Louis pronouncement is disqualified for usefulness by its inordinate length. If a hundred voters, we doubt whether more than one will have the patience to read for himself the Democratic platform. Almost all of them will content themselves with peering at second hand or tenth hand what they are told is the gist of it. The preliminary examination of so-called fundamental principles is superfluous, for the reason that every one of these principles would be accepted by most, if not all, Republicans, except that the two parties might differ as to what constitutes "economy" in public expenditure, and as to whether the burden of labor is not lightened rather than increased by the imposition of protective duties.

We turn to specific declarations regarding questions of actual or prospective importance as to which the two principal parties are by no means agreed. Such, for instance, is the approval expressed by the St. Louis convention of the measures which passed the United States Senate in 1890, but which a Republican Congress has ever since refused to enact—the measure, namely, relating to contempt in Federal courts, and providing for trial by jury even of indictments for contempt of court, which is intended to limit the power of the Federal judiciary to interfere by injunction or mandamus for the enforcement of the laws. We are averse to be deprived of the right to punish summarily for contempt, it is obvious that its orders would be less promptly and thoroughly obeyed. The course pursued by Mr. Roosevelt in the matter of the anthracite coal strike, in his assertion of the existence of a "restraining power" of Congress and in his arrogation of a right to determine by Executive order the age of presumable disability are manifestly contemplated in that clause of the Democratic programme which denounces Executive usurpation. The authors of the St. Louis platform favor the nomination and election of a President inured with the principles of the Constitution, who will set his face sternly against Executive usurpation of legislative and judicial functions, and against that usurpation he relied upon the guise of "Executive construction" of existing laws, or whether it take refuge in "the tyrant's plea of necessity or superior wisdom." The convention's declaration with reference to the Philippines is based, essentially, on the remarkable speech made recently by ex-Secretary Olney on the consequences of permitting the doctrine embodied in the decision of the United States Supreme Court in the Insular cases to stand. With the four judges who opposed that decision the Democrats assembled at St. Louis believe that no government has a right to make one set of laws for those "at home" and another and a different set of laws elsewhere in their character for those "in the colonies." The party's wishes and intentions with reference to this matter are put in the form of a dilemma: All men retained under the American flag should receive the protection of the institutions whose emblem the flag is. If they are inherently unfit for these institutions, then they are inherently unfit to be members of the American body politic. That is to say, in spite of the decision rendered by a majority of one in the Insular cases, the Democrats at St. Louis persist in declaring that the Constitution follows the flag. If we have no intention of admitting the Philippines to the status of a State, or even of a Territory, in the Union, then we should do for their inhabitants what we have done for Cuba. From the principle thus asserted, the platform draws the corollary that American capital ought not to be encouraged to develop the natural resources of the Philippines, for such capital would thereby acquire vested interests, which might not be reconcilable with an early extension of independence to the islands. How thoughtful Democrats representing Eastern and Southern States can have brought themselves to favor the election of United States Senators by the direct vote of the people is hard to understand, in view of the historical and logical connection of the election of a State's United States Senators by its Legislature with the principle of State rights. If United States Senators were chosen by the people, the inequality of the constituencies represented by New York Senators, on the one hand, and by Nevada Senators on the other, would become glaring and exasperating. That the plank relating to reciprocity does not differ materially from the corresponding plank in the Republican platform will be evident when we point out that, although the Democrats "favor liberal trade arrangements with Canada and the people of other countries," it is only where they enter the country with benefit to American agriculture, manufactures, mining, or commerce.

It is not easy to perceive just what is meant by the declaration in favor of retaining the army and of expenditure for military purposes to "a point historically demonstrated to be safe and sufficient." Does this signify that, because an army of ten thousand men was once deemed adequate it would suffice at the present time when we have undertaken the protection of extensive transatlantic dependencies and of the maintenance of law and order therein? Here we may mention that the platform, as constructed by the subcommittee, contained a clause approving of a continued expansion of the army, but this clause does not appear in the document reported to the convention by the full committee, and accepted by the latter body. The platform pledges the Democracy, if entrusted with power, to construct quickly the Panama Canal, thereby, of course, accepting the version of the canal route from the Republic of Panama, yet it denounces the means by which that route was secured. The denunciation is embodied in two clauses, which do not mention, as the subcommittee did, the Panama affair specifically, but accuse the Republican administration of "making war" without the authority of Congress, and thereby usurping a fundamental prerogative of the Federal Legislature; and of violating a statute of the United States (the naval act approved June 28, 1892), as well as treaty obligations (the treaty with Colombia), international usages, and constitutional law, under the pretence of executing a great public policy which could have been effected in other, less objectionable, and with better. We observe next, that the refusal of the Republican majority in the House of Representatives to permit a legislative inquiry into the management of the Post-office Department is aimed at in concluding clauses which accuse the Republican administration of withdrawing from Congress those duties of investigation which heretofore have made the representatives of the people and the States the informed and vigilant body conducting a severe investigation of its own, the outcome of which has been the beautiful exhibition of a few convictions, while a broad corridor has been thrown over the bureau which have been the favored field of administrative abuses, and while the superior officers under whose jurisdiction malfeasance has been committed have been kept in power. After several clauses dealing with the race question, brought into the foreground by a plank inserted in the Republican platform, had been proposed, accepted, and then rejected in committee, the manifesto finally submitted to the convention, and by it approved, declares that to revive dead and hateful race and sectional animosities in any part of our common country means confusion, distraction of business, and the reopening of wounds now happily healed. Wherever the Democrats assembled at St. Louis gathered and concern the terms of the Republican convention at Chicago to kindle anew the embers of racial and sectional strife, and appeal from it to the common sense and equitable spirit of the American people.

We turn to the position taken in the platform with regard to the tariff and the trusts. As originally reported from the subcommittee, the tariff plank, while recognizing the general principle that the sole source of the power of taxation is the duty of supporting the Federal government economically, constitutionally, and effectively administered, acknowledged as a truth of equal importance that, in the assertion of any general principle, and in reaching any end, however sacred and logically unavoidable, due regard should be paid to actually existing conditions. The necessity of making tariff revision not arbitrary but produced was emphasized by the further declaration that "Domestic industries, if protected, would keep in view, as men of common sense should, existing conditions, however wrongfully or mistakenly brought about, and the danger to the cause of tariff reform itself that would result from an abrupt and revolutionary reversal of fiscal policy. As reconstructed by the full committee, the tariff plank still declares that the revision of the tariff, while, of course, it ought to be made by the people, and not by the friends of its interests, should be gradual"; but, at Mr. Bryan's dictation, the whole policy of protection was denounced "as a robbery of the many to enrich the few," and a tariff "limited to the needs of the government, economically administered," that is to say, a tariff for revenue, was demanded. All that part of the Democratic platform which is concerned with the tariff issue is incoherent, and plainly the outcome of irreconcilable wishes and opinions. On the other hand, the pronouncement in reference to "trusts" is definite and peremptory. The platform, as finally framed, demands a rigorous enforcement of the existing criminal as well as civil statutes against all trusts and combinations of capital which shall judiciously be found to have violated the law. It also insists on the enactment of such further legislation as may be needed the more effectually to suppress law-breaking trusts, and, as a specific remedy, proposes that an trust or combination engaged in interstate commerce, which shall be declared by any court of competent jurisdiction to be monopolizing any branch of business or production, shall be permitted thereupon to transact business outside the State of its origin. The platform also calls for an enlargement of the powers of the Interstate Commission, to the end that the travelling public and shippers may have prompt and adequate relief from the abuses to which they are subjected in the matter of transportation. To the plea put forward on behalf of the Republicans that, in the matter of controlling trusts, as has been proved in the Northern Securities case, they have actually done what Democrats in their hour of power failed to do, the St. Louis platform admits that the party in power has "ordered assaults upon some monopolies," but goes on to assert that, "paralyzed by its first victory, it flung out a flag of truce, and cried out that it would not 'rise again,' leaving its future purposes clouded by its vacillation."

In spite of the blunder committed in committing Mr. Bryan's demand for a tariff for revenue, and in spite of several minor flaws, the platform might not have rendered the Democracy's appeal to the ballot less entirely hopeless had the convention frankly recognized that the gold standard had come to stay. That recognition was embodied with perhaps as much candor and readiness as could be expected from men most of whom had accepted the Chicago and Kansas City platforms, in the plank which, after prolonged and heated debate, was reported by the subcommittee. The plank, which was substantially identical with that adopted by the Democratic State convention in Mississippi, acknowledged that the discovery of gold within the past few years, and the great increase in the production thereof, an increase adding two thousand million dollars to the world's supply of that metal, of which $700,000,000 have fallen to the share of the United States, have contributed to the maintenance of a money standard of value, an issue upon which, and here rendered that issue from the field of political contention. In the full committee, under the mischievous, and, as it proved, irresistible ascendancy of Mr. Bryan, the pronouncement approved by the subcommittee was stricken out by a vote of more than two to one, and it was decided that no declaration whatever with regard to the money standard of value should be made by the national Democratic convention.

To all clear-sighted and honest members of the committee on resolutions, it should have been patent, as it was to Judge Parker, that reticence upon the one subject of superlative moment was as inexpedient as it was disingenuous. For two reasons it could not be pretended that the omission from the platform of all reference to the currency is of itself a sufficient recognition of the fact that the gold standard is no longer disputable. No such recognition could be inferred from the silence of a party, which in two Presidential campaigns had identified itself with an attack on the foundation-stone of financial security. On the contrary, reticence under such circumstances is itself but too well recognized as a confession of guilt. It is still joined in his idols. The suspicion, moreover, is confirmed by the knowledge that the acceptance of the gold standard, as a fact, recommended by the subcommittee to the committee on resolutions, was repudiated in the latter body by an overwhelming vote, at the dictation of W. J. Bryan, the apostle of the free-silver heresy. Upon a platform which contained no reference to the one issue which for eight years has divided the country, no sincere friend of the gold standard could afford to place himself; and Judge Parker, by his telegraphed message to Mr. W. F. Sheehan, gave conclusive proof of his personal integrity, making unmistakable his determination to be loyal to his convictions. The telegram made it evident that even the Democracy had a candidate who would rather be right than be President, and that he would not accept a nomination unless the St. Louis convention should make it with its eyes wide open to the unexpurgated nature of his opinions on the money question.

The Letter to a Troubled Wife

THE intelligent readers of the WEEKLY have made a hearty response to its invitation to discuss Dr. Lyman Abbott's letter to the troubled wife. They have sent in many letters, of which we have published during the last month as many as the limits of the WEEKLY'S space would allow. We shall now close the discussion. Dr. Abbott's advice has found many critics and also many supporters. His letter rubbed many readers the wrong way. A man writes: "I think Dr. Abbott's advice in the case is simply damnable." Mary MacLane says that Dr. Abbott has "an adamant heart," in letters to the troubled wife's tale and groan her "not one word of compassion." Another writer thinks the wife need sympathy more than advice, and that the husband and the interfering woman need advice.

Many writers showed a feeling which we ourselves expressed, that Dr. Abbott seemed to take the husband's fault too lightly. "Conjugal love thus married is never the same again," writes one. "It was Dr. Abbott's duty to take account of the wrong done by the husband," says another. Another writer takes issue with Dr. Abbott's assertion that no one person can fill in the full life of any other person, and declares that if the entry to that is not true, monogamy is a mere experiment.

In support of Dr. Abbott some one says: "It is a question of expedient compromise, and as such he deals with it." Some one else says: "The good doctor was not trying to clarify the right or wrong of the question, but to give advice that, both as to matter and manner, would most help his correspondent. It is his course admirable, while at the same time I condemn not strongly the course of the husband."

Does the troubled wife get from any of her adviser's criticism any better counsel than Dr. Abbott has given her? A woman says of the husband: "He would never watching, and if she—the wife—had the energy, I think a good housewife should work wonders with such a sickish, mawkish excuse of a man." But that is not helpful advice. A man says: "This woman is getting to be a desperate malignant, and to submit herself to such treatment . . . and smile and make up, would show a lack of spirit that would never command the respect of the husband." Another adviser says: "If it be possible, let her without at present doing anything irrevocable, leave up her will and live apart from her husband for a while. That would be a test for both of them and would probably teach the husband how much she was to him." A woman says: "The disappointed wife should seek sympathy from a lady friend. The disappointed husband can travel and his heart will soon return to his home, virtuous, loving wife."

None of these suggestions seems to us likely to have helped the lady more than Dr. Abbott did. We sympathize very much with the opinion of the correspondent—"Wondering," she wrote: "The situation is, unhappily, frequent, and is a problem of gigantic difficulty which nobody living in the present state of society—not even Dr. Abbott—has yet succeeded in solving." The problem is very hard. Dr. Abbott's attempt to meet it imperfectly successful. Could it be bettered? Perhaps we can show by example how difficult it is to better it. Let us suppose, therefore, that Dr. Abbott had written as follows:

Your husband has got himself in a mighty bad scrape. If your statement of the case is exact it might be a good deal worse, yet I can understand your feeling of having had a tremendous job. The feeling is warranted. Husband and wife may scrap and differ and still maintain perfect trust, but when confidence is utterly destroyed, it is as though the air was darkened and the only piping had fallen out of everything. I am sorry for you, but don't knock under if you can help it. Get ashore with the press if you can. It is better for you and for him and far better for your children if you have any.

Your husband, as you describe him, seems not a bad sort. Really, I am sorry for him too. These unhappy married women, who in their solitary appeal to other women's husbands for comfort, are the very devil. They work almost irresistibly on the sympathies of kind men, and men are soft creatures against sympathy. They tell us, is akin to love. And when such appealing women have a calm and station, as you say, which implies good clothes, leisure, education, and carriage exercise—and are good women, and need, "in purity and goodness," as you say, to have some one cheer and brighten their lives, they suppose about the most dangerous trap that a well-meaning, unprejudiced married man can fall into. He might as well take so much strychnine. Besides, if you can, dear lady, what your unhappy husband was up against. He ought to have run away early and just as hard as he knew how, but you see he had lived with you all these years and had gathered no general experience. He was in before he knew the ice was very thin. And yet you are struggling to get out from under the weight of it. And you say he is a good man. I tell you, he kind to him. Pull him out and get him on his pins again. If he is a good man it is worth doing, and no one man can do it but you. He is a sick man; he is a wounded man; Heaven send he be not a fool, but, even if he be, he is yours. I tell you, wash your face as David did after his great sorrow, and set it towards the light. If you can help that man and heal his hurt and make him sound again, it is a victory. To win such a victory is to justify life; to be able to do it is to know whether you win or lose, and where you stand there may be grief, but there will be no despair. I tell you, the stuff is in you to reshape your life, and perhaps your husband's, if you have but the courage to use it. Help him if you can. It is best for you, best for him, best even for the other world. Here is your cross. Take it up. Forget yourself in it, and trust, as you surely may, that as your day is shall be your strength.

I send you back your letter, so that you may destroy it if you choose, and of this one, of course, I shall keep no copy.

The Foreman at Loomis Park—Horace Ruk Delivering his Speech

Another View of the Assembly—Attorney General Blair Speaking

CELEBRATING THE SEMICENTENNIAL OF THE REPUBLICAN PARTY AT JACKSON, MICHIGAN

The semicentennial of the birth of the Republican party was celebrated at Loomis Park, Jackson, Michigan, on July 5, when, on July, 1835, was held the first State convention under the name of "Republican." 10,000 persons were present, and listened to speeches by Secretary Bag, Senator Fairbank, Speaker Cannon, Horace Ruk, and Attorney-General Blair of Michigan.

Photograph by Allen Hughes

WILLIAM F. SHEEHAN

To William F. Sheehan, Judge Parker's personal representative at the St. Louis convention and the recipient of the telegram from Judge Parker declaring his principles on the money question, is largely due the successful outcome of the campaign in Judge Parker's behalf which resulted in his nomination at St. Louis. Mr. Sheehan was born at Buffalo in 1839. He has been active in politics for almost twenty years. He has been Speaker of the New York Assembly and Lieutenant-Governor of New York. He is a prominent member of the New York bar, and is active in important industrial and financial interests.

Photograph by Davis & Mott

THOMAS F. RYAN

Thomas F. Ryan, one of the most prominent of American financiers, had an important part in the Democratic National Convention at St. Louis. As a Southern man—a delegate from Virginia—he was instrumental in securing the acquiescence of the Southern delegates in the situation brought about by Judge Parker's telegram on the money question. He was also the principal influence in the selection of the candidate for Vice President, Bruce R. Davis of West Virginia, an old friend.

Blocking the Russian Retreat on the Yalu

By William Dinwiddie

Special Correspondent of "Harper's Weekly" in the Far East

PING-WANG-CHENG, MANCHOU-RI, May 1, 1905

"THERE were a thousand dead and wounded Russians in the little valley below us when the sun set on May 1," said smiling Colonel Hazada, of the Twenty-fourth Regiment of Japanese Infantry. "The charge came to the soldiers. I commanded that day, and we are grateful to our Emperor that it was so. No stage play or picture can ever rival the real scene in which we had the good fortune to take part as the actors. If we had been a little earlier the Russians would have retreated by another road, and if we had been a little later they would have escaped us entirely."

The colonel was talking, with a grave face now and twinkling, excited eyes, of the fight at Hamantung, where his regiment blocked the hurried flight of the Russians from the Yalu River, and where—caught like rats in a trap—the Russians bitterly fought like madmen, and laid down their lives in a glorious struggle. Thick snow fell on a battle-field strewn with the dead, on hill-sides and in tiny valleys where agonized voices, all night long, cried hoarsely, in guttural Russian, for a drop of water.

For the first time a foreman has leaped from the lips of the colonel, a major, and the only lieutenant left of one company of the valiant Twenty-fourth Regiment, which bore the brunt of the flooding attack, the story of this battle and the incidents of the two days which preceded it and led up to the sensational combat.

The relation runs—from their own words—that on the night of the 28th of April the Twelfth Division began crossing the Yalu about ten or twelve miles above Wain. Their artillery had searched the opposing hills across the river during daylight with out receiving an answering messenger of shell, and the pontoon-builders crept out into the river at nightfall, with boat after boat, anchoring them in the sluggish current side by side, and placing the continuing flooring upon these floating supports until shore was linked with shore by a buoyant causeway.

That there were Russians before them during the previous day had been made evident by a slight, intermittent rifle-fire, and once some two hundred Russians took down a small lateral creek, but, only to retreat in frantic haste under well-placed Japanese shrapnel.

Silently and almost on tiptoe the Twenty-fourth Regiment, in the advance, crept over the bridge, which swayed and protestingly creaked on its mechanical hinges, with inches seemingly like rifle-shots to the knee-knocking rate of the soldiers. Not a shot met them. The enemy had all retired the evening before.

It was right here that the fatal Russian blundering began. Between the point at which the Twelfth Division crossed the Yalu and the Ayho River, which is confluent to the Yalu six or seven miles farther south, there is a strip of willy, inconsistent hill country, which is desolate and brush-covered, broken into narrow valleys and razor-backed ridges, and cut into a hopeless tangle of food-worn ravines and gullies. There are no roads or trails, and the Russians badly determined that only a small force, at best, could ever hope to cross these bad lands, and that the main force would follow the line of least resistance along the Yalu River bank to the junction with the other river.

A whole division—the Twelfth—crossed this strip in a day and night. The thousands of men who accomplished the journey carried in provisions with them except the boiled rice in their little net-covered wicker baskets and in the aluminum food-bottles swung upon their belts. They were in heavy marching order, carrying nearly two hundred rounds of ammunition in handboxes and knapsacks, with their blankets slung at all.

The Twelfth Division had no wheeled artillery, but in its place a large number of mountain-guns, which are packed on horses, and—surprising as it is—every gun went through with them, though the horses often had to be pushed bodily up the steep or slimes by the soldiers, and, frequently losing their footing on the sharp declivities, rolled into the bottom of the gullies.

As they toiled shuffling up to the crests of the ridges, and stumbling and falling, they slid down into the streambeds, all day long on the 30th of April. Sweating, exhausted, almost too tired to eat, the night worked them some two miles from their destination—the banks of the Ayho. With hardly any sleep in the night of April 29—and I believe they had marched the day before—and the fearful march of the 30th from three o'clock in the morning to eight o'clock in the evening, it is little wonder that, as an officer remarked, "The men were difficult to wake up" at four o'clock in the morning of May 1.

But wake they did, and march too, for at daylight they held the crest of the hills before a weak Russian position.

It is an astounding fact that the Russian general, though he had works in which to prepare defenses, had practically failed to maintain a continuous line along the face of this tiny, shaly, by all the rules of the game, should at least have been supplied with ample iron-fences, so that in case reinforcements were demanded to repulse an attack they might have a protected fighting position.

However, though this was the only point from which his position on the banks of the Yalu could be successfully danked, he not only failed to build earthworks, but he never sent soldiers to repel the attack of the enemy in force.

The Japanese regiment which we were following had the extreme position on the right, while the other regiments reached down the Ayho to the left almost to a point contacting with the Second Division, which, on the 30th, was attacking the Russians with a direct frontal attack, and, as an illustration of what they could do with their artillery, had smothered the enemy's front under a most spectacular and destructive shell-fire from over a hundred guns.

The Twenty-fourth Regiment crossed the river without opposition, several miles behind the foremost Russian position in front of the Second Division. The same case in crossing was not the lot of the other regiments of the Twelfth Division, and the farther to the left they lay the more resistance they encountered from Russian rifle-fire, which indicated that the Japanese were at the threatened outposts of the Russian left. All in all, the Russian position was hardly held and by no great force of men, even as well down the Ayho (which springs in almost a complete bow from the Yalu).

My regiment crossed the river by wading, behind an island, and the smaller Japanese soldiers were up to their armpits in water for a hundred yards. In the second crossing from the island to the mainland they were hardly ankle-deep in water. There was no resistance in their immediate front until after they had moved a short distance farther to the right and up the hill, when contact was made with a small detachment of Russians, who were easily driven away.

The regiment rested in this position from nine o'clock in the morning until after ten, waiting for orders from headquarters. The order which came was to move up the river to a country road which led directly to Hamantung, eight miles away.

At the village on the banks of the Ayho where the road crossed the stream, the Russian commander had placed a force of four or five hundred men to guard the ford, considering this number sufficient to repulse any Japanese attack which might take place from this direction.

The Regiment at Ping-Wang-Cheng—Getting a Gun into Position

A quick, hard, and stubborn fight occurred at the outskirts of the village. The second battalion of the Twenty-fourth Regiment rushed the place, and the Russians retired, step by step, down the road, fighting fiercely as they backed up in position on the hills on each side of the roadway. They had no artillery and neither had this Japanese battalion of four companies.

The commanding officer, Major Okamura, followed orders to proceed to Hsinan by this road, which, by the way, joined the main road running from the Yalu River to Feng-Wang-Cheng and Liao-Yang on the Manchurian Railway at Hsinatou.

It was nearly noon as he and his men pressed on toward the peak, fighting precipitately every step of the way, for, as the Russians retired from one position, they took up another on the next set of hills, and stuck like bullocks until the Japanese soldiers had painfully climbed out through the lateral ravine beds to positions above and flanking to the right and left, the ground they occupied.

No reinforcements came to the assistance of this courageous little band of Russians, who fought, with gritted teeth, to prevent their enemy's soldiers from advancing to the main line of the Russian retreat, through Hsinatou.

Neither did the other companies of the Twenty-fourth Regiment join the second battalion until they had almost gained their goal—the road-crossing.

Where were the Russian reserves, five thousand strong, in a question which has been asked many times since the disastrous defeat of the five thousand who held the line on the Yalu.

The official reports of the Russians will show, the writer believes, that the five thousand troops which got away practically sold-free were not reserves at all, in the proper sense of the term. The Russian General Zvonovitch, finding, on April 30, how badly he had blundered in estimating the artillery strength of the Japanese, who nearly a hundred guns burst forth, with shrapnel and common shell, from concealed positions on the islands beneath his mountain-side trenches—a shell-fire which silenced every gun effort of his own artillery in less than ten minutes—determined on withdrawal, but again mistakenly attempted to protect the retreat of his baggage and wagon trains by holding his five thousand men in the trenches on the morning of May 1, against a force forty thousand strong.

If, after having been so hopelessly overwhelmed by artillery fire on April 30, he had taken his chance and pulled out his entire army during the night, he would undoubtedly have gotten away without heavy toll in lives, for the Japanese troops had all been making herculean efforts in the nature of night marches and heavy outmarching, and it would have tried their fine spirit to have followed them in retreat far more than that of the Russians who had been idly holding imperfectly fortified positions for several weeks.

The five thousand men left behind to fight eight times their number were deluged with a fearful artillery fire as soon as day-light permitted the Japanese gunners to discover their positions on the morning of the 1st. One or two absolutely futile attempts were made to open up their batteries, but almost the instant the first shell came screaming toward the Japanese line, fifty or more Japanese cannon broke loose in uncontrolled guffawing fury, and literally set the men and guns to pieces. The Russians stuck to their perilous positions for several hours, with two divisions of the First Army advancing boldly in their face, and, in fact, the last retreat began only when the left wing of the remaining third of the army—the Twelfth Division—began to come in on their flank, making it hopeless for them to prolong an absurdly losing contest.

The Russian general may have felt that he could safely withdraw his men at the last moment, but it is impossible to understand how he had the temerity to leave twenty-eight field-pieces within the zone of fire, instead of sending them on in full flight to the rear hours earlier, and leaving only light-footed soldiers to make the rear-guard fight.

Returning to our Japanese battalion of the Twenty-fourth Regiment, we find them divided, at two o'clock in the afternoon of May 1, lying flat down on hill ridges on opposite sides of the Hsinatou road, under short-range fire from two Russian guns which were part of the reserve under General Kerdzhievsky. As has been said, these guns occupied a position at right angles to the main road leading from the north.

The range was less than eight hundred yards, and an exhibition of shot, aimed always higher in artillery under the rifle fire of brave men was given. In less than fifteen minutes every man had been shot down around the guns, and when an attempt was made to gallop the horses in and take the guns out all the animals were killed. The Russians in confusion deserted the cannon and fled to the rear.

Now was the chance of the second battalion, just being reinforced by another battalion of their regiment on the right. Could they capture the guns and take the coveted position across the main road? At least they could try.

Fatigued almost to the point of exhaustion by twenty-eight hours of marching and fighting, with only a few hours' interval of rest between, they still had the vigor of battle excitement to request in command.

Ten companies crept down the hill toward the road, posting for breath, with eyes fixed on the prize—the two grim destroyers of life, standing side by side on the opposite skyline except for the stream of dead and wounded lying limply heaped in dark spots on a yellow background of earth.

Defused by the stream of rapid rifle fire from their supporting companies they heard not the soldier thinking of three hundred horses, each bearing a beautiful Coosack in high bridle—hat and long tasseled boots, who was sauntering down upon them with uplifted sabre from the left. The cavalry were upon them and almost over them before they recovered from the startling shock.

A wave, a rally, and the gallant Japanese knelt, being fall in the ensuing front of rearing horses. In turn, the shoulder of a battalioi ran through the Russian lines. Horses fell headlong and riders fell headlong over them. Sabres fell in nervous arms, and forces surged in the saddle or hurklingly fell forward on the backs of horses, in a blind effort to secure support. A few galloped on ahead of the attacking line, which stopped, wheeled, and retreated in disorder.

Now were dropping fast in the thin Japanese line on the hillside. A new enemy had come into the game of death. He the rounded hill-top overlooking and enshading their own position, to the extreme left and not over four hundred yards away, the flanking guard of the Russian troops had appeared, and opened a merciless fire on the handful of Japanese soldiers.

Overpowered for the moment, and holding an exposed position where it was impossible to carry on anything but a fatally losing contest, they sped up the hill to its crest, and once more, belly flat and in changed front, they answered the fire of their new-found foe.

No leave was the struggle that the dead and wounded were left on the hillside for the time, and before the savage fighting again anew had had time to recover their breath the renewed cavalry made another dash straight for the hilltop where they lay. Once the dead and dying they galloped, only to retreat again before the shattering rifle fire.

The Japanese failed to take the battery, and the enemy's cavalry, finding not only this body of men but their comrades on

(Continued on page 115.)

A Detachment of Japanese Artillery crossing a River in Boats

The Presentation of University Burs and Associates for Honorary Degrees at Oxford passing Birmingham College on the way in the Ashmolean Theatre, where the Degree of D.Litt. (Hons) was conferred upon Mr. Howells

W. D. Howells, D.Litt. (Oxon)

By Sydney Brooks

Oxford, July 6, 1904.

THE Oxford undergraduate is a fraud. So, too, is "Commons." (Need I say that "Commons" is the accepted abbreviation for common-sense work, the great work of the Oxford year, the work that mounts through concerts, theatricals, garden-parties, flower-shows, and half a dozen balls to the crowning scene in the Sheldonian Theatre when the university confers honorary degrees on the distinguished sons of England and the world?) The Oxford undergraduate and Commons are both, I repeat to say, in a conspiracy of fraud. This is a disabusing opinion to have to express, but candid compels that it should be made known. However, there are reservations to be made. If you are the sister, or, better still, the girl cousin of a popular undergraduate, and fulfil the main qualifications of that dignity by being able and willing to dance all night for a week on end, then Commons is a sheer delight. If you are the mother or father of an undergraduate who has won the Newdigate or the Unwin prize for Greek verse or the Chancellor's prize for Latin verse and are privileged to hear him recite his composition in the Sheldonian, then also Commons will be a time of anxious pleasure. But if dancing bore you and a giggle strikes you no little less asinine in an Oxford quad than in a cathedral, and you prefer to steep yourself in the beauty and the calm of this incomparable place without the aid of an insistent gaiety—if, in short, what grips you in Oxford is Oxford itself, then you will stay away from Commons and make your visit during one of the variations or in ordinary term time when all is normal and accident. In any case, if you are wise you will not go to the Eckenina. The feature of the Eckenina is the conferring of degrees at the Sheldonian Theatre. Somehow, I know not how, legends have gathered round the proceedings that, in the light of the reality seen like satire. Perhaps there were once undergraduates who envied them with a running fire of chess. Our last head—who has not died of the daring soul who greeted Tennessee, as heavy-eyed, comely described, he came forward to receive his degree with a "Did they make and call you early?" He may have been a fact, but I begin to doubt it. These tales of undergraduates crowding the upper galleries of the Sheldonian, cheering and cut-calling, making all else inaudible, the chancellor's speech dumb, the orators penitential gaspulators—myths, all myths. And yet they are still believed. Whoever is honored by the Society with a D.C.L., a D.Sc., or a D.Litt., leaves himself for an ordeal of irrelevant and probably personal criticism from the galleries. Lord Kitchener a few years ago seemed quite nervously expectant of what would be shouted at him. Nothing was shouted, nothing ever is. I stand a couple of days now for three and a half hours on the floor of the Sheldonian and watched the proceedings from start to finish. The annual meeting of a company that was paying a ten-per-cent. dividend could hardly have been tamer. There was indeed, one undergraduate who wanted the organist to play "Mr. Healey" and expressed his wishes from time to time, but without any real fire or conviction. There were also undergraduates who laughed and cheered whenever the chancellor (Lord Tweedmouth) stumbled in his Latin. There were others who shouted "How Ray" when Lord Ray, the president of the British Academy, came up for his degree. Somebody yelled not once, but often, "Speak up, sir," when the Regius Professor of Greek presented the nominator for the degree of D.Litt. in an all too inaudible voice. "Try a megaphone," exclaimed some one else. "We can't hear you," said a third. "Oh, never mind," drawled a fourth in accents of weary contempt; while a fifth at irrelevant intervals shouted, "No, no" or "Hear, hear," as the mood took him. And when the winner of the Newdigate recited his poem in a voice of interminable dolour, a plaintive noise, half sigh, half groan, came from the mouth of a listener with more or less apathy. But that was all, and as a specimen of undergraduate wit and uproariness it hardly deserves a high rank.

What brought me to Oxford was the pleasure of seeing the degree of D.Litt. conferred on Mr. W. D. Howells. It is a distinction not easily earned nor lightly bestowed, and America may well claim a share in the honor so gracefully done to her best beloved man of letters. As it happened, America had a twofold interest in the proceedings, for among the degrees of D.Litt. conferred was one on Mr. Sargent. The Sheldonian is a round theatre, built by Sir Christopher Wren after a Roman model, and though apparently small, capable of holding nearly four thousand people. On Wednesday last the tiers and galleries were filled to the uttermost, the lower ones by ladies and dons, the topmost one by undergraduates, while on the floor stood the graduates and strangers, clustering round a passageway through which the procession was to pass. At eleven o'clock the chancellor, in his black and gold state robes, attended by two pages, and followed by the heads of the colleges in their scarlet gowns, entered the theatre and passed up to the platform. The list of proposed degrees was at once read out by the chancellor, and the pleasure of the house asked in the time-honored Latin form, and signified in cries of "Placet." Those on whom the degree of Doctor of Civil Law was to be conferred were then summoned into the theatre and took their seats in the reserved passageway. One by one they were presented to the chancellor by the Regius Professor of Civil Law in a series of speeches describing their achievements in the choicest Latin. The chancellor replied in a few complimentary words, and formally admitted each nominee to the degree. The person so honored then mounted the platform, shook hands with the chancellor, and took his appointed seat to the right or left. The loudest cheers among the D.C.L.'s were given to the French ambassador, M. Cambou, to the Archbishop of Canterbury, to Lord Curzon, to Lieutenant-General French, to Mr. George Wyndham, and to Mr. Sargent. In presenting Mr. Sargent, the Regius Professor of Civil Law described him as a famous master of painting (teleberrimus pictor omnium scolas artis pingere magistrum), whose remarkable portraits of men and women of the manual exhibitions are behest with the greatest adumbration. Such is the beauty, grace, the refinement, and great dignity of his portraits that we only quarrel with the artist because we cannot speak to him or embrace them (quarum adumbratum personarum tanta pulchritudo, tanta venustas, tot illiberae, talis cum dignitate gravitas, ut id ipsum pictori obijcere aut inquisire relligum quod nullo modo cum illius ad colloquium pervenire, nisi

MR. W. D. HOWELLS AT OXFORD—THE GROUP OF DISTINGUISHED NOMINEES ON WHOM THE ENGLISH UNIVERSITY RECENTLY CONFERRED DEGREES

[illegible]

THE FIRST PUBLIC APPEARANCE OF PO THE SACRED COLLEGE AT

The photograph shows His Holiness Pope Pius X. at his first public celebration of the Mass and surrounded by the Sacred College. The occasion was the recent canonization of St. John Venerable.

Pope Pius X.

POPE PIUS X. AND THE CARDINALS OF ST. PETER'S

Mass in St. Peter's, seated on the elevated throne facing the pontifical altar, in honor of Saint Gregory the Great, which was attended by 40,000 people modi sermones ratiocinationes et ipsa amplecti possumus). To which the chancellor would have added, "Vir spectabilissimus in arte mirabilis, sapientissimus, erga aristocraticos non et totius Universitatis admittit se ad gradum Doctoris in Jure Civili honoris causa."

Among the Doctors of Science it was, of course, Signor Marconi who drew the most attention. Nothing could well have been more cordial than the greeting offered him. The Doctors of Letters came last on the list of degrees. Lord Blyth headed them, then followed Sir Spencer Walpole, the historian, and then Mr. W. D. Howells. A hearty, long continued clasp of the utmost kindness greeted him from all parts of the house as he moved to the side of the Regius Professor of Greek who presented him and again when he shook hands with the chancellor. There should be a law passed in New York making it obligatory on Mr. Howells never to stir out of doors without the scarlet robes and mortarboard cap of an Oxford D. Litt. His strong and composed face, so full of thought and kindness, never, I thought, looked more attractive than when he stood listening with a grave anxiety to the tribute of the regius professor. After welcoming him as the citizen of a nation so closely connected in many ways with England (idem Americanum, a gente remota quoniam, sed diu nobis non minus necessarium vinculis conjunctum, quam nos etiam conjunctum fore speramus), the regius professor went on to describe him as a writer of great distinction in several departments of literature, as poet, critic, and novelist ("scriptoribus eximio politus et eruditum, et in omni parte litterarum americanarum laudatum, et laudem, potant, habentem elegantissimam)—one whose pictures of life and character were universally admired for their truth and artistic finish (nam in romanticis litterarum genere quo ad omnia laudem habuit et precibus inventa laudum—quoniam altissimum aestheticum bonumque depinxerat, quanta cum veritate, quanta lepore?).

The speech concluded with a recognition of the exact type of Mr. Howells's descriptions of Italy and Italian life. When it was over Mr. Howells took a step forward, bowed slightly to the chancellor, who rose and said, "Vir egregius, magnus gallice gentis R.R. acceptissimus, qui narrationibus pulcherrimis et munus nostratum corda pertinetur colles, ego auctoritate mea et totius Universitatis adhibito te ad gradum Doctoris in Literis honoris causa." Distinguished sir, I have favored you of a kindred race, and skilled to praise our hero, too, by the beauty and delight of your tales, I, etc., etc.). Then Mr. Howells stepped on to the platform, shook hands with the chancellor in a round rhombus of applause, and passed in a half-fledged knight's sent on his right—leaving, I hope, as pleased as all as we left who could claim any connection, however remote it might be, with him or with his country.

"Rim, Romanism, and Rebellion"

How James G. Blaine was Defeated by a Phrase

By Frank W. Mack

STANDING between the two men on the staircase of the Fifth Avenue Hotel after dinner, standing in 1884, I heard the Rev. Dr. Richard lead James G. Blaine as the leader of Republican hosts against "the party whose antecedents had been Rim, Romanism, and Rebellion." My gaze had been fixed intently upon Mr. Blaine's earnest, sad smiling face as he spoke, but instantly the famous obliteration reached my ear I turned to see how Blaine received it. I felt that something had happened—something hard, impatient. But Mr. Blaine had not been so impressed. Indeed, I do not believe he heard the three awful words. It is my conviction that while they reached his ear they were not stored in his brain. His eyes were gazing over the heads of the crowd below him. They were weary, but not observing eyes. He was worried by Israel, anxious about the election-year crisis which was then less than one week away. Surely he was safe in the hands of a company of clergymen who were there to help him. They had gathered, not was the oratory was pouring over him. Might he not relax without fear? And so, I believe, Blaine's mind was somewhere away off, lost perhaps with other plans.

A Presidential candidate was in deadly peril, but did not know it. He was being defeated among his adherents five days before the battle of the ballots. The hostile words of the friendly old preacher flouted just him unheeded; in his response he failed to rebuke them, and the supreme moment of opportunity had gone by. "Destiny had waited just around the corner," but turned now away and laid a new trail for history.

Through all these years I was responsible to the Associated Press for the national end of politics in New York city at the close of that great campaign. That Wednesday morning the manager had objected to my shortening his staff by taking away Lessey and Morgan, and directed for the Fifth Avenue Hotel, where that meeting of destinies that any man should be able to report alone," he said. On the face of things before the event it looked that way, and I frankly admitted as much. But inside me, somewhere behind the brain, I felt an insistent impulse to caution.

News of a Clerical Malaise

"But you don't need two stenographers," protested the manager. "The shorthand man can take it all and then get it out soon enough for first editions—guess the world isn't so damned anxious to get quick news about this clerical malaise."

My mentality agreed with his, and I felt half silly about it, but beyond that was the dread lest something of importance be forgotten. Being responsible, I insisted on that ground and, with the two stenographers, waited for the Fifth Avenue Hotel, where the reception to Mr. Blaine was to occur. I left alone then, like one who has got up in the night and made note of something he might otherwise have forgotten. I would "do" the introduction and the descriptive part of the story.

On the parlor floor of the Fifth Avenue Hotel, one flight above the offices, a deeply carpeted space forms a covert upon which upon the reception parlors and the great dining-hall, and from which cascade the corridors and out of which rises the broad staircase to upper floors.

A sizable and increasing company of men were shuffling in groups about the broad hall, and the place was brightened by women who had sought this available spot to observe a great man, and though no one yet suspected a great event.

It was the Wednesday before election day. The great men greeted and hesitated each other with that impatient air that marks the mass apart from the world when occasionally it steps in to rob against real life. A few hardheads like Dr. MacArthur and Dr. James M. King emphasized the almost Jewish earnestness of the others. For the day at least the clerical heart warmed even toward the Jews, for there among them was Rabbi E. H. M. Strauss. His powerful was the Pharaoh Knight; the peoples of the earth had risen up to call him good, and the numbers glowed with pleasure and importance.

"I am here; that shows where I stand," loudly spoke the Plymouth Church assistant, Rev. S. B. Halliday.

And his brethren cheered and wrung his hand and stepped his back, for he was not as a lizard plucked from the Plymouth tower. Yet, for Halliday's club, the great floor, had just delivered his famous campaign speech in behalf of Cleveland.

Editor Henry M. Field of the Evening Star was in the throng, and also Cyrus Palmer, Dr. Richard, Dr. Spears, Dr. Burdwell, and Dr. Samuel S. Spencer, who was editor of The Independent.

Ah, yes, this is important—the question of who were present, for did not a storm of controversy follow as to who were and who were not?

The Welcome to Blaine

I imagine 400 or 500 persons may have stood crowded together when the speaking began, though afterwards one side claimed that a thousand men, including the great pulpit leaders of New York, were there. On the other hand, the World, denouncing by exclusion, printed a list of pulpit leaders who were sitting to say they had not attended—among them Dr. Houghton, Henry V. Sallabee, Charles B. Parkhurst, Henry Van Dyke, Marvin B. Vincent, Benjamin F. Woodson, John R. Paxton, Thomas McKee Brown, Vermilyea, Howland, and Gallaudet.

In due and deliberate time, as chairman, Rev. Dr. Samuel S. Spencer, who was editor of The Independent, the proper committee proceeded to summon the object of their courtesies. They trod with slow dignity up the broad, heavily polished staircase. Feasting thickly about the foot of the stairs, the people waited. Mr. Blaine was also waiting with members of his family, in their room above. Presently a number among the people gave into a murmur of suppressed comment. The great man was in sight on the upper landing. As he came down into full view and glanced over the crowd of white faces in the dimly lighted hall, one voice broke through the murmuring with a shout—went on the balcony of the balcony of the balcony which followed.

Dr. Spears beside Mr. Blaine looked pleased and proud. Had he not brought to them the object of their political fever? Verily so. And then the lusty cheering grew new as the people behind Mr. Blaine his wife and two daughters, Emma and Walker, his sons, and the little Levi P. Shollen.

The accompanying party paused at the sweeping curve of the staircase and Mr. Blaine descended alone. He stopped some half-dozen steps from the bottom. His face was very pale, and his white hair gleamed in the light. He had just returned from a trip to the West. Dark shadows were under his eyes. He was desperately weary, but he flashed a quick smile over the faces staring at him, and then turned with a little motion of self-satisfaction to Dr. Spears at his side.

At the moment Dr. Spears began a few words of preliminary welcome, a tall, strong, slender, loose-jointed man stepped up out of the crowd on to the staircase. His head was big and slightly bent, and his carefully brushed gray hair fitted well the largely built and heavy lined face. Reaching the second broad step the tall man paused, leaning against the wall.

When Mr. Blaine came to a stand on the staircase I leaped up ed and gone off at a tangent. Years before Mr. Blaine had referred to Blaine's eating as "a startling turkey cook," and now Crinkling and his stalwarts were sitting on top of the fence to see the Blaine procession go by. Of course there were some dainty people who protested against the use of derelicts with which to dump scandal over the head of Mr. Cleveland. Outside the question of decency, they held it to be a dangerous thing to make a martyr of an enemy.

Oh yes, those elements were all operating against the Republican candidate, but every man must meet hostility, and these forces could be overcome at the polls. Which was true of the schedule just named. Despite their influence Mr. Blaine could have won. But here within five days of election another antagonism was added to the schedule, and Fate, "standing just around the corner," rubbed our heads with scornful union.

New York by a Thousand Plurality

And it may be said here, as it will later be said in history, that, minus any one of the obstacles just named, Mr. Blaine would have been President of the United States. New York was vital, and it gave Mr. Cleveland a plurality of 1047. Any one of the scheduled forces carried this many votes against Blaine. Could he have won or escaped any one of them he would have succeeded. Could he have been delivered from the minority's no-one another story would have been written. The combination was just strong enough to defeat the dearest ambition of Blaine's life, and did so.

On Thursday morning the Herald printed the brief address of Dr. Burdard, including the Three E's, and the country first heard of Burdard through the roll and rumble of his altercation. The Times and the World, though latterly open-eyed Mr. Blaine, did not print the Burdard utterance. Why, I have never understood. Each had printed the local burst of the Associated Press—a copy of Miley's transcribed notes. Possibly some sorry little copy-trader had squeezed a mere meeting of dummies into the "political news notes," or had reduced it to a meagre paragraph with a single line head. The weekly Union and Catholic Times did not print it. On Thursday it was referred to the incident with levity more potent than any other.

"At the meeting of the managers with Blaine at this city Wednesday, the Rev. Dr. Burdard said in his address to Blaine: 'You represent all the virtues Mr. Cleveland represents: Eum, Romanism, and Rebellion.' The World repeated this, and the Democratic press on Friday got into full swing editorially. Dr. McElwain wrote and published a letter of vehement protest, and the Three E's became to the coming canvass what the Money letter had been to the faithful campaign four years before.

The Democrats, to show their campaign on Saturday night with a great parade through the streets of New York, and mean while the sign-painters in Ann Street were busy night and day preparing "Eum, Romanism, and Rebellion" transparencies. On Saturday morning, six days before election, Dr. Burdard over his signature published a card to the public. He declared the purpose of his words had been solely mischievous; that he did not intend to cast any reflection on the Roman Catholic Church, and was speaking only of the doings of the Democratic party; that he believed in religious freedom, and that he alone was responsible for the language and sentiment of his address.

This contribution from Dr. Burdard did more harm than good. It evoked peevish laughter from the enemies of Blaine and groans of disgust from his friends. To some minds its last sentence confirmed the shifty rumor that Dr. Burdard was at heart a Cleveland man, and that he had poisoned the Blaine address to help his favorite. This rumor was as wicked as it was ridiculous, and it is mentioned here only to indicate the fevered condition twenty years ago.

How Blaine Took It

Saturday came, and despite the jangling clamor of friends and foes there was no syllable from Mr. Blaine to believe or destroy the old preacher's deadly jangle. The friends were frantic and impatient. The foes were playful and very active.

"Does he not dare touch it?" cried one. "Very well—does he understate it?" wondered the other. "Very well—he shall see."

My belief is that, until the end of the week, Mr. Blaine thought the matter would pass under and be lost before election-day.

It was not until Saturday evening, in a speech delivered at New Haven, while Democratic thousands were parading New York beneath the banners from Ann Street print-shops, that Mr. Blaine first referred to the Burdard blunder. The ash and crystal of it all lay in his last sentence.

"Although Burdard, by conviction and connected with a Protestant church, I should esteem myself all any man the most degraded if, under any pressure or under any temptation, I should in any measure, make a disrespectful allusion to that ancient faith in which we never received moral lived and died."

On my way to Mr. Blaine's rooms at the Fifth Avenue Hotel Sunday night I met his valiant supporter, Patrick Ford, in the corridor. He had just left the Blaine apartment alone. I saw him come forth. Within, I found Mr. Blaine standing near a table in the centre of the room. Beside the table sat Garrett A. Hoad, who was to become Vice-President of the United States twelve years later. Their conversation ceased immediately I entered. They had been having a conference, I thought—the three men, Blaine, Hoad, and Ford. I think so today.

"Yes, I have something for publication to-night," said Mr. Blaine. He pushed a chair for me at the table. "Please write," he added, still standing, while Hoad watched across at the work.

Beside me on my desk as I set down these recollections is a little small and time-yellowed slip of paper on which I wrote at Blaine's dictation that Sunday night, two days before his defeat in 1884. There are some creases and some interesting dew in Blaine's hand, and beside these sheets of copy lies the pen which he used. He began his dictation thus:

"A delegation of Catholics, headed by Patrick Ford, editor of the Irish World, called this evening to extend congratulations to Mr. Blaine upon the manner in which he had referred to Rev. Dr. Burdard's infelicitous remark at the late meeting of unionists in this city."

"Mr. Ford are the other members of the delegation—who besides Ford?" I asked. Blaine was annoyed. He spoke shortly.

"Never mind about that—continue, please."

"But, Mr. Blaine, I must have the names of Mr. Ford's colleagues." Whereat Mr. Blaine was clearly vexed. Hoad now moved nervously, glancing from one to the other. With fine tact he spoke in that tone of comradeship which, when softly used, is very potent with a young reporter.

"Mr. Blaine does not care to give any other names—it makes no difference to you, my dear boy."

The Mysterious Delegation

"Pardon me," I urged, "it does make a difference. The first question at the office and next from the public will be as to the identity of the entire delegation." Mr. Blaine spoke quickly, at once unrepentant.

"Merely say that Mr. Blaine gave out no other names."

"But that does not absolve me," I persisted. "Names are names in this matter; and, besides, I saw Mr. Ford coming out long here alone just now—did he remain after the others had gone, or were there no others?" Mr. Blaine's eye clouded slightly. He was tired, anxious, possibly desperate—must he be forever harassed by this stretched business? His breath was coming for an explosion, but the faithful Hoad lifted a restraining hand, and spoke hastily, and leaped across the table.

"There, my boy, don't be suspicious," smiled Hoad. "It is a stand just as it is and held us responsible—on your report, if necessary." The indrawn breath exhaled from Mr. Blaine's lips in a weary sigh. The reporter was rather enojed or cramped—it does not now matter which. Mr. Blaine continued the dictation, and I cut from the sheets the words which he said. He was closing down his utterance of the night before at New Haven, and I reproduce it as a fine example of subtle disposition:

"In reply to the congratulations Mr. Blaine reaffirmed the position he had taken in his New Haven speech. He said:

"Religious liberty is the essential basis of our land, freedom of conscience is the inalienable right of every American citizen, as free or naturalized. Whoever violates that freedom strikes at the foundation of the republic. As a Protestant I demand for the Catholic precisely the same liberty of action, the same respect for conscientious belief as I claim for myself. Perfect religious liberty is the highest attainment of a free Christian nation, and that liberty implies mutual tolerance, respect for each other's rights of conscience, and a generous spirit of Christian charity."

The sophistry of this ingenious distortion lies, as we can better see at this distance from the turmoil of its birth, in the fact that it challenges nothing which Dr. Burdard had said, and it sends bravely to the eye and appears fair to the eye, yet it did not touch the poison in the Three E's. Indeed, Dr. Burdard's nod to the public on the day before had declared just as readily for religious freedom and tolerance.

Had Mr. Blaine in one sentence demolished the classification of "Romanism" with "Eum" and "Rebellion" the Burdard card would have been instantly quarantined. And the fern and of Blaine appreciated this, as is shown in his next dictation:

"Mr. Patrick Ford remarked that it was a very gratifying circumstance that in an excited campaign, in which American Republicans were taking part, this remark [Burdard's allusion; assailing Romanism with Eum and Rebellion] was the first and only word spoken, so far as he had heard, tending to wound the feelings of Catholics."

It cannot be doubted, I think, that Mr. Blaine would have deemed Dr. Burdard's correction of "Romanism" with "Eum" and "Rebellion" if he so doing he could thus have composed an aside without arousing the echo. And just there, I imagine, by the problem that bound his hand and tongue until the electric hour drew near he set forth.

The Author of the Three E's

On the following Tuesday, Mr. Blaine was defeated by the misleading tribe of joint votes in New York State.

And Dr. Burdard? He became the most hated and the most ridiculed citizen of the republic. The burden of Blaine's defeat was fastened upon his giant shoulders. His influence and position were almost destroyed, and a year later he resigned his pulpit and quit the editorial chair, when political passion had cooled. I met him socially. We never introduced.

"It is the renewal of an acquaintance," I remarked.

"Have I met you before?" he asked, and peered down at me with his keen eyes.

"I stood before you when you addressed Mr. Blaine in the 1884 campaign," I recalled.

A queer look crept into his face—a compound of awe and smile and fear.

"Ah, yes," he mused, "it was a bitter, bitter thing; but it came to me sometimes now that I may have been, after all, a humble instrument in the hands of a greater Power."

Russia's Commander in the East

By Charles Johnston

GENERAL KUROPAKIN is reported to have said, when setting forth across Siberia: "The first month they will say that I am inactive, the second that I am incapable, and the third that I am a traitor, because we shall be repulsed and beaten. I shall let the people talk, I shall suffer by my resolution and to advance before July, when I shall have the forces I need."

We are not compelled to believe this story. General Kuropatkin is not glib. Nor have his countrymen uttered a single criticism of his Far Eastern policy, although three battles of first importance have been lost since he took command. But the story will express the difficulties Kuropatkin is facing.

We should think of Kuropatkin as by temperament a student, and with much of the gentleness of a student. When chief of staff in Shakhoff he always tried to spare the men, to gain points with the greatest economy of suffering, to save the regiments in his charge whenever possible. Yet, without, he is an essentially martial spirit and has a record for countless heroisms under fire which would have won him half a dozen Victoria Crosses had he been in the British army, and did, in fact, win him all the distinctions for signal valor that are in the gift of the Russian Empire. The picture of General Kuropatkin shows a series of brilliant decorations, nearly every one of them representing a dangerous wound received in battle, on fields as wide apart as the Sahara and Gobi desert.

We hear constant rumors from the front of relentless disagreements between General Kuropatkin and Admiral Alekseeff about nearly every movement in the war. They probably represent the fact that Kuropatkin was an ardent adherent of the "peace party," and, like Minister Witte, heartily disapproved of the policy which made war with Japan inevitable. Admiral Alekseeff thought and acted as a naval officer whose mind was filled with questions of naval bases and strategy. He saw Russia's Siberian fleet cut in two by the Korean peninsula, just as the French fleet is cut in two by Spain, and there is little doubt that he hoped to absorb the whole region down to Fusan and ultimately to turn it into Russian territory. He is also a very ambitious man, and hoped to make a reputation rivaling Mirzoeff of the Azov, such a reputation as links the name of Lord Buffen with Burma, of Lord Roberts with Kandahar, of Lord Kitchener with the Sudan. As far as the question of morality is concerned, Yvonne Alekseeff is in exactly the same position as these distinguished men, all alike representing the principle of aggression and expansion. His real fault is that while they succeeded he has failed. Alekseeff failed because he ignored the deep-seated hostility and immense energy of Japan and the lasting jealousy of Russia which inspires certain modern poets.

General Kuropatkin, on the contrary, was thoroughly alive to the political and military dangers in Alekseeff's path. When he visited the Far East a year ago Kuropatkin spent some time in Japan, and was cordially received by the leading statesmen and soldiers of the Mikado's Empire. He familiarized himself with the Japanese military system, saw recruits being trained in the German towns, and visited the arsenals. He was deeply impressed by the completeness and thoroughness of Japan's military preparations, and was under no illusion as to the formidable nature of the forces which the Island Empire could put into the field.

General Kuropatkin is thus called to lead an army, which he knows to be ill prepared, against a foe whose invincible power he heartily recognizes, in a war which he almost certainly disapproves from a political, not less than from a military, standpoint. But like all patriotic Russians his one thought now is the safety of his country, and towards this end he is bending the energies of a strong intellect and the riches of a vast experience.

Thoroughly alive to the strength of the Japanese army, he is equally aware of the great difficulties which the forces of his country have to overcome, and of the weak points and obstacles in the task before him. During seven years' service at the War Ministry General Kuropatkin had to master the formidable problems involved in the organization of the greatest army in the world. For Russia has an army of over a million in a year's foundation, with effective reserves which bring the total up to the millions in time of war.

The greatest difficulties which Kuropatkin has to face are administrative rather than tactical. For these he has been to some extent prepared by his experience as Governor General of Transcaucasia from 1880 to 1887. Before his appointment in Transcaucasia, General Kuropatkin spent seven years in St. Petersburg, at the headquarters of the general staff, and as special lecturer on military strategy at the General Staff Academy. During this and a previous period he was a great writer; and, although much of what he has written is reserved for the use of the officers of his army, he has published much that is of high literary value. One noteworthy is the great work, in two volumes, on the Russo-Turkish war of 1877-1878; Lozku, Phrygia, Mesopotamia, and The Crimea of General Shakhoff's Division. Two other works of great value are Ukraine and Koshkova, each of which commemorates an episode of picturesque adventure in Kuropatkin's life.

To give an adequate account of Kuropatkin as a fighter would be to retrace the military history of Russia for a generation. He was one of the leading figures in the great drama of Russian expansion in Central Asia, in which General Kaufmann was protagonist, and whose chief incidents were the conquest of Bokhara, Khiva, and Kokand. Kuropatkin played a foremost part in the advance on Khiva and Bokhara, and was several times wounded and decorated for signal valor. In the Turcoman campaign, which followed a few years later, he was also a fighting spirit, and he then helped to conquer the regions which, as this error of Transcaucasia, he was to administer ten years later.

Kuropatkin's part in the Russo-Turkish war of 1877-1878, which strengthened Russian, made Serbia a kingdom, and Bulgaria an independent principality, and which would have liberated Macedonia also had it not for the interference of England, Germany, and Austria, is a part of European history. As chief of staff to Shakhoff he was the mind of the Russian army during the war, and every book on that contest is full of his exploits.

General Kuropatkin at Kow-Iang—Reviewing Russian Troops on the recent Anniversary of the Emperor's Birth

Ducks by Sydney Adams

Point Shooting

By Robert W. Chambers

IN point shooting, which has such a charm for so many, and among the many for the writer, perhaps the first and most important rule is absolute self-concealment, and after this self-concealment is accomplished, the second rule is to maintain silent immobility while sweeping sky and water with eyes that miss nothing from horizon to horizon. The third rule is to place your decoys properly. This trio of field tricks is not easy to learn, first, because in the beginning amateurs can scarcely understand the necessity for such precautions; second, because the process is both nerve and muscle exercising.

Point shooting differs, of course, according to locality; and the rules which govern it are learned to modify accordingly, either through the advice of local experts or through experience where mortifying blunders and empty game-bags speak more plainly than the worst of snakes. In all its alluring simplicity the problem is this—to take station in such a manner that the various bunches of wild ducks passing in to rest or passing out to feed shall come within range of your point and decoys.

The hours for shooting, therefore, are usually from dawn until ten o'clock in the morning, and from just before sunset until too dark to shoot. There are, however, border-line days when the ducks are restless and continually on the wing; and on such days one may look for ducks and trouble at any hour. Ducks are as capricious as trout in their habits, different species of ducks decoy in different ways. Mallards coming in may swing around after the first shifted salute, and drive past again, grounded for another, and sometimes even two or three more volleys.

Black ducks waste no time after the first crack of the gun; indeed, in the writer's limited experience, the black duck seldom decoys in the open, and it's a shot orbed out of good by its duck-ness. However, difficult as the wily black duck is to decoy, he can be brought in on the marshes to call and stand just at dusk. As for stalking a black duck, it requires the most careful work, and is successful only in fifty times. I recall one such incident. We were three guns on an inland marsh or slough. The ducks had fed and trilled and floated in; our squawking tame decoys was no good; we were cold, wet, and hungry; and we took our departure.

When about half a mile away a bunch of twelve black ducks came bounding along, low down, and dropped exactly in front of the grass land where we had been squawking. Holding a brief indecisive council we admitted the probable impossibility of stalking those ducks. Yet the sight of wary duck heads raised above the dead marsh-grass excited us to try. And try we did, making a slow, painful circle of a mile, creating creeping, and daring to fill a head. Through a mass of swamp bushes I suddenly saw a single duck rise its head within range. It was now or never; at a word we jumped up; a solitary black duck finished, and six barrels made use of what we supposed to be the only failure. Thus the slinking spectacle presented itself of eleven large fat black ducks clattering up within range and departing at the speed of an express-train leaving records.

If anybody thinks a black duck gives one time to stuff a shell into a lever, experience may modify that belief. Ducks, particularly black ducks, are funny about decoys. I have sat for hours listening to an old black duck quacking, and watching her swimming about just out of range of the decoys, where the more credulous mallards were steering blither and blither, poking the wooden decoys with their bills. Next new decoys painted like life are usually of no more value than battered old cork decoys, regardless of color, black, and created with sea slugs. Canvas decoys are handy at times, and often very good for mallard; but I have seen canvas decoys repeatedly ignore their own decoys, and stand to a bunch of cork half a mile out.

A black duck knows his business as a rule. I remember one mad attempt made by my brother and myself to bring some big bunches of black ducks within range. We began elaborately; we purchased many cans of different colored paints; we rolled the lumber room for stumps and logs; we enlisted a dozen small boys. Then we began shaping the bodies for twenty decoys: one youth to rough him, one to plume, one to shape, my brother to carve, and I to finish.

Then we carved the heads, and set each head upon a neck. Then we inserted heads of tin snail-corks. Now we were ready for the color; and I am free to say that those decoys were almost perfectedly reduced. One or two redheads and mallards we added to the details; people came far to observe our wonderful handiwork. We could scarcely wait for the decoys to dry. At last the day of days arrived. Dawa found us squinting behind a most artistic blind with five and twenty marvellous decoys riding the waves off the shore. So lifelike they appeared that it gave us a start every now and then to peer out at them; and once, when a lone birddiver belated us among them, the excitement in that blind was worse than hysterical.

It grew hot in the blind. Our duck-call quacked drowsily; in many we observed black ducks dropping in; here a bunch on the water was persistently splashing; there a bunch swam cheerily across the shining ripples. That never a duck stopped our way; now a duck even declined to swing overhead. It was heart-breaking. It was incredible. How could they resist those decoys? Well, with unmet expectations I found out that, though the one shining on a live duck's horn-shaped wing makes it glitter like metal at times, so live ducks still drop to a wooden duck which shows the slightest trace of glitter. Head color, dead flesh, is a weakness; the slightest bit of glitter excites suspicion. Also elaborately shaped decoys are not necessary; an odd lot of driftwood looking usually looks like a duck, and the roughly shaped cork decoys, battered, matted, and broken back, at a few rods, so exactly like ducks that I have time after time been deceived by other people's decoys, and have often deceived other people.

The most wise project has been to make the male's decoys as such an ass as he might seem to many; he is only a visitor of good sportsmanship which requires a wing shot for every cork in the blind. Point shooting in the North often means wintery work in frozen blind, salt water that put like scintillating snow, ice-cold decoys, and fingers sometimes too numb to draw trigger or hook breed. This is the extreme, and its many gradations breed what for comparison may be called autumn aurnath, as what Northern point shooters expect.

They learn to distinguish a coming flock of ducks when the hunter is but a dot on the gray horizon; they learn to distinguish even the particular species of duck when the individual birds are no larger than dark dots against the sky. The old boys know; if it be heard he will tell you; if it be wisdom, redneck broadheads, huff-heads, shillshanks, he will surely tell you, and tell you correctly, though the distant birds be not as large as the head of a pin against the sky.

There is less of mystery in this startling four de force than one might think. The great difficulty with the amateur is to see all birds at all. When at last he comes to discover them, his limited experience will begin his delightful schooling. The trick is all learned when one knows what sort of duck is to be expected at that time of day, that time of day, in that locality, and under those conditions. Given that knowledge, it is not difficult to learn that different kinds of ducks in different ways. Before the first day is over the amateur point-shooter has learned to distinguish a shillshank from a black duck, a bullhead from a pit-bull, and at considerable distance too.

I shall never forget one of my first lessons in point shooting when only a lad, and aware strong enough to lay my hands over level and "hold ahead." We had put out to pick up some ducks among the decoys; we floated in rakes all around us; I was pointing out, with great pride, a bunch of shillshank coming like a duck squall, low over the water, when the boyman made a pee-ee, a dead duck, missed it, and seeing the boat for me to pick it up as it rolled past.

And as I laid hands on the floating feathered quarry, right out of the water rose a gray, wet, live thing, big as a dog, and so close that its whiskered head was thrust almost into my face. Back into the boat, head over heels I dropped, the most startled lay on the Atlantic coast. It was only a seal, but it seemed a talk from the vast deep to me. I never heard a boyman laugh very loud except that now, and one other time, the occasion of which is not necessary to re-tell here.

I remember another time that a boyman laughed, but not very heartily. Some talk had occurred at the inn concerning the functions of the great blue heron. It was generally agreed among those present that the great blue heron considered himself a warty for marsh ducks; that ducks felt safe in his vicinity; that when men approached the flying of the brim was a signal for every duck to leave in a hurry.

This, of a sudden, came the warning whistling ruck

A man present made up his warped mind to take advantage of this. He purchased at a taxidermist's a stuffed heron, selected a lonely spot on the salt marshes, installed his bird, and squatted down prepared for slaughter. Nothing came until evening, when a boy came, peering backward, ran upon the extraordinary complication. The boy came armed with the means that evening. He told the story soberly enough, saying that although it was rather a dirty trick it might be successful.

"But why," we asked, "was it not successful?"

"Because," said the layman, "the darn had left the price tag on the bird, and the wind was blowing it fierce enough to scare every duck out of the finest South Bay!"

Then we laughed. It was an evil trick; I heard that he was warned off the meadows next day.

In the greatest possible contrast to this Northern point-shooting is point shooting in the South. A typical day occurs to me, fresh still in every detail; the great gray lagoons strung together by canal-like winding channels, the miles of reeds, poison grass, and cane that stretched between the inland waters and the great dunes which held back the ocean a mile away; the impenetrable jungle opposite where tall palms towered above the water oaks. We had pitched our camp on the banks of the inland water, some ten rods back in the jungle—ten guns and a water guide. An open-faced ramp, thickset with palm leaves, sheltered us; our fire was backed by great pink cedar logs which scintilled like ten thousand red pyres. Oliver sagged and kicked at his dummies; the guide's nose was partly a whistle; from time to time the soft measured beat of an oar, repeated three times at exact intervals, contributed to my discontent.

It was too wet for rattlesnakes and I was glad; it was not too dry for mosquitoes, and I was sorry. The guide wore cotton trousers. Observing my brother buyings he remarked that a heavy muscotoon wore fangs three-quarters of an inch in length; and that no lizards were for protection if the snake struck the leather squirts. Pondering on this pleasant proposition I fell asleep, only to be awakened the next instant. It seemed to me, by a hand on my shoulder and the soft voice of the native guide urging me to breakfast.

It was pitch dark. Oliver, mad as a hedgehog, crawled out into the fire-glow, eyes the breakfast with malice aforethought. However, he managed to swallow his usual "snack," including an entire roasted duck, and presently I saw him light a long palmetto "fat" and mumble off toward the "cellar," where several dozen of live his heighens.

Sticks of cartridges were filled, gun cases picked up, muscotoons rolled, and we stambled off through the dark, the guide leading, lashed down with deers and oars. He could see in the dark, that guide. If I told you that the pupils of his eyes were veiled you would not believe me; so I won't tell you. Besides, I don't think they were, but there is no doubt about his being able to see in the dark where we could see nothing. We pooted it a dozen times every night.

Fatigued that we had not trodden on a muscotoon in the dark, Oliver and I embarked in the pitchy darkness in an unseen boat on unseen water; and off we pootled into the weird. It was near dawn, and all the blacker for that. Yet, as we glided off down the lagoon, a shrill whistling ruck tore through the darkness over head—ducks whirling out to sea.

We had our misgivings, Oliver and I, when it came time to chuck-out of the boat and grope our slippery slimy way up a mud bank into a thicket of high marsh-grass. But no reptile bit us, we landed cartridges, swaters, and guns, and knelt down to watch for dawn, muscotoons, and ducks. Nothing more tremendous than mosquitoes assaulted us, but I will cry, with my last breath, proclaiming New Jersey pestless after that dark hour before dawn on the muddy banks of that lagoon.

Meanwhile, above through the darkness tore bunch after bunch of whurring, whampering, whistling ducks, inside to our eyes. They came like flocks of shells; we could hear the shrill aerial ruck after, growing louder as it came nearer, passing above us, where a hundred soft wings tore the air unseen, away, away, out into the darkness that ruckled the inside sea.

"I can make out our deers," whispered Oliver.

Splash! Splash! Unseen ducks were dropping into the deers; we strained our eyes in vain. I looked up; the rest was faintly gray; star after star paled and went out. Then, of a sudden, came the warning whistling ruck, a black ragged wedge swept across the sky; two pairs of crimson flashes darted skyward, and splash, splash, splash! the game was done.

The gray mist on the lagoon became transparent, three ducks came hurtling over the deers, looming enormous in the fog of morning; again the flames picked the gloom, not red, but paler now. Then a rushing cloud of bluish steamy mist, scented by lone herons; then all alone, a muscotoon whirled past, winging outside the deers; but Oliver's gun cracked, and down he plunged.

Dawn was near. Across the dunes, haunted by bear and wild cat, a sickly yellow light tapped the impenetrable thickets of cactus, Spanish bayonet, and fragrant bay. Then the deer haunted firs where black ducks were quacking in operose undertone, yellow pools grew pink. For away, drained clear in the purpling gloom, flashed the morning star, still unknown. Then through the misty mystery a wave sparkled, litred with palest gilt, a muffled leaped clear out of water, again, again, splashing the bog with gilded spray. It was dawn.

Correspondence

PATRIOTIC GERMANS

NY 10010, May - June 2, 1968.

we disapprove of without belittling our Chief Executive and consequently ourselves, if true Americans.

1. 0.1M, citr

J. J. Westermann

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

Stk.—In your speech of July 2, Mr. Charles W. Naper, in commenting on the lack of influence of the German element in the course of events in this country, says the blame is ignorance on their part, and charges the Polytechnic Germans with opposing education. That the Germans have exercised little or no influence is to begin with, an erroneous impression that is widespread, and the cause of this impression lies mainly in the fact that we accidentally happen to use English as our language.

To charge the Pennsylvania Germans with gross ignorance is unjust, since as early in our history as 1748 German newspapers had been founded and prospered among these same Pennsylvania Germans. About this time also a German edition of the Bible was printed by Christian Saur in Germantown, Pennsylvania. This, I believe, was the first Bible printed on this continent.

In what other manner than it has done could the German element have made its influence felt. In our country the "course of events" is decided by the will of the majority, and I believe that the German element has been able to influence the "course of events" the German element can justly claim that its influence and support was nearly always with the majority, and that it likewise was the most numerous of the different elements. It is to the credit of the Germans that they have acted from the standpoint of patriotic Americans and not from any selfish standpoint as Germans. Speaking as a citizen of German descent, I can say that I have never known any Americans, and it seems less fair to them than all other elements, including Anglo-Saxons, should merge their nationality with the American nationality. They have not unreasonably claimed to be called by the American name.

1 day, 200.

11. 44. 01

AR TO SYRACUSE UNIVERSITY

NEW YORK, July 2, 1904.

To the Editor of Harvard's Weekly:

SIR,—I do not know that the WEEKLY will have any comments on the boat-races at Poughkeepsie, but if so I hope the injustice done to Syracuse University by many of the New York papers will be avoided in the WEEKLY.

We are characterized as a little obscure institution, practically unknown in the college world, etc. We are referred to deprecatingly as a "Methodist college." Now we only ask if that makes sense, and we affirm these allusions in ignorance of the facts. It is true the university is under Methodist auspices, but it is also true that our students very largely represent all other denominations and religious beliefs, and there are many of no particular belief. We have many Jews and Catholics, and some of our very best students are included among these. There is no theology at all taught in the institution. In our faculty of more than two hundred members the large majority are non-Methodists; several are Catholics and several are Jews.

It would be quite as much to the point to call Yale Unitarian and Harvard Unitarian, and they do have theology departments; also to speak of Cornell as Baptist because President Scurman is a Baptist clergyman.

Kyrleuse University is older than Cornell, being founded in 1852 on a Tennessee College. Its change to the present name and location took place in 1871. We have now an attendance of 32,325 students, and a very interesting feature is the fact that over 100,000 of these are in the college proper. We still adhere to the requirement of plenty of Greek and Latin for the A.B. degree, and our courses are stiff. We have other courses leading to other degrees.

I send you a slip that will give you some facts about the university. It is interesting to know that in our college proper we outnumber all universities in the State, and that we have more than 200 more students from New York State than has Cornell. I write you these facts simply and solely in the interest of truth.

1000.000

FRANK S. MALLEY, Dean.

CARRIAGES, ETC., CARTOONS

GARRISON, S. C., July 1, 1971

to the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

"NIN.—While I have been a Democrat always, I consider the successful candidate for the Presidency of the United States my own individual President, irrespective of his party. We have agreed to abide by certain prescribed rules and regulations. First, I am an American; then comes my party; for this reason and the respect I have for the office I long to see the time when our Executive is exempt from such criticisms as are caricatures, though with such running in their design as for the likeness to be readily detected.

With your wise influence can't this be stopped without curtailing the "freedom of the press," that publishers seem to be so anxious to guard with jealous care? Do the people of the United States demand that the man chosen to be their chief shall be held up to such insulting ridicule? Have we lost all respect for our nowadays father of his country? We can assure what

TRAGEDY AND THE SACR

Newfield, Va., June 20, 1961.

Sir,—Dr. Lyman Abbott's recent letter of counsel to a distressed wife turns us back to a passage of Martensliuek, where he points out that tragedies would inevitably change their character if a sage were to cross the boards. Suppose, he suggests, that destiny should have played the same havoc with Antonine's fate that it did with Hippolyte? Even had destiny so desired, the issue would have been different, for the soul of Antonine would have been strengthened by disaster.

not encourage us to follow. In this suggestion, and he wonders what would have happened to tithe if, just after the great scene in which from him all his rusticity, thoughtless faith and loyalties, and supplants them with his cold, clever, charming designs, if, just at this instant, Socrates could have walked in upon him with a dispassionate dialogue ready upon the maturity of evil? If we show, and careful gradation he had led tithe to see that we can be inspired only by the truth of our own thoughts, never by the deeds of others, but only by the emotions in ourselves, we allow to be weakened by those deeds.

Suppose just after the great "To be or not to be" soliloquy Hamlet could by chance have heard the wonderful discourse in the fourteenth, fifteenth, and sixteenth chapters of St. John: "in the world ye shall have tribulation; but he who gives of himself, he will increase the world." In the face of such lofty thought would not a scheme of personal vengeance have seemed nothing? What desire can resist simplicity, sincerity, tolerance, self-allegation? Need Leah have pity and if Marcus Aurelius could have met him at the edge of the forest and talked a little, might:

Dr. Alcott thus played the sage, in a measure, to the complaining wife, and so far as it went his advice was good. But might not a wholesome course of reading for unhappy wives have been marked out with good effect? As a beginning and to cultivate a natural sense of humor, Dr. Egbert Arnold's How to be Happy would be an excellent promise for the reader. Dr. Arnold's It Depends would be of service to those who are inclined to be impatient to fence off the world and to attempt to "isolate in earnest," but the ladies all relaxed. They wanted companionship (indeed as we all do; they wanted a comrade to walk through life with, but when the Egbert desired them to join him in emancipation they were not so ready to follow. They were given five times, and read much, but he, I suspect, has not.

Browning has, as another Victorian prophet, had his word to say on this subject.

No, for us, no world! And through press thee in me,
Up and down, staid me, heart in heart, fare we!
Welcome, agonized features laugh to, and baneful frow,
Good in soul, souls I and thou! With souls should souls have peace

Again in James Lee's Wife he shows the forsaken wife capable to formulate keen and disinterested judgments upon a wrong, and having let the bitterly wounded go, she remains clear and abstract maxims upon the true principles of art. Again, in the best satisfactory Paper, we have the whole matter thoroughly threshed out and the final line is:

Love is all and death is naught, with the

The truth is, a less gentle adviser than Dr. Abbott might have written: "Dear lady, this is a hard saying, but you cannot but know that you cannot earn nor keep what you cannot hold. Neither law nor force can give you back what you have lost, but if you are courageous and clear headed and light-hearted and high-spirited, what you have lost may come creeping back of its own accord, because home and sin-hone and merriment and innocent thoughts dwell where you dwell."

It is true, as has been suggested, that certain women's clubs are turning disapproving eyes upon Mr. Abbott because he dares believe that devotion cannot be forced by law! Conduct can be circumscribed by law, and so, but what law can force a man to respect a wife who asks some one else how to hold his affection? What loyalty is that between comrades?

And another point: does any rational woman desire her husband to forego all other feminine friendships and influences that he may have? Whoever does is a rash woman, and recklessly afraid of being a bore. At such rate we should be stepping back into the days of seraglios and harems, but it is the husband we should be warning.

Seriously, the great issue to face is that each soul in the world is self-poised or not poised at all. Marriage, indeed, is a helpful partnership, but in the closest of marriage too there are divisions and separations. There are whole tracts of consciousness in which the soul leaves its Creator alone. If this were not so, marriage would be belittling. There are a thousand lessons in every married life, where a noble woman must look away from herself and her petty exclusiveness, and lose herself in service to her husband, in acts of outside selflessness, in helpful activities

What would have been the result to this same complaint if, instead of writing to Dr. Abbott about loss of reason and of life, she had suddenly thought: "There is a woman ill and sad, who has needed my husband's friendship, and must therefore need mine?" She would have awakened the sage in her own bosom; and it would have been even as if Socrates were greater than he had passed across the threshold.

0.000, 0.000

L. C. W.

Progress of the War

From the beginning of the war, February 8, until July 4 the following Russian war-ships have been either sunk or disabled so that they are at present out of commission: the Petrugorodsk, 1,400 tons, Bogatyr, Boysar, Aurist, and Yacars. On June 24 Admiral Togo reported that he had succeeded in sinking the Russian battleship Pravoslav and damaging the battleship Suvorov and the cruiser Iskand, but this report the Russians deny. Several torpedo-boats, destroyers, and gunboats are known to have been destroyed. The Russian ships which have been injured but were repaired and are reported to be again in commission are the Canerich, Fukuroi, Britannia, Poltava, Port, Iskand, Narvik, and Iskand. Japan has had the battleship Butsue, the cruiser Yokosue, and several torpedo-boats, and a Japanese cruiser was successfully torpedoed by the Russians on May 19. Other Japanese ships are believed to have been injured on the Port Arthur engagements; but definite knowledge of this is withheld.

On May 7 Admiral Togo succeeded in blocking the entrance to Port Arthur by sinking merchant steamers in the channel, but on June 15 it was reported that the Russians had succeeded in clearing the channel again. On May 1 the first great land battle of the war took place near the Yalu River, and resulted in a Japanese victory. The Japanese lost 218 killed and 760 wounded, and the Russians 2384 killed, wounded, and captured.

The second decisive land battle took place on May 26 at Kin-Chow, thirty-two miles north of Port Arthur, and the Japanese, though suffering the greater loss were again victorious. The Japanese casualties were 739 killed and 3444 wounded. The Russian losses are estimated at 18,000 killed and wounded. The Japanese military commission reports that it buried 704 Russian dead which were left behind on the battlefield at Kin-Chow. A third battle, lasting three days, began near Yantung on June 13. The Russians report their casualties at 526 killed, 1983 wounded, and 1000 missing. The Japanese estimate their losses at 1000.

The first and second Japanese armies have effected a union, and the lines extend along a sixty mile front from Japan's sea on the north to Szechuen on the south.

July 5.—General Kurata reports that on July 4 the Russians made an attempt to recross the Great Pass, but were repulsed. The Japanese lost fifteen killed and thirty wounded. The Russian losses were several officers and two hundred soldiers killed and wounded.

July 6.—A Tientsin telegram says that on the night of July 5 Admiral Togo attempted to send four destroyers into the harbor at Port Arthur to attack the Russian fleet. Two of the destroyers were sunk, a third was badly crippled, and the fourth succeeded in effecting a retreat. No damage was done to the Russian ships.

Field Marshal Yamagata, commander-in-chief of the Japanese field forces, accompanied by Generals Kodama and Fukushima, left Tokyo today for the front.

July 7.—A dispatch from Chokien says that engagements of varying importance are constantly occurring on the hills surrounding Port Arthur. On July 4 the Japanese are said to have recaptured the area of the Japanese Takahara Mountain, which is less than three miles from Port Arthur.

Admiral Skrydloff reports that on July 3 the Russian Visiting Squadron captured and ordered a large Japanese squadron in the Gulf of Korea. The Russians captured and destroyed in capturing from the Japanese battleship and cruisers, but were attacked by the Japanese torpedo-boats. Two of the Japanese torpedo-boats were believed to have been sunk. The Russian ships were not damaged.

July 8.—General Oku is reported to have occupied Kiao-chow yesterday, driving out 20,000 Russians.

A telegram from Liao-Yang says that a column of Russians was attacked by the Japanese during the night of July 8 at a point about seven miles northwest of Freshai Pass. The Russians were compelled to retreat, losing about three hundred killed and wounded.

July 10.—Lieutenant-General Sukharoff in a dispatch to St. Petersburg confirms the report of the Japanese occupation of Kiao-chow on July 8. The Russian losses were 150 killed and wounded. General Sukharoff adds that the Japanese are now on the road to Yankow (the port of Nanking).

Chinese refugees from Port Arthur, who arrived to-day at Chifoo, say that two large Russian war-ships have been missing at Port Arthur since the engagement of June 24. The battleship Suvorov is still undergoing repairs.

What a Nation Eats

A COMMITTEE of the Royal Statistical Society of Great Britain has recently been engaged in investigating the production and consumption of meat and dairy products in that country, and which they find that there has been increased production, yet it has not been on a scale proportional with the increase in population. According to its report, submitted at a recent meeting of the society, the average consumption per head in Great Britain was, of meat 12.8 pounds, of milk 15 gallons, of cheese 16.5 pounds, and of butter 19.5 pounds. The consumption of meat included 2.5 pounds of beef and veal, 27.5 pounds of mutton and lamb, and 30.8 pounds of bacon and pork. In addition, the British people consume extensive quantities of poultry, game, rabbit, etc., which are not included in the above summary. The average of 15 gallons of milk does not include separated or skim milk, which is consumed to an appreciable degree. In comparison with the Continental countries, England consumes much more meat, but considerably less than the United States and Australia.

Gum from Bacteria

THE beneficial effects of bacteria are no less interesting than the part they play in the propagation of disease, and a recent discovery is that the vegetable gums found on trees, such as gum arabic, are the result of their activity. Previous to this investigation by Dr. S. H. H. Smith, of New South Wales, it was believed that vegetable gums were the result of the mechanical or pathological condition of the trees in which they were found, but the entire subject was one about which comparatively little was known. Dr. Smith believing that bacteria produced the gum, examined two trees from which it exuded, and obtained two varieties of bacteria, of which he made cultures.

Under ordinary conditions of culture the formation of gum was only suggested, but when, as in nature, a constituent of bark, was added to the culture medium, a thick slime was produced in considerable quantities. This slime was made up of gum, as well as bacterial cells and albumenoids, and by a simple chemical process a clear, transparent, and brittle gum was obtained similar to the arabin derived from gum trees, and resembling in its essential properties the natural substance. Dr. Smith's conclusion was that the arabin gums derived from trees are bacterial and not higher plant products, and that certain constituents of the sap, under the action of bacteria, are changed into gum, which exudes from cracks or wounds in the bark, or else is exuded by the sap in the fruit.

Different varieties of gum are due to different bacteria, while the marked differences observed in the same gum are doubtless caused by different conditions of formation, such as temperature, composition of the sap, etc., which may influence the action of the bacteria.

Dr. Smith believes that the supply of gum could be greatly increased by injecting artificially susceptible but non-producing trees with pure bacteria or with sap from an affected tree, while additional branches of the same tree could be inoculated and an increased yield obtained. As many kinds of gum are now becoming scarce, chiefly on account of the destruction of trees from which they previously have been obtained, it would be a great economic advantage if the bacterium could be taught to treat the trees as so to increase the yield.

Finger-Print Identifications

THE identification of criminals by means of finger-prints introduced in recent years in European police and penal establishments is paralleled by a similar system which has been used in Korea for centuries to identify female slaves. In a paper recently read before the Anthropological Society of London by a missionary from Korea, it was stated that in the deeds of sale of slaves the hand of the latter was placed on the short of paper on which the deed was inscribed, and on outline of the fingers and thumb was traced, while, in addition, an impression was made of each finger. Such impressions, which naturally furnished a complete identification, have been found on deeds that date back 1200 years.

A Premature Roast

A correspondent near Boston, who contained all the scenery for Henry W. Stange's forthcoming production of "Paradise" in English, caught fire a few days ago, but, fortunately, the costly scenery was saved. While Walter Burleigh, general scenic artist for Mr. Stange, was watching the firemen fight the flames, a small urchin pulled Mr. Burleigh's coat.

"Say, mister," he said, "it's a little early to roast your show, ain't it?"

Any one who has seen the "Paradise" scenery should be able to see the difference between the scenery and the scenery of the "Paradise" scenery. The scenery is the scenery of the "Paradise" scenery. The scenery is the scenery of the "Paradise" scenery. The scenery is the scenery of the "Paradise" scenery.

THE INFANT SLEEPS
A perfectly good, healthy, and really adorable and intelligent baby is a real treasure to a mother. The baby is the baby of the "Paradise" scenery. The baby is the baby of the "Paradise" scenery. The baby is the baby of the "Paradise" scenery.

THE BROWN'S PATENT SOAP
FOR THE (1811, 25, 30, 35, 40, 45, 50, 55, 60, 65, 70, 75, 80, 85, 90, 95, 100, 105, 110, 115, 120, 125, 130, 135, 140, 145, 150, 155, 160, 165, 170, 175, 180, 185, 190, 195, 200, 205, 210, 215, 220, 225, 230, 235, 240, 245, 250, 255, 260, 265, 270, 275, 280, 285, 290, 295, 300, 305, 310, 315, 320, 325, 330, 335, 340, 345, 350, 355, 360, 365, 370, 375, 380, 385, 390, 395, 400, 405, 410, 415, 420, 425, 430, 435, 440, 445, 450, 455, 460, 465, 470, 475, 480, 485, 490, 495, 500, 505, 510, 515, 520, 525, 530, 535, 540, 545, 550, 555, 560, 565, 570, 575, 580, 585, 590, 595, 600, 605, 610, 615, 620, 625, 630, 635, 640, 645, 650, 655, 660, 665, 670, 675, 680, 685, 690, 695, 700, 705, 710, 715, 720, 725, 730, 735, 740, 745, 750, 755, 760, 765, 770, 775, 780, 785, 790, 795, 800, 805, 810, 815, 820, 825, 830, 835, 840, 845, 850, 855, 860, 865, 870, 875, 880, 885, 890, 895, 900, 905, 910, 915, 920, 925, 930, 935, 940, 945, 950, 955, 960, 965, 970, 975, 980, 985, 990, 995, 1000, 1005, 1010, 1015, 1020, 1025, 1030, 1035, 1040, 1045, 1050, 1055, 1060, 1065, 1070, 1075, 1080, 1085, 1090, 1095, 1100, 1105, 1110, 1115, 1120, 1125, 1130, 1135, 1140, 1145, 1150, 1155, 1160, 1165, 1170, 1175, 1180, 1185, 1190, 1195, 1200, 1205, 1210, 1215, 1220, 1225, 1230, 1235, 1240, 1245, 1250, 1255, 1260, 1265, 1270, 1275, 1280, 1285, 1290, 1295, 1300, 1305, 1310, 1315, 1320, 1325, 1330, 1335, 1340, 1345, 1350, 1355, 1360, 1365, 1370, 1375, 1380, 1385, 1390, 1395, 1400, 1405, 1410, 1415, 1420, 1425, 1430, 1435, 1440, 1445, 1450, 1455, 1460, 1465, 1470, 1475, 1480, 1485, 1490, 1495, 1500, 1505, 1510, 1515, 1520, 1525, 1530, 1535, 1540, 1545, 1550, 1555, 1560, 1565, 1570, 1575, 1580, 1585, 1590, 1595, 1600, 1605, 1610, 1615, 1620, 1625, 1630, 1635, 1640, 1645, 1650, 1655, 1660, 1665, 1670, 1675, 1680, 1685, 1690, 1695, 1700, 1705, 1710, 1715, 1720, 1725, 1730, 1735, 1740, 1745, 1750, 1755, 1760, 1765, 1770, 1775, 1780, 1785, 1790, 1795, 1800, 1805, 1810, 1815, 1820, 1825, 1830, 1835, 1840, 1845, 1850, 1855, 1860, 1865, 1870, 1875, 1880, 1885, 1890, 1895, 1900, 1905, 1910, 1915, 1920, 1925, 1930, 1935, 1940, 1945, 1950, 1955, 1960, 1965, 1970, 1975, 1980, 1985, 1990, 1995, 2000, 2005, 2010, 2015, 2020, 2025, 2030, 2035, 2040, 2045, 2050, 2055, 2060, 2065, 2070, 2075, 2080, 2085, 2090, 2095, 2100, 2105, 2110, 2115, 2120, 2125, 2130, 2135, 2140, 2145, 2150, 2155, 2160, 2165, 2170, 2175, 2180, 2185, 2190, 2195, 2200, 2205, 2210, 2215, 2220, 2225, 2230, 2235, 2240, 2245, 2250, 2255, 2260, 2265, 2270, 2275, 2280, 2285, 2290, 2295, 2300, 2305, 2310, 2315, 2320, 2325, 2330, 2335, 2340, 2345, 2350, 2355, 2360, 2365, 2370, 2375, 2380, 2385, 2390, 2395, 2400, 2405, 2410, 2415, 2420, 2425, 2430, 2435, 2440, 2445, 2450, 2455, 2460, 2465, 2470, 2475, 2480, 2485, 2490, 2495, 2500, 2505, 2510, 2515, 2520, 2525, 2530, 2535, 2540, 2545, 2550, 2555, 2560, 2565, 2570, 2575, 2580, 2585, 2590, 2595, 2600, 2605, 2610, 2615, 2620, 2625, 2630, 2635, 2640, 2645, 2650, 2655, 2660, 2665, 2670, 2675, 2680, 2685, 2690, 2695, 2700, 2705, 2710, 2715, 2720, 2725, 2730, 2735, 2740, 2745, 2750, 2755, 2760, 2765, 2770, 2775, 2780, 2785, 2790, 2795, 2800, 2805, 2810, 2815, 2820, 2825, 2830, 2835, 2840, 2845, 2850, 2855, 2860, 2865, 2870, 2875, 2880, 2885, 2890, 2895, 2900, 2905, 2910, 2915, 2920, 2925, 2930, 2935, 2940, 2945, 2950, 2955, 2960, 2965, 2970, 2975, 2980, 2985, 2990, 2995, 3000, 3005, 3010, 3015, 3020, 3025, 3030, 3035, 3040, 3045, 3050, 3055, 3060, 3065, 3070, 3075, 3080, 3085, 3090, 3095, 3100, 3105, 3110, 3115, 3120, 3125, 3130, 3135, 3140, 3145, 3150, 3155, 3160, 3165, 3170, 3175, 3180, 3185, 3190, 3195, 3200, 3205, 3210, 3215, 3220, 3225, 3230, 3235, 3240, 3245, 3250, 3255, 3260, 3265, 3270, 3275, 3280, 3285, 3290, 3295, 3300, 3305, 3310, 3315, 3320, 3325, 3330, 3335, 3340, 3345, 3350, 3355, 3360, 3365, 3370, 3375, 3380, 3385, 3390, 3395, 3400, 3405, 3410, 3415, 3420, 3425, 3430, 3435, 3440, 3445, 3450, 3455, 3460, 3465, 3470, 3475, 3480, 3485, 3490, 3495, 3500, 3505, 3510, 3515, 3520, 3525, 3530, 3535, 3540, 3545, 3550, 3555, 3560, 3565, 3570, 3575, 3580, 3585, 3590, 3595, 3600, 3605, 3610, 3615, 3620, 3625, 3630, 3635, 3640, 3645, 3650, 3655, 3660, 3665, 3670, 3675, 3680, 3685, 3690, 3695, 3700, 3705, 3710, 3715, 3720, 3725, 3730, 3735, 3740, 3745, 3750, 3755, 3760, 3765, 3770, 3775, 3780, 3785, 3790, 3795, 3800, 3805, 3810, 3815, 3820, 3825, 3830, 3835, 3840, 3845, 3850, 3855, 3860, 3865, 3870, 3875, 3880, 3885, 3890, 3895, 3900, 3905, 3910, 3915, 3920, 3925, 3930, 3935, 3940, 3945, 3950, 3955, 3960, 3965, 3970, 3975, 3980, 3985, 3990, 3995, 4000, 4005, 4010, 4015, 4020, 4025, 4030, 4035, 4040, 4045, 4050, 4055, 4060, 4065, 4070, 4075, 4080, 4085, 4090, 4095, 4100, 4105, 4110, 4115, 4120, 4125, 4130, 4135, 4140, 4145, 4150, 4155, 4160, 4165, 4170, 4175, 4180, 4185, 4190, 4195, 4200, 4205, 4210, 4215, 4220, 4225, 4230, 4235, 4240, 4245, 4250, 4255, 4260, 4265, 4270, 4275, 4280, 4285, 4290, 4295, 4300, 4305, 4310, 4315, 4320, 4325, 4330, 4335, 4340, 4345, 4350, 4355, 4360, 4365, 4370, 4375, 4380, 4385, 4390, 4395, 4400, 4405, 4410, 4415, 4420, 4425, 4430, 4435, 4440, 4445, 4450, 4455, 4460, 4465, 4470, 4475, 4480, 4485, 4490, 4495, 4500, 4505, 4510, 4515, 4520, 4525, 4530, 4535, 4540, 4545, 4550, 4555, 4560, 4565, 4570, 4575, 4580, 4585, 4590, 4595, 4600, 4605, 4610, 4615, 4620, 4625, 4630, 4635, 4640, 4645, 4650, 4655, 4660, 4665, 4670, 4675, 4680, 4685, 4690, 4695, 4700, 4705, 4710, 4715, 4720, 4725, 4730, 4735, 4740, 4745, 4750, 4755, 4760, 4765, 4770, 4775, 4780, 4785, 4790, 4795, 4800, 4805, 4810, 4815, 4820, 4825, 4830, 4835, 4840, 4845, 4850, 4855, 4860, 4865, 4870, 4875, 4880, 4885, 4890, 4895, 4900, 4905, 4910, 4915, 4920, 4925, 4930, 4935, 4940, 4945, 4950, 4955, 4960, 4965, 4970, 4975, 4980, 4985, 4990, 4995, 5000, 5005, 5010, 5015, 5020, 5025, 5030, 5035, 5040, 5045, 5050, 5055, 5060, 5065, 5070, 5075, 5080, 5085, 5090, 5095, 5100, 5105, 5110, 5115, 5120, 5125, 5130, 5135, 5140, 5145, 5150, 5155, 5160, 5165, 5170, 5175, 5180, 5185, 5190, 5195, 5200, 5205, 5210, 5215, 5220, 5225, 5230, 5235, 5240, 5245, 5250, 5255, 5260, 5265, 5270, 5275, 5280, 5285, 5290, 5295, 5300, 5305, 5310, 5315, 5320, 5325, 5330, 5335, 5340, 5345, 5350, 5355, 5360, 5365, 5370, 5375, 5380, 5385, 5390, 5395, 5400, 5405, 5410, 5415, 5420, 5425, 5430, 5435, 5440, 5445, 5450, 5455, 5460, 5465, 5470, 5475, 5480, 5485, 5490, 5495, 5500, 5505, 5510, 5515, 5520, 5525, 5530, 5535, 5540, 5545, 5550, 5555, 5560, 5565, 5570, 5575, 5580, 5585, 5590, 5595, 5600, 5605, 5610, 5615, 5620, 5625, 5630, 5635, 5640, 5645, 5650, 5655, 5660, 5665, 5670, 5675, 5680, 5685, 5690, 5695, 5700, 5705, 5710, 5715, 5720, 5725, 5730, 5735, 5740, 5745, 5750, 5755, 5760, 5765, 5770, 5775, 5780, 5785, 5790, 5795, 5800, 5805, 5810, 5815, 5820, 5825, 5830, 5835, 5840, 5845, 5850, 5855, 5860, 5865, 5870, 5875, 5880, 5885, 5890, 5895, 5900, 5905, 5910, 5915, 5920, 5925, 5930, 5935, 5940, 5945, 5950, 5955, 5960, 5965, 5970, 5975, 5980, 5985, 5990, 5995, 6000, 6005, 6010, 6015, 6020, 6025, 6030, 6035, 6040, 6045, 6050, 6055, 6060, 6065, 6070, 6075, 6080, 6085, 6090, 6095, 6100, 6105, 6110, 6115, 6120, 6125, 6130, 6135, 6140, 6145, 6150, 6155, 6160, 6165, 6170, 6175, 6180, 6185, 6190, 6195, 6200, 6205, 6210, 6215, 6220, 6225, 6230, 6235, 6240, 6245, 6250, 6255, 6260, 6265, 6270, 6275, 6280, 6285, 6290, 6295, 6300, 6305, 6310, 6315, 6320, 6325, 6330, 6335, 6340, 6345, 6350, 6355, 6360, 6365, 6370, 6375, 6380, 6385, 6390, 6395, 6400, 6405, 6410, 6415, 6420, 6425, 6430, 6435, 6440, 6445, 6450, 6455, 6460, 6465, 6470, 6475, 6480, 6485, 6490, 6495, 6500, 6505, 6510, 6515, 6520, 6525, 6530, 6535, 6540, 6545, 6550, 6555, 6560, 6565, 6570, 6575, 6580, 6585, 6590, 6595, 6600, 6605, 6610, 6615, 6620, 6625, 6630, 6635, 6640, 6645, 6650, 6655, 6660, 6665, 6670, 6675, 6680, 6685, 6690, 6695, 6700, 6705, 6710, 6715, 6720, 6725, 6730, 6735, 6740, 6745, 6750, 6755, 6760, 6765, 6770, 6775, 6780, 6785, 6790, 6795, 6800, 6805, 6810, 6815, 6820, 6825, 6830, 6835, 6840, 6845, 6850, 6855, 6860, 6865, 6870, 6875, 6880, 6885, 6890, 6895, 6900, 6905, 6910, 6915, 6920, 6925, 6930, 6935, 6940, 6945, 6950, 6955, 6960, 6965, 6970, 6975, 6980, 6985, 6990, 6995, 7000, 7005, 7010, 7015, 7020, 7025, 7030, 7035, 7040, 7045, 7050, 7055, 7060, 7065, 7070, 7075, 7080, 7085, 7090, 7095, 7100, 7105, 7110, 7115, 7120, 7125, 7130, 7135, 7140, 7145, 7150, 7155, 7160, 7165, 7170, 7175, 7180, 7185, 7190, 7195, 7200, 7205, 7210, 7215, 7220, 7225, 7230, 7235, 7240, 7245, 7250, 7255, 7260, 7265, 7270, 7275, 7280, 7285, 7290, 7295, 7300, 7305, 7310, 7315, 7320, 7325, 7330, 7335, 7340, 7345, 7350, 7355, 7360, 7365, 7370, 7375, 7380, 7385, 7390, 7395, 7400, 7405, 7410, 7415, 7420, 7425, 7430, 7435, 7440, 7445, 7450, 7455, 7460, 7465, 7470, 7475, 7480, 7485, 7490, 7495, 7500, 7505, 7510, 7515, 7520, 7525, 7530, 7535, 7540, 7545, 7550, 7555, 7560, 7565, 7570, 7575, 7580, 7585, 7590, 7595, 7600, 7605, 7610, 7615, 7620, 7625, 7630, 7635, 7640, 7645, 7650, 7655, 7660, 7665, 7670, 7675, 7680, 7685, 7690, 7695, 7700, 7705, 7710, 7715, 7720, 7725, 7730, 7735,

THE MARTINIS BY A. E. W. MASON

SYNOPSIS OF CHAPTERS

In the opening chapter Pamela Martine is introduced to the reader as a young society woman of London, beautiful and of fine personal charm. Into her early life has come a mysterious influence which dominates and directs her whole career. What this sinister influence is only two of her friends suspect: a young schemer who knew her as a child at Roquebrune, and Miss Warrides, who is in love with her, and who, though his proposal of marriage is refused, determines to win her. Late one night at a ball, Pamela and Warrides, a little wiled on by champagne, observe a young couple leaving the opposite door. They are Tony and Millicent Striction, who live in a gloomy house presided over by the rich but unjust father of the young ones. They are really kept prisoners by the whims of the tyrannical old man, and it is only by playing truant and getting out by stealth late at night that they are able to enter at all into the life of the outside world. This practice they keep up for a year, but finally both of them grow extremely weary of their monotonous life, and in a moment of desperation Tony determines to go to America to make his fortune. While Millicent is to be left behind and sent for as soon as her husband is able to establish a home, Millicent becomes infatuated with Lionel Callon, a gentlemanly adventurer. Pamela wishes to help her. She sends Warrides on a mission to find Tony and bring him home. Warrides returns from a friend of Tony's, Mr. Chase, that Tony, having lost all of his small fortune in New York, is now in the North Sea on a trader. Warrides uses every argument in prayer upon him to come back, but he refuses, and Warrides is forced to return alone. Tony remains on the trader until the term of his cruise is over (meanwhile having learned of his father's death), and then decides to enlist in the French Foreign Legion, as no other career seems open to him. John Minter, a friend of Pamela's, learns from her of the perfid Millicent is in from Callon, and invites Pamela to leave the yacht native in his hands. Tony goes to Algeria and joins the French Foreign Legion at SOUL-EL-AKHEB, enlisting under the name of "Gibson." Meanwhile Minter has conceived a plan for getting Lionel Callon out of the way, so saving Millicent from perdition. He lays up all Pamela's debts and places them in the hands of a single firm of sell-brokers, who based on a settlement from Callon within twenty-four hours. Callon receives a proposition from Minter to superintend an important enterprise of the latter's in the city, at a salary of four thousand pounds a year, the term of his absence from England to be two years. He realizes that Minter's intention is to get him out of the country, but his financial difficulties compel him to accept the offer, and he leaves England without having seen Millicent again. Tony Striction goes with a surprising expedition of the Foreign Legion, south of Algeria, while crossing the Sahara, they are attacked by fanatical Touaregs. Captain Taverney, commander of the expedition, is mortally wounded during the engagement. He leaves a letter recommending that Tony be promoted from his position as sergeant in the rank of officer. Warrides meets with Pamela in Algeria, and although her manner is not delightfully friendly, she allows him to think that in time it will be possible for her to accept him. One thing, she tells him, would make her take the step now: the return of Tony Striction. Warrides, desirous of obtaining information as to Tony's whereabouts, goes to London to visit Tony's friend Mr. Chase, who, he thinks, will be able to enlighten him. He finds on his arrival that Chase has died suddenly, and on examining the handwriting and address on the envelope of a letter intended for the merchant, thinks that he has found a clue to Tony's hiding place.

CHAPTER XXI

CALLON REVISITS

ALL through that autumn Pamela watched for Tony's return, and watched in vain. Winter came, and with the winter a letter from Mr. Minter. Lionel Callon had booked his passage home on a steamer which sailed on Christmas eve from the port of Valparaiso. Pamela received the news one morning of December. She hinted that day with the quon, and for once her thoughts were set on other matters than this immediate business. The long grass meadows slipped away from her view - but the whole she pondered how once more the danger of Callon's presence was to be averted. At times she hoped it would not need averting. Callon had been eighteen months away, and Millicent was quick to forget. But she was so weak to respond to a show of affection. Let Callon lay down again persistently, and the danger at once was close. Besides, there were the letters. That he should have continued to write during the months of his absence was a sign that he had not forgone his plan of conquest.

When returned home with an scheme floating in her mind. Some words which her mother had spoken at the breakfast table had recurred to her, and at first Pamela revived the subject.

"Did you say that you would not go to Roquebrune this winter, mother?" she asked.

"Yes," Mrs. Martine replied, "I have been for so many winters now. I shall stay in England for a change. We can let the Villa Fontaine, we don't."

"Oh, there is no hurry," said Pamela. She added, "I shall be going to London to-morrow, but I shall be back in the evening."

She thought over her plan that evening. Its execution would cost her something she realized. For many years she had not been out of England during the winter. She must leave her horses behind, and that was no small sacrifice for Pamela. She had one horse in particular, a big one, whose which had carried her in the days when her troubles were at their worst. He would follow her about the paddock or the yard merrily against her arm, a horse of blood and courage yet gentle with her, thoughtful and kind for her as only a horse amongst the animals can be. She must leave him. On the other hand, her thoughts of late had been turning to Roquebrune for a particular reason. She had a thought that she would rather like to tread again those old paths, to see once more those cypresses and headlands of which every one was a landmark of past joys—just as an experiment. She travelled to London the next day, and drove from St. Pancras into Regent's Park.

Millicent Striction had taken a house on the west side of the park. It looked out across the water and through the glades of trees, and in front of it were the open spaces of which Tony and she had dreamed; and the sunlight streamed through the windows and lay in golden splashes on the floors when there was sunlight in London anywhere at all. When she looked from her window, on the first morning, she could not but remember the place which Tony and she had shared long ago. They had been so certain of realizing then. Well, they were realized now, for her, at all events. There was the sunlight peering through every crevice; there were the wide expanses of green and trees, truly the windows looked on Regent's Park, and on no wide prairie; and of the two who with so much enthusiasm had marked out their imaginary site and built their house, there was only one in the enjoyment of the fulfillment. Millicent Striction thought of Tony that morning, but with an effort. What Pamela had foreseen had come to pass. He had given assent to her thoughts; she could hardly visualize his person to herself; he was almost unrecognizable. Had he walked in at that moment he would have been welcome to her as a stranger.

It was, however, Pamela Martine who walked in. She was shown over the house, and until that ceremony was over she did not brook the reason for her visit. Then, however, Millicent said, with a slight:

"It is what I have always wanted—sunlight."

"I came to suggest more sunlight," said Pamela. "There is our villa at Roquebrune in the south of France. It will be super this winter. And I thought that perhaps you and I might go out there together as soon as Christmas is past."

Millicent was standing at the window with her back to Pamela. She turned round quickly.

"But you hate the place," she said.

Pamela answered with alacrity:

"None the less I want to go this winter. I want to go very much. I won't tell you why. But I do want to go. And I should like you to come with me."

Pamela was anxious to discover whether that villa and its grounds and the view from its windows had sold the power to revive the grief with which they had been so completely associated in her mind. Hitherto she had shrunk from the very idea of ever revisiting Roquebrune: of late, however, since Warriden, in a car, had occupied so large a place in her thoughts, she had wished to put herself to the test, to understand whether her distress was really and truly dead, or whether it merely slumbered and could wake again. It was necessary for Warriden's sake, as much as her own, that she should come to a true knowledge. And nowhere else could she so certainly acquire it. If the sight of Roquebrune, the familiar look of the villa's moor, the familiar paths whereon she had carried so overcharged a heart, had no longer power to hurt and pain her, then she would be sure that she could start her life afresh. It was only fair—as she phrased it in her thoughts—that she should make the experiment.

Millie turned back to the window.

"I do not think that I shall leave London this winter," she said. "You see, I have only just got into the house."

It might spare you some annoyance," Pamela suggested.

"I don't understand," said Millie.

"The annoyance of having to explain Tony's absence. He will very likely have returned by the spring."

Millie shrugged her shoulders.

"I have borne that annoyance for two years," she replied. "I do not think I shall go away this winter."

Was Millie thinking of Calton's return? Pamela wondered. Was it on his account that she decided to remain? Pamela could not ask the question. Her plan had come to naught, and she returned that afternoon to Leicester Square.

Christmas proved, and half-way through the month of January Calton called on a dark afternoon at Millie Karetton's house. Millie was alone; she was, indeed, expecting him. When Calton entered the room he found her standing with her back to the window, her face to the door, and she stood without speaking for a few moments.

"You have been a long time away," she said, and she looked at him with curiosity, but with no more anxiety; to mark any change which had come in his face.

"Yes," said he, "a long time."

Millie rang the bell and ordered tea to be brought.

"You have not changed," said she.

"Nor you."

Millie had spoken with a noticeable difference in her manner, and she had not given him her hand. With her back towards the light she had allowed very little of her face to be visible in her visitor. When tea was brought in, however, she sat at the table and the light fell upon her. Calton sat opposite to her.

"At last I know that I am at home again," he said, with a smile. Then he turned forward and kissed his niece, although there was no third person in the room. He knew the value of such tokens. "I have looked forward during these eight months so very much to seeing you again."

Millie's face colored, but it was with a hard look upon her face; her eyes blazed.

"Yet you went away without a word to me before you went; you never hinted you were going."

"You thought it unkind?"

"It was unkind," said Millie.

"But I wrote to you. I have written often."

"It is no longer have you told me why you went away?" said Millie.

Millie shrugged her shoulders.

"I told you—I told you a great deal of you."

"I told you—I told you something," she said.

"I have come to tell you why I went away without a word. I never mentioned

Immediate Deliveries

Pope Tribune

A light,
stylish, speedy

Gasoline
Runabout

Engine in front
Bevel gear drive
Wheel steerer
Simple construction
Easy to operate

A type of car
that appeals to those desiring a reliable gasoline
runabout

6 Horse Power,
$650.

Pope
Hartford

A modern

Gasoline
Touring Car

A powerful hill
climber
Each part as true
to measurement as a chronometer
Backed by the Pope reputation
for quality

Model B—like
illustration—
10 Horse Power,
$1,200.
Without tonneau,
$1,050.

POPE MANUFACTURING CO., Hartford, Conn.

BRANCHES:

New York—Worcester St.
Boston—Commercial Ave.
Chicago—31—West 31st St.
Washington, D.C.—14th St. N.W.
Philadelphia—15th St. N.E.
Pittsburgh—15th St. N.E.
Cleveland—15th St. N.E.
Detroit—15th St. N.E.
Milwaukee—15th St. N.E.
St. Paul—15th St. N.E.
Minneapolis—15th St. N.E.
Portland—15th St. N.E.
Seattle—15th St. N.E.
Tacoma—15th St. N.E.
Vancouver—15th St. N.E.
Portland, Ore.—15th St. N.E.
San Francisco—15th St. N.E.
San Jose—15th St. N.E.
Stockholm—15th St. N.E.
Stockholm—15th St. N.E.
Stockholm—15th St. N.E.

Original Drawings

Pastels

Water-Colors

Prints

The
Fifth Avenue Book Shop

No. 259 Fifth Avenue
New York
Telephone 2100 Madison

Bronzes

Book Plates

Photographs

Fine Bindings

Rare Books

Old Prints

Autographs

Engravings

Mail Orders

Fine Stationery

Carefully Filled

Works of Fiction

Books in Sets

Orders Executed
on Commission

Send your address and we will forward you notices of our art exhibitions and special lists and catalogues as they are issued

1 Russian Lazar at San-Chan-Tou, Bombarded by the Japanese.

MOTOR BOATS

LAUNCHES, STEAM AND SAIL YACHTS, ROW BOATS, CANOES

SPEED—PLEASURE—BUSINESS

Beautiful, Reliable, Economical, Simple, Safe

that always makes a motor boat a boat. Write for our Motor Boat Book. Agents in New York, New York, and other cities. RACING BOAT WIFE CO. 1835 171, MUSKOGEE, WICH.

WILD LIFE OF ORCHARD AND FIELD

By
ERNEST INGERSOLL

New Edition, with many New Photographs. • $1.40 net (postage extra.)

HARPER & BROTHERS, FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK

The Jumping Frog

By MARK TWAIN

This story first brought Mark Twain into prominence as a humorist. It had instant recognition as a notable piece of humorous fiction and has remained a general favorite amid all the author's later work. The story of the "Jumping Frog" is now published as a book, with translation from the French and new addition by the author written in November of 1903.

Humorously Illustrated with Twelve Full-page Drawings by Strothman
Crown 8vo, Ornamented Cloth, $1.00

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS, NEW YORK
NEW YORK CENTRAL'S GRAND CENTRAL STATION,

Faultless

Hunter Baltimore Rye

leads in universal popularity because there's nothing wanting. It has

Absolute Purity
Faultless Quality
Exquisite Flavor

Sold at all first-class liquor and wine hotels, in N. Y. and all other cities.

Mammoth Cave

One of America's greatest wonders is located in Edmonson County, Kentucky, 30 miles south of Louisville. This Company has just issued a very interesting booklet of 20 pages description of the Cave. This booklet is well illustrated with many fine half-tone cuts, is printed on unsanded book paper and design on cover is in three colors and very attractive. If you want a copy send 10 cents in silver or stamps to

C. L. STONE, Care Post. Agent

Louisville & Nashville R.R.
LOUISVILLE, KY.

Fly-Rods & Fly-Tackle

Suggestions as to their Manufacture and Use

REVISED EDITION

By H. P. WELLS

Author of "The American Indian's Fisherman"

Illustrated with Photographs

Post Free, Ornamented Cloth, $1.12 net (postage extra)

HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers, New York
CENTER OF THE CITY OF
NEW YORK

Mark Twain's Six Funniest Books

Tom Sawyer

Innocents Abroad

Vol. 1

Innocents Abroad

Vol. 2

Pudd'nhead Wilson

Roughing It

Vol. 1

Roughing It

Vol. 2

Six Beautifully Bound Books

*With Illustrations by E. W. Kemble, Peter Newell,
B. West Clinedinst, and J. G. Brown*

Of all the books of the great humorist these are the ones that have made his name a household word wherever the English language is spoken.

Their Fun is Immortal—Worth Reading Twice

This is the first time that these volumes have been put within the reach of any but the rich, and published in a uniform low-priced set.

Everybody Can Afford Them

OUR OFFER—We will send you the entire set of six volumes, charges prepaid, on receipt of $1.00. If you do not like the books when they reach you, send them back at our expense, and we will return the $1.00. If you do like them, send us $1.00 every month for 11 months. In order to keep you in touch with us during these months, on receipt of your request for these books we will enter you as a subscriber for one year, without additional cost to you, for either HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, HARPER'S BAZAR, or THE NORTH AMERICAN REVIEW. In writing, state which periodical you want.

Harper & Brothers, Publishers, New York City

MENNEN'S

Borated Talcum

TOILET POWDER

MENNEN'S TOILET POWDER

brings comfort to tender skins; soothes in cases of chafing, itching or sunburn;—relieves and refreshes tender feet;—essential for children's health and comfort—refreshing after the bath,—cooling for prickly heat;—delightful after shaving.

Mennen's is the powder used by all ages—the powder with a National Reputation. Take no worthless substitutes which are liable to do harm.

Imitations are forced on you by dealers because the profit is much larger than on the genuine article.

25c. everywhere, or by mail
SAMPLE FREE

GERHARD MENNEN CO.

22 Orange St., Newark, N. J.

HARPER'S WEEKLY

Edited by George Harvey

HARPER @ BROTHERS NEW YORK

July 30 1904

Price 10 Cents

Sir Mortimer

By
MARY JOHNSTON
Author of "To Have and To Hold"

THE love of Sir Mortimer for the fair Damaris Sedley, a lady-in-waiting, holds unswerving course through a narrative alive with stirring incidents of the days of Sir Walter Raleigh, when all England loved, sung, adventured, and fought, in the flush of youthful power. Herein is a love story of uncommon charm cast among stirring scenes—love in the lap of adventure, set forth with rare imaginative power.

Readers of "To Have and To Hold" will welcome in this tale of love and gallantry the distinct advance Miss Johnston has made upon her former success. The romance is instinct with new life and color, like the golden days with which it deals.

"The witchery of romance pervades its scenes, and once in the grasp of the story line reader will be swept along the current to the end."—Chicago Chronicle.

"Her thousands of admiring readers will thank her for the book—a strong, vigorous, original story, with honor as its theme."—Syracuse Herald.

"May be classed among the gems of modern novels."—Birmingham News.

"She has reproduced in a wonderful manner the tone of Elizabeth, with all its greatness and its littleness."—N. Y. World.

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK

In Search of the Unknown

By
ROBERT W. CHAMBERS
Author of "The Maiden of Paradise," "Cardigan," etc.

THIS captivating story describes the strange adventures and novel love affairs of a young student of science who accompanies a learned professor on expeditions in search of the unknown in nature. The professor is on the track of some entirely new facts, with which he intends to astonish the world. In the meantime the student meets several girls, and half a dozen love affairs develop. A unique and highly entertaining story, in which Mr. Chambers has drawn his girls with his usual felicity, and their engaging charms are all the more piquant displayed in such fantastic surroundings.

Post 8vo, Cloth, $1.50

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK

"There's recreation in the books themselves."

77 Information

Bureaus of the New York Central Lines

Each City ticket office of the New York Central, Boston & Albany, Michigan Central, Lake Shore, Big Four, Pittsburg & Lake Erie and Lake Erie & Western Railroads in the cities of New York, Brooklyn, Boston, Worcester, Springfield, Albany, Utica, Montreal, Syracuse, Rochester, Buffalo, Niagara Falls, Toronto, Detroit, Cleveland, Pittsburg, Columbus, Indianapolis, Cincinnati, Louisville, St. Louis, Chicago, St. Paul, Denver, San Francisco, Portland, Los Angeles and Dallas, Texas, is an information bureau where desired information regarding rates, time of trains, character of resorts, hotel accommodations, and a thousand and one other things the intending traveler wants to know will be freely given to all callers.

Send to George H. Dinkels, General Passenger Agent, Grand Central Station, New York, a 2 cent stamp for a 88 page Illustrated Catalogue of the "Four Track Series."

THE GIVERS

BY
MARY E. WILKINS FREEMAN

THESE are Mary E. Wilkins Freeman's latest stories. All are filled with the humor and pathos of New England life—the type of story which is indisputably the author's own, and in which she scored her remarkable early success.

Of the stories in this volume, the title story—"The Givers"—has created more widespread interest and called forth more letters from the author's readers than anything else Mrs. Freeman has done. It is a laughable tale of the revolt of a sturdy, strong-minded woman against the inappropriateness of the Christmas gifts with which she is deluged by her well-to-do, unthinking friends. How she leads each in turn to replace her gift with some homely, serviceable article is a triumph of rough-handed New England diplomacy and a highly amusing tale.

Sophia Lane is but one of the many characters in this book who are good to know and not soon forgotten.

Illustrated, Cloth, $1.25

HARPER & BROTHERS
PUBLISHERS NEW YORK CITY

HARPER'S WEEKLY

JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION

VOL. XLVIII

New York, Saturday, July 30, 1904

NO. 245

Copyright, 1904, by Harper & Brothers. All rights reserved.

THERE'S LIFE IN THE OLD MAN YET

HARPER'S WEEKLY

Vol. XLVIII,

No. 2484

EDITED BY GEORGE HARVEY

THIRTY-SIX PAGES

NEW YORK CITY, JULY 30, 1904

Terms: 10 Cents a Copy—$4.00 a Year, in Advance
 Postage free to all Subscribers in the United States, Canada, Mexico,
 Hawaii, Porto Rico, the Philippine Islands, Guam, and Tutuila, Samoa

Entered at the New York Post Office as second-class matter

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS
 NEW YORK CITY: FRANKLIN SQUARE
 LONDON: 45 ALBEMARLE STREET, W.

COMMENT

THE most interesting feature of the campaign up to date is that nobody seems to have decided definitely whom he will vote for. Four years or eight years ago the average man met on the street after the nominations were made answered promptly, "McKinley" or "Bryan." This year he hesitates, and either asks his interlocutor what he is going to do, or he guesses one is about as good as the other, or he "always has been a Republican, and can't see why," or, "it is a satisfaction to know you can vote for a Democrat if you want to," and so on. Positive commitments are rare. The average man is waiting. The candidates personally are unexceptionable. As for the platforms, he will see what they have to say in their letters of acceptance. In any case, he is well satisfied, and goes about his work with a feeling of security such as he has not experienced in recent years. This is good. It means that a revival in business may not only be expected, but has already begun. Exports are increasing, crops are flourishing, saw-mills are working overtime, railroads are getting ready for the greatest traffic next fall they have ever handled, idle money is seeking investment, prices are hardening—in all ways are evidenced the beneficial effects of the return of sense to a great political party. The way is clear for the conduct of a campaign upon high lines—upon the relative merits of party organizations, party principles, and party candidates—without serious apprehension of any kind. Meanwhile the average man waiting is wise. When there is no danger, there need be no haste.

Particularities of the daily and Sunday and nightly lives of the candidates are now the most popular features of our active papers. No detail from this time on will escape the sometime friendly, sometime hostile, but ever anxious eyes of the reporters. Already we know that the Judge's favorite bathing-suit is blue, mostly set off with narrow white stripes, and of proportions specially designed to afford a striking contrast to the garments worn by Secretary Taft's lacrosse at the big fair. It is expected that this fact will be utilized with great effect by the Sprinkled Republican in its masterly elucidation of the true principles of anti-imperialism. On the other hand, the principal meal of the day at Rosemount is served at seven o'clock instead of at noon—a custom wholly discomfited with the traditions of the Grange—and the Judge substitutes a dinner-jacket for the blue overalls universally recognized as the emblem of best form in our agricultural districts. Trust the Tribune to make the most of this incriminating evidence in the weekly edition founded by H. G. The Colonel, being President, is enabled to draw a secret-service crowd around his personal habits, but already sinister rumors are being whispered to the effect that, on the eve of the battle of San Juan Hill, he hid himself to rest within a suit of plumeated pajamas. Suitable pictures therefore may be expected in due time to decorate the artistic pages of Mr. Hearst's colored supplements. Thus the good work of appealing to the reason of a free people will continue unabated and unaltered.

Needless to say, during the trying period now begun, the conduct of not only the candidates but of the wives and mothers and aunts and children of the candidates, even to the fourth generation, as in the case of Mr. Davis, must be exemplary in every respect. But even that will not suffice in the mind of an active campaign-director. No tricks must be mixed either. It is gratifying to observe that, so far as we can perceive, none has been as yet. For example, we read that while passing the plate on Sunday a suspicious moisture adfused the eyes of the Judge as he reverently accepted a paper from a little colored boy—a living, dusty example of a true race once enslaved but now—except, of course, as to voting—free as untamed steeds. Meanwhile the President was "in his accustomed pew," and Theodore, Jr., in emulation which we hesitate to pronounce politically wise, of the only son of the biggest Trust, began to teach a class in Sunday-school. These we opine to be only preparatory exercises, but they constantly precedents which must needs be followed to the end. Were unto the Judge if he misses the bell before November, and sad will be the fate of the young instructor should he, in a forthright moment, yield to the enticement, in preference, of the waves of the South!

We are disposed to wonder sometimes whether we really are as silly as we pretend to consider ourselves. Suppose, for example, of a crisp Sunday morning, after six days of laboring with the Philistines, the Judge and the Colonel should meet by chance upon the golf-link of a neutral club and forthwith play a match! Would we have a revolution? Would Rev. Dr. Sales C. Summels be elevated? What would happen, anyway? Who would venture a prediction? It would be a game worth seeing. They are good men, and would doubtless prove as antithetic at golf as in statecraft. The Colonel would put out a long ball; there is no doubt of that. But would he keep on the course? Ah, there's the rub! The Judge has a good eye and would keep it on the ball; also, we apprehend, he would play short in the face of trouble, but once on the green, might not his inaccuracy counterbalance the advantage gained by his more daring antagonist? Who can tell? It would be a grand game, anyhow, and we have no manner of doubt that they would like to play it as much as we should like to have them. Meanwhile the passing of plates and the teaching of Sunday-school classes are pastimes quite as unobjectionable and probably make up in usefulness for the greater restlessness to be acquired upon the links.

Of the many estimates of the probable outcome of the coming Presidential election, the calculation published on July 18 by the Evening Sun, though not entirely acceptable, deserves particular attention, because the writer is evidently well informed and disinterested. Before marking what seem to us some weak points in his computation, we should remind the reader that there are now 470 Presidential electors, and it follows that, to gain the Presidency, a nominee must secure 235, or more than half. Nobody will dispute the correctness of the assumption that the Democratic nominee is virtually certain to carry thirteen States, which, together, possess 124 electoral votes. Named in alphabetical order, these States are Alabama, Arkansas, Florida, Georgia, Kentucky, Louisiana, Mississippi, Missouri, North Carolina, South Carolina, Tennessee, Texas, Virginia. The only State in this list about which any doubt has been tendered during the last quarter of a century is Kentucky, which in 1896 gave McKinley a plurality of 261 popular votes, and twelve out of its thirteen electoral votes. It is also true that in 1890 Kentucky elected a Republican Governor by a plurality of 283, but in the following year, it returned to the Democratic column, where it has since remained.

Of twenty States, which have 182 electoral votes, and which are set down as indisputably Republican, we noted the inclusion of one Eastern and some Western commonwealths as open to controversy. Disregarding Kansas, which voted for Weaver in 1892 and for Bryan in 1896, but which, since 1898, has increased steadily the Republican plurality—and also passing over Rhode Island, though, of late, this State has repeatedly chosen a Democratic Governor—we would point out that the seven electoral votes of Connecticut are by no means assured to Mr. Roosevelt. It is true that the State was carried for McKinley in 1896 and 1900, and, during the last eight years, has thrice elected a Republican Governor; but the Republican plurality in 1902 was considerably less than a third of the figure attained by McKinley six years before. The Democratic nominees for the Presidency carried Connecticut in 1876, 1884, 1888, and 1892, and if in 1890 Garfield secured in it a plurality of 2550 it was because he also managed to carry the adjoining Empire commonwealth. Should New York give Judge Parker a large plurality, he is more likely to be successful in Connecticut than is his competitor. This State, therefore, should be removed from the table of "certain" Republican States. As to Idaho, North Dakota, South Dakota, Utah, Washington, and Wyoming, Bryan carried every one of them in 1896, and retained Idaho in 1900. In the last-named year, McKinley carried Utah by a plurality of only 2133 popular votes, and Wyoming by only 4318. If we withdraw at least doubtful the three electoral votes of Utah and the three of Idaho as well as the seven of Connecticut from the Evening Star's list, the total of safe-Republican electoral votes is reduced to 169.

We come, finally, to twelve States having 143 Presidential electors, acknowledged to be "doubtful." From these Mr. Roosevelt must add seventy electoral votes to the 169 with which we have credited him, in order to be elected. It is evident that some of the assumptions on which this list is based require revision. Why, for instance, should Maryland figure in it? Since the new Franchise Act became operative in that State, it can be reckoned upon by Judge Parker with as much confidence as can Kansas be counted on by Roosevelt. Well-informed persons believe also that West Virginia has been secured for Judge Parker by the nomination of ex-Senator Davis of that State for the Vice-Presidency. Why, again, should not Nevada, which has never given its three electoral votes to a Republican since including 1892, be much more likely to go for Parker this year than is Idaho to go for Roosevelt? Neither are we able to understand why Montana should be described as "doubtful." Montana has never given its electoral votes to a Republican, except in 1892, and then by a plurality of only 1250. It is true that two years ago it elected a Republican Justice of the Supreme Court, but in that case political considerations were by no means predominant. The thirty-nine votes of New York are also placed by the Evening Star in the doubtful column, but when we compare the vote-getting records of the competitors, we must admit that Judge Parker has a better chance of gaining the Empire commonwealth than Mr. Roosevelt has of winning Idaho or Utah. Neither, with the political contests of the last twelve years in view, does Mr. Roosevelt seem to have any prospect of carrying Colorado. Delaware we are inclined to concede to the Republican candidate, in view of what has taken place in that State since and including 1894. We hold, moreover, that the nomination of Senator Fairbanks for the Vice-Presidency ought to give Indiana to the Republicans. We think, on the other hand, that the Evening Star is justified in treating Illinois, Nebraska, New Jersey, and Wisconsin in the list of doubtful States. It seems to us plain, therefore, that Senator Fairbanks sets the part of wisdom when, in his Indianapolis newspaper, he urges his coworkers to cease taking results for granted and to be up and doing.

There are those who explain the presence of the "Fore-bill" plank in the platform put forward by the Republicans this year at Chicago—a plank repudiated by Republican leaders in 1900 and 1896—on the assumption that Mr. Roosevelt felt constrained by his conception of his political duty to insist on the insertion of the demand for the enforcement of the Fourteenth Amendment. Others suggest that the probable effect of the Fore-bill plank on negro voters in doubtful States at the North may not have been overlooked by the Republican nominee. Let us see what the negro vote might amount to in pivotal Northern commonwealths. According to the last census there were in California 3711 colored males of voting age; in Colorado, 3215; in Connecticut, 4576; in Delaware, 8354; in Illinois, 29,702; in Indiana, 18,186; in Nebraska, 2288; in New Jersey, 21,474; in New York, 31,424; in Ohio, 31,253; and in Rhode Island, 2765. When we remember how close these States have been at times—even Ohio gave Cleveland one of her electoral votes in 1892—we can see that, if the colored vote should be cast solidly for the Republican nominee, it might suffice to turn the scale in the commonwealths named. Even in Kansas the adult male negroes of voting age number 14,895; in Michigan, 5193; and in the State of Washington, 1230. Yet, notwithstanding the evident effect of the negro vote in doubtful States on the contest for the Presidency, the late President McKinley and the late Senator Hanna declined fully to secure it by a promise to enforce the Fourteenth Amendment.

At the hour when we write there seems to be no doubt that either ex-Lieutenant-Governor William F. Sheahan or Senator Arthur P. Gorman might have the chairmanship of the Democratic National Committee if he will take it. Apparently, it is equally certain that neither is well enough to support the exhausting labors and wearing responsibilities inseparable from the post. Under the circumstances, it is probable that Mr. Thomas Tammert, of Indiana, will be selected for the duty. It may be remembered that, before leaving St. Louis, many of the most influential representatives of Southern States on the new national committee desired formally to recommend the choice of the Indian to the nominee for the Presidency. There is a widespread impression that while Mr. Tammert might not be able to carry Indiana against Senator Fairbanks, he would be of great assistance to his party in all the other doubtful States west of the Alleghenies. On the other hand, he is not known to have excited any jealousy or enmity in the East; and in the management of the campaign in New York, New Jersey, and Connecticut, he might be expected to rely on Mr. Sheahan's advice. He could not have a safer adviser. Next in Chief-Judge Parker himself, no one has made more progress in the esteem and confidence of his fellow citizens, since the St. Louis convention was called together, than has the ex-Lieutenant-Governor. If his counsel is followed all factional dissensions inside the Democratic party will be allayed or suspended in the pivotal Empire commonwealth; and it should prove even easier to effect the desirable result this year than it was in 1892, because Chief-Judge Parker is of a more placable and judicial temper than was Mr. Cleveland. Whichever position may have been taken, before the St. Louis convention adjourned, with regard to the expediency of nominating the New York candidate, there will be no favoritism and no persecution on the part of Chief-Judge Parker toward any element of the Empire State Democracy, provided, of course, all elements concur heartily in the promotion of a party victory.

Nobody, of course, would moderate the effect on a Presidential contest of the maintenance of contentment on the part of farmers and skilled workmen. If the producers of our export staples have reason to expect good prices, or if skilled labor in all fields can look forward to steady employment at what they consider fair prices, the chances of dislodging the Republican party from its place of power in the Federal government would no doubt be lessened. The pending struggle between the meat-packers and their employees is, so far as it goes, an incident of ill omen for the Republican nominee. It is too early yet to forecast the lengths to which a sympathetic strike may be carried, and as yet, therefore, we cannot measure accurately the political significance of this collision between capital and labor. That the Kansas crop of winter wheat has been materially damaged seems to be undisputed. But the effect of the curtailed production may be counterbalanced by an increase of prior stored Europe's wheat yield fall signally below last year's, as is now asserted to be probable. The prospects of the maize or Indian-corn crop are decidedly better than they were a year ago. As the acreage allotted this year to that product is only 87,000 acres less than that of 1902, and as the condition of the staple at this time is seven points better than it was at the same date in 1902, there are good grounds for expecting the second largest harvest recorded. The largest corn crop ever known was that of 1902, when the output was 2,552,000,000 bushels. Before the trying times of August and September shall have come and gone, it would be premature to predict whether this year the cotton crop will reach once more the record-breaking yield of twelve million bales. The fate of the cotton stands depends to an obvious extent upon the question whether killing first is deferred until later than the average date of its occurrence, which is about November 1.

In his manifesto from Lincoln, dated July 13, in which he says he will support the Parker and Davis ticket, Colonel Bryan announces: "As soon as the election is over, I shall, with the help of those who believe as I do, undertake to reorganize for the campaign of 1898, the object being to marshal the friends of popular government within the Democratic party to the support of a radical and progressive policy, to make the Democratic party an efficient means in the hands of the people for securing relief from the plutocratic element that controls the Republican party and for the time being is in control of the Democratic party. This plan of organization will be elaborated soon." Will it better suit the Colonel's purpose of reorganization, thus declared, that Judge Parker shall lose or win the election? "Judge Parker," he says, "stands for enough things that are good to justify me in giving him my vote." But how about the votes that he can influence? Does he suppose that the Judge shall receive those also? There are few such votes in the East, and not many, it is thought, in the South, but in the Western mining States there may be some. Parker's nomination was secured, says Colonel Bryan, by crooked and indefensible methods; nevertheless he will vote for Parker as against Roosevelt. But will it be easier to reorganize, or, more accurately, to re-Bryanize, the Democratic party with Parker in the White House or with Roosevelt there? This question can hardly fail to be matter for deep meditation to Colonel Bryan during the coming three months. The Democratic party has been twice organized to promote the ends which Colonel Bryan had in view and has twice been beaten. Can it be organized again for the pursuit of those ends after a successful campaign in which some of those ends were resolutely excluded? It seems doubtful. Would not Colonel Bryan be well advised to take counsel of prudence and postpone the elaboration of his plan of organization until he sees how matters stand on the morning of November 9? It will be time enough then to organize for 1898. An organization for that year, if elaborated now, might break loose and get to work to beat the "plutocratic element" in the Democratic party in the coming election. That would not do. If Colonel Bryan beats the Democrats this year, he cannot count with certainty on Democratic help in beating the Republicans four years from now. The Colonel's best course for the present is to lie low.

The summer's campaign will do all the Republican editors good. They have had too easy a time. In the campaigns of 1896 and 1899 there was practically only one time to play, and if they played that hard enough they did their full duty. That jig is up now. That time gets no votes this year, and somewhat awkwardly and with a perceptible heaviness of spirit the Republican editors wheel into line. It is not that they are troubled with forebodings or timorons about the issue. It is that it is all so strange. No Bryan to plug at; no huge barn-door target of free silver that any tyro could always hit; Parker, and the money question irreverently settled! It means a great change. It means work overtime by all the designers for the slogan factories, and the readjustment of sights on political weapons and careful going over of old stocks of projectiles. All this takes time, and nobody is, or need be, in a hurry to begin. Meanwhile the near-by Republican editors are looking over the new situation, and some of them are grunting. "What happened," says the New York Mail, "was the breakdown—the inevitable breakdown—of the conspiracy of silence. . . . We repeat, this is a detested plot in which Judge Parker is almost the principal figure." "Judge Parker," says the Tribune, "played a shrewd game of politics. Yet he emerges creditably from a convention whose most respectable figure was William Jennings Bryan." "When the voters," says the Press, "deliver their verdict on the Belmont-Parker crime against principle and decency, they will make the silver question a greater man than the candidate who after long silence opened his lips at last only to compound a moral and political felony."

No doubt the Republican editors will miss the silver champion sorely enough, but it is not becoming in them to sigh for him so audibly. They are on the wrong lay. The better man for them to show at this stage is that assigned by rumor to the patriot statesman of Oyster Bay, whose exclamation on the morning of July 19 is said to have been, "Thank God the Democrats have put up a man at last who is not a word to the contrary." And this exclamation, like most honest words that come from the heart, may even have been good politics. The Hartford Connecticut figures out that the stronger the mainline of the Democrats and the sounder their platform, the better the chance for Roosevelt. For it argues simply and reasonably that the stronger public confidence is in both candidates and both platforms, the better for business; and the better business is in a Presidential year, the less desire there is for a change. So the wise thing for the Republican editors to do is to admit heartily that the Judge and his party are deserving of every confidence, and that no business man need postpone any venture for fear of any consequence of anything that may happen in November. Bryan has supplied the Republicans with their most effective slogan. He declares and insists upon it that Parker is Safe.

The plank in the St. Louis platform demanding a recurrence on the part of Federal officials to "Jeffersonian simplicity" in living has provoked a question which the framers of the plank probably never thought of considering, the question, namely, what is meant by "Jeffersonian simplicity." Now, there is no doubt that during two years of his first term as President, Mr. Jefferson believed it to be politically indispensable to counteract the tendencies towards form and ceremony that had characterized the administrations of Washington and Adams by furnishing as strong a contrast as possible. His two predecessors in the post of Chief Magistrate had exalted ideas of their office, and believed that the observance of a good deal of ceremonial was necessary to the maintenance of its dignity. That during the two years from March 4, 1801, to March 4, 1803, Jefferson was acting a part is taken for granted by Mr. William Elmer Curtis, author of The True Thomas Jefferson, who finds confirmation of the theory in the fact that the "simplicity" programme was not permanent; that it was abandoned as soon as the third President became satisfied that no further danger was to be feared from the imitation of what he called "monarchical institutions." Among the "citizen" leaders of the French Revolution he had seen something of the leveling system he introduced, and, perhaps, was convinced that it was during a period of transition a useful feature of a republican form of government. At all events, when he first took office, he was determined not to be a personage, but "Citizen Jefferson" and nothing else. There is no doubt that, during the two years that we have named, he carried simplicity to an extreme, and gave great offense to the British and Spanish ministers. That in the case of the British envoy the offense was deliberate is probably true, and here Jefferson was impelled not only by political motives, but also by a desire to humiliate the King of England's representative, in retaliation for the insolence with which that monarch had treated him (Jefferson) when with Adams he visited the court of St. James's on his way home from France.

After he thought the protest against the transplantation of monarchical and aristocratic notions to an American republic had been sufficiently emphasized, Jefferson changed his habits and became a gentleman again. He received visitors with decorum. He returned to the customs of refined society, and the criticisms which had been aimed upon his manners in disparaging hospitality were changed to compliments. He also altered his style of dress. "He has had aside his old slip-pers," wrote Senator Plummer of Massachusetts, "and his old red waistcoat and soiled corduroy small-clothes, and is attired all in black with clean linen and powdered hair." Even during the first year of his first term Jefferson's account-books show that he spent nearly eight thousand dollars more than his salary, which, it will be remembered, was $25,000. Even then there were almost as many servants on the monthly pay-roll of the White House as there are to-day. Three of these—to wit, the steward, the chef, and the kitchen-boy—were French. Then, as at all periods of his adult life, his table was famous. The writers of his day described his dinners as perfection, and his viands and wines as the best that could be furnished. One of the Federalist Congressmen, an unfriendly witness, remarked that he wished the President's French policies were as good as his French wine.

As Mr. Henry Adams has pointed out in his history of Jefferson's administration, there is no foundation for the story invented by an Englishman named Davis, and caught up by Federalist newspapers, that on March 4, 1801, the third President rode on horseback to the Capitol, and, after hitching his horse on the railings, went in to take the oath. As a matter of fact, Jefferson, at the time of his first inauguration, was living at Conrad's boarding-house, which still stands on New Jersey Avenue, not far from the Capitol, in the same room which he had occupied during his term as Vice-President, and it would have been absurd for him to enter a carriage or mount a horse for the purpose of traveling so short a distance. He walked between Dexter of Massachusetts, Secretary of the Treasury, and Stoddard of Maryland, Secretary of the Navy, the only members of Adams's cabinet who had had the decency to remain in Washington. He and they were escorted to the Capitol, short as the distance was, by a battalion of soldiers on foot, while a column of honor was fired by a battery from Alexandria. At the close of the ceremony, Jefferson was escorted in the same way back to Conrad's boarding-house. He did not occupy the White House until the ensuing May, probably from his lack of proper furnishings and his own absence from the city. As President, Jefferson had a fine coach, drawn by four magnificent horses, for which he paid sixteen hundred dollars, a very large sum in those days, and his coachmen and footmen were clad in livery. The vehicle was seldom used, however, because the streets of Washington were unpaved and muddy. Jefferson preferred his saddle to a carriage, because it gave him exercise; he was proud of his horses and a fearless rider.

Here it is pertinent to recall some of the facts collected by Mr. W. E. Curtis, which show that not until his accession to the Presidency did Jefferson deem it expedient to affect simplicity in dress and demeanor. While minister of the United States to France he had lived with great elegance. His entertainments were beautiful and frequent. He not only spent the whole of his salary, but drew largely upon his private resources to maintain an appearance befitting his position. No representative of the United States at the French capital has ever done greater credit to his country by his department and his hospitality. On occasion he could be a courtier, and knew as well as any Frenchman how to turn a compliment. So, too, while a member of Congress and Secretary of State in Philadelphia he had kept quite an imposing establishment in a suburb near Gray's Ferry; there were five horses and five men servants in livery, including a butler brought from Paris. He afterwards imported a French coach. His dinners at Philadelphia were notable as social treats, and there was nothing in his habits or his bearing to foreshadow the negligence which afterwards he temporarily assumed. His own scientific tastes, indeed, led him rather into the society of scholars than into the gay world, but he was extremely careful that his daughters should learn dancing, music, and other social accomplishments from the most fashionable preceptors, and showed great solicitude about their manners and deportment. He wrote for them essays on etiquette, and admonished them to cultivate the "art of politeness." He was, it is recalled, fastidious about his table china and plate. It was he, by the way, who introduced finger-bowls into the United States. Of dress he wrote that it was the article in which economy is perhaps the least to be recommended. He warned his daughter that her clothing should be fit for its kind, and that, from the moment she rose from bed, she should dress herself in such style as that she might be seen by any gentleman without being able to discover a pin missing.

Mr. Balfour's army proposals go far to justify what we said the other day, concerning the ability of the governing class in England to govern, by sheer ability, and without theories. The most striking fact about the new proposals is that, flatly contradicting the tendency in nearly every civilized country at the present day, Mr. Balfour has the courage to cut down not merely the rest of the army, but its numbers. He will effect a saving of some two and a half million dollars a year; something not to be sneered at, in these days of shrinking trade and idle shipping. He will lessen the numbers of the standing army by some nine thousand men, leaving the total of the British army at two hundred and twenty-seven thousand, less than one-fourth of the peace armies of France, Germany, or Russia, each of which has about five million men ready for service on a war foundation. The Secretary for War, Mr. Arnold-Forster, to whom it fell to set forth the government's scheme, declared that he would leave the militia untouched; and that he would not diminish either the cavalry or the artillery branches of the service. The great changes would be confined to the infantry, which he proposed to reduce by fourteen battalions, leaving forty or fifty battalions for home service, after providing for India and the colonies. A certain number of battalions would be kept at home. These would be reduced to five hundred men, four hundred of whom would be enlisted for two years' service, and would afterwards enter the reserve for six years. This would provide for three as many reservists as there are men with the colors, thus raising the army on a war foundation to four times its peace strength; and this plan of building up a reserve is really the great feature of the new proposals. Other points are, that the volunteer establishment is to be reduced to one hundred and eighty thousand men, but these are to be much more effectively trained than at present, so as to become an element of real strength.

Perdicardis (alive) has rather a good opinion of Raouli. In Paris, where he has gone to apprise the French government of the disturbed condition of Tangier, he is quoted as recommending that Raouli be given a chance to keep order in northern Morocco. "He says he can do it," says Perdicardis. "Try him. It would be an experiment, but it is better than anarchy. I consider him the strongest man now available to deal with the turbulent conditions about him." Mr. Perdicardis says it is a mistake to think of Raouli as a common robber. He dresses like a Moorish gentleman, and, apparently, behaves like one. His capture of Mr. Perdicardis was a move in politics in retaliation for persecution of himself and his family. Mr. Perdicardis got no hurt from his six weeks' experience of Raouli's hospitality, but his wife is still somewhat the worse for being thrown down a flight of stone steps by Raouli's men.

Any story about the Czar is credible until a likelier one invades it. The Czar lives behind closed shutters, and there is no trustworthy Jacob Riis to give the public a reliable peep through them. To be sure, he is often seen in public; to be sure, he makes discourse from time to time that the public may hear or read; but it is a man in uniform that people see, and the words of a man in uniform that they hear. The real man lives secluded, advised by counsellors whom his people rarely know and still more rarely trust. In the Quarterly Review, a writer, said to be a high Russian official, draws a picture of the Czar which has made some stir in England. It is sufficiently depressing. He represents him as possessed of the dangerous notion that he is God's lieutenant on earth and acting under divine guidance. He takes wrongly, it seems, the legal fiction that the king can do no wrong, and resting on that belief, and relying on advisers who encourage it, he neglects with everything, to the prodigious detriment of the business of state. Pleyer possesses his master to keep his word, evincing Manchuria and avoid war. Says the Quarterly writer: "He is ever struggling with phantoms, fighting windmills, conversing with saints, consulting spirits of the dead. Books he long ago ceased to read; sound advice he is incapable of listening to." The grand dukes are the real power in Russia, according to this writer, for no minister can contend successfully with their influence with the Czar. This is a pitiful picture of the autocrat of a great nation committed to a serious war. It may be exaggerated or even false, but it corresponds with the impressions that prevail at this distance from St. Petersburg, that the young Czar is a dreadfully over-weighted man, not at all up to his tremendous job, not able to choose and trust wise helpers, nor to withstand the calamitous influences that beset him.

Mr. Straus is for Mr. Rosenfeld.

Our National Irrigation Problem

A FEATURE of the platform adopted by the Democratic national convention at St. Louis, which deserves more attention than it has hitherto received, is the laudatory reference to the arrangements made for the reclamation of arid lands on a vast scale. The platform congratulates our Western citizens upon the passing of the law known as the Newlands Irrigation Act, for rendering the arid tracts of the Far West suitable for tillage; a measure framed by a Democrat, carried through the Senate by a non-partisan vote, but only accepted by the House in the face of the opposition of almost all the Republican leaders. It is a notable characteristic of this comprehensive measure that it is designed so as to work automatically, however, without further action on the part of the national Legislature, until the reclamation shall have been accomplished. The lands reclaimed, moreover, are to be reserved for home-seekers in small tracts, and rigorous precautions are taken against land monopoly, both of which far-seeing regulations were justly commended at St. Louis as symbols of the policy of domestic development which the Democratic party may be expected to carry out should it be placed in power. We may here recall the words penned by the President of the United States in a letter addressed to the Twelfth Irrigation Congress, which was held at Elgin last September: "The passage of the National Irrigation Law," Mr. Roosevelt said, "is one of the great steps not only in the progress of the United States, but of all mankind. It is the beginning of an achievement so great that we hesitate to predict the outcome." What has actually been accomplished under the law since its enactment in 1902 is summed up in the latest number of the Review of Reviews by Mr. William E. Smythe, author of The Country of the Future. Before marking some of the results achieved by the Geological Survey, to whose supervision the task of constructing and controlling the irrigation works was committed, we should call to mind the magnitude and complexity of the project. The entire western half of the United States had in the first place to be studied by experienced men, and all available data concerning water supply and the feasibility of reclaiming the vast and unsex of the West had to be collected and considered. The Reclamation law is very far-reaching, and has many important ramifications. Much has had to be taken into account besides water and land. It is not sufficient merely to build storage works and turn water into open channels. The soil must actually be reclaimed, and the capital invested in reclaiming it need be returned to the fund, to be used over and over again as similar enterprises. Then the soil made tillable has to be subdivided into areas of sufficient size to support a family. The Secretary of the Interior may fix the unit as low as forty acres, but it must not exceed 160. The best-named figure represents the maximum amount of water right which may be sold to land held by a private individual. In all cases, moreover, the beneficiary of national irrigation must be an actual occupant of the soil, living thereon or in its immediate vicinity. It is not until the end of the new policy is, as the Democratic platform says, to assist small home-makers in getting a foothold on the land. The government's purpose is not to aid speculators, but only to assist genuine settlers in securing the amount of irrigated soil reasonably needed for the support of their families. The contemplated outcome of the law is not only the storage of water, but the intensive cultivation of the soil by a multitude of landed proprietors. Mr. Smythe is justified in saying that if only one State were to be benefited by the Geological Survey, a thorough study of its resources and opportunities would be a great task. When, however, thirteen States and three Territories have to be examined, and selections made that will stand the test of future judgment, the burden imposed upon the surveyors becomes one of economic proportions. Often the prospects which had been generally regarded beforehand as most attractive, and had been discussed with most approval in the newspaper press, have been found, upon local investigation, to have fatal defects, and, consequently, have been abandoned to the disappointment of large numbers of people.

The principle upon which Dr. Charles D. Walcott, director of the Geological Survey, and Mr. Frederick Haynes Norvell, chief engineer of the reclamation service, have proceeded, is the following: In each of the thirteen States and three Territories named in the law, one leading project has been selected with a view to early completion of the work, provided all of the conditions should prove favorable. For example, in Arizona, a great storage-dam has been begun on Salt River, for holding the flood waters until they can be used. In California, the Secretary of the Interior has authorized works that will reclaim the lands in the vicinity of Yuma by means of a dam across the Lower Colorado River, which will raise water so that it can be used on adjacent lowlands. In the State of Colorado plans are nearly completed for the construction of a great tunnel from Gunnison River to the dry Uncompaghe Valley. In Idaho a great dam across Snake River has been planned, and contracts will be let for construction at an early date. In Nevada work has been begun on dams and canals to combine the flood-waters of the Truckee and Carson rivers. In short, in each State and Territory, some project of national importance is in process of planning and construction. All of these works are for the purpose of regulating or storing flood-waters, or lifting out of their channels those waters which are too low to be directed by gravity. Its such instrumentalities the intermittent streams are rendered perennial, and the occasional floods are restrained until the waters can be put to beneficial use.

The money needed for building these great structures comes not from direct taxation or appropriation, but from the accumulated sums paid for the public lands, which are being disposed of in these States and Territories. Day by day settlers and investors are paying to the government small sums to obtain a complete title to lands which have been, primarily, in public ownership. It is a little known but an interesting fact that from a half to one-tenth of the total area of the Western States and Territories still belongs to the Federal government. That government is now, as it has been for generations, giving away or selling these lands, and, since the date in 1902 when the Newlands Irrigation Law became operative, the moneys received for lands thus sold are credited to the Treasury to the Reclamation Fund, to be used for the construction of great works, which will facilitate the distribution of the public lands by adapting them to the plough and the furthering the creation of a multitude of small farms instead of a few large cattle ranches. The amounts received from land sales have ranged from less than a million dollars up to many millions a year, the amount varying according to the general prosperity of the country, the activity of the land offices, and the interpretation put by courts or by the Federal officials upon the laws. In recent numbers there was received three million dollars for the year 1904; four million dollars for 1902; eight million dollars for 1903, and in 1905 it is estimated that there will be over five million dollars, and possibly, as much as seven million dollars. As the land grows it is invested in irrigation works, and so it comes to pass that the arid lands pay virtually for their own reclamation, and the government, on its part, is the gainer by bringing about a permanent and flourishing settlement of areas, which otherwise would have been condemned to perpetual sterility. Although the law is but two years old this great national policy is already in full swing in seven States and one Territory, while preliminary examinations are being advanced in all the remainder of the arid region.

It is satisfactory to learn that under the Geological Survey there has been no room for corruption or graft. The spokesman has been rigorously barred from the reclamation service. Nobody has ever asked, and nobody knows to-day, whether the many individuals employed in the works are Republicans, Democrats, Socialists, or Prohibitionists. Appointments have been made under civil service examinations held in various parts of the United States. Only the experience and fitness of applicants are considered. Public men who have sought to influence appointments on behalf of their friends have encountered re-uffs to which they have been accustomed in their political experience. In their behavior toward several projects, all technically feasible, the heads of the reclamation service have acted with a broad view to the future development of the country and a perpetuation of its prosperity. They have been actuated by no considerations outside of the physical and human interests involved. Of course citizens of different localities have directed the attention of the service to what they regarded as promising opportunities for development, but each proposal has been dealt with on its merits. We observe finally, that those charged with the execution of the irrigation laws have steadfastly borne in mind that they are building not for a year or a decade, but for ages.

Mr. William E. Smythe is peculiarly qualified by long study of the subject to discuss the progress that has been made toward the solution of this national problem. It was he who, some eleven years ago, wrote for the Review of Reviews the first article that ever appeared in an American magazine in explanation and support of the suggested application of irrigation on a vast scale to the huge arid tracts that lie between the watershed of the Mississippi and the Sierra Nevada. He has taken as effective a part as he has any one in organizing the movement, of which Senator Newlands of Nevada became the sponsor in Congress, and which has resulted in a noteworthy law, for which millions upon millions of our children's children will be grateful.

Judaism's Future in America

The old child of the wind and the sun and their struggle with the passing traveler to see which could first enter him to out-aid his clank is inevitably called to mind by the effect which American toleration in matters of religion and our relative exemption from Anti-Semitism, has upon the Jewish and German Jews emigrating to this country and settling here. The wind of outcast and persecution which they have so stoutly and so successfully resisted in Europe, which has but accentuated their racial and re-declared to English opponents of this measure that the Chinese freely entered into their contracts to work, knowing exactly the restrictions which they would be put under. It appears, however, that they knew nothing of the kind. The notices posted up in Chinese towns in Shantung and Pechili contain nothing to draw the laborer's attention to the fact that he is to work ten hours a day underground in the deep levels. Nor is there even a hint that, during his three years' stay in the Transvaal, he will be kept in a kind of enlarged bull-pen, from which he will not be allowed to stray. Again, it is not made clear to the laborer that he will have no opportunity to better his position; nor is anything said about the fines, penalties, or imprisonment to which the laborer will be subject if he strays beyond the limits of the bull-pen, or if he helps any one else to escape.

In a word, these helpless and ignorant Chinamen are being condemned to three years' penal servitude, involving ten hours' daily work in deep-level mines, for the crime of seeking work. For this they are to receive something like twenty-five cents a day, less fines and stoppages, whereas a Chinese laborer even in California can earn sixty or seventy cents a day, working as a free man, in the open air. It would be easy to launch into rhetoric against this crying abuse, but it is better to keep to the cold, precise, denunciation of a learned authority on English law, who declares that such a contract would not be valid for a moment if made in England, "because it is in undue restraint of trade and of the liberty of the subject, and is inconsistent with the fundamental principles of the common law."

Holidays

To achieve a successful holiday is almost as difficult a matter as to achieve a successful labor. The requirements of preparation, of courage and power of choice, of poise of intellect and character, alert perception, and indifference to discomfort are almost as severe.

If one goes to one of the usual holiday resorts, and, possessing a sympathetic countenance, is by chance admitted to the secrets of one's fellow pleasure-seeker, what one most often learns is that mortals have led the prison-house of loneliness at home only to find a narrower one away, being bereft of the pleasant tasks and duties that helped to numb the sense of time. Indeed, the amount of listless misery borne by pleasure-seekers is incalculable, and the expense of failure in the field of holidays heart-rending.

The first great factor in a successful holiday, as in a successful life, is to know oneself, and to choose within the compass of one's real abilities. It is futile to try cramming out if one likes blue-tongues, delicate eating, and much service, and rapidly so to go to a big hotel invented and set on top of the earth for purposes of feeding, courtship, and displaying clothes, if one loves nature, and desire a silent communion with one's own soul. As a general rule, the better choice is to take what one has paid for as conspicuously and peacefully absent during the rest of the year. There is always a certain preparation for reaction in buying. So if one's workaday world is in the midst of a city where every turn is filled with people to whom one must adjust oneself and one's mood, the natural bent is to hunt for quiet in one's holiday.

Now on the face of it, a solitude would seem the cheapest and easiest thing to find, left, as a matter of fact, to find one adequate, beautiful, and safe is expensive, difficult, and risky. Perhaps as good a way as any, if one is not prepared to expend great sums and travel far, is simply to reverse the order of the day, and sleep during the sunlight and to repair, fresh and observant, to one's roof at sunrise. Here, with an open-glass for wide vistas into the heavens, with an easy chair or a cushion or two, one may find fresh air, undisturbed loneliness, and such peace as we bring with ourselves to enjoy. Again, this is a solitude lightly to be held aside if we find our mood not nicely adjusted; no money has been spent, no fatigue incurred, and we can face our failure to be delighted without too much humiliation.

On the other hand, if one has planned to run great risks, to travel far, and empty one's pockets, it is well to prepare carefully as one would for any other expensive undertaking. We should turn for advice to those who have already gone forth and triumphed alone. The most shining and conspicuous examples in literature of those who have written poems to the self-poised soul are Epictetus and Marcus Aurelius. These two have also the inestimable advantage of being easily procured in cheap pocket editions, so that one can carry this food of the spirit in safe and small compass without worrying. A line or two at a time, a single thought from Epictetus, will furnish matter for a day's reflection, and one need not always be holding the book open. Epictetus's words melt beautifully into the landscape, and easily become part and parcel of the phenomenal world about.

Marcus Aurelius, too, gives us the stuff of strength, though somewhat tinged with patient tears and in somewhat longer sentences, and Nietzsche reiterates all the philosophy of self-poise in the maxims and lyrics of Zarathustra, with a little added tinge of loneliness, a touch of awe and terror at the significance of desire.

For making one feel a part of nature, for inducing the subconscious mood, lulling the superficial faculties to sleep and rousing the profounder part of one's nature nothing is better than a slow, sleepy review of Shelley, "Alastor," "Lamia and Cythra," "Adonais," "The Cloud," "The West Wind," read as one lies on the ground, half awake and half asleep, rapidly seeing the flecking of light and shadow in the deep grasses, and the swaying of top-heavy daisies, hunches, buttercups, black-eyed Susans, and bitter-sweet twines, —these together, so tried to relieve of the limitations of personality, that one feels small as much in the wind that blows and the brook that gurgles, in the grasses and the meadow flowers, as in a body. One misses the sensation that the self reaches as far as consciousness, so that one really is already the color in the sunset, the song of the evening breeze, or the drip of the afternoon's slant sunbeam filtering over the curves of the hills.

But if we desire a more alert interest in the hours of rest, we can turn to the great professional holiday-makers—those who, like Thorstein, Herrings, and Elizabeth, have gone out into the realm of quiet and have conquered. Interest is mainly unsocial. Unless we are going in back at pictures or cathedrals, historic houses, and battle-grounds, when a special course of reading is usually marked out by the guide-books, it is best to read the praises of space and freedom and silence in general. We can turn to Elizabeth to exhortation for us that "By our own spirits we are deluded." (And surely it would be difficult to chase upon any one less deluded by other people's than Elizabeth.) The very fact of coming to know the joy Elizabeth had in seeing a peaceful landscape alone will give an added value to such a scene for us and never rob Elizabeth our lot of her delight, at such compound interest does interest grow on earth. The philosophy of Thoreau at Walden will help any man to accomplish the difficult task of lifting himself out of the habitual dissipating activities of daily life into a new mood of unbarred concentration: a certain stillness of the body crops one out, and a profounder appreciation of the fine joy of unbroken loneliness. We are at one, then, with all things made, and our restless agillike life is swept out of consciousness.

There are many and varied kinds of associational values. The scenery of the poet provides an opportunity for a filtered view of young heretics, and on the edge of the mystery-shaded plain farther in, he watches those delicate, veiled white ladies foster and lead and whisper is, after all, but our kind. Who shall say it is deeper or more pathetically sweet and patient than that of a man and tired little mountain-maker, who stood on the end of a pier in Maine watching a gorgeously mantled snail drop into the river, and turning to the stranger beside her, said, with child-like good faith: "I love to see the sunset just here. I was once an Egyptian princess, and day by day I watched the sunset and saw I loved from just this point."

A startled glance into the tired, quiet face of the speaker was enough to restore one of sanity. It was simply the logical result of an overabundant introduction to some of the more spiritual and modern forms of mysticism. Doubtless it had done much to relieve the monotony of a life offering little or no scope (ideas) and making large demands upon industry, courage, and fidelity.

If the necessary decoration of life cannot be furnished by the healthy and joyous vitality of the senses, then by all means let those of us who can indulge in past and future here, and put the hero in some more brilliant tale than this. It would be a colossus heart indeed who should destroy such a blessed situation for a mere matter of geography.

A Lost Chance

A PREVAILING feeling with regard to the British Tibet expedition is one of intense regret that provision could not have been made for including Rudyard Kipling among the members of the mission. It will pass through the mind of many a reader of the last of the Lamas, and what Kipling could make out of a fight such as that at Gyantse, a story like the Drama of the Four-Arms sufficiently shows. To read of Pathans and Goerkhas and Sikhs, and to know that Kipling could make something immortal of it all, but will not do so, is to experience a boundless regret. His wonderful word-pictures of rarely visited Rajputana, after wards worked into the Naushah, his descriptions of Bharat of Allahabad, of the Deccan, make it the more desirable that the first opening of the wonderlands of Tibet might be caught on his vivid canvases. The adventure is unique, and will never be repeated. Tibet and Lhasa will never be exactly the same again. Yet, through more inertia and conservatism a marvellous opportunity is lost, and lost forever.

Alton Parker Hall

Mary McIlister Hall

Judge Parker's two Grandchildren on the Lawn at "Roughquest"

VIEWS AT ESOPUS—SNAP-SHOTS TAKEN AT JUDGE PARKER'S ESTATE ON THE HUDSON

Judge Parker's home at Esopus, New York, is on the west shore of the Hudson, in Ulster County. His estate consists of 166 acres, most of which is under cultivation. Here the Democratic nominee for President lives throughout the year, except during the time when the Court of Appeals is in session, when Judge Parker spends the greater part of each week in Albany. The photographs are snap-shots taken recently at Esopus, showing scenes on the estate, with portraits of Judge Parker's two grandchildren, Alton Parker Hall and Mary McIlister Hall.

Photographs by Joley

Sailors at Work on the "Kearsarge"

"Kearsarge" Sailors at Reception

Dinner-hour in the Forecastle

Righting a Slip-hauler

THE VISIT OF THE NORTH ATLANTIC SQUADRON TO PORTUGAL—SNAP-SHOTS OF SCENES ON THE FLAGSHIP "KEARSARGE"

King Carlos I.

At Sea in 1903.

Visiting Brazil.

THE VISIT OF THE NORTH ATLANTIC SQUADRON TO PORTUGAL—KING CARLOS I. VISITING THE "KEARSARGE"

The visit of the four battleships of the North Atlantic Squadron—the "Kearsarge," "Maine," "Albatross," and "Iowa"—to Portugal on June 11 was made notable by the attention accorded to the officers of the fleet by the royal family. King Carlos visited the flagship "Kearsarge" on a tour of inspection; a half given in honor of the squadron of the American Legion at Lisbon was attended by the entire royal family; and in a shooting, fencing, and tennis tournament arranged for the American visitors the king took an active part. The photograph is a snapshot taken just as the king was stepping aboard the "Kearsarge." Admiral A. S. Barker may be seen within the frame, and in the rear (a vertical line) is the Lusitania steamer to Portugal, Mr. Charles Page, Regent. The reader is referred to the article on page 1183 of this issue.

The Interior of the Clinical Ward of the Field Hospital at Feng-Wang-Cheng

Another View of the Clinical Ward, showing Japanese Wounded and some of the Hospital Staff

HOW THE JAPANESE CARE FOR THEIR WOUNDED—VIEWS IN THE FIELD HOSPITAL AT FENG-WANG-CHENG

The photographs, sent by William Dieckhoff, one of the special correspondents of "Harper's Weekly" in the Far East, show scenes in the Japanese field hospital at Feng-Wang-Cheng, where the wounded among the Mikado's soldiers are cared for. The hospital is equipped with modern military appliances, and the wounded are attended by trained nurses and physicians.

Digitized by Google

further to do with it. After this they again sought Mr. Justice Bradley, who, after considerable persuasion, became the fifth member of the Supreme Court constituting the electoral tribunal.

The commission began the first day of February, 1877, and met in the Supreme Court chamber in the Capitol building, the court being in recess at the time, as was customary in the month of February, in order to enable it to catch up with the cases argued prior to that time. The law creating the electoral tribunal carried with it the necessary employees. A number of the employees of the Supreme Court were also employed by the Electoral Commission, and the various salaries that they received from the Supreme Court was a basis for services to the electoral tribunal. The writer, therefore, was employed as a page to the Electoral Commission, and received the same pay from both, namely, six dollars per day. The Supreme Court chamber was used in the early days of the Capitol as the Senate of the United States, and consequently would only accommodate a limited number of people. Part of the old gallery of this room, immediately back and over the head of the Supreme Court, was open to the press and public.

Each member of the Electoral Commission was entitled to as many cards of admission each day as he desired, and each Senator and member of Congress was also entitled to these tickets, so some idea of the demand for the number who endeavored to gain admission may be had. The tickets were sold in many instances, and the writer was offered twenty-five dollars for a single ticket, but declined to accept it. The first case argued was the Florida case, and right here I think it but just to correct an erroneous impression. It has always been accepted that Mr. Justice Bradley cast the deciding vote in the tribunal, but such was not the fact, as upon hearing both sides of the Florida case, the tribunal adjourned to what is known as the robing-room of the Supreme Court, and there discussed the merits and demerits of the case fully and following the custom of the Supreme Court in voting on cases—i. e., calling upon the members of the House first, the Senators next, and the justices of the court in the order in which they were named—that is, beginning with the last named member of the House of Representatives designated as one of the commissioners; then the next in order; then the last named in the Senate, then the last designated of the justices, who voted first. Consequently, Mr. Justice Joseph P. Bradley voted first when it came to the members of the Supreme Court, and was followed by Mr. Justice Strong, Mr. Justice Field, Mr. Justice Miller, and, lastly, Mr. Justice Nathan Clifford, the president of the commission; and this method of voting was followed in the other cases. From this it will be seen that Mr. Justice Bradley cast the eleventh vote of the commission; thus I know to be correct, for the reason that I occupied a seat beside Mr. Justice Nathan Clifford, the chairman of the commission, and recorded the vote for him as he called for the same.

Notwithstanding this fact, some misreport, at the close of the Louisiana case, went to the house of Justice Bradley, No. 211 Street, and attached a piece of rope to the door, and the papers all stated that it was done to show that justice was dead. There were two questions submitted to the tribunal in the case of Oregon, and on the one question a solid vote of fifteen was cast for Rutherford B. Hayes as President of the United States, the deciding giving the 145 votes necessary in a choice for President of the United States.

It was not very long after Mr. Hayes became President that Judge Davis, then a Senator from Illinois, came into the old office of the Supreme Court, and among these Senator George F. Edmunds, a Senator from Vermont who had been a member of the electoral tribunal, Judge Davis remarked, in the presence of the writer: "Edmunds, it's a good thing that you fellows get to off the Supreme Court. If I had been there I would have been a member of the commission, and if I had been a member of the commission, I would have voted Louisiana for Tilden if it was only to show my independence." It will be seen from this remark just how close Samuel J. Tilden came to being President of the United States, instead of Rutherford B. Hayes.

A War-time Adventure in Korea

How a Party of Americans made their Escape from the Scene of War in Northern Korea.

By Helen Struve Meserve

IN THE very northwest of this country called Korea, or Land of Morning Calm, and only thirty miles from the Manchurian border, we are spending the happiest times of our lives. Somewhere among the hills we have called our home, and life seems like a dream—no thought, no worry, for the morrow takes care of itself. So many Americans in the neighborhood are surrounded by beautiful places by mountains. At our feet is a river which in summer during the rains becomes a roaring torrent, and ends the life of many a poor Korean who strives to cross unaware of its swiftness and depth. But when the rains are over you marvel to think that this modest little stream humming along so quietly, with the wild flowers on the banks reflected in its smooth surface, could become so tempestuous. Crossing it is a quaint bridge followed by a flower-bordered path which leads up the bank to Somnang and for one who is seeking seclusion and forgetfulness of the world here is the ideal spot. Even here, though, nature of our have penetrated, but we refuse to let that our quiet life can be disturbed, although a trail from Manchu leads down our little valley and under the shadow of the pines. As I write from my studio window I can see it—deserted, to be sure, for Korea, the Land of Morning Calm, has never looked brighter, fairer, and more peaceful than on this summer morning.

ROCK, KOREA

You will see by the lead line of this letter that we found it necessary to quit our seclusion and had refuge in the world. The situation became dangerous, and when Mr. Allen, our United States minister at Seoul—in whom we, as well as all other foreigners, place the greatest confidence—telegraphed that far-reaching hostilities were imminent near us and urged women and children in the vicinity to leave, offering to send a United States war-ship to our rescue, we of course followed his advice. Thirty-six hours afterward we had completely dismantled the home where we had been so happy, packed our belongings, and turned our faces toward civilization.

Under ordinary conditions our northern retreat is not difficult of access. A couple of days by steamer from Chongju to Chongju, fifteen hours is my own launch from there to Anju, followed by a ten days' trip in chairs, brings us in our destination. But at that time the prospect of getting out was not an alluring one. The thermometer was fifteen below zero, the snow was a foot and a half deep on the ground, and navigation was almost impossible. From Puk Chin to Chittabulie our first day's pilgrimage was but a preface to the succeeding ones, and the long weary hours spent on the road in a half-frozen condition were preferable to the nights we spent in Korean houses.

From the time of their construction, until they crumble away and are lost in the heap of mud from which they rose, these habitations know no lesson. A whole family lives in one or two of the low rooms, where all the cooking, eating, smoking, and sleeping are done, and where the little ones come to life and the old ones pass away. But such hospitality as they offer is ever charged for. They looked with astonishment on the enemy when we sent ahead to clear things up, and we fearfully induced us that eighteen men had been at work all afternoon preparing the route, ten by ten, where we were to camp.

At Chittabulie a telegram awaited us announcing that Anju, our stopping-place for the next night, was held by the Russians. This was startling news, as the Japanese headquarters were not sixty miles distant, and an encounter daily expected. But as delay would but postpone the inevitable evil hour, it was decided to press on.

We left Chittabulie at 7 A. M., and started on our long day's trip. Anju was our immediate goal, and the distance was not making it almost impossible for the miles to keep on their feet, for these mountain passes can scarcely be dignified by the name of roads. We were quite a cavalcade, with servants, luggage-vans, and coolies. General Hyon Yong Tak, the Russian magistrate who at one time saved the lives of our party on a Yung lie, accompanied his journey with us. He was travelling in a chair, with numerous attendants, guards, etc.

At nine that night, after the very longest day I have ever experienced we were met by the lantern-bearers, for whom we had sent ahead, they brought strange and startling tales of the Russians, their ferocity and strength, for they had struck terror to the hearts of these simple children of nature. By no means the cold growing more intense and the night becoming darker, the miles nearly giving out. Some of the wagons lost the trail and lay long in the drifts, but they were soon found and safely guided, but still we kept on. It was nearly midnight when the light from a huge bonfire announced to us our approach to Anju, and then even our bodily fatigue could not keep from our minds the thought that we were to encounter the much-dreaded Russians, whose camp injured men. But it happened that the Russians proved most courteous when we met them, which was not until the following morning, although I must confess that through the vigil of the night every sound brought them to my mind, and possibilities of what might happen occupied my thoughts.

The snow of my trip was by long ago, and my excitement of riding, so, after only forty hours of rest, we proceeded on our way. We had just crossed the frozen river and had passed through the historic old gate at Anju when we were overtaken by the Countess. All fear vanished, and a desire to photograph them was upon me, so, taking advantage of any sex, I requested that they allow me to do so. Most willingly and politely they acquiesced, and, with the vanity of all mankind, arranged their caps and neck gear, put on their prettiest expression, and posed. As they knew no English, French, nor German, conversation was carried on through a Korean interpreter, who spoke to one of the gentlemen of our party.

They thus learned who we were, whence we came, and whether we were going. Cards were exchanged and passes given, enabling us to use telegrams, for they held the office of Anja Protection was also offered, but with this we would gladly have dispensed, in every minute brought us nearer the Japanese. For a good bit of that day they remained near us, frequently leaving the highland to search the Korean villages which lay snuggled in under the shelter of the neighboring mountains, and were supposed to conceal Japanese spies, who, dressed as Koreans, are well disguised, for there is a marked similarity in their faces. They also made maps from the hills of the surrounding country.

The Cosacks are hardy-looking men, with strong, determined faces. As soon as they can walk they are given a rifle and mounted on a horse, so, consequently, they are superb horsemen. Before the days of the telegraph—and that is only a few years ago—a system of signals was used to convey news from one end of the country to the other. This was done by building fires on the mountain-tops, which could be seen for a long distance. When the light grew dim another fire farther on was built, thus communicating anything of importance. These stations can still be seen, and resemble the walls of some old monastery, half hidden in the trees on the sides of the hills, a frequent picture in Korea.

The following day, after parting with the Russians, and as we drew near the fine old walled city of Ping-Yang, a lone horseman came into view holding high over his head that famous emblem of our liberty—the American flag. He was a missionary, and had been sent to escort us in, as no strangers were allowed to enter or leave the town; and so for the first time we felt the protection of our flag. It sent a thrill through us to think that even in this far away land we were really free.

The sun was slowly sinking behind the great purple hills, leaving the old walls silhouetted against its orange light, and the sentries could be plainly seen from their posts as we came slowly on, so that in admiration that we did not know until afterwards that we had been taken for Russians and nearly fired on. It was with difficulty, however, during our stop that we left and re-entered the city, as every gate was guarded. Though courteous to us in the exterior, the Japanese found it necessary to take every precaution, but matters were finally simplified by our wearing a badge of red, white, and blue, which acted as an open sesame in every emergency.

Ping-Yang is in the shape of a ship, and the huge anchor of stone is erected outside the walls. The Koreans have a superstition that if a well should be dug within the city the ship would sink, hence all the water used is carried for a long distance, and the water-course is one of the sights of this quaint, interesting old place. Not so very long ago the water was carried in pike-pole stone jars, but since that enterprising American concern, the Standard Oil Company, have introduced their oil into even the most obscure localities, the jars have been abolished, and their places taken by these ugly modern inventions of the twelfth century of wooden barrels.

Ping-Yang is situated on a hill top, with a view for miles of the surrounding country. At one end is the Fort of Killa; it is thickly wooded, and has a temple and several monuments dedicated to his memory. There sacrifices continue to be offered to his spirit. The spot is kept as sacred by both Koreans and Chinese that during the China-Japanese war in 1894 the defeat of the former is said to have been due to the fact that they allowed no trees to be felled on this ground, thus allowing the Japanese to effect an entrance unimpeded.

While staying in Ping-Yang we were most hospitably entertained by the missionaries, who have very comfortable homes, and are doing splendid work among the natives. Indeed, never within the range of my experience have I known women work so hard and conscientiously. In addition to their caring for their homes and little ones, they teach nearly all day long, and are the patient, tender friends of this down-trodden, persecuted race.

During the China-Japanese war the Koreans had suffered as severely—Ping-Yang being reduced to one fifth its population, houses pillaged and burned—that they now expect a repetition of this, and wishing to save what little they have, pack it in their wooden chests, which comprise the greater part of their house furniture, and start out to seek security in some sheltered spot where the roar of the cannon cannot be heard and where they may sit and smoke their pipes in peace. Often we would meet a whole family, consisting of three generations, for some could be left behind, as the greatest feeling of affection and respect exists among them.

At the time we were in Ping-Yang twenty thousand people had left their homes, and for no fault of their own nor of their country, only that they were the unfortunate victims of two men who saw fit to make this land the scene of a war.

If possible our journey from Ping-Yang to Chinnampo was more fatiguing than the former ones, a driving rain set in, and the roads were so narrow and the hills and rivers so frequent that it was impossible to remain in the backward, as it was standing on one wheel a good bit of the time. So we climbed in and got ourselves comfortably arranged, only to get out again, for there was always "Only one more river to cross," and we began to wish it were the river of Jordan.

If one Korean house can be dirtier than another, we got into it that night between these two places. Korean houses are made of mud and have, for means of heating them, a leak or flue which is built under the floor, thus giving a comfortable shelter to all insects who may care to take advantage of the opportunity. We were obliged to bring our wearing apparel tied in bags from home in the middle of the room, to put the legs of our coats in this of kerseene oil, and in the air heads up in towels to be innocent. All, but, notwithstanding, these precautions kept us from sleeping. It did not rain on the morning, but turned cold again and a blinding wind blew. Kates' clothing was added, and we were enveloped in rugs, head and all; but even then we suffered. We travelled for three or four miles to the first river, but found that it had thawed during the warm spell and washed away the bridge. The water had risen so high that the mules were nearly drowned in attempting to cross. After rescuing them we turned back and retraced our steps to wait in another native house until nature would give us her kind permission to continue on our way. The next day the crossing was successfully accomplished, although two hours were spent in accomplishing it. Mules were then sent out from the opposite bank and the mules literally dragged over, as standing in the cold water would have been fatal to them. But even the most fatiguing events must have an end, and ours was reached upon our arrival in Chinnampo, where, after a few days' waiting for the ice to melt and drift away, we were rescued by the United States cruiser Corwin, and made her feel that even an ordinal such as we had proved through her life's contemplation; for the felled rail was killed, and we were brought safely from the perils of the north to the peace which now prevails in the south.

Working the Cosack Scouts—Conversing through an Interpreter

Eun, Kim, and the first Russian Party in China (K. T. T. T.)

Photograph by F. A. Jones

ALTON B. PARKER

SNAP-SHOTS OF THE PRESIDENTIAL AND AT CHEVY CH

THEODORE ROOSEVELT

OMINEES AT ESOPUS-ON-THE-HUDSON,
ASE, WASHINGTON

The American Colony in London

By "Anglo-American"

SOMETIMES think the King must spend nearly half his time with the American colony in London. It is a rare thing for a week to go by without an announcement in the Weekend Post that the King has dined with Countess, Duchess or Marchioness, with the Duchess of Marlborough, with Mrs. Ash, or Mrs. Arthur Paget or Mrs. Mackay or Mrs. Bradley Martin or one of the dozen or so ladies of Anglo-American society. And it is still rarer when a house party arranged for, and of course selected by, the King does not include at least one or two of his American friends. He has and always has had a genuine and an dignified liking for the company of American women, and he carries it to a degree of politeness that purely English society sometimes turns up its pretty nose at. Somehow, perhaps, that the reign of King John would mean the social triumph of the American woman; and the prophesy has come true. In the eighties and early nineties we used to discuss and grumble at the American invasion. Nobody discusses it now, for the simple reason that the American invasion has taken its place as a permanent and of course, happily dominant, unresistably pervasive. There never was a time when the American colony was so supreme or its supremacy so little challenged.

That is not to say that all signs of opposition have departed. There are still great quantities in London, just as there are in the rest of the world, of the "Rita" who still keeps up a fragmentary fight against the Stars and Stripes. "Rita" is one of them. Americans may have heard her, in "Rita's" opinion, all the folks and the wickedness of the "Smart Set" in London are of American origin. Her ladyship, Mrs. American woman, depending upon a female society that dined at six and went to bed at ten, have taken up its composed routine and sent it whirling through rakes-walks, appendicitis luncheons, the "Washington Post," and a whole heap of unkindly of insinuations. True, "Rita" is not of much importance. She may perhaps speak for a small section of the province, but for nothing more. I merely quote her to show that the American woman may still be called upon to fight, and a pitched battle—those days are over—but an occasional skirmish. And even among the members of the real world you will find from time to time a half-hearted waiting over some first American visitor, another occasional disdain sneer and scorned, another party snatched up. Some Englishmen indeed profess to see no hope ahead for themselves and their countrywomen until the whole of the aristocracy has made at least one visit to America and until the American colony, when all the parties have been suitably called in the New World to profess the banker's taste of the old, there will then, it is hoped, be a chance for the English girl. This hypothesis every Anglo-American marriage is a step nearer to that beautiful consummation when.

But the domination which the American colony has gained and all, not a comfortable rival, but the same or grander, of bringing American influences will seek their place within the borders of the United Kingdom, and when the domination of the American woman will have automatically ceased. For the present, however, that domination is complete and accepted on the whole with a good natured enthusiasm; that occasional little episode of jealousy or such outbursts as "Rita" has favored us with should not be allowed to detract from. There should run through the American people a thrill of patriotic pride at the thought that London possesses in the American colony the social centre of the world and growing yearly in the progressiveness, the variety, and the cosmopolitan tone of its social life. American influence holds the highest places. I question whether any capital has ever harbored so powerful or so brilliant a group of foreign-born women. London possesses in the American colony, in whatever sphere of English activity one turns an American is pretty sure to be found in the front rank. Leaving out art, the drama, sport, and literature, and confining oneself simply to the world of society, the splendor of the American position is almost phenomenal.

I do not wonder that the King delights in the American colony. He might confine himself to it altogether without feeling that his life had lost anything worth having in variety or pleasantness. Wherever his need or inclination he could include it in the full without entering a house merely out of an English house. That sounds like an exaggeration, but to any one who really knows the American colony in London it is more likely to appear a truism. One of the most remarkable characteristics of that colony is the fact that it enters the whole social field, represents all interests, and takes part in a leading part of everything in all positions. As I am writing in the middle of Ascot week I turn naturally to horse-racing for an illustration. I do not know how things may be today, but when I lived in America horse-racing was not considered one of the pastimes of the Four Hundred, and it was an exceedingly rare thing to come across a fashionable New York woman who knew anything at all about it, that in England horse-racing is incomparably the greatest of the national sports.

To know the pedigree and performances of the horses, something of the history of the turf, the names and weights of the principal jockeys, all the technicalities of bookmaking, and the probabilities of the various tracks, is part of the social education of any Englishwoman who means to hold her own in society. Each American new-comer feels herself at first horribly out of it in this world of sidereal sport, talking a language of its own; but each soon comes to realize that "fair play," and at the end of a season or two will find a steward of the jockey-club with simply paralyzing assurance and an air of absolute knowingness. I notice that no less than six American women have taken country houses just before the Ascot week—just that average about £1000 for the five days—and are entertaining on a scale which pays off in full any debts the world may have had against their Puritan ancestors.

The take-again politics. Politics are discussed round a Fifth Avenue dinner-table about as often as "thine" embroidery, and it would be almost indelicate for a number of the Four Hundred to know anything about them. But in England you are a social outcast if you are not "up" in politics. Politics come immediately after the weather, and either just behind or just in front of horse-racing, as an inevitable topic of conversation. Here again the American dilettante is ignorant of the very alphabet of the subject, but she picks it up somehow, is ready to converse or converse Mr. Chamberlain at a moment's notice, and is just as likely as not to start a political salon of her own. One of the members of the present government has an American wife also. In his own words, "look, after my constituency and is far and away the best political agent I have ever had." Countess, Duchess of Marlborough, is a keen and interested member behind the scenes of English life. She is always playing bridge or politics and often both together. It was of her home at the Duke of Devonshire and Mr. Balfour, after their somewhat heated part last autumn, not to smoke the pipe of peace that she had filed for them.

In the more public way Mrs. George West, who was latter known as Lady Randolph Churchill, is an inveterate politician, and scores of American women, whenever an election is on, find themselves irresistibly drawn into it as canvassers, speakers, or platform ornaments. Mrs. Chamberlain, who might, if she chose, be a real power in politics, has sunk herself too much on her husband's estate to take a hold in the matter. The Duchess of Marlborough, though after much practice she has learned the art of platform-speaking to a very possible degree, confines herself in the main to hazar openings and similar semi-political affairs. Lady Naylor Leyland was always active in active in politics when her husband died, and the sudden appearance of the young Duke of Marlborough on political platforms, as a speaker on the free-trade side, is said to be wholly due to the energy and push of his American wife.

As for the domination which the American colony in London has made most distinctly its own is that of organizing lunars and fêtes and concerts on behalf of charities. A book, and a very interesting one, might easily be written about their achievements in this direction. Every American woman is a general manager of it, and in London, with a yearly list of charitable functions that have to be organized, conducted, and made to pay by fashionable volunteers, they find a magnificent field for their energies. The constructive side of Mrs. George West, as she showed when she planned the Week, is almost masculine in its firmness. Mrs. Ash is not only a charming hostess, but also a business woman, but also a woman of affairs of first-rate ability. Mrs. Arthur Paget has the inventive genius of a social Edison, and can have money out of people's pockets in a way that abhors strikes me as the best solution of the inequality of wealth that has yet been proposed. The poultry-fall in the famous Crême de la Crême was her idea and under her management, and she has recently been collecting all known species of domestic pets for sale at the monster bazaar at Albert Hall.

Mrs. Bunsell, again, whose salon is a gathering place for the most brilliant society in London, is a social hostess of quite cheerfully every season in organizing concerts in aid of hospitals; and Mrs. Mackay is almost as lavish with her presence and activity as with her check-book. And besides all these and many more whose one might mention, there is the cohort of American dilettantes and of course, ladies, in the back ground and lead to any Anglo-American life its last touch of social distinction. It is not too much to say that anything or grander under such auspices and with so much enthusiasm and ability to back it is bound to succeed. Every hospitable secretary of a known institution, in fact, a woman, and all the details he has ever performed a leader of the American colony to get up something on its behalf; and a leader of the American colony is rarely dead to such appeals. It helps, at any rate, to pass the time.

Mrs. Arthur Paget the other day. She was just back from a visit back, she was just going to Paris for the week-end; she had two hundred and eighty-nine letters to answer; she was superintending the building of a new elevator in her house; her lawyer was up-stairs, waiting. I am sure, and all the details of the "domestic pet" still in the hands of Albert Hall bazaar were on her mind. Yes, it certainly helps to pass the time.

Books and Bookmen

By James MacArthur

"EVERYBODY in this world means to be pretty good to other folks, and when they ain't, it ain't always their fault; sometimes it's the world's collection, is indicative of the outcome of experience and a good heart, is, in the main, Mary E. Wilkins's philosophy in her new book of short stories, The Rivers. The title, though borrowed from the animal story to which the collection is devoted, is indicative of the character of all the sketches wherein the spirit of charity or "giving" in one form or another is exemplified. Yet the common denominator to which these stories may be related seems more of coincidence than of design. The title one perhaps may not after thought, for when the first story in the volume appeared in Hanover Magazine it was called "The Result of Sophia Lane."

"The Rivers," however, is most aptly appropriated by this story in which Sophia plays an original rôle in fiction. The story has that unexpected turn, that element of surprise which long ago we became accustomed to in Mrs. Wilkins Freeman's work, but which never loses its power to bring an odd situation or truth home to us with fresh and sometimes startling conviction. She may always be trusted to recast an experience as no one else would. Take this story of "The Rivers."

Flora Bell and Herbert Bennett are to be married on the next day but one. Her Aunt Sophia had adopted her when her parents died, when she was a baby, and had brought her up on a pension a year. To-day Flora Bell and Sophia Lane are hurrying the belated preparations, when Sophia's second cousin, Mrs. Adeline Cutting, her married daughter Abby Bell, and her unmarried daughter Louise, who have driven over from Addison with their wedding presents, arrive on the lambe scene of triumph and joyousness. There is too and kindly gossip for a while, and then the Cuttings leave Flora to uncover the park, upon they have brought her the first one—from Mr. and Mrs. Cutting to "Flora, with all best wishes for her future happiness!"—is an afternoon letter, written—"real other; it isn't played!" said Mrs. Cutting with emphasis—in three pages. "It is beautiful," Flora murmured, as she leafed through it, "but I don't like the last paragraph. The next paragraph, quite bulky with expectation, promises to be finger-finger from Abby, sunny guesses and explanations as to their use follow. "They are real parties," said Flora. Sophia said nothing. "Emmie," said Louise, indignantly. "They are lovely," said Flora. Sophia said nothing. By this time the three visitors look as if they had good cause to be aggrieved. The story has become electric. So far the story seems to present a not an uncommon experience in a delicate household and obedient to the fact that it is just here that the genius of Mrs. Wilkins Freeman steps in and leads you by a way you have not.

"Flora has got many good presents," Sophia remarks to her visitors at last, "and I have a few hundred ones, thanks to me and what I did last Christmas. . . . I'll just as soon tell you as not. I must leave the author to disclose what it was Sophia did "last Christmas" for that is her story. Folks are generous enough in this world, she feels, only they don't know how to store their generosity. The story is told with that unrolled power and pathos which have given the author an unrivalled position among New England story-tellers. This sketch, with "Jinx," "The Reign of the Bell," and "The Picture of Arcadia," are equal to the best stories Mrs. Wilkins Freeman has written. In "Lucy" and "Ephraim" there is something forced in the situation, yet her art in telling the stories renders the artifice of the stories themselves. I refuse to liking Mrs. Wilkins Freeman best in her short stories, and I think she is the best in this country, and few in any other. It is seldom that one story tells is capable of adjusting the work of another; too often their own creative mind leads them to see a different development of character and style, and make in the way a just and yet a pitiable appraisal. For this reason, a recent statement made in an article on "Is American Literature Bourgeois?" by Josephine Dickson in the North American Review is as remarkable for its insight and justice concerning Mrs. Wilkins Freeman's work as for its generous appreciation. "To what must we attribute the immense vogue of Mary Wilkins?" she asks. "Not in the information she gave us of the New England character. She did not discover the field. . . . What was the first cause of her success and general attention, of these famous sketches? Their amazing novelty. This author lived her success quite as much on novelty of method as on freshness of material, and stands in consequence head and shoulders above them, even among her own countrymen and temporary authors artistically. But she unquestionably owes her first brilliant reception, on whatever deeper and more enduring foundation her reputation with posterity may rest, to her originality."

Vanya Stale, by Elsie Macartney Lane, is a novel well worth reading not only for its entertaining qualities, but for its grace and sympathetic portrayal of a beautiful character in history, who came at one time within the orbit of Robert Burns the poet. It is difficult for a Scot to forgive the harsh and passionately selfish delinquency of the Scottish part in his relation to Vanya Stale and other women, and one had to hurry to forgive and read his essay on Burns to find holes for the unnecessary and needless flaying of the poet's besting line. But forgetting that, and certain lapses in Scots dialect, it would be admitted that the author has written a story which appeals to the sympathies and rings true in human nature, especially to Scottish human nature. Vanya is a most breathing heroine as child and woman, and the author makes her live with a sense of pulsating reality that takes one out of the written page into the heart. Jack Stale, as he is called in the fatherhood of no strange and unaccountable a hold on the provincial line with the drinking, is a lovable, blundering character who appeals in his part of narrator as the domestic did in The Little Minister. Vanya Stale is so good a novel that one's interest is aroused in what else the author has written or may write. I see she is credited with The Mills of God, a book which I recall made some stir among the reviewers, but which I neglected to read. Vanya Stale will now hasten me to make amends, and I have no doubt other readers will do the same.

At North, in England, there lives an old man named John Cypford, who is believed to be the original of Joe Gargery, the genial blacksmith in Great Expectations. Even allowing for the changes wrought by age, the South Blacksmith is said to bear a remarkable resemblance to Dickens's portrait, and in suggest the peculiar characteristics of Joe Gargery. "I worked was a blacksmith and locksmith in the vicinity of Tavistock House when Dickens lived there, and the world would often stand by and chat with the smith while he did jobs about the house. 'I remember,' says Mr. Cypford, 'having to go there as late as nine o'clock one night, and I was out to work on a cupboard in a dark room. The cupboard was locked, and the key was lost. I could see that Mr. Dickens was more than usually interested in what I was doing. It was a tall cupboard, with a kind of double door. As I say, Mr. Dickens stood by, joking with me, but giving me no hint of what was in the cupboard. I had picked many locks at Tavistock House, but this was the toughest job I had ever had there. I can recall Mr. Dickens's amused look as he watched me unravel that lock. All at once, the bolt of the lock shot back, the cupboard door flew open, and there stood Joe Gargery smiling at what seemed a lot of fuss. The bones of the skeletons rattled with the commotion, and Mr. Dickens burst out laughing, then suddenly pulled up as he looked at me. 'Do you mean to say that you are not frightened, Cypford?' he said. 'No, sir,' replied I. I have seen five skeletons in the rattle of St. Pancras Church to be frightened by this.'"

Mary E. Wilkins Freeman
Author of "The Rivers"

One of the Condemns on Top of Mount Washington after the Race

Mr. F. E. Stanley checking the Steps to the Hotel on the Summit of the Mountain

Mr. Wilson raising the Tape at the Finish

Mr. Otto Verneise climbing the Mountain a Half-Mile from the Summit

THE AUTOMOBILE HILL-CLIMBING CONTEST ON MOUNT WASHINGTON

The photographs are arranged in order of time during the recent automobile hill-climbing contest on Mount Washington, to which such prominent automobilists as Harry Harkness, James E. Brown, and F. E. Stanley took part. The race at which Mr. Harkness won the championship of the club took place on July 23, 1900. The first race was made by Mr. F. E. Stanley, in his 1900 power (Ford); and by Mr. James E. Brown in his 1900 power (Ford).

Copyrighted by General

College Influence and the Home

By Charles F. Thwing, LL.D.

President of Western Reserve University and Adelbert College

THE purpose of the home is the purpose of the college. The parent desires his son to become large-minded, great at heart, strong in will, representative of all that is good and beautiful, pure in his moral nature. The teacher also seeks to secure for his students wisdom through learning, and to cause wisdom to become a guide of the will of each of them. The son of Josiah Quincy, one of the most modest presidents Harvard College has had out of its more than a score, says of his father: "His heart's desire was to make the college a nursery of high-minded, high-principled, well-thought, well-conducted, well-bred gentlemen, fit to take their share, gracefully and honorably, in public and private life." I am sure that the desire of President Quincy for his students was the same desire which he as a parent had for his children.

The Need of Cooperation

The identity of the aim of the home and of the college is indeed significant. For the idea is altogether too strongly and too unanimously held that the college is either remote from or even antagonistic to the home, that its ideals are not the ideals of the home, and that its ways of securing these ideals are not the methods which the home adopts. To be sure, a superficial interpretation gives ground for the judgment of such alienation. For students are away from home. College life is at once monastic and communal. Domestic life is not monastic and in many respects is not communal. College boys live in an atmosphere of freedom as the last class-day orator at Harvard, Billiamine, well pointed out. The domestic atmosphere is one of dependence and supervision. But after all the superficial and temporary differences, at bottom the college seeks what the home seeks; the home seeks what the college wants—the first type of the gentleman.

The home and the college, therefore, should cooperate in seeking the results for which each labors.

The home should lead the college in its work of making the first type of the gentleman in at least three ways:

First, The home should be frank with the college as telling the college all about the boy whom it entrusts to the college for four years. The home is to be frank, it is said, always frank. The college is obliged to find out for itself what kind of a fellow this boy of eighteen is. In certain respects it is well for the boy and well for the college for it to find out for itself. But usually if frank, statements are made, that strength of the college which is devoted to seeking information could be devoted to formation, if need be, to reformation. I have often thought, and I believe I have elsewhere said, that it might be well for the college to put into the hands of every father sending a son some questions about that son. In such a list might be included such questions as these:

1. Has your son inherited tendencies to any disease?
2. What are his favorite studies?
3. To what temptations is he more inclined to yield?
4. Is he responsive to responsibility?
5. Does he readily assume leadership in any undertaking?
6. Can he be trusted not to overwork? Can he be trusted to work enough?
7. Can he be trusted to take sufficient exercise?
8. Has he already formed good habits of study? If not, in what respect are his habits of study poor?
9. What do you wish this college to do for your son?

Arnold's Method at Rugby

Such questions are simply suggestions. They represent conditions and facts of which it is usually well for the college to be informed. College teachers might never promptly and soverely helped, not of course all, but at least a few boys through possessing such information.

Second, I also wish to say that the home may work with the college in trusting the boy. The boy also comes to college entrusted or entrusted by his home, under the fear that he will not prove worthy either an intellect or character, is very prone to prove that he is worthy of this lack of trust. The boy who comes to college trusted by his home is just like him—if worthy, the trust. Nothing makes the young or the old so unworthy of being trusted as being trusted. This was the method of Arnold of Rugby. It was also the method of President Quincy, in whom I have already referred. His son says of him that in his intercourse with the students "he always told it he granted that they were gentlemen and men of honor. He never questioned the truth of any story any of them told him, when in academic difficulties, however insubstantial it might be. That statement was accepted as truth until it was contradicted by some facts and irreconcilable evidence. Then, beyond doubt, the unhappy youth was made to know the value of a good character by the inconvenience attending the loss of it." One of the most significant remarks ever made about Arnold was that made by the boys of Rugby: "We wouldn't be to Arnold, he'd believe us."

Third, The home should look to the college for giving the highest things to its sons. By the highest things I mean what is contained in these four words, which have been said to designate the finest line in Latin literature: Vir bonus, verus, magnus, liber (May they see virtue and consume away for that they have broken it). Manliness is first, and the recognition of the fact that to forsake manliness is death is also first. Truth, becoming truthfulness, faith inspiring to faithfulness, and the sense of duty which begets constitutional difficulties, these are the first things. At the present time it is important to make first things first in the American college. For a tendency is appearing to make first things second, and second things primary. The head of a department in an historic American college writes me, saying:

A comparatively insignificant number of boys come here for the purpose of study. The college life—not athletic, as is generally stated, but general social intercourse—takes their time. In many cases their parents look at the college as a girl's parents do on any popular boarding-school—on place to make pleasant acquaintances.

Concerning Social Intercourse

Be it said it is important that a boy should have the advantage of general and free social intercourse. It is an advantage to make and to hold pleasant acquaintances. Social intercourse and pleasant acquaintances, not only as a means of pleasure, but as a means of the promotion of professional or commercial success, are important, but they are not so important as the making of new large in mind, great in heart, strong in will. Primary things and secondary may exist, but they are not coordinate. Let superior things be regarded as superior and subordinate an subordinate. The college, therefore, is eager to cooperate with the home in giving to the boy the best social intercourse—the cardinal virtues as well as in the cardinal graces.

But the college has relations to the home, as well as the home to the college. After three or four years of sojourn the college turns the boy back to the home. It may be said at once that it is a little difficult for him, and especially difficult, I may add, for his academic sister, to resume these domestic relations. If he has not lost touch with the personalities of the home, he has lost touch with its forms and methods, standards and atmospheres. Here is an argument for the boy to return to college, to home, that their relations are not wholly or largely severed that he is at least to put himself back into these relations. He is to be an obedient son, a helpful brother, and a happier brother. He is to be free from all sophomoric exclusiveness and from senior lethargies. He is to become interested in all the interests of the home. He is to bear into it well-being a gentleness which is sympathetic, a strength and an appreciation which are loyal and loyal. He is to assume responsibilities. He is to be efficient without officiousness. If the college shall have helped the boy to become the gentleman it has endeavored the intrinsic wealth of the home.

For the Training of Husbands

But the college has not simply asked in the making of a good home better; it has also aided in making the good home itself. A college president, speaking to the freshmen at the opening of their course said, "You are here in order to become good husbands." The idea is common that college men do not marry so largely as other men, and do not wish to marry. In course there are men, college as well as non-college, who neither marry nor wish to marry, and also there are college and non-college men who ought not either to marry or to wish to marry. Such men, however, are few. The family is normal, and marriage is its foundation. Most college men, like most college women, marry late; but they do marry. When the class of 1924 of Harvard College had been graduated twenty-five years it had living one hundred and sixteen members. Of this number an less than thirty were married. Only twenty-six were bachelors. More than seventy were married, had married and one college and non-college remained single. When one considers the crises which wait for the fifteen men to remain unmarried—due to parents, ill health, such as tendency in tuberculosis or insanity, certain forms of mission and industrial service, it is at once clear that the proportion of college men in this class of 1924 who have remained bachelors for what some would call unworthy reasons was probably very small. The college does seek to make men of the type who are not merely heads of houses. The college not only makes the good home better, it also makes the home, and a very good home too.

Thus the American home, the corner stone of American society, and the American college, an institution of the community, work together, each giving to and each receiving from the other richest opportunities for blessing and for betterment.

CURIOSITIES OF ANGLING

By Robert W. Chambers

Illustrated by Sydney Adams

SOMETIMES by accident, sometimes by design, trout will struggle into places where one would scarcely expect to find them a pollywog. The writer recalls a curious example of this. There was a pool on the upper reaches of a certain trout river, known as "The Haunted Pool." Between this pool and the river channel lay a flat sandy stretch of alder and willow bottomland. One day the writer, during an investigating tour, noticed a two-pound trout persistently jumping in the Haunted Pool. The next morning, not in hand, the writer set out through a heavy rain. It had rained all night: the river was yellow, bank high, and impassable; the only hope lay clear back water, headlands, and such spring-fed levees as the Haunted Pool.

A careful whipping of that dark-green and brownish foam powdered half a dozen leeches. Much back trout, but no two-pounder. A close and minute survey revealed no sign of the big fellow. No fishing that the sandy flat between the pool and the river was several inches deep in water, and that a kingfisher was overhead in that direction, the writer, thinking that perhaps some fly had been washed into the temporary pool, waited some days in vain.

Before I had taken a dozen steps the kingfisher flushed up the stream, wheeled, hovered, and plunged. Instantly a tremendous commotion ensued; the kingfisher struggled a moment in the shallow water, then flurried up to the limb of a dead tree, apparently dazed; and on the surface of the pool a big speckled two-pound trout floated quivering, belly up, feebly whirling round and round in his efforts to right himself. I would scarcely believe that the fisher had struck the trout; he had, and it was a mortal blow—a round blow just forward of the dorsal fin, piercing the backbone.

The puddle was nowhere over four inches deep, a curious place for a big trout to go swimming after plump fly. It was an angler's ruin for Fontenelles. All that day it rained steadily; the river rose in proportion; here and there I picked out a trout from the foaming edge of near sandy whorls, but it was slow sport.

About five o'clock, the rain slaking the river was ankle-deep in water, and the mud was everywhere. I feared for the trout; and my boots proved well founded, for in wading a continuous stream up, saying that trout were lying in mud puddles in the mud, and that every meadow was alive with them. We probed tufts, milk-cans, and volunteers, and drove off to say what we could. It made one's heart ache to see dead trout lying in the grass and in the mud, left by the receding flood. And it was a strange sight, too, to see mud puddles in the mud stirred by darting trout which, in their frantic efforts to escape our benighted aid, ran there where high and dry in the mud and grass. We saved thousands of fish, returning them to the brooks and quieter waters of the river; but I fear that thousands of noble trout perished that day, and I know that the river has never quite recovered from that disaster.

An amusing experience happened to me on a very beautiful and apparently still stream which I had known well, years before, when I first struck the upper waters. I was perfectly certain that it was a gem among trout streams; the water was diamond clear, the pools and rapids apparently formed for the express purpose of harlequin trout. Three hours continued me that there was not a single trout, not a solitary fish of any kind in that stream. Why? Not for lack of food. Here the sandy shallows were alive with caddisworms; stoneflies danced and dipped above the verdant pools; there was food sufficient to sustain many trout to each pool. And, besides, here in the wilderness nobody came; there was not a soul but fish and that pearl among streams.

Another hour's walk down stream explained the mystery; a thirty-foot cataraict falling above, blacked any living fish's progress up the stream. Below the falls there were trout; above that foaming column of water and a fin stirred the calm reaches. This fact once understood and accepted, I, of course, never fished above the falls, until one day wishing to make a detour through the forest, I crossed the stream a mile above the cataraict.

Idly, and without serious intention, I halted midway across and cast up stream, merely for the pleasure of casting. To my amazement, a fine trout sprang clear out of water, missed, chased the fly, and made off with it. If a tarpon had suddenly shot out of that pool it could scarcely have astonished me more than when I landed that trout. Crawling him to a fine male trout in splendid plump condition, I cast again and hooked his mate, crawling her after a pretty fight with a thousand rods. Not knowing what to expect, I cast again, then waded up stream to the next pool. Out of it rushed a third trout—a silvery creature that seemed unworldly familiar—a strange, deeply built fish that fought bravely on, circling the pool twice, jumped twice, looking like a salmon parr, and then with a rush and a third leap, leaped himself on the gravel at my feet.

Then that second mystery was cleared, explaining the first mystery: for the trout was a California rainbow; and it was plain that somebody had stocked the stream above the falls, trusting that the fish would not run down. I drew in my line, glad to give these tiny strangers every chance to multiply in peace. I do not know whether or not they did; twice since I have visited the little trout stream, not to fish, but to look. And always I have seen one or two shadowy forms dart up through the shining shallows to the shelter of the rock shadowed pools.

The examples of trout in strange waters which I have cited have been instances of involuntary emigration. But trout often make deliberate choice of unusual habitations. An old house, disused by a flood, satrued in the bed of a trout stream. I have looked into the window panes and seen scores of trout dart over the floor, which lay some six inches under water. It was a great hiding place for trout.

On another occasion I was the disgusted observer of a trout inhabiting a jet pen. The pen ran down to the river; the routine occupant had dug a hole in one corner of the pen which the current enlarged into a small deep basin. And I regret to say that I never failed to see from one to five trout lying there, apparently enjoying the limited water, discolored from the filth on the dip above.

Trout, theoretically the spiritual dwellers in icy crystalline depths, sometimes have perverted tastes, as well as individuals may highly organized. They eat one another; they eat other fish; they eat their own eggs when the chance presents itself; and I believe, from personal observation, that they deliberately eat upon and kill maimed or injured trout. Big trout will jump at almost anything that is in motion on the water. I have seen them come swirling up in the wake of a dipping swallow; they will take the tortoise horns of artificial bait, squabs, sparrows, artificial grasshoppers, crickets, frogs, and "dobsons." I have seen trout strike at a small caterpillar swimming; I have seen a trout strike and seize a mouse.

Once, while resting from a canoe, when at dusk the night-birds were very thick, I slipped the flies again and again on the wings of the grating birds, and on one occasion discharged a feather which, falling to the surface of the lake, was seized by a trout. On another occasion, in Maine, resting at sunset, I hooked a trout, not through the hook. The trout crawled up on the bank; the hook carried away a little film of skin and hair without hurting the frightened creature. Recovering, I cast and took a trout on that tuff of hair, which, added to the Farmhouse Belle on my leader, seemed to do the work as long as it lasted. Yet, when it was gone, substituting a black gut with chemical body and lead wings, the trout knew the difference, and refused the offer.

More than once, on the Kennebec, looking for needier a sinner at a vast, I have lost both shiner and fly, and taken a trout on the combination;—and sometimes very small trout. I fancy that experience is not uncommon among anglers. But the worsted tale I have to offer concerns the almost incredible performance of a common catfish which, Heaven alone knows how or why, struck at a spinning spoon, and was landed by the writer, who can blame nobody for doubting his sanity or his veracity after this barren ing tale. But there was a reputable witness to the intertile performance—an angler whose reproach. And I thought he would hint when he saw that grinning, gaping bullhead come into the landing-net. It was an uneasy experience; and I'm glad I had a witness to the deed—literally "a deed without a name." Doubtless that's what Macbeth's friend meant—landing a catfish on a spoon.

On one occasion while in camp we anglers were under the temporary necessity of cleaning our own catch. At the time I was collecting Pelocypoda; and while cleaning a heavy catch taken just after a storm, I found some rare beetles in various stages of preservation in the stomachs of the trout. No doubt the rain had washed these beetles from leaves and branches and other lurking places into the stream.

Curiously, never but once have I seen a trout jump for or take a butterfly. The only time I ever witnessed the phenomenon was in New Hampshire on Greely's brook, when a specimen of Vanessa arctia fell into a pool, and a small trout rose and seized it as it was swept struggling over the rapids. The trout, with the beautiful black and silver markings on its body, lay motionless for a minute in a pool close to my feet; then the struggle to to the hotel, filled a wide-mouthed bottle with grasshoppers, and prepared to be murdered. But justice was on the side to take a full out of cupidity. And this is how she did it:

The grasshoppers being lively, I found that every time I removed the stopper of the bottle, several hoppers escaped. So a dark idea came into my mind. I chloroformed the grasshoppers, and muffled out with the stupefied insects. But not one trout would take a grasshopper so dead. Whether the subtle efficacy from the anesthetic penetrated the water I do not know. At any rate, not a grasshopper was taken, although the trout would always swim up to examine the bait.

Another interesting occurrence took place one day in France when I had put a yellow fly in my bank, and the trout were, of course, dining exclusively upon yellow flies. After an hour of two useless casting, I sat down on the bank of the stream and contemplated the water. All around me in the grass were growing these barely golden blossoms that look like sun buttercups, and which the French call fontaine d'or. Idly plucking one I tossed it into the current. "Splash!" A trout took it. Then I lost no time in stripping the handle and wings from a fly, slipping a blossom, and casting. Not a trout lodged. But no sooner did I toss bolt the butterfly began, and was continued spasmodically until the butterfly, wings and all, was swallowed, and the trout looked as though his gills were swollen with toothache.

I stepped the fly again and again on the wings of its sporting head.

I have seen trout jump when dragonflies were hovering; but I have never been certain that the fish aimed at the dragonfly. Nor have I ever seen a trout rise to a spider, although often and often I have given them the chance by dropping various species of spiders from a bushledge over a school of hungry trout. The spiders, of course, would run off over the surface of the water as easily as though they were running on dry land so their use as baits: the trout would usually rise an inch to look at them, then drop back as though deceived. Never have I seen a trout suffer to mistake a live garden slug, or toad, a leech, a haddock, a water beetle, a "skinner," or a "water boatman." Yet they will sometimes strike at artificial representations of these creatures.

An interesting incident occurred once in Europe when, after days of patient labor, I was unable to interest the trout in any of my flies. A peasant came down to the stream, and cast with a cock-shafer—a big live, berry, buzzing cock-shafer. And the first thing I knew he was fast to a three-pound trout—under my very nose in water I had worked to death.

Another time, in Massachusetts, after proving of an angler, and myself not being bigoted, I early offered a live grasshopper with gratifying results. Then my downfall began: I hastened back another blossom into the stream than a trout came at it, carrying it under water, and retaining it long enough for me to have looked him had a hook been concealed under the golden petals.

Once, on the Kennebec, I saw a snipe fly across a pool and drop a fair dmax feather from his body. A trout rose to it, repeatedly, yet I had been standing there and casting for over two hours, using every fly I could think of. I attempted to get that lot of down to use, but the current robbed me.

Curiously enough, I, personally, have never had much success with a "white miller." Anything just "off" white seems all right, but a pure white fly never has brought me much success. Yet I have seen trout rise to a live white moth—even to a lot of thousands and a silky seed from a miller. Once, while about the silver dried skin of the pupa of the dragonfly from which the larvae had escaped, I saw a trout take it and felt it, too. Weighing the red skin of a snake once, I dropped it into a pool, and all day long swarms of shiners tugged away at it, biting off tiny glistering scales.

We simple va-banance folk who delight in some quiet, and a still pool, witness many little episodes which cause and delight us—so many that it might take volumes to record them and the patience of Job in India. But there was only one job, and it is high time this group was ended.

Correspondence

ROMAN CATHOLIC IN OFFICE

NATIONAL MILITARY BUREAU, THURSDAY, JULY 8, 1904

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

SIR—The current number of HARPER'S contains an article under the caption of "The Papacy and the Republic," in which this passage occurs: "Joan Maria Harrison, elder in a Presbyterian Church, William McKinley, confidant and adviser with Methodist Episcopal bishops, were typical of a long line of Protestant Presidents who theoretically believed that Roman Catholics were Christians, and that they were entitled to offices under the republic, but as for having personal friends among Roman Catholics, as for putting them in places of responsibility, as for living up to the spirit as well as the letter of the law which guarantees parity of standing between Christian and Jew, Roman Catholic and Protestant, they could not; their antecedents, training, tastes were all against it."

How many persons of ordinary intelligence could have been led into making such a misleading statement as the above passes by understanding, unless it was made purposely to mislead. I thought, as the saying is, "the man in the street" knew that President Jackson appointed Roger B. Taney, a Roman Catholic, Secretary of the Treasury, and afterwards appointed him to the exalted position of Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States. It is possible that the writer of the article referred to is ignorant of the fact that Associate-Justice McKenna, of the Supreme Court, an appointee of President McKinley, is a Roman Catholic. Does he not know that Justice McKenna was President McKinley's first Attorney General? If he does not know these things, he ought, before he undertakes to write another article, to strive to gain a little information on the subject on which he intends to write.

William McKinley was a broad-minded, generous man and not the fifth-wheeler, narrow-minded, almost contemptible creature that the author of "The Papacy and the Republic" paints him.

I am, sir,

JOSEPH M. COLEY.

CROSSING THE BOUNDARY AT EL PASO

EL PASO, TEXAS, JULY 8, 1904

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

SIR—The United States Treasury is just now engaged in the biggest business game in El Paso. People living and doing business here are "nipped" by an arrogant and officious immigrant inspector on their return from a trolley ride across the border to our sister city, and subjected in a long impudently questioning as to whether they are intended clients of the United States. It is a happen not to possess their final citizen papers, though residing in this country for the last fifteen years, or they may be immigrants just arrived through Ellis Island, the authoritative inspector with the argosy ever is sure to levy the head or so-called immigrant tax on the unfortunate victim, and relieve him of two hard-earned dollars with the impertinence of a white-collar worker and the persuasiveness of a highway robber in the lonely streets of Nevada.

I confess to a total ignorance of the immigration law as it exists, but I can conscientiously testify to its anomalous stupidity in its practical working as applied by the immigrant inspectors at this port. I wonder if this narrowly conceived ruling of the law had its origin in Washington, or is merely the abuse of an ignorant inspector?

I am, sir,

NATURALIZED CITIZEN.

IS IT PLAC OR MIXIN?

PHILADELPHIA, JULY 7, 1904

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

SIR—As published in the newspapers, one of the planks of the Republican platform, recently adopted at Chicago, contains the following declaration:

"Protection which guards and develops our industries is a cardinal policy of the Republican party. The measure of protection should always at least equal the difference in the cost of production at home and abroad."

The phrase does not inform us whether the difference in the cost of production at home and abroad, which it alludes, should be the measure of protection, in plus or minus; and, in the absence of this information, the statement is without practical significance. As a less cost of production at home than abroad obviously requires no protection, it would seem, at first thought, that the authors of the platform intended to affirm that the measure of protection should equal the difference in the cost of production at home and abroad only when the cost is greater at home than abroad, but in very little consideration makes it evident that, with this interpretation, the statement is destitute of any practical application to the present protective tariff system of the United States. The tariff system of this country gives protection, indiscriminately, to industry in which the cost of production is greater at home than abroad and to industry in which the cost of production is less at home than abroad. And, as this practice has been persistently maintained and defended by those who adopted the platform, of which the above statement is a part, it is obvious that they have not the least intention of reducing the tariff to industry in which the cost of production is greater at home than abroad. Yet the protection of a commodity which can be produced abroad at less cost than at home, and the protection of a commodity which can be produced at home at less cost than abroad, obviously involve very different results.

Even if it is true that the industry of the nation is guarded and developed by the protection of industry in which the cost of production is greater at home than abroad, or by the protection of what is popularly called the "infant" industry, yet, in view of the fact that nearly every commodity produced in this country is protected by a high tariff, it is manifestly of the utmost importance to obtain definite and reliable information as to the effect of the protection in cases where the cost of production is no greater at home than abroad. Assuming that the cost of production is, in fact, greater at home than abroad, or, more properly, as usual, for instance, can be produced in this country as cheaply as abroad, it seems to know, definitely, whether the protection of these commodities guards and develops the industrial system of the nation, or whether it simply enables the producers of these particular commodities to enrich themselves at the expense of the American people. The most enthusiastic protectionist, if he has any regard for his reputation for sanity, does not contend that industrial conditions and opportunities are so inferior in the United States that nothing can be produced here as cheaply as abroad. The vast volume of merchandise exported each year would make such a claim ridiculous. And, if the protection of these commodities which can be produced here as cheaply as abroad is simply an opportunity to plunder the American people, we certainly have a right to call upon the producer of each commodity for a definite and precise statement of their claims to protection. Merely appealing to Congress with a bald assertion that they need protection, or the claim that they have a right to protection because some of their neighbors are favored in this way, is very far from being sufficient.

Another thing which especially needs looking into is the increase in the cost of production which is caused by the protective tariff itself. By effecting an artificial increase in the cost of production, the protective tariff itself increases the "difference in the cost of production at home and abroad," and thus very largely creates the apparent necessity for its own existence and perpetual growth. It transforms industry into infant industry, which would otherwise not be. It is certainly a very peculiar situation which is brought into existence for the purpose of offsetting the "difference in the cost of production at home and abroad," and which, in practice, constantly increases the demand for itself by increasing the difference in the cost which it was created to nullify. It is well known that in at least many cases the tariff on raw and partly finished materials involves a great increase in the cost of the finished products. The tariff on hides and leather increases the cost of shoes, harness, and belting. The tariff on wool increases the cost of clothing, carpets, etc., etc. The protection of wood pulp increases the cost of everything made of paper. The list may be extended indefinitely. In fact, the protection of iron, steel, and lumber, directly increases the cost of dwellings, houses, barns, fences, etc.; and also of all kinds of transportation equipment; and also of all kinds of machines and implements. In fact, it directly increases the cost of every finished commodity produced in the country, including all of the most important articles of food. This artificial increase in the cost of all the finished products necessarily restricts consumption; and a general restriction of consumption, imposed by an artificial increase in the cost of production, must fail to obstruct the development of our industries, and to make the demand for labor less than it would otherwise be.

An artificial increase in the cost of production, or an artificial increase of price, however obtained, necessarily restricts the market for the good. And, whatever it may do for a few unscrupulous producers, a restriction of the market for the goods necessarily obstructs the development of the industrial system of the nation.

I am, sir,

ISAAC W. GRIMMOND.

THE VIEW OF AN EYE-WITNESS

BATTLING, ILLINOIS, JULY 11, 1904

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

SIR—First paragraph, second column, page 1040 HARPER'S WEEKLY—"and this fine cruiser (the Tenny) might have been," etc. "as it was, she sank because her captain let her up." etc. The writer evidently confuses the Tenny and the Korset. I speak as an eye-witness. The former returned to her anchorage, terrified, wounded and dripping with signals to the sailing vessel. The latter was sinking. Soon after, her hulkers were ashore. She was not blown up but sank in good position to be raised.

The Korset, apparently unharmed by the fight, was blown up by her commander.

I am, sir,

DAVID H. MOORE.

Lately bishop in charge M. E. Miesden Jones, Kew, and Chica.

A PROTEST INDORSED

FLORHAM, LONG ISLAND, JULY 15, 1904

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

SIR—I wish to thank you for your just and much-needed protest in the editorial pages of your current issue of the WEEKLY against the antiquated and wholly inadequate ferry boats which the public is compelled to use in crossing the East River between Thirty-fourth Street and Long Island City—namely "carrioles of transportation," as you say. The boats, in order to cross the river with decency must consult the convenience of the passengers. Their two points, should be at least twice as large, with double decks and extra seating capacity in the cabins. The maintenance of the present boats by such a great company as that which controls and operates them is nothing less than disgraceful.

I am, sir,

A SUFFERER

THE NORTH AMERICAN REVIEW

EDITED BY GEORGE HARVEY

August, 1904

The Baltic Fleet and the Northeast Passage, Rear-Admiral G. W. MELVILLE, U. S. N.
Automobile Legislation . . . The Hon. JOHN SCOTT-MONTAGU, M. P.
The Present Crisis in Trades-Union Morals JANE ADDAMS
Obstacles to Reform in Turkey CHARLES MORAWITZ
The Principle of Probation CHARLTON T. LEWIS
More Truth About Women in Industry . . . ELIZABETH CARPENTER
The Restriction of Immigration ROBERT DE C. WARD
British Shipping and the State BENJAMIN TAYLOR
The Dark Rosaleen HENRY W. NEVINSON
Folly of Chinese Exclusion H. H. BANCROFT
A Glance at World Politics SYDNEY BROOKS
Can Congress Constitutionally Give the Filipinos Independence?
L. It Can H. A.
IL. It Cannot J. H. C.

THE SON OF ROYAL LANGBRITH.—VIII.

A Novel by
W. D. HOWELLS

50 cents a copy $5.00 a Year
THE NORTH AMERICAN REVIEW, FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK

The Campaign IS NOW ON IN EARNEST
KEEP IN TOUCH WITH IT
BY SUBSCRIBING FOR PUCK
THE NATIONAL CARTOON WEEKLY

PUCK, under the leadership of John Kendrick Bange, will be a potent factor in the contest between the "Hero of San Juan Hill" and the "Sage of Enospos," and everybody will want to see the telling cartoons.

The Cincinnati "Times-Star," referring to the Double Page cartoon in the Fourth of July PUCK, says: "J. S. Pogue's 'H—,' one of the best of the Anti-Corruption Cartoons, has attracted attention all over the country."

PUCK will be mailed from now until $1.25
Election Day for

Leave your order with any Bookstore, Newsdealer or Subscription Agent, or send it direct to

THE PUBLISHERS OF PUCK, Puck Building, New York

He Knew His Business

The following story is being told of the adventures of a well-known business man with a shrewd book-agent. The latter revisited at his office by the book-agent who offered him a set of books describing, with alluring illustrations, Beautiful Homes of America. The business man liked them.

"All right," he said, "I'll take a set. Leave them with me, and I'll take them to my wife at Pleasantville to-morrow."

"Oh," said the agent, "I am going to Pleasantville myself this afternoon, and will leave them at your house if you wish."

The business man declined the offer, however, and the book-agent departed with the sum as payment for the books tucked in his pocketbook.

Later in the afternoon the business man, arriving at his home with the Beautiful Homes under his arm, saw the book-agent disappearing across a nearby field.

"I just paid him for that set of books he ordered at the office," announced he to his wife.

"You did, eh?" shouted the business man, and, coming up the street near the departing agent, he called to him excitedly, "Hey, John, catch that fellow!"

The son turned and ran after the old man, who stopped and turned as he came up.

"Oh," he exclaimed, "you've caught me just in time. I suppose your father wants that set of books he ordered. I have the right here under my arm—as you see, he has them at your house." He handed over to the young man, "Will you pay upon?"

"I'm taking the six o'clock train back to town,"—and pocketing the bill sent the son handed him he made off toward the railroad station.

"Good-bye," he called back over his shoulder.

"I hope your father will like the books."

As It Was Intended

A certain clergyman reports the following incident as occurring just inside the entrance to one of the largest and most popular New York churches during a crowded service.

It was during the reading of a prayer and the entire congregation were kneeling. A man of rough appearance, evidently unused to ecclesiastical surroundings, strode through the open doors and came in apparent wonderment at the silent and kneeling congregation. He looked a moment then turning to the sexton, who stood near by, remarked, briefly:

"Well, this beats the devil!"

The sexton turned a severe eye on him.

"That is the intention," he replied.

What a Good Short Story Must Be

"T. P." BAR recently published some interesting results of an inquiry among writers with regard to their requirements as to the matter of acceptable short stories. The opinions were various; but the following requirements were generally implied: The author who would succeed in producing and able matter in this form of literary art should take care that his story is:

First, Unshaken in conception;

Second, Well constructed;

Third, Well written;

Fourth, Humorous or sentimental or epic or tragic.

Fifth, A monument on life;

Sixth, and finally, It must be interesting.

"All that I ask of a short story," says one well-known authority, "is that it will compel one to read it to the end"—which reminds one of Lear's definition of the qualities absolutely essential to the equipment of the good pianist:

"First, technique, second, technique, third, technique."

A HISTORY OF THE AMERICAN PEOPLE

In Five Volumes

By WOODROW WILSON, Ph.D., Litt.D., LL.D.

President of Princeton University

A new, epoch-making work—the only complete narrative history of the great Republic in existence to-day

PRESIDENT WOODROW WILSON has devoted the best years of his life to the preparation of his great work, "A History of the American People," from the earliest times to the administration of President Roosevelt. The work is monumental in character and scope, represents the genius of the greatest historical writer of the present time, and is written in that delightfully flowing style which translates historical facts into the romance of a nation. Hundreds upon hundreds of new portraits, prints, maps (in colors), plans, and pictures make the pictorial features alone tell their wonderful story—the birth and growth of what is now the United States of America. There is a photogravure frontispiece to each volume, and portraits in India tint and black. Dr. Woodrow Wilson's is the first complete narrative history of the United States in existence.

In order to meet the urgent demand for this work, the publishers have now in readiness a

NEW SUBSCRIPTION EDITION

With Photogravure Portraits of the Presidents

In addition to the illustrations noted above, the new edition contains full-page photogravure portraits of the Presidents of the United States—twenty-five in all—from

Washington to Roosevelt, a feature which materially enhances the richness of the work. The five volumes are issued in bindings of new design and beauty:

Green crepe buckram, with leather label, per set - $25.00

Half-red American Library leather, " - 33.00

OUR OFFER We will send you the entire set of five volumes, charges prepaid, on receipt of $1.00. If you do not like the books when they reach you, send them back at our expense, and we will return the $1.00. If you do like them, send us $1.00 every month until the full amount is paid. On receipt of this dollar, we will send you, without cost, beginning at once, a year's subscription to either Harper's Magazine, Harper's Weekly, Harper's Bazar, or The North American Review. In writing, state which binding and which periodical you want.

Address

HARPER & BROTHERS, FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK CITY

Schlitz

at St. Louis Exposition

When tired and exhausted from sight-seeing, you will find nothing more reviving and refreshing than "Schlitz."

When the nerves need food, beer is the usual prescription. So in insomnia; so in nervousness.

The doctor knows that malt and hops are nerve foods and tonics. He knows that pure beer is good for you.

That is why he says "Schlitz."

Schlitz Pale and Export Bottled Beers and Schlitz Famous Atlas Brand Draught Beer are on sale exclusively at—

Administration Restaurant, located between the Forestry, Fish and Game and Administration Buildings.

Fleischman's Vienna Restaurant, located in the Model City, north of east corner of Manufactures Building.

Schlitz Export Bottled Beer and Schlitz Wiener Draught Beer are on sale at—

The Firmin Michel "Hot Roast Beef Sandwich" Cafe, located in the Philippine Exhibition.

Government Restaurant and Cafe, conducted by Firmin Michel, located northeast of the Liberal Arts Building.

The Beer That Made Milwaukee Famous.

HARPER'S WEEKLY

Edited by George Harvey

HARPER & BROTHERS NEW YORK
August 6 1904 Price 10 Cents

ALTON B. PARKER says:

"I Read the NEW YORK WORLD Every Day"

THE WORLD Elected Cleveland

"It may be said without reservation that if the Democratic party in my first campaign had lacked the forceful and potent advocacy of Democratic principles at that time by the NEW YORK WORLD the result might have been reversed."—Grover Cleveland's Letter to The World, May 10, 1903.

Bryan on THE WORLD

"THE WORLD never during the last twenty years considered itself a party paper. It promised to spread truly Democratic principles and truly Democratic ideas, and it has done so, and will do so, with entire independence of bosses, machines and platforms, following only the dictates of its conscience."

Quoted, with approval, by William J. Bryan in The Commoner, July 10, 1903.

Send $1 to the NEW YORK WORLD and you will receive THE WORLD every weekday for four months from the day your subscription is received, including every day of the Presidential Campaign. This offer is for mail subscribers only. The regular price of THE WORLD for four months is $2.

THE WORLD IN THIS PRESIDENTIAL CAMPAIGN

THE WORLD is not an organ. It does not support any candidate for the sake of party nor does it oppose any candidate because of his party.

The World vigorously supported Cleveland in his last victorious campaigns, and during his last years it opposed with equal vigor his Venezuela policy and the secret bond contract. It was the first newspaper to expose the secret note to the Wall Street syndicate, and it skinned the second secret bond contract.

The World opposed William J. Bryan and his sixteen to one editorial page led in the fight for sound money and against the "free coin and revolution" proposed by the Populist forces temporarily in control of the Democratic party. In this Presidential campaign The World's news will always be fair and impartial. The foremost leaders in both parties will write for its columns. The World believes that the truth is always to be told. Its editorial page will—as it always has—support truly Democratic ideas, expose all fraud or sham, fight all false pretense. It will be as quick and as truthful in exposing the Purse Potentates of one party as of the other.

It will fight for what seems to it Right. It will be true to its record, as, for instance, when it fought David B. Hill—and defeated him—for Governor of New York; when it opposed with all its might—and also defeated—the tainted candidate whom Hill nominated for the highest court in New York—Maynard, when it supported Seth Low against Tammany and McKinley against Bryan.

The World this year will strive to be even more than in earlier campaigns true to the ideal of its founder when he said The World should be "both a daily schoolhouse and a daily forum, both a daily teacher and a daily tribune, an instrument of Justice, a terror to Wrong, an aid to education, an exponent of true Americanism."

The result of the election will be foreshadowed in The World weeks in advance, exactly as Cleveland's election was foretold and as McKinley's triumphs were. The World giving the electoral vote by States with absolute correctness ten weeks before McKinley's election day.

The World will not only strive to be Right, but it will be Bright and Large—national in its news and views. Every one who is interested in this vital Presidential contest will need it every day. No Democrat or Republican should be happy without it.

To encourage the prompt formation of clubs for the campaign a special commission of 20 per cent. will be allowed to agents or parties forming clubs of ten or more in any town. Get up a club of ten and send $8.

An active agent wanted in every election district. Write for particulars. Sample copies supplied free on application.

Address The New York World Campaign Club, Pulitzer Building, New York

HARPER'S WEEKLY

VOL. XLVIII.

New York, Saturday, August 6, 1904

No. 345

Copyright, 1904, by Harper & Brothers. All rights reserved.

KEEPING COOL

HARPER'S WEEKLY

Vol. XLVIII

No. 2455

EDITED BY GEORGE HARPER

THIRTY-SIX PAGES

NEW YORK CITY, AUGUST 6, 1904

Terms: 10 Cents a Copy—$4.00 a Year, in Advance

Postage free to all subscribers in the United States, Canada, Mexico, Hawaii, Porto Rico, the Philippine Islands, Guam, and Tutuila, Samoa

Entered as the New York Post-Office as second-class matter

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS
NEW YORK CITY: FRANKLIN SQUARE
LONDON: 45 ALBEMARLE STREET, W.

COMMENT

Mr. Cortelyou is getting busy. He says it is all over, that Mr. Roosevelt has 267 electoral votes "sure," or 28 more than required, without counting New York, New Jersey, or West Virginia. This is the way he figures:

FOR ROOSEVELT.
California	10
Colorado	7
Connecticut	5
Delaware	3
Idaho	3
Illinois	27
Indiana	15
Iowa	12
Kansas	6
Maine	6
Maryland	8
Massachusetts	16
Michigan	14
Minnesota	11
Montana	3

Total 267

FOR PARKER.
Alabama	11
Arkansas	6
Florida	5
Georgia	13
Kentucky	12
Louisiana	8
Mississippi	10

Total 84

BOUGHT.
New York	39
New Jersey	12
West Virginia	7

Total 58

This is really the limit of political vanity. There are times when a campaign-manager can with reasonable surety predict results. Mr. Croker was a master of this art, but even he never ventured a guess until he had received and discounted the final promise of the last district-leader near the end of the canvass. But Mr. Cortelyou, who surely has no better information than anybody else at this stage of the game, jumps blithely into the field of prophecy with cheerful disregard of a hundred possible happenings between now and election day. He could not do his chief a worse service, for the simple reason that he only directs attention to his own lack of experience and wisdom and deprives whatever he might have some reason for saying later of any possible significance. Think of Quay or Platt or Gorman or Aldrich putting forth such a statement before either candidate had accepted his nomination or declared the principles upon which he proposed to appeal to the people! And contemplate the expression upon the face of Cornelius N. Bliss when he appears in the "financial district" and is told: "Contribute? Certainly not. Why should we? The result is certain. The election is over. Your chairman, who knows, says so." Contrast the counsel of the cunning Mr. Fairbanks, who is shaking his wise head out in Indiana and saying, "I guess we're going to win, boys, but it's a real fight and we must be up and doing every minute till the last ball is in the box." No "sure things" for that astute gentleman! He doesn't believe in them. Nor does anybody but the wisest tyro in politics. Even though he did select his own manager, Mr. Roosevelt does not deserve a handicap such as Mr. Cortelyou bids fair to be.

Mr. Cortelyou may have—and we guess he has—some reason for pronouncing New York and West Virginia "doubtful," but when he puts New Jersey, with its 56,000 plurality for Mr. McKinley, into that category, he must make the Honorable John Kean cry out in his sleep.

Senator Gorman would not and Mr. Sherman could not accept the chairmanship of the Democratic National Committee, so Tom Taggart hunted in. Apparently he has about as few qualifications for the post as anybody who could have been selected. His sole idea is to "hustle for votes." Appeal to the sober sense of thoughtful people are regarded by Tom as purely academic. His weapon is noise. This is not necessarily ineffective in certain communities. For example, Tom has carried Indianapolis three times and now reaches the summit of his present ambition at the head of the National Committee. It is the first time we can recall that a man has deliberately and avowedly hunted this particular position with a known end, presentation of "claims," and insinuations that seemed at one time to be almost threatening. However, circumstances enabled Tom to "get there," and already, we are told, "his coat is off." Not because of the heat! Dear no! Tom doesn't mind heat. He is hustling for votes. Well, he may wear Mr. Lechman in Indiana, but if he is permitted to roam about the country leaving a cloud of disgust in his wake he is likely to offset the boasted Cortelyou as a weight upon the candidate. We assume, however, that when the organization of the committee shall be completed, Mr. Sherman or someone else capable of appreciating the fact that only the intelligent independent vote can give the Judge so much as a possibility of election will be found at the helm.

There can be no denial of the fact that the strongest independent journals of public opinion are lining up for the Judge. Of the big newspapers here in New York the Tribune alone supports the Colonel. The World, Times, Standard, Evening Post, and Brooklyn Eagle, all of which favored McKinley, are opposed to Roosevelt. The Sun certainly is not supporting him. All this we could have guessed. But the taking of a positive position by the Herald is a complete surprise. Mr. Bennett's theory of making a successful newspaper has not hitherto involved active participation in political campaigns. All he required of his young men was to get and print the news, which they have done so admirably that Mr. Bennett's yearly net revenue from the Herald exceeds a million dollars. But he has insisted and consistently acted upon the belief that the taking of sides weakens such a paper as it suits him to make. He considers it an advantage, however, to be on the winning side at the finish, and it has been his custom to return to this country a few weeks before a national election and tell his helpers which way to lean. So far as we can recall, he has not made a single error in forming this judgment since he has shivered his paper. It is certainly significant, therefore, that he should now cast his own precedents to the winds and at this early day come out flat-footed for Judge Parker. What his action means we can only guess. All we know is that Mr. Bennett himself wrote the declaratory article. Is it reasonable to suppose that he really thinks Judge Parker is going to be elected, and that the Herald is going to continue to land right side up with care? Or has he, at sixty-three, decided to effect a complete change, not merely in the policy of his paper, but in his lifelong theory of successful journalism?

Maybe he aimed only to attract attention to the Herald? If so, he has achieved a most notable success.

The Judge and his friends naturally must chafe over this reversal of form by the great newspapers. But there is a fly in the ointment. One of the first telegrams sent from Expos, if the usually veracious chroniclers are to be believed, bore an invitation to Mr. Hearst to visit the candidate. Up to date Mr. Hearst hasn't gone and his papers don't seem to be going either. They are not only sulky, but are making more mischief and stirring up more trouble than all other public agencies combined. This does not quite tally with Mr. Hearst's congratulatory telegram, but it is a fact, nevertheless, and one that is vastly disturbing to some people. Personally, as we have said before, we do not attach the importance that others do to the routine exaggerations of Mr. Hearst's papers, but towards the end of a well-constructed campaign their enormous circulation and power of vituperation by pen and brush will make them a force to be reckoned with. Indeed, it may not be a fly in the ointment; it may be a spider, and a big, black one at that.

We continue the record of the personal adventures of the candidates. This time it is the Colonel, and the narrative is found in the faithful—indeed, almost exclusively faithful—Tribune. Two boys visiting Mr. Thomas Hensett at his ancestral home in Hamington, Long Island, went fishing on the waters of the Sound. Their designs were fixed upon walley-fish, their best apparently having failed to inform them that fancy creatures bearing titles so often no longer lure the hardbitten to raise their heads in those strenuous waters. But they got a bite all the same. The account continues:

Together the two pulled with all their strength, but they could not bring the fish to the side of the boat. Suddenly there was a call just back of them:

"Wait a minute, boys, and I'll help you." Around their stern came a neat, round-bottomed boat, containing two men and a boy. A muscular hand was reached out, and some one who could draw in the heavy fish grasped the first line.

"It's President Roosevelt," gasped Powers to McConr.

Hand over hand the line was pulled in, the fish making frantic efforts to break loose or pull the man at the other end of the line overboard, but at length the fish was pulled up beside the boat.

"Why, it's a big dogfish. Shoot him, look," said the President, and Secretary Lusk drew a revolver and despatched the fish.

Subsequently the President and the boys exchanged letters of congratulation and admiration. The incident calls for little comment. It was a characteristic act of impulsive kindness on the part of the Colonel which does credit to his nature. Fairness compels the admission that the Judge would probably have attempted the same thing, but whether he would have succeeded is a grave question. We have not yet been informed whether his secretary also carries a gun and is that quick on the trigger. We assume that Mr. Lusk had a duly executed permit in his other pocket and was taking no chance of involving his chief as particeps criminis in overruling the Constitution and defying the laws of the land. If so, all is well. Everybody concerned is to be congratulated except the dogfish, and so sympathy need be wasted on him. He was probably a Democrat, anyway. Most dogfish are.

The Judge has had his picture painted. It is on a gorgeous first-floor canvas and was done by Mr. Miller-Ly, a quite competent artist. The pose is supposed to be characteristic. The Judge stands before a bookcase, whose contents, we regret to observe, are screened by a red curtain. Nevertheless we are permitted to behold a few volumes of New York law reports and the writings of Thomas Jefferson, all of which he is said to have had in the home. His hand rests fondly but respectfully upon "Cooley's Constitutional Limitations," with which he hopes to fill a place in the White House library and to have been vacant during the past few years. On the table to his side are several pieces of yellow paper closely resembling in color a Western Union telegraph blank. The writing is indistinct, but one readily imagines that if the fragments could be put together they would constitute the first draft of the latest shot heard around the world. The curb is somewhat somber, yet neat and undecorated—black curtains east and west, white waistcoat and four-in-hand scarf and turn-down collar. It is the antithesis of a Rough Rider's costume. The expression in the brown eyes is not altogether satisfactory, but the hair and mustache are as natural as could be. To those who have formed their opinions of the Judge's personal appearance from his pictures in the papers we should say that his mustache is not black but red—not glaring at all, but pretty red nevertheless—and so was his hair before it turned gray. He gets it, we believe, from his mother's side. The portrait will hang in the headquarters room in the Hoffman House, and anybody can look at it without charge.

Grandpa Gossaway must be a cause of constant annoyance to Son-in-law Elkins. Not content with accepting an expensive nomination for Vice-President, the frisky old gentleman now proposes to marry again, if the Washington correspondent of Mr. Wauson's Philadelphia paper is to be believed. Thus romance enters the campaign. The story itself is of the regulation variety. Miss Catherine Cushea was "a pronounced beauty," "an acknowledged belle," "a leader of the most exclusive set" (of Washington County, Maryland), etc. Young Davis met her some centuries ago and proposed to her and she was willing, "but her parents would not reconcile themselves to the idea of their beautiful and accomplished daughter marrying a poor railroad brakeman, and the young man was sent on his way with a broken heart." He tinkered up his affections after a while, got a job as a brakeman, made money and married another girl. Miss Cushea married a doctor and apparently lived as happily as any women whose husband is called up at all hours of the night can be expected to. But the other girl and the doctor, not having been made of cast-iron, died at nine old ages, and were comfortably buried. Recently Grandpa met his first love, now a very old lady in the seventies, and the story is that a wedding is to be celebrated in September. It has since been denied, but the mere hope inspired by even its unauthoritative publication ought to suffice to get for the Democratic ticket the solid widows' vote.

The opinions you are known to hold as to imperialism, the tariff, and the civil service strongly commend themselves to men of my way of thinking.—Carl Schurz to Judge Parker.

Have men of Mr. Carl Schurz's way of thinking exclusive wireless telephonic conversation with Expos?

Some suspicion is expressed in certain quarters regarding the outcome of the Democratic State convention held the other day at Jefferson City, Missouri. There is no doubt that Circuit-Attorney Joseph W. Folk, who is not yet thirty-five, and who is not even a native of Missouri, having been born in Tennessee, and having practised law there until he came to St. Louis twelve years ago, was nominated for Governor by a vote of 549 to 194. So far so good. In the same convention, however, Samuel R. Cook and Albert O. Allen, the candidates of the corrupt Democratic machine, were, respectively, nominated with equally large majorities and with equal enthusiasm, for the important offices of Secretary of State and of State Auditor. From these curious, and, on their face, inconsistent, proceedings, the inference has been drawn that Mr. Folk, at the last moment, entered into some kind of surreptitious bargain with the machine. There are those who say that Senator Cahill brought about a compromise, deeming it indispensable, in order to avert the capture of Missouri's electoral votes by the Republicans next November.

For our own part, so far as we are able to judge at this distance, we should say that Mr. Folk's unflinching warfare against corruption in the past of Circuit-Attorney should be accepted as a guarantee of the fulfillment of his professions in a larger field of usefulness. There was no sign of wavering in the speech which he made to the convention. He had no favors, he said, to ask of "bosses," and no quarter to give. Between them and him, he continued, the battle had but begun. Should he secure a wider field of opportunity he promised to make Missouri the most unblemished State in the Union for corruptionists to live in. If we turn from the politician's proclamation of personal intentions to the platform, which was adopted by the convention virtu rore, we again find no ground for the suspicion that a secret compact had been made with the corruptionists. The platform declares that there is no room in the Democratic party for "bosses." It repudiates their support, and invites such a have been masquerading under the party cloak to bolt. It announces, indeed, a resolve to make them bolt, not only from the party, but from the State. It pronounces the existing punishment for bribery inadequate, and advocates a law compelling witnesses to corrupt transactions to testify, relieving them of prosecution by reason of any testimony they may give. It would have the statute of limitations changed so as to make it possible to prosecute for bribery five years after the commission of the offense. It favors the passage of laws making professional lobbying in the State Legislature a felony, and nullifying all franchises obtained by bribery. Finally, it shows the nominee for Governor to see to it that equal and exact justice shall be rendered to all citizens, and that special privileges shall be granted to none. In view of the fact that this platform was adopted without opposition, and that Mr. Cook, the nominee for State Auditor, promised in a speech from the platform unwavering allegiance to Mr. Folk, we are not disposed to doubt the genuineness of the triumph won by the reform element in the Missouri Democracy.

We are not selecting Judge Parker's guests for him—that would be an impertinence.—The Times.

Too modest, by half. Would the World hesitate?

The Boston Transcript, taking thought for the Presidential succession as outlined by him, invites meditation on the possibilities of an administration made up as follows: Parker, President; Davis (aged 82), Vice-President; David B. Hill, Secretary of State. "What would be thought of it?" inquires the Transcript. It is an interesting field for thought, though not one that calls imperatively for consideration, so many precedents may intervene. Mr. Hay has been such an accomplished Secretary of State that one thinks with reluctance of his having a successor, though that is bound to happen in time. And if his successor were Mr. Hill, and if President Parker, an incorrigible swimmer, followed the practice of President John Quincy Adams, and bathed daily in the Potomac, and were one day surreptitiously eaten by a shark, what then? The first necessary thought is, Who would be President Davis's Secretary of State? It might of course be Mr. Hill, and, in that case, if President Davis, who has an irrefragable fondness for horseback exercise, should one day get too hard a fall, Mr. Hill would be President. And what then? Further speculation might prove interesting, but there are already so many ifs in the way that we think it is hardly worth continuing.

The Tribune prints approvingly an assertion from "One of the Common People"—signature to be kept standing—to the effect that "Irrespective of the attitude that 'Gold Democrats' may take, it behooves all who believe in tariff reform to vote for Mr. Roosevelt." Maybe so, maybe no; but that is not the precise how held out in the platform, and we question whether Mr. Cortelyou urged that view very insistently in his conversations with Philadelphia manufacturers last week. If the "Common People" keep on interpreting the Republican doctrine, it will soon become a close second to the Democratic platform, which contains so many paradoxes that you only have to ask for what you want.

We are informed by the smartest politician who has directed a Republican canvass in New York city in recent years, that the actual difference resulting from perfumery or earnest work by Tammany Hall is approximately fifteen thousand purchasable votes, cast by citizens who would rather take two dollars from Tammany than ten dollars from the Republicans, but who must have something.

The report that the Vladivostok squadron had been sighted off the northwestern coast of Honko, the principal island of the Japanese archipelago, and that it was headed eastward, as if bound upon a cruise in the Pacific, was naturally seamed with some anxiety by American shippers and by our State Department. The traffic between Japan and our Pacific ports, which has been for some time considerable, has acquired large dimensions since the present war in the Far East was looked upon as inevitable. We are told that during the last six months more than forty million dollars in gold has been received at San Francisco alone in payment for supplies shipped, or ordered to be shipped, from our Pacific coast to Japanese ports. Two American steamers, laden with foodstuffs, are at this moment tugging Japan. Besides foodstuffs, it is admitted that we have supplied horses, mules, and forage, while that coal and munitions of war have also found their way across the ocean is sufficiently probable. The doubt concerning the status of the so-called "volunteer" steamers, which have been cruising under the Russian naval flag in the Red Sea, does not attach to the vessels composing the Vladivostok squadron, which, on the contrary, are clothed with all the powers belonging to duly commissioned warships. They are undoubtedly at liberty to stop neutral vessels and examine their cargoes with a view to discovering whether they are conveying to a belligerent commodities describable as "contraband of war."

American shippers will naturally expect our State Department to enlighten them as to what is contraband of war, and on July 23 an attempt was made to do so, but the question is more easily asked than answered. Even foodstuffs are contraband, if on the face of the manifest, they are intended for consumption by a belligerent's army or navy. Whether foodstuffs, on the other hand, conveyed in neutral vessels and consigned to private merchants in a non-blockaded Japanese port, would be a fair prize is at least doubtful, and should be a subject for adjudication by The Hague court. Then, again, as to coal, this would indubitably be contraband, if assigned to a blockaded port, or, on the face of the ship's papers, intended for trans-shipment to a belligerent's war-vessels. Whether coal, however, consigned to private merchants in a non-blockaded belligerent port can be treated as contraband is a question which Russia, indeed, answered in the affirmative at the beginning of the present contest, but as to which none of the other great powers has taken a similar position. We take for granted that our State Department would decline to submit to Russia's arbitrary ruling in the matter. We hope that no case of controversy will arise between our government and the great northern empire. We should like to believe, if the Vladivostok squadron really means to cruise in the Pacific, that it has no design of interfering with American merchantmen, but simply desires to intercept the Hongkong Maru, the Yippon Maru, and the America Maru, the three large freighters of the Japanese steamship-line plying between San Francisco and the Far East. These three steamers were used as transports for some time, but have lately resumed their commercial functions, and would constitute more valuable prizes than have yet been secured in any of the raids undertaken by the Vladivostok squadron.

It is not well known to our readers as it is to the riotous strikers of Cripple Creek that Governor Peabody of Colorado has absolutely nothing in common with former Governor Walcott of the same State, or with the late Governor Altgeld of Illinois. He has given ample proof of his determination and ability to maintain law and order in his State without help from the Federal government; and if in 1902 Governor Stone of Pennsylvania had made equally effective use of the resources at his disposal there would have been no pretext for Mr. Roosevelt's interposition in the anthracite-coal strike. As neither the Governor nor Legislature of Colorado has invoked the aid of the Federal administration, and as there is no pretence that interstate commerce or the carriage of the United States mails is obstructed, it was absurd for a deputization from the Cripple Creek rioters, headed by a wilhelm Rough Rider, to visit Oyster Bay, for the purpose of requesting the President to protect them from the enforcement of order at the hands of the Colorado Executive.

The grotesque futility of the appeal would have been patent even to the petitioners had they been familiar with Mr. Roosevelt's published views of the course pursued by President Cleveland, on the one hand, and by Governor Altgeld and Governor Weitz on the other, with reference to the Chicago strike of 1894. It is recalled that those views were set forth by Mr. Roosevelt in an article published in the Forum in February, 1895. After praising the "admirable" conduct of the Federal government in the year named, Mr. Roosevelt denounced as shameful and as calculated to "call down the condemnation of every American who wishes well to his country" the indulgent attitude adopted toward the riotous strikers by Governor Alge, Governor Waite, and the Governors of certain other Western States. He declared that "the worst foes of America are the foes to that orderly liberty without which our republic must speedily perish," and that "the reckless labor agitator who arouses the mob to riot and bloodshed is, in the last analysis, the most dangerous of the working-man's enemies." Some Populist newspapers in Colorado are saying to-day that the people of that State will show Governor Peabody what they think of him when he comes up for reelection. Just what Mr. Roosevelt advised the committee of the Cripple Creek strikers to do we do not know; but if he still holds the views which he propounded in the Forum article he must have injured them with the utmost carelessness to reelect Governor Peabody. What he said in 1895 is equally true to-day, namely, that "every true American, every man who thinks, and who, if the occasion comes, is ready to act, may do well to ponder upon the evil wrought by the lawlessness of the disorderly classes when once they are able to elect their own chiefs to power." We know of nothing that has happened since 1895 which should weaken the sagacity of Mr. Roosevelt's prediction that "if the government generally got into the hands of such men as Alge and the other Governors like him referred to, the republic would go to pieces in a year; and it would be right that it should go to pieces, for the election of such men shows that the people electing them are unfit to be entrusted with self-government."

Sometimes, when the Saturnian days return, and American railroads are managed with as much regard to the convenience of their patrons as is reasonably consistent with the interests of their stockholders, benches will be placed on the platforms of stations where passengers can sit in summer while waiting for trains. It is done now on the Pennsylvania Railroad, a road which has long thought it expedient to consult the convenience of its patrons, and to try to make travel agreeable to them. It is not done on most of the roads that run east of New York, on the New York Central, for example, or the New Haven and Hartford. On the one road, and on most others, one sees in summer days the station platforms crowded by standing passengers, while the waiting-rooms of the stations are nearly empty. People prefer to sit down while waiting for trains, but in summer most people would rather stand up outside a station where the air is good and they can see the train coming, than sit down in a waiting-room which is more or less stuffy, and from which they cannot see what is going on.

The saddest stories of tongue and pen that the papers give us nowadays—except always the stories of the destruction of Sunday-school children on excursion trains and boats—are the stories of the newspaper correspondents who went out to see the Japanese and Russians fight. Tokyo seems still to be mainly populated by newspaper men from Europe and America who expected to get to the front and didn't, and who are now pretty well convinced that they never will get anywhere worth reaching, or see anything worth telling about. On the whole they have maintained a creditable reticence about their services, and considering that they went out to write they have written admirably little. But that little is—oh, so sad! Stories of winter outfits hastily and expensively gathered for a campaign in Siberian snows, and then of struggles to keep the moths out of furs, and then of new equipments of khaki and mosquito-netting, and all in Tokyo. And those that escaped from Tokyo with high hopes, presently returned frustrated and de-solate, or if they stayed with an army the censors strangled their news stories. The correspondents are plucky men, and some of them are philosophers. They have laughed when they could. They do not all consider themselves to have been wronged because the war is being fought without consideration for them. The complaint of those who permit themselves to complain is, not so much that they have been restrained, as that they have been continuously deceived and misled with. The Japanese, one of them grumbled, never say "you can't." They say "certainly," and raise hopes and invite preparations, and then nothing comes of it but more disappointment. We trouble to think what the Tokyo correspondents will say of the Japanese, and especially of Japanese severity, when they get home—if they do get home, and do not rather escape from Tokyo and enlist under the Czar. More than half of them have already gone over to the Russian side.

By the army of workers for newspapers, soon to be resolved into a profession by Mr. Joseph Pulitzer, no craftsman is held in more affectionate regard than Morse Henry Waterston. Indeed, we think it will be agreed that, of the journalists now living—barring, of course, William Randolph Hearst in the somewhat restricted limits of his able assistants—he stands at the head of the list. His idiosyncrasies may be many, but they are incidental to the brilliancy of his intellect. He is loved, not despite his faults, but faults and all. Far be it from us to suggest that at rare intervals a minor defect may be detected in his logic, and yet we cannot but joyfully admit on his behalf a certain looseness of reading which seems hardly conducive to that accuracy, accuracy, accuracy, of which he, as a post grand master, should be a living exponent. For example, he speaks without what seems to us to be adequate information or due consideration as follows:

HARPER'S WEEKLY is one of the best-written publications of the day, its editorial dissertations are replete with political intelligence and sometimes brilliant in expression: its "discusses," or "minor topics," are apt and to the purpose; yet, on the eve of the national Democratic convention, the WEEKLY denounces Mr. Cleveland as if he were, or ever had been, a possibility; a clear instance of the lack of insight as well as of presence; for, although the sensation dealer, never like of the President as a fruitful and picturesque theme of speculation and gossip, the least careful investigation into the facts of the situation would have shown George Henry and his engaging staff of advisers what the Examiner has all along told them that no one likely to exercise any actual influence over the matter of a Democratic nominee regarded Mr. Cleveland as a possibility. This has been fully verified by the proceedings at St. Louis.

It is easy to reason after the fact. It is quite true that Mr. Cleveland did not become a serious factor in the consideration of the delegates at St. Louis, but it is nevertheless a fact that he was regarded as a very ominous "possibility" by the very men who not only "expressed actual influence," but finally held absolute control. This we happen to know of personal knowledge.

Furthermore, at no time did we anticipate Mr. Cleveland's nomination. On the contrary, four weeks before the convention we printed in the very first paragraph of this journal the following positive indication of "possession":

We now reckon it a virtual certainty that Judge Alton B. Parker will be the nominee of the Democratic party in opposition to Theodore Roosevelt. That he will have a long lead on the first ballot everybody concedes; that a great many delegates, not interested, are privately but definitely pledged to his support we happen to know to be a fact. The astute managers of Judge Parker's candidacy predict his nomination as the second ballot. He exerts the pressure that there will be no second ballot. Massachusetts, Delaware, Wisconsin, all of the "favorite son" States—even, in our judgment, Maryland—will change to the New Yorker before the result is announced, and Parker will enter the lists with the prestige of a nomination as closely approaching Roosevelt's in unanimity as circumstances and free expression of opinion could make possible.

We do Morse Henry the charity of suspecting that he did not happen to see this; or maybe his eyes are becoming a little dim, although we surely hope not. In any case, should we, as he himself suggests, have looked to the veteran editor to guide us safely? Might not we have recalled certain predictions of disaster from a very distinguished pen in the event of Mr. Cleveland's nomination in 1892? If so, could it have been other than natural to look askance at prophecies from the same source relating to the same individual? But perhaps Morse Henry made none such. In the language of Mr. Joseph M. Weber, lately of Messrs. Weber and Fields, we ask him. And, before he answers, we considerably warn him that we know. With what Morse Henry says of HARPER'S WEEKLY we comply.

HARPER'S WEEKLY, a staunch Republican paper.—Bakersfield Californian.

HARPER'S WEEKLY, the foremost supporter of the Democratic cause.—Pittsburgh Times.

HARPER'S WEEKLY, Independent.—Atlanta Constitution.

HARPER'S WEEKLY, the indispensable critic.—Washington News.

Quite so!

The New York Governorship

In computations of probabilities may be based upon facts made on the Stock Exchange, the Republican and Democratic nominees for the Presidency have about equal chances of securing the electoral votes of New York. Assuming the presumption of equal vote-getting powers on the part of Mr. Roosevelt and of Judge Parker within their native State to be well founded, we must recognize that the selection of a nominee for the Governorship, who could add strength to the ticket, is a matter of great moment to both parties. It goes and that the tremendous strength exhibited by Mr. McKinley at the ballot box assumed the choice of the Republican nominee for Governor, even Mr. Benjamin R. Thell, Jr., having been swept into office on a tidal wave in the year last named. There is no doubt that Governor Thell, in spite of the fact that in 1892 he only obtained a plurality of less than 10000 over Mr. Cady, would insist upon using his control of the State machine to secure for himself a re-nomination if he believed that Mr. Roosevelt would have a walkover. As it is up to the hour when we write, he has evinced a disposition either to take the nomination himself or to give it to some one whom he would be likely to dominate. Among those whom he is understood to have favored next to himself are ex-Lieutenant Governor Woodruff and the present Lieutenant Governor, Frank W. Higgins. It now looks, however, as if Mr. Thell would submit to being overruled in the matter for two reasons. In the first place, President Roosevelt is loathly averse to the necessity of putting forward a strong and popular man for the highest place in the State administration and he is believed to have succeeded in securing the retirement of ex-Secretary Root to become Mr. 145. In the second place, it is reported on what seems trustworthy authority, that the attempt recently made in Wall Street by the present Governor, who is also, it will be remembered, chairman of the Republican State committee, to raise a campaign fund for use in the Empire commonwealth, have met with humiliating failure. There is, on the other hand, no doubt that the success of war would be booting if Mr. Root should be made the Republican nominee for the Governorship. It is probable, therefore, that Mr. Thell will realize himself in gaining control of the State Legislature, with an eye to a seat in the United States Senate. No well-informed person doubts that Mr. Root is materially stronger in the city and State of New York, than is Mr. Roosevelt himself, and the latter evinces sagacity in denouncing the selection of his friend for the office of State Executive.

To cope with ex-Secretary Root the Democrats would need to put forward a strong man, and it becomes, therefore, a question of much interest, who will be selected by Mr. Charles F. Murphy, the leader of Tammany Hall, in whom it is understood that the privilege of choosing a nominee for the Governorship has been conceded by Judge Parker's friends. The recognition of Tammany's claims to designate the Democratic standard-bearer, so far as the contest for State office is concerned, puts an end not only to the candidacy of Mr. Martin Littleton or of Comptroller Grant, one or the other of whom would have been supported by Mr. McArren, the leader of the Brooklyn Democracy, but also to the hopes of at least two conspicuous representatives of the party in Erie County. That Mr. Murphy will select a resident of the city of New York may be taken for granted, and not long ago it would have been assumed with equal confidence that his choice would fall on Mayor George R. McCallan. It is now known, however, that the nomination of Mr. McCallan will be opposed on two grounds: first, that, in the event of his election, Mr. Charles V. Yerkes, president of the Board of Aldermen, who is a legacy from the Low administration, would become Mayor. As the opposition, which is based on this ground, comes from inside the Tammany organization, it might be destroyed by Mr. Murphy, who has shown himself possessed of an ambivalent temper, if it were not supplemented by earnest protests on the part of independent and influential Democrats, who point out that Mayor McCallan's approval of the Remsen this Bill—subsequently vetoed by Governor Thell—is scarcely calculated to commend him to non-party voters, either in the city or in the country. But if Mr. McCallan is passed over, upon whom is Mr. Murphy's choice likely to fall? He needs a man who has already placed himself as the public eye, and challenged popular interest; a man of forceful, picturesque, magnetic personality; a man who would not shrink from facing ex-Secretary Root on the platform, and who, perhaps, would evince superior qualifications as a vote-getter. To ask the question is to answer it: the name of William Travers Jerome at once suggests itself. It is true that Mr. Jerome is not a member of the Tammany organization, and that last year he opposed the Tammany nominee for Mayor, although it was duly tardily and reluctantly that he called to the support of Mr. Low, if Mr. Murphy should decide to accept him, however, it would not be the first time that Tammany has gone outside of its own circle for nomination for a nominee. There is no doubt that the selection of Mr. Jerome would commend itself to thousands of independent Democrats in the city of New York and in many non-partisans throughout the State. It would be superfluous to add that a certain element in Tammany Hall, which formerly had more influence than it is now capable of exercising, would applaud any sincere enthusiasm the support of Mr. Jerome from the Outside. In Tammany's office, Nobody, whether Republican or Democrat, who has watched the official course of William Travers Jerome doubts that he is a brave and honest man who would be a worthy opponent of the Executive Mansion at Albany, although in power and intellect immeasurably inferior to Mr. Root.

The Republican "Negro" Plank

A SPEECH writing the other day to the Philadelphia Public Ledger complained that while a great deal of publicity was given to a crime committed by a colored man, little, if any, attention is paid by newspapers to the efforts making by the great majority of blacks for the industrial advancement of their race. He thinks that while men ought to recognize that, on the whole, American negroes have done surprisingly well, in view of the fact that, only forty years ago, they were turned loose, without any education or resources—with nothing, indeed, but a single shirt and a pair of blue jean overalls. Scarcely had this letter been put in type than almost every sidewalk newspaper in the country published extracts from a bulletin issued by the Union League in "Negroes in the United States." It appears from this bulletin that of the 3,573,272 farms operated in the continental portion of the United States, no fewer than 748,715 were owned or leased by negroes. Of the farms filled by negroes working on their own account—and as laborers employed by white men—24 per cent. were owned by them in whole or in part, the remainder being worked by them as lessees. In other words, forty years after the blacks had been emancipated, about one-fourth of all the negro farms had become landowners. Of the farms of the South, considerably more than a fourth (comprising more than a sixth of the improved acreage) are filled by negroes working on their own account. More than a sixth of the gross agricultural products of the South, according to value, and almost a fifth of the products sold to live stock, are raised by negroes operating for themselves. It is further to be noted that negroes here and there of the farm labor employed in the South, measured in wages and in one-fifth of the fertilizers applied to the Southern soil. Of farm products, measured by value, negroes raise more than one-half in Mississippi, two-fifths in South Carolina, and from one-fourth to one-third in Alabama, Georgia, Louisiana, and Arkansas. We observe in fine that, according to the bulletin issued by the Census Bureau, negro farmers, working on their own account, produce almost two-fifths of all the cotton raised in the continental part of the United States, more than one-fifth of the sweet potatoes, and about one-tenth of the tobacco and rice. In view of these statistical data, it is undeniable that the colored correspondent of the Public Ledger is right in contending that, when the conditions are considered under which he entered on the task of self-support, the American negro has done remarkably well.

To assert, however, that the negro has an industrial taste is to preach to the converted, so far as the Southern whites are concerned. The latter have always maintained that the freed blacks of colored men are those who aim to train them in habits of industry and thrift. It does not follow that, because negroes cultivate on their own account, half of all the cotton farms, more than a third of the rice farms, about one-fifth of the tobacco farms, and one-seventh of the sugar farms in the South that they are entitled to political—much less social—equality. Neither by education, by native intelligence, nor by character are they, as a race, qualified to exercise the suffrage, much less to legislate or administer justice for the whites. Even if the negro were to raise a far larger proportion of the agricultural products of the South than they now do, it would still remain open to grave doubt even from the view-point of Northern smokers, whether the reconstruction legislation, enacted after the civil war, was justifiable on moral or sociological grounds. The conclusions which a large majority of fair-minded and thoughtful persons at the South are now tending to adopt were recently summed up concisely and effectively in the address by Dr. James K. Boyle, of the University of Wisconsin. Now that a generation has passed since the Fourteenth Amendment was added to the Federal Constitution it will surely be disquieted that the time has arrived when the wisdom of the trenchant change projected by that amendment of the organic law of the land may reasonably be made the subject of investigation. In the course of his inquiry Dr. Boyle defined tersely the purpose of the three constitutional amendments adopted after the civil war. As thus: The Thirteenth Amendment made the negro a free man; the Fourteenth made him a citizen, possessing all the rights of a citizen, and aimed to stimulate the States to grant him suffrage; the Fifteenth Amendment undertook to provide a guarantee that the negro's right to vote should be free from any State interference or discrimination on the ground of "race, color, or previous condition of servitude." No much for the purpose of the three several amendments. For what purposes were they en-

[illegible]

Cautiously resumed, Dr. Boyd had secretly undertaken to demonstrate in the House that the Fifteenth Amendment, considered as an experiment in political science, is an unqualified failure than the Republican national convention proclaimed it to be the determination of the party now in power, if successful next November at the ballot box, to compel the Southern States to permit the negro to exercise the suffrage, by threatening, in the event of their refusal, to enforce the Fourteenth Amendment, and cut down the representation of those States in the Lower House of Congress and in the electoral college.

What could have been the motive for lowering in the Republican platform in 1904 a negro plank which was rejected in 1896 and 1901? A Brooklyn correspondent of the New York Star suggests that it sprang from a wish to secure the negro vote in certain doubtful States in the North. It would be folly on the face of it to suppose that the negro vote in the North was so important, the negro vote, at the risk of estranging many thousands of Southern white men, who are now living in the doubtful States of the North, and who, but for the negro plank in the Chicago platform, might have supported Mr. Roosevelt, who supported Mr. Kenley. The Star's correspondent says that he, his brother, and his friends, who were Republicans, had been told that Mr. Roosevelt had made up their minds to support Mr. Roosevelt. In the current campaign, but now that a negro plank had been inserted in the Republican platform nothing would induce any of them to vote for him. Stress is also laid on the repellent effect of the negro plank on the thousands of Northern business men who live in the doubtful States, and who, in consequence of the negro plank, in connection with his railroad, mines, and factories, and who, be business reasons, do not want a realization of the race question, will do almost anything to defeat the man who has taken that question into the foreground. It is probable enough that the votes of these two classes of men—Southerners residing in the North, and Northern business life by business life in the North—will more than counterbalance the votes of the doubtful States. Whatever may have been the real motive for the last, there seems to be no ground for doubting that it was a political blunder. The fact seems to be recognized by Mr. Fairbanks, who, in one of his last speeches in Indiana, tries to propitiate voters, who regard the negro plank with sympathy, by describing the sectional issue as extinct.

The Volunteer Fleet and the Dardanelles

The strains of the volunteer fleet has long been somewhat ragged, run in Russia, and this vagabond has had more than one admitted by the admiralty on the Nerx, which has on several occasions sought to remote it. The difficulty of the situation dates from the first establishment of this auxiliary fleet, after the last Russo-Turkish war of 1877-78. In that war Russia had no fleet at all in the Black Sea, as the result of causes which we shall presently consider, and she was, consequently, forced to undertake a long and tedious march overland, through Russia, across the Caucasus, and over the Black Sea coastlands. The ships were transported by rail, and the crews by land, through sufficient transients. Russia could have taken her army by water right up to the gates of Constantinople, saving at least six months' hard fighting on land.

This was so obvious that, shortly after the war, a patriotic movement was inaugurated among the Russians of the South, and later, of the whole country, to raise a great national subscription, for the purpose of buying an auxiliary fleet, and holding it ready for use by the U.S.S.R. government should a similar occasion arise. With the proceeds of this subscription the first ships of the "volunteer fleet" were bought, and these have since been constantly added to.

On the morning to provide this auxiliary dock had been started as a result of the war with Turkey, and with special reference to the Black Sea, it was natural that the ports of the Black Sea, like Odessa and Sevastopol, should become the headquarters of the fleet. The Black Sea was the main artery of the Russian Empire, and it played an important role in the trade between these ports and Vladivostok, since the Trans-Siberian Railroad was not then in existence. The vessels that these ships became familiar objects in the Red Sea and the Straits of Singapore, and Englishmen learned to recognize the new Russian ships, which were not only the most modern but also the most powerful. The new ships were, from the outset, employed in the transport of Russian troops and military stores to Vladivostok, and, later, to Port Arthur, while at the same time they were used to transport Russian colonists to Japan and Korea, and immigrants to Manchuria.

The tankers were not crewed steadily until it numbered sixteen and even it was well equipped ships. To demonstrate the popular character of this organization these ships were all named after Russian cities. One of them, the Krasnaya, the largest and newest ship in the fleet, was named after the capital of the Soviet Union. It had a tonnage of 12,500 tons, with 16,500 indicated horse-power. The Moscow comes next, with a tonnage of 11,600 and 15,500 horse-power engines. Then there are five ships of the 10,000 tons displacement—the Kryg, the Alexand, the Sevastopol, the Elektrosila, and the Chelmsky. These five ships, the Krasnaya and the Moscow together, are capable of making 30,000 tons available for naval service. The rest have not more than 3000 horse-power at their disposal, and at best might serve as slow transports. In view of the distance between Rostov and the Black Sea, the ships of the 10,000 tons displacement are in a poor position in the existing situation. To the ships already mentioned must be added the Anapa, with 9535 tons displacement; the St. Petersburg, with a tonnage of 9282 and an indicated horse-power of 10,700; and therefore the Novorossiysk, with a tonnage of 9035 tons displacement, but ten tons too big to be considered anything but an (light) boat; the Donetz, of 8540 tons displacement, which is, on the contrary, a fast ship; the First, the Vladivostok, the Aurora, with displacements just under eight thousand tons each, and, finally, the diminutive Almaz, of 2500 tons displacement.

Of the sixteen ships which form the volunteer fleet, therefore, only six have sufficient speed to make them useful as converted cruisers; these are, in order of speed, the Amiral, the Minos, the Akron, the Irati, the St. Peterburg, and the Scoring. Two of them, the St. Peterburg and the Scoring, are, as we all know, in the Red Sea; the others are, for the most part, in the Black Sea, on the wrong side of the Bosphorus.

In 1896 the regulations of the volunteer fleet were found to be vague and unsatisfactory; in that year a new arrangement was made whereby the auxiliary fleet was brought under the British Admiralty, though retaining its own management and capital. It is certain, however, that this arrangement has not received full international recognition, so that the status of these ships must still be considered unsettled.

That status is only raised because of the special conditions affecting the Bosphorus and the Dardanelles, regulations and understandings at Russia and Russia alone. These regulations are the result of a series of treaties, dating from early in the last century. By the Treaty of 1841 Turkey was virtually placed under the protection of the great powers, which guaranteed its integrity and independence. This treaty was one of the pretexts for the intervention of France and England in the Crimean war. The debate of Lincolin in what was resulted in the abolition of the Russian protectorate over what later became Rumania and the expulsion of Russian war-cruisers from the Black Sea. The furthest extreme to which the powers went was in forbidding Russia even to land

HENRY G. DAVIS, DEMOCRATIC NOMINEE FOR VICE-PRESIDENT—A SNAP-SHOT TAKEN AT HIS HOME AT ELKINS, WEST VIRGINIA, ON JULY 14

The reader is referred to an interesting personal sketch of ex Governor Davis on page 1266 of this issue of the "Weekly"

The Water polo games—a snapshot of the Contestants and Spectators

A General View of the Larchmont Shore during the Games

Contestants in the 300-yard Swimming race During off at the Start

PHOTOGRAPHS OF SCENES AT THE ANNUAL RACE WEEK AND WATER-SPORTS CARNIVAL AT THE LARCHMONT YACHT CLUB

Women's day is the feature of the annual race week at Larchmont, the event of the day being the water sports held off the shore in front of the clubhouse. The sports were witnessed by members of the club and their friends, among of whom are prominent socially in New York. Among the events were swimming and tub races, sailing contests, juncu dicant, and water polo, the contestants being members of the New York Athletic Club. Among the winners were P. V. Dunsard, who won the first swimming match; Harold Warren, who won the tub race; and E. H. Adams, who won the 300-yard swimming race.

Photographs by DeWolf

The Mayor's Party leaving the City Hall Subway Station on their Tour of Inspection

A Scene in the Subway—Painters at Work spraying Paint with Pressure pumps at the Ninety-sixth Street Station

THE MAYOR'S INSPECTION PARTY MAKING A TOUR OF THE NEW SUBWAY IN NEW YORK CITY

A trip through the new Subway in New York was made on July 10 by Mayor McWilliam and a party comprising members of the Rapid Transit Commission and various city officials. The tour was undertaken in order to confirm contractor John R. McComb's recent statement to the Rapid Transit Commission to the effect that the Subway would be completed on time, 1 mile of the road that had not before been inspected—the roadway spur under Central Park and up Lenox Avenue to the One Hundred and Twenty-sixth Street station—was visited during the trip. It is announced that the Subway will be ready for the use of the public September 1.

Photographs by John

Ex-Senator Henry G. Davis

By Melville Davisson Post

THE Democratic national convention at St. Louis was confronted with a tremendous undertaking. Not since the series of difficult compromises which were necessary to the adoption of the Constitution have political leaders so labored to unify vast sectional interests and alloy feeling inherited from recent defeat. It was a work of large adjustment, undertaken with a profound sense of public obligation and the greatest patience. Even the most obscure delegate seemed to feel that this national convention would adjourn, having either instantly united the party or hopelessly disrupted it. When the Presidential candidate was selected the adjustment had arrived. The calm judgment of the convention was satisfied; but its partisan instincts, its class enthusiasm, its sentiment, enmeshed with traditions, remained to be considered. The convention descended for several places on its ticket a party stalwart, of ancient and continuous affiliations, whose name would recall memories—sympathetic fervor and the enthusiasm of reminiscence.

One who studies the history of ex-Senator Davis will presently realize less, prominently for he is for a running mate to Judge Parker, and why the situation at St. Louis demanded him rather than another.

Planning an Industrial Empire

Henry G. Davis was born in Baltimore, and not at Woodstock, Maryland, as the newspaper sketches give it on the 16th of November, 1828. His father was Caleb Davis, a merchant, and his mother, Miss Louisa Brown, an aunt of Senator Arthur P. Coker. His early years were spent on a farm near Baltimore, and his educational advantages were not more than those of Lincoln. Later he came into the employ of a railroad company in a minor capacity, but quickly advanced to a position of responsibility. In 1851 he married Katharine Blunt, of Frederick, Maryland, and shortly afterwards moved to Piedmont, then Virginia. Here the large spirit of the man found an ample theatre. He founded first the mercantile house of H. G. Davis & Brother, and then began his investments in lands. He saw what great wealth the forests and railroads of this portion of Virginia represented. In this estate he was quite alone. It was the fashion in Virginia to consider these Western mountains barren and hopeless territory. And one was still a pioneer who came down through the Cumberland with the sun behind his back. For the most part the information which the South and East had of the Alleghenies was still smacking of a Marco Polo. It was No Man's Country, presided by the black bear. Young Davis had here something of the same vision that came earlier to Henneschawett and his great guest, only Davis dreamed of an industrial empire, added to the republic. No pro-motor of to-day, summing from a broker's office to a hotel lobby, could grasp the tremendous difficulties of this plan which young Davis was turning in his mind. It would take half a century and the revenues of Maryland to construct a commercial highway from the Cumberland westward to the mouth of the Kanawha—and to strip and dismember the mountains.

A Triumph at Eighty

Henry G. Davis was eighty when his plan was half carried out. He had conquered the mountains to the Tygart's Valley River. He had a system of railroads literally chiseled into the bosom of the Alleghenies, comprising the West Virginia Central and Pittsburg, Piedmont and Cumberland, the Coal and Iron, scores of towns, and hundreds of industrial plants. Millions of feet of lumber and millions of tons of coal had gone down to the market places from this wilderness. The dreamer was uncovering his empire.

In 1900 a New York city syndicate endeavored to purchase this vast development, and Senator Davis sold. In one cash payment he received fifteen millions of dollars. He was just the scriptural measure for life. His friends presumed that he was weary and that he would now be content "to dust from his hands the sands of granite"; but Henry G. Davis was not going to the Silence with a plan half worked out when the life in him was still vigorous. He took the money and began a railroad line from the Tygart's Valley westward to Elk River and down to the Kanawha, as he had planned fifty years before. He would put again into the mountains what he had got out. The republic should have its province developed to the Ohio. And so he was at work at eighty when the St. Louis convention called him to another labor.

Eighty! Most men are dead then, or as good as dead. But not all; some have done their greatest work when the lights were going out. Li Hung Chang in Asia, for example; Bismarck in the unification of Germany; Gladstone, Tolstoy, and Lord Roberts.

The Senator's Locust-trees

Senator Davis seems never to have calculated against an age limit. One afternoon in the present summer he was walking through the grounds of his locust-estate at the town of Elkins, where he resides. He was accompanied by one of his superintendents, and the conversation ran upon the growth of trees. "These North Carolina poplars," said the Senator, "grow rapidly, but they are poor trees at the end." "Why don't you try some harder trees?" responded the superintendent. "I have thought about the locust," Senator Davis answered—"let me see, a hardy grove about twenty-five inches in twenty years," and then, musingly, "I think I shall put some out."

Ex-Senator Davis's Home at Elkins, West Virginia

Such as one does not fall in readily with Robert Louis Stevenson's theory of living. "If a man knows he will, sooner or later, be robbed upon a journey, he will have a battle of the wits at every inn, and look upon his extravagancies as so much gained upon the thieves."

It need be said of Mr. Davis in his youth that he must eventually amass a fortune, because he did the work of three men and spent the income of one. And, further, his rule was to hold no post mortem over matters that had ended—when an event passed, it was gone for good and all. A younger business associate came to apologize for the failure of a venture which had been intrusted to his care. He was brought up thus abruptly in his elaborate regret: "Well, isn't that thing over? Let us get to work again!"

It is attempting to arrive at a classification of such a man as Senator Davis one is apt to grope for a comparison. Compare him to a familiar with two types best exemplified in the careers of Sir Thomas Lipton and Mr. Cecil Rhodes, respectively. The one depends upon rickshaws and established methods—a progress from one ship in Glasgow to a hundred others. The other seeks to advance the outposts of human dominion over the sea, the desert, or the wilderness, and thereby add some new province—some leading permanent wealth to the common holding. The one takes a measure from every man to make his own bag larger. The other brings a bushel from nature to the common heap.

Of the Class of Cecil Rhodes

Senator Davis is of the class of Cecil Rhodes. His great development of the coal and timber regions of West Virginia was later felt than that of Mr. Rhodes in the mining regions of Mattheleland and Mesopotamia. It was so much closer pain to the common wealth. So it comes about that Senator Davis's fortune represents no man's loss. He never traded in values or took anything by usury. It was all wrested from the wilderness.

Before the creation of the State of West Virginia Mr. Davis was a Whig; afterwards he was a Democrat. He was elected to a seat in the Legislature of West Virginia in 1860; later he was in the State Senate, and in 1871 he was chosen United States Senator. He was re-elected and served continuously until the 4th of March, 1883. His business interests were now in that fortunate state which required the closest personal supervision, and he declined to stand for reelection. That he continued active in the political councils of his party—a lively and regular debater, he was a member of the First International Conference of the American States which met in Washington in 1889-90, and became a member and potential host of the International Railway Commission, which grew out of this conference. Later President McKinley continued the compliment of President Harrison to Mr. Davis, by making him a member of the Second Conference of the American States held in 1891-2 in the city of Mexico. The delegation from the United States recognized his prominence by selecting him for its chairman.

A "Regular" Politician

Throughout his political career Mr. Davis has always been what is generally called "regular." He believed that his party, at its basic principles, stood for the best policy of a representative government, and that while it might be dominated at times by one element, and that while it might be dominated at times by one division, yet, like Seneca's pilot, it could be, on the whole, depended upon "to keep the rudder true"; and then, too, there was the Tribune's line for the legion.

Ex-Senator Davis was a delegate-at-large to the convention at St. Louis, and a member of the committee on platform and resolutions. When the labor of that committee ended, and Judge Parker was nominated, he left St. Louis. A visitor from his State, who wished to sit in the delegation, asked Mr. Davis for his proxy and badge, and he gave them to him. The visitor inquired whom he should support for Vice-President, and the ex-Senator answered, "Jay good man." His faith in the convention was established, and he was setting out for his home contest.

The Story of the Nomination

The inside story of party councils is rarely written, but there was little closet history attending this nomination for Vice-President. In the as-sembling conference of party leaders, who met to consider a proper candidate, the number of the national committee from West Virginia, who had been a life-long friend of Mr. Davis, arose and moved the venerable ex-Senator. His prominent fitness under the situation was apparent to all and he was at once agreed upon. When the convention assembled the committeemen went down in his delegation. "Don't worry," he said, "our own ex-Senator Davis will be nominated on the first ballot. Delaware will yield to West Virginia when the roll is called, in any and present him to the convention." The roll was scarcely called before the nomination was made by acclamation. Mr. Davis was already in his native State when the news reached him.

He is a hale, rugged old man, broad-shouldered and strong-featured; his step is elastic, his eyes clear, and his voice vibrant. Childhood was Prime Minister of England at eighty-five and not so sturdy. Like the great Englishman, ex-Senator Davis believes that health and many days are in the open; no worry and a regular life, to bed at ten, a rambling walk in the morning, a good horse in the afternoon—and the water and the air of the mountains. There ought to be good years yet to his account.

The nomination of this man should bring all the elements of his party into near and confident relation. His very age makes for the closer sympathy of all. He has lived through the experiences of every class, up from the farmer's roof, and there is some fragment of his life to recall the needs of each. And whether or not he obtain in this best great hour, when his life shows, the republic will do all indeed to bring his type in the resting of her sons.

The Browns, Lee, and Davis Children—Nephews of ex-Senator Davis's Grandchildren taken at his home in Elkins, West Virginia

Two Rising Englishmen

By Sydney Brooks

London, July 20, 1904.

I HAVE never known a party make such a dead set against any one as the Conservatives are at this moment making against Mr. Winston Churchill. The other day he was howled down in the House. A few weeks ago when he rose to speak almost the entire party got up and walked into the galleries. The local Conservative organization in the constituency for which he sits has already announced that he need not expect its support at the next election. The elder members of the party seem to take a particular delight in snubbing him. More than one of them has publicly renounced his friendships, and others are refusing to give him the cut direct. It is all a tribute to his power. That it should take so personal and aggressive a form is as much Mr. Churchill's fault as his misfortune. He has, of course, committed the unpardonable sin of breaking away from his party. While the rupture is still in process of maturity some bitterness on his side and on theirs, is inevitable. But his manner does not tend to lessen either its amount or its quality. He himself talks so hard and shrewdly, and makes so rare a use of his clever, ready tongue, especially in the way of personal attack, that he cannot logically, though he sometimes does in fact, complain if his old party treats him with special severity.

Winston Churchill began life well in being the son of a beautiful and popular woman and a brilliant politician; and he has improved on the excellence of this start by crowding his life with the use of years of life into all round experience than fall to the lot of one man in ten thousand. I first heard of him as a vivid war correspondent, writing letters full of fire and color from Cuba during the Weyler regime. Later on the letters ceased; their author had taken up arms himself in the Spanish cause, winning thereby the First Class Order of Spanish Merit. Then he saw service in India, accompanied Sir William Lockhart as his orderly officer during the Tirah campaign, and showed more muscle. A year later he was heard of in the Sudan, serving under Kitchener, and taking part in the recklessly brilliant charge of the Twenty-first Lancers that decided the campaign. The result was more medals, and a graphic, outspoken, slashing look—The River Roor. But it was the trouble with the Boers that first made him a national figure. He went out as correspondent for the Evening Post, and had hardly been a month before he found himself "a hero." The work of the summer-train at Freetown, his cool talking of the shaken troops, his dual capture by the Boers, his escape from Pretoria and his baffling of the first yoke of, made up one of the most dramatic and popular incidents of the war. Good judges not only of style, but of matter, put him first among all the correspondents in South Africa. His descriptions of men and things, of battles and battles, were, if not the best, at least among the best; and he threw into his letters, besides, so much transparency and sanity, showed such a masterful grasp on the political and resource situation, was at once so thoughtful and imaginative, that all serious Englishmen turned to him for guidance through the South African maze. Winston Churchill was the first son to paint the Boer in his true colors, to try down and expose the abuse and misrepresentation that had engendered him, and to convince England that she was dealing with a foe in all respects worthy of her steel.

It was a foregone conclusion on his return home that he would enter Parliament. He contested Tottenham in 1900 and was elected, no less than three cabinet ministers helping him in his fight. You have seen him in America—no lay to look at, red-faced, ebullient and wholesome, and something of a boy to talk to, ebullient, joyous, and a trifle irresponsible. He looks at things from the oratorical standpoint; his interest in himself, his achievements and prospects is frankly whole-hearted and engrossing. Lord Randolph Churchill's personality and career are among the most brilliant memories of English politics. His son was one of a welcome in public life from the start, and there was the keenest interest to see how he would shape. He has shaped exceedingly well. No one has dropped into the House of Commons more at ease, as he has. Long-headed and yet fresh and emotional, emphatic yet at the same time persuasive, he commands a ready audience. In spite of his lip and unsmooth neck, he forces men to listen to him, and with such effect that I have seen this low of twenty-nine lead a reluctant House to his views by the sheer logic and power of his speech. Lord Randolph was genius and ignorance. His son may not be a genius—though, personally, I am inclined to think he is—but he has already a store of knowledge and a capacity for using it in debate such as his father never acquired. There is self-possession, self-confidence, and a tremendous capacity for hard drudgery beneath his youthful mannerisms. Moreover, people are interested in him. He gets talked and written about; his speeches are reported almost, if not quite, verbatim; there is a popular feeling that wishes him well. One can see already that he will go far. He was among the most persistent and effective critics of Mr. Bismarck's army scheme; he is quite the most effective critic in the House or out of it, of Mr. Chamberlain's fiscal policy. He is pretty sure to repeat his father's success; he may also repeat his father's misfortune. His position is still undetermined, but he is likely to lead him into splendid blunders as into splendid triumphs. Either way he will make his mark, and most certainly arrive at the top, or at least near the top, of the political ladder. I know of no Englishman in a more enviable position than he holds in the great names of the House of Commons and in the varied and exciting post behind him, with a yet more picturesque future in front, and, above all, with the parts and energy to turn everything to brilliant account.

Another coming man, though of a different stamp, is Lord Hugh Cecil, the late Lord Salisbury's younger-son and eldest son. The son that will be long remembered and spoken of in the world of English politics as Lord Hugh Cecil's son. It was the Education bill of that year that brought him into such sudden and splendid prominence. The extreme Hugh Cecil view taken in him is most unimpaired. He is an extraordinary man—abnormally thin, abnormally thin, a boyish anatomy fine perched on a fragile graceful lath of a body, an overgrown huddlesbody tormented with the length of his legs, and at a loss to know what to do with his hands; his face, his eyes, his hair, his features, his very air, his very tone; you hear a thin reedy voice, faintly unimpaired, you catch his gestures, nervous, spasmodic, the contortions and interferences of his slender fingers; and the conclusion seems inevitable that if manner, presence, address go to the making of a Parliamentary man, that he, too, may be a man to watch. He is a man to watch. But wait a minute. This overture of a post, this minute asseverate, has something in him worth attending to. "Reserve of that man," said some one of Bismarck, "he means what he says." You cannot listen to Lord Hugh Cecil for two minutes without remembering that he, too, means what he says, that an overbearing contention is behind his lightest word. Before five minutes are passed you have the impression not only of supreme sincerity, but of a flashing brain, of a searching, half-irritable wit, and of an indubitable power of eloquence. A grandiloquence is not more proud of utterance than is Lord Hugh Cecil, yet a grandiloquence could not master his audience more completely.

The House of Commons is rather a worldly body, impatient of boredom and genius and eccentricity. Intolerant of everything that puts a heavy strain on its emotions. There enters into it the same element in a frank set, talking to it as a person might talk to a congregation of boys, forcing his way into the recesses of each man's conscience, and the House, half repelled and slowly uncomfortable, sits, nevertheless, entranced. After one of Lord Hugh Cecil's perorations I have seen this frivolous, material, cynical assembly pay his oratory the last tribute of an awed, half-grooping silence. Lord Hugh stands to-day pretty much where Gladstone stood sixty odd years ago. Gladstone was just turned thirty when he wrote Church and State. Lord Hugh Cecil is thirty-four. The same ideals and beliefs, the same insouciance in religion, the same passion for the Established Church, the same tendency towards ritualistic ritualism, are to be found in both men. The parallel is curiously close, down even to the subtlety and medical cast of the men's minds. Gladstone was utterly antagonistic to the instincts and sympathies of the majority of the House of Commons; not less so is Lord Hugh Cecil. Yet Gladstone ended by playing on the moods of the British legislature as Paganini played on the violin; and if he goes on as he has begun, Lord Hugh's mastery will be equally complete. In one point only do the two men part company. Gladstone had neither wit nor humor. Lord Hugh has both; and in this he takes after his father rather than after the great antagonist of his father's later years. Like his father, too, he kicks angrily against the party priks. He is not a man of whose support his leaders, even his own cousin, the Prime Minister, can feel sure. Already he has revolted against the majority of his party over the Rural question. Forty years ago it was said of the late Lord Salisbury that "he was just as likely to turn against them at some moment of political importance. He could not fall in with the discipline of the party; he could not subject his opinions or his caprices to its interests. Some men on his own side of the House disliked him. Many feared him: no one regarded him as a trustworthy party man." That is exactly a picture of Lord Hugh Cecil's position to-day. He is a power, and a growing power, but still so uncertain one. No one dare forecast his future. It is certain to be great and brilliant, but whether along Gladstone's lines or along Salisbury's it is impossible as yet to foresee.

In Camp

By Robert Gilbert Welsh

FROM exile to my kingdom I return,
To winds and waters, councillors of mine.
My treasure,—yonder lake where sunsets burn,
My palace roof,—the blue above yon pine,

Books and Bookmen

By James MacArthur

"Do you know," said a friend to me a short time ago, "I have never read a novel of Meredith yet, but I am going to take him up as a serious writer." How I expect that first adventure into the unknown and unexplored tracks of the great English novelist's splendid imagination! When Jude the Obscure came out with The Egoist and The Sign of the Cross, it was Zangwill who led his antagonist satiric laugher the authors by parodying the titles as Meredith the Obscure and The Unknown Egoist. Even the most ardent lovers of Meredith find much to deplore in the style of his later books, just as Browning admirers find much that is difficult in the art of his later poems; novelist and poet in their declining years became more mannered and in vained in their literary methods and less glowing and inspired in imaginative effort. Both blessed the antiquity and indifference of the public, and for lack of genuine appreciation and recognition, went their own way, which is never a good thing in art. The artist, be he poet or preacher, novelist or painter, composer or sculptor, must ever have a high and humble regard for the clear and lucid expression of his ideas, jealous though he may be of their origin. "Who really cares for what I say?" Meredith is reported as saying in a recent interview. "The English people know nothing about me. There has always been something antipathetic between them and me. With luck, after a while, it was always the same outcry of remorse and disapproval. The first time or ten I minded it. Then I determined to disregard what people said altogether, and since then I have written only to please myself. But even if you could tell the world all I think, no one would listen." The novelist's feeling, notwithstanding, I am sure that there is a large body of readers who would be glad to hear again from the author of Kohe Poreia. There seems, however, little likelihood of this. The work of George Meredith, like that of Thomas Hardy, the two great Victorian novelists left to us, is probably never finished. "Some say I am ill," Meredith says, "I have felt a peculiar disinclination for work of all kinds. The thought of taking up a pen is quite absent. I am as receptive as ever. I read and enjoy hearing of new things. But my mind seems now as if it could not give out any more. A visit to me now will give you but a warmed, old hen instead of the plump pullet you look for whenever his vigorous now is laid to rest."

Nevertheless, Mr. Henry W. Neilson, of the London Daily Chronicle, in a recent article, addresses these remarks, takes leave with the author's view of himself, and states that in spite of the serious illness of last autumn, Meredith was stronger and in higher spirits than he had seen him for some time past, when he called on him at his home. The fine line, so like some of the Greek statues now labelled "states" or "admiral" or "poet" in our museums, was borne as heavily as ever, the laughter quietly pouring nearly all that was said. The language came in a full and unobtrusive stream, but concise and accurate, flowing closely upon the point of thought, entirely free from the softness, vagueness, or languors of mood that at sometimes thought characteristics of poets and imaginative men. Of late years he has spoken very rarely, but his interest in the great issues of the time remains as acute as ever. He shared a great interest in the campaign now going on in the East. His own politics are apparently with the Japanese, whom he admires as a really people. "They are a people capable of great ideas, and at the same time of great practicality of detail. They have known what to do; they have never faltered or quailed. Besides, they are an artistic people, full of invention; and the whole race feels a great sense of nature—a sense of the beauty of landscape and flowers. With their Buddhism, their devotion, restraint, fearlessness of death, and artistic sense, it may very well be that the Japanese are a more valuable race than the Russians from nature's point of view."

This led the novelist into a digression on fearlessness of death as essential to manliness. "Doctors and priests are doing a lot of harm by hovering the sick and death and making the English less manly. No one should consider death or think of it as worse than going from one room into another. The greatest of political writers, has said, 'Despise your life, and you are master of the lives of others.' Philosophy would say, 'Conquer the fear of death, and you are put into possession of your life.' I was a very timid and sensitive boy. I was frightened of everything; I could not endure to be left alone. But when I came to be eighteen, I looked around the world (as far as a young of eighteen can look) and determined not to be afraid again. Since then I have had no fear of death. Every night when I go to bed I know I may not rise from it. That is nothing to me. I hope I shall die with a good laugh, like the old French woman. The end of mine waiting in her about her salvation and things like that, and she told him her best unrequited story, and died. The food of Nature and human nature does not dislike human, you may be sure, and would rather bear it in extremity than the formless official death. Let us believe in a hearty God—one to have more than is lost."

Speaking of Emily among the patriots, he observed that there was one thing he had long been anxious to say about her—long affairs, and was glad of the opportunity now offered him. "In speaking of a foreign nation, we must always try to realize what it has done for the world—the very best it has done—instead of always criticizing and dwelling on its weak points or on its malevolence toward ourselves. The other day I was reading a spirited attack upon the Germans. The writer found their manners very distasteful. Well, I dare say they are distasteful, though there is still a simplicity about the Germans that outshines elaborate civilization. But instead of finding fault with their manners, we should have returned to the world—where as philologists, editors, scientific observers, aviators of disease, or, again, as artists and musicians. And, besides, they produced little. I think there is no race to which the world owes more." The student of Meredith knows, of course, that he has always been deeply attached to France. She has given us a splendid literature—think of Montaigne and Rabelais and Molière—great things in art, and, above all, manners. France has shown herself rapidly at the very highest, as well as, by fits, of the lowest. Take America; she has been the shrewdest leader of men; has given us Emerson, that very great writer. The Americans have dominated the world with their inventions, promise of the great things to be expected of them. And they are, however, a large-hearted people; but they are a very young people still, and hitherto perhaps the country has been rather too large for them. What I want to make plain is the necessity of insisting on the best in such people—on its high art service to mankind. That is one of the ways in the sentiment of brotherhood, to the spirit of unity among nations, will not dwell on our own virtues. But foreigners might remember that England's emancipated the slave, and at a cost; that she has been the example of free institutions, a light of freedom; and that she has likewise a noble literature."

Dr. Emil Reich's admirable work on Success Among Nations would please Meredith. He has approached the study of the causes of national success from a new standpoint, has arrived at his conclusions largely through personal and experimental research, as well as from comparative history. He has attempted to arrive at the real soul of the national people, by a series of brightly shining glances for existence among them. The work is of timely interest and importance; it is written in an attractive and popular manner, and has already been warmly received and highly approved.

Emil Reich, D.D.,
Author of "Success Among Nations"

MAKING NEW AUTOMOBILE RECORDS AT THE VANDERBILT'S MACHINE, DRIVEN BY PAUL SARGENT

New track records were made at the Empire City track, near New York, on July 18, by Mr. Alfred G. Vanderbilt, Jr., in his machine, driven by Paul Sargent. The records were 15 min. 41 2-5 sec. for 16 miles; 16 min. 39 4-5 sec. for 17 miles; 17 min. 38 4-5 sec. for 18 miles; and 18 min. 37 4-5 sec. for 19 miles. This is a great improvement over the previous best record, made by Fournier, of almost 6 minutes. Fournier's time was 23 min. 45 sec. for 19 miles.

Illustrated by G. G. Gould

Photograph by Perinold

THE EMPIRE CITY TRACK—MR. ALFRED G. TORI, IN HIS RACE FOR THE 20-MILE RECORD

Vanderbilt's 60-horse-power Mercedes driven by Paul Sartori. The records made by Mr. Sartori are: 18 min. 37 1-5 sec. for 19 miles, and 19 min. 37 1-5 sec. for 20 miles, the latter being an excess of 25 2-5 sec. Near the finish of a subsequent race, the machine broke down and had to be retired.

Theodore Roosevelt—Cowboy and Ranchman

A Cowboy's Reminiscences of the President's Early Experiences as a Ranchman in the Bad Lands of North Dakota

By William T. Dantz

ONE evening in the fall of '83 Theodore Roosevelt stepped from the train at the little squabbling town of Little Missouri, where, six hundred miles west of St. Paul, the Northern Pacific Railroad crosses the river of that name in the heart of the Arctic Dakota Bad Lands.

He was a slender blue-eyed young man of twenty-six, quietly dressed, and carrying little baggage save a fine collection of rifles. It was an inviting sight that met his eye. All about were towering buttes of scoured clay and granite hiding in their dark recesses, deep shadows as treacherous as the silent, silent, muddy river that swept their feet.

Those who have never seen the Bad Lands of North Dakota and their weird old buttes, scarred and precipitous, can ever understand its loneliness and mystery hidden in their depths, particularly in those early days. Long a rendezvous for bad Indians and worse white men, the region had been abandoned as a plague spot. Four years before, hardy engineers and chain-bearers of the Northern Pacific Railroad had passed through under strong military guard, and even the completion of the railroad did not warrant the removal of Major Vandee's little command, whose ranchment stood a few hundred yards east of the station.

At the time of the arrival of Theodore Roosevelt from New York not more than a dozen residents were there to give him welcome. "Old man" Moore, who ran the hotel and collected his bills with a cavalry salute; "Big Mouth" Bob, who kept the saloon; Harry Paddock, hunter and trapper, and Tom Stark, the station agent, who was usually roaring drunk, were the prominent citizens. Added to these were a score of nondescript—bailiffs, hunters, milkmen, bull-whackers, and horse thieves—who eyed the visitor with icy indifference, string him up as one of those predatory "duke" hunters, who, after a fruitless residence of a day or two, "pulled their freight" for home.

It was the flock of the great and red stand of the buffaloes, whose countless herds of these noble beasts, grazed by the horses from the Black Hills had pushed north to the headwaters of the Grand and Yellowstone rivers, only to meet the end of an unending from the north. They were shot down by thousands. All along the line of the trail, the Northern Pacific were stacked innumerable piles of hides that only represented a fraction of the slaughter.

At the Running of the Big Game

It was to be in at the hunting of this big game that Roosevelt came to the Bad Lands, then the paradise of this modern race of untamed humanity. Quietly he entered the hideous crowd, and found a couple of quiet young Canadians, who owned a bunch of saddle ponies which grazed on the sage-brush flats below the town.

A bargain was struck, one of the brothers agreeing to act as guide. The ponies were brought up, saddled, and with the extra ones packed with provisions and blankets the outfit started for the infinite range fifty miles to the south.

The guide, Joe Ferris, headed straight through the almost trackless Bad Lands to Pretty Butte; here they ran into buffalo, and even the seasoned Ferris was forced to abandon the grim and dogged tenacity of the stranger. Hunger, cold, wet, all immovable in such a wilderness, were not the least of their troubles. They were not "took his medicine" like a man.

They packed such meat as they needed and returned. As they passed along the fertile river bottoms, with their wealth of big game, this thought occurred to Mr. Roosevelt: "If this country will support so many elk, and deer why would it not keep cattle?"

Some struggling ranchmen had already started the nucleus of herds at favored spots, but they were rare and isolated. So impressed was the young New Yorker with these sleek and shining cattle grazing on the rich river bottoms that he determined to enroll himself a ranchman.

While to the casual visitor the Bad Lands looked an impenetrable waste, closer inspection showed the valleys and narrow spring-fed coulees leading far back into the forbidding hills covered with a rich growth of bunch-grass and blue joint, on which countless deer, elk, and other game thrived in luxury.

The "Maltese Cross"

Eight miles to the south of Little Missouri the buttes crested, leaving a wide stretch of bottom lands. Here was the home of Joe Ferris, the guide, his brother Sylvanus, and their partner, William Merrifield. They had built a comfortable shack of logs, and as professional hunters made this their headquarters. They owned several ponies and also a small bunch of cattle that grazed about the valley close to the ranch. These were on their left hips the bend of the "Maltese Cross."

From this began the Roosevelt ranch; for in those days the question of land ownership was never raised. The first lands were unencumbered, and he would was welcome to all five ranges desired. So purchasing the burnt cattle and ponies of the Ferris brothers, Roosevelt returned to New York, with a promise to return back in the spring. When he returned train after train of stock cattle rolled in after him. These cattle, after being unloaded and branded with the Maltese Cross, were driven to the ranch.

This was in the spring of '84. There were ominous signs in those days. Many and loud were the threats about "Big Mouth" Bob's saloon at "Little Missouri" over "stuck up tenderfoot shassany" round, driven in cattle, not "cheat" and game. The old-timers foresaw that the influx of cattlemen meant their doom, the end of riotous lawlessness, and their hearts were laid. In them the young man saw an interloper, a tenderfoot, although they confessed that "few a cutter with a spint he was' plum handy with a gun."

It was a busy summer for the young ranchman. He took an active part in the work of branding and improving the ranch. Endowed with a grim tenacity and untiring energy, he was everywhere, down on the ground struggling with a husky cow that objected to the branding iron, or out in the hills after deer or mountain sheep, always alert, quick to decide and act, he found in that life abundant opportunity to develop those natural characteristics.

He was a good, though not a "fancy," shot; his success as a hunter was more due to that dogged tenacity with which he followed his game and which always wins in the long run. He was particularly good, however, at long range and running shots—all the more singular, as he sighted through glasses. He had a beautiful collection of rifles, one of them an express—being inland with solid gold plates, exquisitely engraved with hunting scenes. This he rarely used, however, his favorite being a plain Winchester of .45 caliber.

"Old Manitou"

The accompanying photograph shows him as he looked in the summer of '84, and was taken on the Maltese Cross Ranch. The horse is "Old Manitou," a favorite hunter of which he was very fond. He bought the horse that spring of "Hell-roaring" Bill Jones, and trained him to be one of the best hunting horses in the Bad Lands. Any one who has tried to lift a lamp, freshly killed deer on a horse's back can understand "Old Manitou's" virtues. He was a real hunter, and was not a little of a "hell-roaring" Bill. The saddle, made in Denver, weighed sixty pounds, and was handsomely adorned and ornamented with silver "cowhorns." It was a hunting suit of buckskin, knife, and .45 caliber pearl-handled revolver in his belt, and with rifle slung in saddle, Roosevelt would be off before daylight, never failing to return with a deer or sheep and usually with several others hanging up somewhere on the hills.

In the mean time his cattle thrived and prospered. Other ranchmen began to come in, and soon the weary old buttes held great herds of cattle, which found there abundant food and shelter summer and winter.

With the cattle came the cowboys—lean, gaunt, young Texans, half-bred Mexicans, men from the South and West, slow of speech, quick in action, magnificent riders who sat their sturdy cow-ponies with that unconscious grace that comes only to those born in the saddle. Here Roosevelt found congenial spirits. He rode, ate, and slept with them; sat at night by their camp-fires listening to their simply told stories that often spoke a world of tragedy. One of the "Chinamen" in his outfit, a little Chinese thief, shot three deputy sheriffs and had nearly escaped before he was surrounded and killed in the Wind River Mountains; for through the whole game of cowboy talk runs this keynote of single, uncomposing manhood—the jealousy of personal valor, the gospel of "make good."

His First Presidency

During the winter the destruction of "Big Mouth" Bob's saloon in the little shack, built at the foot of Graveyard Butte, gave these cowboys with alarm. It is safe to say that no finer aggregation of great American citizens ever went unshaken. Their protests finally developed into downright lawlessness, so that no property was safe, ponies were stolen, cattle run off or killed, and it became necessary for the ranch owners to organize for mutual protection. They met, less than half a score of quiet determined men, in a little frame shanty on the east side of the river, where the town of Medora now stands.

It was openly hinted that a certain deputy sheriff was in collusion with the outlaw element. He and a number of his friends were present as sneering spectators. After a few preliminaries the "Little Missouri Stock Association" was formed, with Theodore Roosevelt as president.

The latter then addressed the meeting, or, rather, addressed the sheriff. Never in the history of the frontier has such a speech been listened to. He openly accused the sheriff of incompetence and dishonesty, and with the red light of the officer's pearl-handled revolver at his belt flashing across his glasses, the speaker accused him as a man unworthy and unfit for his trust.

It is one thing to deliver a fiery accusation of general or personal charges before a crowded meeting of law-abiding citizens—

Copyright, 1904, by T. H. Morgan

A HITHERTO UNPUBLISHED PHOTOGRAPH OF PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT, TAKEN DURING HIS RESIDENCE IN THE BAD LANDS OF NORTH DAKOTA

The reader is referred to the article on the preceding page containing reminiscences of the President's early experience in the Bad Lands by Mr. W. T. Dunz, who lived near the President's ranch, and who was one of his companions during that time it is another to stand coolly before a silent handful of frontiersmen and merely accuse one of dishonesty. Death stares a man closely in the face who attempts it, for these men, bred in isolation, are sensitive to the quick of their personal honor, and an accusation that would be laughed at in a convention hall would cut out man's heart here. Standing, with downcast head, the sheriff said never a word, but his jawline was gone.

That was the beginning of the end. The story of the "bad man" gradually gave way before the ranchman. Most of these were young men controlling Eastern capital—men of education and intelligence. The "Custer Trail" Ranch, owned by the Eaton Brothers of Pittsburg, was located a few miles north of the Maltese Cross, while to the south lay the ranch of Mrs. Lloyd Roberts, and further on my own.

The lady in question was the only woman rancher, and though somewhat strenuous was held in high esteem by all the cowboys, including Roosevelt himself. Left a widow with five little girls she bravely fought out the struggle for existence unaided and alone. With a few cattle and sheep she not only put the wolf to the woods, but always had a piece of cake or pie or bit of codfish for the hungry orphan, who never failed to stop when passing her little log shack on Sleeping Bottom. One by one her girls grew into womanhood, and were quickly "married" in turn by one of many suitors, until all are now married to prosperous ranchmen.

Two years passed and the "Maltese Cross" Ranch grew and prospered. Their cattle now bore the eight-pointed cross over and beyond the Bad Lands from the Killdeer Mountains to the north to Chalk Buttes at the south. A new ranch, called the Elk-horn, had been established thirty miles north, and the Roosevelt cattle in all numbered over 2000 head. Cowley life in earnest was now at hand.

In '85, "Three-Seven Bull," foreman of the Berry-Baker Company, was captain of one roundup, and Jack Goodall of the other. Both were crowded-begged, hard-riding cowboys, and showed no mercy on man or beast. Roosevelt took his place as a common cowboy, neither asking nor receiving favors. He had his own string of ten horses, and stood his trick at night stand with the others. The work was hard, the hours long, and little time was given for sleep. Saddle soiled and half dead from exhaustion, I could have cried from sheer distress, but the ethics of cowboy life called for grin, dogged silence—"make good" or pass out.

These trying days on an Easterner's men told on Roosevelt as well. He grew gaunt, thin-skinned, and showed teeth with which I have seen him when you could have spanned his waist with your two thumbs and fingers.

"That four-eyed maverick has got wind in his crew a plenty," slowly drawled "Three-Seven Bull" one evening as Roosevelt un-saddled his second faded horse and threw his rope over his night pony. "He's a sure man to hold up his end."

On the roundup Roosevelt was singularly astute in his personal habits. He was the only man in the outfit who carried a tooth-brush and a razor. His blankets and "teepee" (tarpaulin) were always clean, and though he belabored with any bare-legged puncher in camp, he drew the line sharply on their occasional festivities. Although the entire social life of the cowboy centered in the saloon, I never saw him take a drink or even smoke.

Only once did I ever see his temper get away. It was a bitter night late in the fall. The last cold roundup had reached "Chinney Buttes," a mile south of the Maltese Cross Ranch. A driving rain that from as far west turned the whole river bottom, where the camp was made, into a sea of half-frozen mud. The cattle were restless and hard to hold. All hands were cold out, and the nervous beasts were finally rounded up under the shelter of the bluffs. The creek's fire had long been drowned out, and all hands were superfluous.

Roosevelt and I slept together. After helping to quiet the 400 horses we crawled, hungry, wet, and cold, into our bed that meant some blankets spread on the wet ground covered by a tarpaulin or water-tight canvas. Hardly had we turned to when a night rider slashed a wet lariet across our bed, calling out:

"All hands turn out; cattle breaking away."

With a groan I slipped out sideways and groped in the darkness for my pony's parker line. Suddenly I found a herd of picturesque language, the gist of which was a general malice on the country, the man who made it, the man who lived in it, and the "blankety blank feed that would leave God's country for such a blankety blank wilderness"—but there are certain situations of which it is too sacred to go into detail.

It seems that there had collected a good-sized tidal of half-frozen rain on the tarpaulin covering our bed, and in getting up my partner had instinctively raised his knees, with the result that the whole refrigerating outfit spilled down the open neck of his gray flannel shirt. Hence the outburst.

Roosevelt established and stocked the "Elkhorn" Ranch in '88, and while this was a better hunting location, he lived here to stay at the Maltese Cross, where were kept his sixty head of saddle-horses. Most of these came from the Pumpkin Creek Ranch, over in Montana, and were bred by the Revingtons (one of the owners being the artist of that name). They were the biggest, huskiest, and most unquenchable breeds that ever swam the Little Missouri. They seemed to take a fathom's delight in making air-ships of their riders at the slightest provocation. The young owner took a keen delight in their breaking, and often "choked brother" himself. He is a clever rider, and ran out with ease any ordinary buckler. That crafty old "Ben Butler," past-master in high and lanky picking, "smashing," and all the villainous tricks of the confirmed barker, pruned him much. After a bitter fight one frosty morning on the logging camp range, where the roundup was in camp the horse threw him violently, breaking three of his ribs. Though white and drawn with pain he insisted on remounting the horse.

Like other cowboys, the Maltese Cross ran a mess-wagon during the summer roundups, and representatives from other ranches joined it. This wagon moved along the main streams, the riders accompanying, circling the surrounding hills. A big herd of extra horses followed, driven by a boy, while a man was usually employed to guard them at night. The night herder attached to the Roosevelt wagon was a man named "Wannigan," or at least that was his only known name. He was a solemn, lean, hungry vermin, whose only evident ambition in life was to eat up everything in sight.

Under the quiet reserve of the cowboys lies a keen sense of humor that finds particular delight in clever story-telling. The men who can gravely tell the wildest story is much admired, and each ranch usually has one of these raconteurs, around whom revolve their local pride.

"Wannigan" was the story-teller of the Roosevelt outfit. He went up to the H. T. horse ranch on Deep Creek one day to visit his friend Jim Harman. "Hell-roaring" Bill Jones happened along, and the trio sat down to dinner together.

Bill started off with a story about his own cat. It seems this feline had a way of sneaking into the family pantry and stealing the cream off the milk crocks. Bill's mother laid for the cat, and whenever she caught it thieving would plance the animal's head in the milk and fire it out the window. This continued so long that whenever Bill's female relative bore in sight the cat would run to the pantry, dip its head in the milk, and then dash out; it had become a habit.

After finishing his third three pound can of raw tomatoes, "Wannigan" gravely told a painful story about his two mules who lived in Minnesota. It seemed they owned adjoining farms, and that their relations might be peaceful reconciled to build a fire fence between them. After a beautiful fence had been built their such talk broke down and went down opposite sides to tie off the knots. They fell to quarrelling, and a desperate fight ensued, with the result that both had all their arms and ears sheared clean off with the keen blades.

The Roosevelt Ranch as it looks today

The Custer Trail Ranch

The assembled company looked gravely and looked at Jim; the latter had just poured a bit of molasses on a pile of butter cakes before him. With his knife he lobbed the pie, and standing both actions in his mouth at once swallowed it with a gulp; it was "up to him."

He told of his ten grandfathers' work in New York State who went out one day with cross-cut saws to trim their apple-trees. While about they had a dispute that ended in a desperate fight with the saws, so that both trees raised arms and legs—till a shout of derision stopped his story; he had failed to equal the cool, precise nonchalance of his rivals.

Rosevelt had a grim but keen sense of humor, and enjoyed the camp-fire tales and songs. His vocal melodies we will pass over, but ever in a while he would join in the singing chorus of the following cowboy song:

The old black bull came down from the mountain—
Hoors! Johnny, hoors!
The old black bull came down from the mountain,
Long time ago,
He drew his horns through a white-oak sapling—
Hoors! Johnny, hoors!
He drew his horns through a white-oak sapling—
Long time ago.

The adventures of this celebrated animal were so many and weird that the end has never yet been reached. I have listened to sixty-four verses, with no sign of the finish apparent.

The Marquis de Mores, who married Medora, the daughter of L. A. Van Hoffman, of New York, arrived here in '54 and built the town now bearing his wife's name on the sage-brush flats across the river from "Little Missouri." He was a dashing Frenchman, one of the old aristocratic Bourbons, a white fly of France. Backed by large capital, he built immense structures here for the purpose of buying and killing the big breeds of beef cattle that were herded Chiquito. Soon a miniature city rose up at the foot of the belly buttes, the population being gathered from that floating spirit of irrepressible humanity which circumscribed the frontier in those days. A stage route to Deadwood—225 miles—was established, and soon Medora had a lurid aggregation of residents whose chief characteristic was an uncontrollable desire to make trouble and an unquenchable thirst.

Of all the "bad" men—and their name was legion—"Bad Man Finnegan" was "cock of the walk." He said he came from Bitter Creek, where the further up you went the worse the people got, and that his headquarters were at the fountain head. His heart got lost one day after fling his skin with Bob's "conviction juice," so taking a commanding position in the centre of the town, he "jumped head" into everything within his line of vision. The first shot, through the office of the Red Land Curlew, sent the editor flying into a washout; the second took off a corner of the pad-table in "Blood Run John's" cedar grove, while various other shots judiciously scattered soon had the whole population hiding in the shallow caves at the feet of the butts.

Satisfied with this popular respect for his person, Bad Man Finnegan wandered down to the river, and entering an old saw-logs floated on to other fields. Passing the Klinton Ranch he spied Roosevelt's men hunting head first to the back. All boots looked alike to Mr. Finnegan, so absconding his own he appropriated the other and went his way.

When the young ranchman discovered the loss he was "sure bustle." Securing another boot he started in pursuit, the swift current carrying pursued and pursuer alike. Nearly a hundred miles were thus covered when a fortunate late-20:00 caught Roosevelt to overtake and capture Finnegan and also the latter's surfer, whom he had picked up.

There was a nice "load of poles"—a hundred and more rafted from civilization with two ugly characters in his hands. West of the Kibler Mountains, far out over the divide, Roosevelt knew that Jack Mason had a ranch, so with his prisoners before him, he marched them through the wilderness to that place, where he secured a team, finally landing Finnegan and his partner in Dickinson jail.

Dr. A. H. Stickney, whose twenty-one years' work as physician and surgeon has been spent healing the injured and maimed frontiersmen, who within a radius of fifty miles were brought to him for treatment, thus describes Roosevelt's appearance when he reached Dickinson that time:

"He was all teeth and eyes; his clothes were in rags from forcing his way through the wild cow-bushes that cover the river bottoms down there; he was scratched, bruised, hungry, and in fact, but grumpy and determined as a bulldog."

Although usually returning to New York after every fall beef roundup, Roosevelt remained one year if I think it was '84; and still Christmas. As before stated, a comfortable ranch-house had been built on the Malheur Cross range, where he had liked to stay. By the way, the house has since been dismantled and is now a part of North Dakota's exhibit at the St. Louis Fair. The question has arisen whether or not this is really the authentic Roosevelt home. The writer can emphatically say that it is.

The facts are these: For several years after Roosevelt gave up active ranching his cattle continued to remain under the care of his foreman, Sylvius Ferris. The latter still purchased his employer's interests, including ranch and cattle. Among his headquarters to Medora, Mr. Ferris sold the house to Jim Harrison, of cross-cut saw fame, who in turn turned it over to a friend of his, Jack Snyder, for a residence.

Snyder, whose ideas of correct architecture were chiefly gained through living in dugouts, covered the peaked shingle roof as too cold and unsatisfactory. This he removed, and taking off the top logs from the side walls used them for ridge-poles to support the flat clay roof then placed on. As a consequence the house looked much lower. On its removal to St. Louis the ridge-poles were replaced in their original position on the side walls, the hipped shingle roof was restored, and the house as it now stands is an exact reconstruction of the original.

In the fall of '86 more than 200,000 head of cattle ranged in the lower Bad Lands along the Little Missouri and tributaries. During the preceding four years all had been prosperous, and the cattle increased to the danger point. The summer had been intensely hot and dry, the sun-baked river bottoms being shown as bare of grass as billiard-tables. The ranchmen shook their heads ominously at the prospect; a hard winter would soon leave less, for not an ounce of hay or provender should reach the cattle and their ability to rustle for themselves.

And it came; colder and colder their grim, snow-faced old Bad Lands clutched at the throat of the intemperers. Blizzard after blizzard, storm after storm struck and wasted the splendid herds to ghastly shadows; the place was a howl. Thousands after thousands of the fine cattle lay down and died of sheer starvation. Without mercy that ghastly winter hung on until the late showing of spring saw only a few wadded shadows where before had ranged splendid herds.

The Bad Lands were a charnel house; many carcasses were stripped here, while others saved but a fraction. Some gathered up the remnants and moved away, while others took their own or borrowed money and heavily began again.

Roosevelt was one of these. Although he never again visited the ranch he had it stockaded. A few years ago he sold out his interests to his trusted manager, Sylvius Ferris, who continues to run the Malheur Cross cattle, now cut down to a few hundred head.

Twice since then Roosevelt has revisited the Bad Lands—once (Continued on page 1131.)

Rosevelt on the Cedar Trail

The Author, William T. Austin, and his Staff

SEMITROPICAL SHOOTING

By Robert W. Chambers

Written by Sydney Johnson

TO a man bred in the North there is something peculiarly disappointing in semitropical shooting—that is, in the actual shooting of the game itself—though the novelty of the surroundings and the unexpected plays a great part in the game's sport that amply compensates for the qualities of the game. For it is quantity and not quality that predominates in the extreme South. I am not now speaking of that kind of man who goes wandering into the South, firing at everything new and strange—the sort of man who instinctively flinches away at alligators and crocodiles and pelicans and spoonbills and herons and waterfowl. I mean a man who, who, eager to test new conditions and compare them with conditions familiar to him, accepts lessons with proper humility, and maintains his own standard of decent sportsmanship and unobtrusive surroundings.

I recall a typical day with the quail under semitropical conditions. Around me stretched the flat open pine forests of the wilderness, set with thickets of slender and well-knapped, crossed by red-barked "bushes" from which rose foaming eucalyptus trees. Under foot pulchritudine scrub partly concealed the thick, silicious palm roots over which our primitive ungainly humped and hooped until I thought it would loosen every tooth in my head. My old darkey had no teeth to loosen; he apparently cared nothing for the piling shocks.

His dogs were natives, ticked, goat, wizen, saddle-backed, sapwood mongrel stives, covered with what appeared to be a poppy-crown. One, I think, must have been a "dog-dog," but only the Lord, who fashioned him, knew. I fancy. Both were belated a prevention I did not at first understand; for, although they ranged like pointers, the hundreds of miles of wilderness were flat, and the forest open, and I could not see why he could not pick them up. Thinking of this, I took my eye from the dogs for a moment; and when again I looked for them they had vanished. Suppressing I had marked them down, and expecting to see their fox eyes glimmering between the trees, I continued scanning the scrub until it was plain that we had lost them.

The old darkey and I drove in a circle of a mile without a sign or without hearing a bark. Certainly they were standing somewhere, but where? At last, baffled and impatient, we rounded their call, but the dogs were too stanch. They were so stanch in a circle, bumping and prancing over the palm scrub and roots; and presently drove us back into a hole of quail, our first. The brown whistling whistled us for a second; I sprang up, and dug for a cartridge—with the marvellous result.

"Dev's done gone, sah," observed old Mueh, stolidly; "muk's two down in dat bush, sah."

The next instant he drove us in and pointed.

"Der de dungs, sah. Whoo! Whoo. Tak yeh time, sah."

There were the dogs, old Turkie, frozen into a second up point, belly down in palm scrub; and there rode to the southwest the hideous drooping, stanch as an oak, "bouncing" Turkie's point, content to spread there in the partridge pose like a white-legged wooden horse. I might as well tell the truth; I was not used to birds that lay invisible on the bare ground within six inches of my feet, and the spectacle of a red setter, slaving eyes, like coals, pointing apparently at the very spot on which I was standing, unnerved me.

The trinity was almost insupportable; nothing dashed, I launched a nervous kick at a thin drift of nettles, whistling. I was southerly, blinded by a storming rush of brown wings. One barrel went off at ridiculous range; the second barrel sent me smokeless back too late; and some twenty-four quail went whizzing off into perspective, bearing a mad young man, two dog-headed dogs, and a pessimistic nigger hunched together in the palm scrub.

We clashed back into the wagon, for the quail had disappeared into an impenetrable express swamp, and for the next ten minutes I listened to the counsels of a wise old darkey who knew what he was talking about. In ten minutes the dogs stood again; again I sprang out, teeth set, determined to slay the first bird. But the foxing came again; it seemed as though I could not kick up those invisible birds unless I tried on them. But at last came the whirling rack, the first barrel fired too quickly, then a long cool shot, and my first score. The quail of the far South is about half the size of his best brother of Virginia and the Carolinas; a small, rather dull-colored bird that turns the earth with both feet and wings apparently until pushed bodily into the air. Its quality as food is indifferent; it flies like grained lightning, and, at times, I have seen an entire flock when first flushed drive up into one of the tall pine-trees and settle there. This, fortunately, is not very common. It was a sight, running from eight to twenty thirty birds. It is a pretty sight to see them, after a long point, creep, old rock looking with all the point, dainty, dignity of a heron, and the broad following in an irregular bunch, while the patient dogs creep forward on soundless padded feet until the broad steps under me cover once more.

There is a small wrenlike bird that answers sportsmen in the semitropics. The dogs invariably point this bird; the guides insist that the best dog in the world would do the same, and that this small bird excels the rest of quail. I have seen the bird frequently, and have been fooled, as well as the dogs; but I never got near enough to the bird to inspect him closely. All I know is that, from the distance, he seems to resemble an ordinary Northern wren in shape, color, and flight. We seldom followed up a berry; there were plenty of berries, and our birds, thirty, was nearly enough.

There is one disagreeable feature of scrub-shooting under semitropical skies; rattlesnakes infest the sandy pine plains; and, in the branches, the chances are that you will cross a rattlesnake's nose. These are a little more disagreeable snakes are fat, short, lay reptiles who give no warning. True, also, they seldom strike at you unless you actually touch them. But not to him who treks on a mountain. The unfortunate culture of the matter is that these mountain snakes closely resemble the thick skinned palmate rattle that it is very difficult to distinguish them in the soft light of the express forest, or even in the full glare of the sun.

I remember one that we shot which lay across a pile of mud in a stream which we were fording, and looked exactly like a tree root. It was only the glimmer of the sun on the snake's scales that stopped me. The creature was as thick as the hips of an ordinary man, but not over three and a half feet in length. As I say, this sort of thing makes semitropical shooting rather as pleasant at times, especially when one is trying to "rest," wild nature that it is very difficult to distinguish them in the soft light of the express forest, and their road is usually in a cypress thicket.

I remember one late afternoon and evening squatting in a swamp where I could command a turkey runway. The "cracker" guide whose crew extracted me from that swamp after dark, and he was posted a mile away. The sounds from that swamp at dusk were wonderful. First, out of the gathering gloom a snow-white heron rose like a winged ghost; then a hideous snake-bird followed; then, with a whumping whir and splash, a dozen wood ducks dropped in. But of all weird noises I ever heard, the choicest collection came from that jungle; fox-queers looked at me, ears slowly bent, unknown creatures rattled and screamed and clogged. I could hear deer there, and the strange yelps of herons. But the frog's racket became almost insupportable. Then, in the midst of the infernal racket, something struck the water with a splash and a muffled squeal that defied identification. What it was I never knew; it sounded like a bull elephant, but I declined to believe it was a razor-back slout.

At dawn, the startling, thundering clap-clap of wings echoed like valleys of pistol shots. It was only a wild turkey leaving its roost in some swamp hidden express. I remember one, when tracking wild turkeys through the forest over freshly burnt grass where the ash held the darkish imprints of a huge soldier and great attendant harem, stumbling on a fine serpent-shaped Indian mound in the heart of the forest. Even the black guide had never known of the existence of this mound. We dug a little, lying here some charcoal, but had no time to do more. I never saw it again, although I was there after days we went far out of our way to camp near it. Between grass-landing out of season and turpentine farming, the far Southern forests are gravely threatened. It is sickening, too, to see the hawks hanging just outside of the smoke where the quail are seeking safety.

Curious to relate, I personally never saw but two woodcock in the extreme South. One rose from a "branch" one day when we were returning from quail-shooting; another flushed close beside the high-road on the St. John's River in Florida. I knew of two that had been seen on the Tomoka, but I never saw any along that tropical and jungle-bordered stream. Wild-pigeon shooting is sharp work in Southern climes. The bird is the Carolina dove, of course, not the heavy-tailed and almost extinct passenger-pigeon.

I recall a typical day in the interior. We were six game; we were posted, by dawn, at stations widely separated, on a flat scrubby plain some four miles long by a mile and a half broad. The ground lay surrounded by densest jungles of palm, live-oak, and cypress. At dawn I heard a gun crack, and peering up into the gray sky I saw a dozen birds drive overhead like paddle-stricken jack-wagons. Two barrels did nothing.

In a few moments five guns were crashing; bunch after bunch of pigeons went scurrying across the sky, from their roost far in the forest, to their feeding grounds on the scrubby plain. After a while it occurred to me that these birds were within range, although the effect of the early light made them appear too distant. My nearest neighbor had jerked a blind out of wire-gauze, and I could see the muzzle of his gun poking upward, and at every crash down came a pigeon.

Holding far ahead of a tiny company, I found that they were within the danger zone. Then the firing grew steadily hotter, and nobody could believe how terrifically easy it is to miss a Southern pigeon at full speed at any angle. I got every known angle; they came from all four points of the compass, although the majority followed one aerial route. Now and then single birds driving low

Illustration by J. H. H. H.

The sportsman . . . mounted me would go bounding past; and it was a great relief, at the crack of the gun, to see the four sunny tail-brothers flash in the sun and the bird whirl shooting into the scrub, leaving a fine blotch of smoke dust hanging in mid-air.

The amusing incident occurs to me: my host was trying a pointer pup at retrieving; and, to my surprise, seemed to set great store by the dog. An unprepossessing exterior has nothing to do with the qualities of a field-dog, of course, but I had glanced askance at the pup, and made up my mind that the trainer lied when he pronounced him an accomplished, but thoroughly broken pup. To me he exhibited all the field characteristics of that most hopeless of creatures, the "fool dog." After some hot shooting and retrieving by a brace of noble E. W. and T. setters, I, at my host's request, started with the fool dog to put up some down-scattered single birds that had sighted in the long grass of a dry swamp.

The first bird the fool dog raced down. At the second barrel the bird struck grass behind the fool dog, who began a series of crazy circles. I jerked the bird, and, retranslating my language to suit the formal landscape, requested the fool dog to "go home!" Not much! He liked the fun. He raced up several more singles out of range. Then a long quartering shot came, and I scored. The bird fell before the fool dog's nose. With a yelp of delight he snuggled up the bird, holding it in a flash, back and claws, and began eagerly lapping up the feathers. The dog was not my dog. I walked back to the wagon, where five amazed, mortified, and enraged gentlemen sat speechless.

As I say, the fool dog was not my dog. I was sorry for his owner, sorrowed yet for the unfortunate trainer who had pronounced him "tough and ready, lacking a bit of polish." There is no man more to be pitied than the man whose dog mortifies him in public.

Quick-firing Guns

By Sir Hiram Maxim

THE advent of the torpedo-boat called for a new type of firearm, something that could be trained with sufficient ease to follow the torpedo-boat in its rapid movements, and at the same time have a sufficient rapidity of fire to put the torpedo-boat out of action before it got within striking distance of the ship.

The Hotchkiss revolving cannon was first employed for this purpose, but the gun was too heavy to be easily trained by the ship, and the cartridge too feeble to put a torpedo-boat quickly out of action. The British government therefore called for a new gun.

Sir William Armstrong, Mitchell, & Company produced a six-pounder quick-firing gun, which was, however, very clumsy,— firing some eight or ten rounds per minute. The Hotchkiss Company produced a much lighter form of gun, with a single form of mechanism, which could be fired about twenty rounds per minute, and Nordenfeth produced a still lighter one which could be fired at a rate of twenty-five rounds per minute.

Then came the invention of a semi-automatic gun, using the same six-pounder cartridges, and firing at a rate of forty rounds per minute. All these systems, except the original Armstrong gun, are now in use, the Maxim semi-automatic gun being largely used in the American navy as a battleship-pounder.

One large manufacturing company is now making quick-firing guns of various sizes, which require no cartridge-cases, and this is supposed to be a distinct improvement.

Correspondence

HOW LONG DO WE LIVE?

DEARER, BROX, July 12, 1902

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

SIR.—Professor William Smith has an article in the North American Review for May on the "Immortality of the Soul," in which he appears to be at all divided in his own opinion regarding that all-important subject. At the beginning of the article he says:

"Immortality, if taken to mean conscious existence, is inconceivable. The attempt to conceive it ends in mental vertigo."

Yet further on he says:

"On the other hand, there are some tendencies and features of our nature to be considered which, though they are very far from being conclusive proofs of the immortality of the soul, seem to point to something beyond our present sphere and state of existence. That there is nothing beyond our present sphere and state of existence we have apparently no reason to assume."

While, then, we have "no conclusive proofs of the immortality of the soul," which every one admits, yet the fact that "we have no reason to assume that there is nothing beyond our present sphere and state of existence" gives a long way to show that "the attempt to conceive immortality as a conscious existence" does not always end in "mental vertigo." Immortality surely is conceivable so Mr. Goldwin Smith's own statement so given above, and especially if taken in connection with the last sentence of the article.

"After all, great is our ignorance, and there may be something yet behind the veil."

If Dr. Smith had read Bishop Harold Browne's Exposition of the Thirty-nine Articles, and had not paid special attention to what the learned ecclesiastic says on Article XVII, he would hardly have made himself responsible for the statement that:

"Nothing can be more certain than that the Hebrews were devoted, down to a late period of their history and literature, of any such belief"—i.e., of the immortality of the soul. The bishop shows conclusively that the Hebrews, or, at least, certain writers of the Old Testament, had an unshaken belief in a future state. Their ignorance in the matter may have been, what Dr. Smith says our own is, great, but then they clearly show that they believed that there lay something yet behind the veil."

Is not the learned professor rather extraordinary in what he says of evolution in connection with this matter? He speaks of it as the "discovery of Evolution," and says that there are many "apologists" who at first concluded that "we must rather freely adopt it. Now to make a discovery is no hard matter, for a discovery relates to a fact. Harvey discovered the circulation of the blood. Everybody believes it, because it is a fact. The properties of the magnet were a discovery, which most people certainly "adopt" because they are known to be a fact, and most scientists believe it, because it is a fact. It is absurd to speak of "adopting" a discovery, for a discovery relates to a fact,—like the discovery of America, which most people certainly adopt.

But evolution does not rest on any such grounds as this. It is not a fact, and, therefore, never was discovered, and this is actually admitted by Dr. Goldwin Smith himself when he speaks of evolution, almost immediately afterwards as "Darwin's theory" or the "Darwinian hypothesis." And here he is on firmer ground. Here he has a right to speak of men who have "adopted" it. Many have adopted it, so far as that goes, and many have not, and among those who have not adopted it, and never did adopt it, are and were some of the ripest scholars and men of the first-class intellects known, including an Agassiz, a Huxley, a Harvey Thompson, and many others. This is admitted unflinchingly and in rather a sorry manner, because most unpalatable to him, by Mr. Grant Allen in his Life of Charles Darwin.

It is true that Dr. Smith alludes with regard to "Darwin's Discoveries" that "it has been overwhelmingly demonstrated that man's bodily frame, as well as his mind, otherwise it is an 'overwhelming demonstration' of a process of evolution from lower forms of animal. It may be of vegetable life." The "overwhelming demonstration" apply appropriately to "the process of evolution" from lower forms of animals only, for he admits a doubt as regards the evolution from vegetable life, otherwise it is an "overwhelming demonstration" of a thing that may or may not be true! He admits that a point has been made against the evolution theory in the failure of science, so far, to discover the origin of life, and he simply begs the whole question by saying that "we cannot be sure that the discovery will not in time be made!"

Is this one of the "overwhelming demonstrations"? And we may ask, if evolution has been "overwhelmingly demonstrated," why is it that only some have "adopted it"? A demonstration is the establishment of a fact, and that is just what is wanting in evolution. If it had been demonstrated that would have been the end of the matter. We should simply have had to write under it "Q.E.D.," and the "adoption" of it would have been rendered certain and universal. But as the learned professor speaks of it himself as a theory, and, therefore, how can it be established by "overwhelming demonstration"? In Euclid's propositions there is first the hypothesis (theorem or problem) and then the demonstration. Evolution certainly has not reached this latter stage.

Most writers attempt to establish evolution in this way, but it need not be lost sight of that it has never passed into the realm of actual science. It is still the "great hypothesis" and nothing more.

And Dr. Goldwin Smith seems to indicate, in the article referred to, that he is not entirely an evolutionist in his own mind. "Man is manifestly unlike other animals, and superior is then, in that, whereas they remain stationary, he advances, and apparently will continue to advance in the future."

Evolution, then, has ceased, according to this, with the brute creation. All dumb brutes remain stationary. Man alone advances. There is no danger, one would infer from this, that any other animal will ever spring from the lower creation to rival man in his peculiar and unique powers. If so, can any one be blamed for holding that man is a separate creature, separate at least from all other living beings, and we know something about Dr. Smith seems to think so himself, and so far as our observations go, he is undoubtedly right. He is right in five particulars, which he clearly states:

- (1) Man is manifestly unlike other animals.
- (2) He is superior to them.
- (3) They remain stationary.
- (4) He advances.
- (5) He apparently will continue to advance in the future, presumably after death, or as the learned professor puts it, "he yoneth the veil."

As man has apparently ceased to "advance," as regards his physical structure, the advance referred to must be an intellectual or spiritual one, not on the same lines as the supposed evolution which slowly pushed him up from a lower state, from which he now so "manifestly" differs.

We may have something to hope, then, regarding a future life for man, even from this article, which began in an optimistic strain and apparently in a spirit opposed to it. We only wonder how a writer who states as clearly as noble and distinguished characteristics of man, should not also write:

"It is impossible, since Darwin's discoveries, to uphold anything dependent on the belief that man is a creature apart from the other animals, with a special soul infused into him by his Creator."

We must choose between these two statements. There have been no "discoveries" that can in any way upset the old belief, which we have no doubt still lurks near the heart of Dr. Goldwin Smith himself,—that "the Lord God formed man (all other animals have been produced) from the dust of the ground, and breathed into his nostrils the breath of life, and man became a living soul."

I am, sir,

C. H. MCKENDEL, D.D.

DO MEN MANAGE THEIR WIVES?

New York, July 12, 1902

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

SIR.—Lillian Bell, who has always been rather strenuously critical of men, now, after several years' experience of married life, avers in HARPER'S HAZARD that men frequently manage their wives in a mastery and tactful manner, and that the world has hitherto not accorded them a credit which manifestly they deserve. In the multiplicity of proverbial about wives and domestic wives, "Who ever heard the phrase," asks Miss Bell, or Mrs. Boyd as she now is, "As tactful as the proverbial husband?" Who ever heard anybody say, "As clever as a husband?" This view of the case is almost pathetic, and appeals at once to the sense of justice. Men must have their due without delay. If they are tactful and clever, and not the stupid old deans we have been led from time immemorial to think them, let us rise at once to the new idea—the new man, indeed—and offer him a related but sincere and generous homage. To think that a man is tactful and clever, and to call him a creature to be led merely! Yes, that has been the crux of our attitude toward husbands. It is what our mothers have taught us—that "the way to a man's heart is through his belt"—but let us not repeat the worn-out absurdity. If days are saved, this is the hour of the man's triumph. The husband, the husband of manifold resource, and let wives beware. They believed themselves to be leading great affectionate lears at the ends of matrimonial ropes—they were, on the contrary, being led. They thought they were amusing themselves by playing with petted and spoiled husbands, but it is the old story of the Frenchman and his cat, when the man realized that while he amused himself with his cat, the cat likewise amused itself with him.

Possibly this accounts for the happiness of the American husband—happiness on an individual scale to men of other nations, who prefer to manage their wives in the more blundering fashion of barbaric ages. It has remained for the American husband to pull the wool over the eyes of not only his wife but of all other men who have pined him as one who gave his womanhood no thought. These footmen have even in him only the type of the man who remarked that he had so difficulty in maintaining his authority over his wife, having a never-failing system. He is variable found out what she really wished to do, and then told her to do it. But this is only the first step in the American man's management. As Mr. Boyd truly says, wives have permitted themselves to do things they don't want to do, and wrapped in the time-honored belief in their own meritorious authority, they wonder again why it has come about. They never suspect, poor things, that they have been managed, yes, managed, by the time and happy-looking man slipping his cunning office at their own door of the table.

I am, sir,

A MICH-MANAGER WIFE.

THE TRUANTS BY A. E. W. MASON

SYNOPSIS OF CHAPTERS

In the opening chapter Pamela Mabile is introduced to the reader as a young society widow of London, a girl of rare personal charm. Late one night Pamela and Alan Warfield—who is in love with her—discover a young couple leaving the opposite house. They are Tony and Margaret Strillon, who live in a small house provided for by the rich but unwell father of the young man. They are in reality kept prisoners by the whim of the financial old man, and it is only by playing truant and going out by stealth late at night that they are able to enter at all into the life of the outside world. But finally they both weary of their prison-house life, and Tony determines to go to Algeria to make his fortune. In his absence Mable becomes infatuated with Lionel Trolan, a wealthily idiosyncratic French widower in his fifties. She sends Warfield on a mission to find Tony and bring him home. Warfield finds that Tony, having lost all of his small fortune in New York, is now in the North Sea on a frigate. Warfield loses every argument to prevent him from coming back, but he refuses. Tony remains on the frigate until the moment his fortune is used up, when he has learned of his father's death, and then decides to enroll in the French Foreign Legion, as no other career seems open to him. Julia Wadde, a friend of Pamela's, learns from her of the poor Mable is in town talking. He takes up all Pamela's debts and places them in the hands of a single firm of solicitors, who hold on a settlement while they wait. When Pamela receives a proposition from Mable to superintend an important enterprise of the future in Tunis, which his financial difficulties would make it impossible for him to undertake, she is persuaded by her generous-hearted father, again asks Pamela to marry him, and she allows him to think that to him it will be possible for her to accept him. This thing, she tells him, would make her take the step upon the return of Tony Strillon. Warfield, desirous of obtaining information as to Tony's whereabouts, goes to London to visit Tony's friend Mr. Thos, who, he thinks, will be able to enlighten him. He finds on his arrival that Thos has died suddenly and on examining the handwriting and address on the envelope of a letter directed for the lady here, thinks that he has found a clue to Tony's latest whereabouts. He returns from Tunis and persuades Mable to go south with him. They are even during together late at night in Bedford Park by Mr. Mander, who tells Pamela that he suspects danger for Mable. Pamela suggests Warfield to go to the old place of refuge for consultation—the police of the village inn, in order to devise a plan to help Mable.

CHAPTER XXIII BONAPARTE REVISITED

THEY accordingly they met on the following afternoon. Pamela rode across the level country between the Credit Hill which overhung her house and the village. In front of her the three poplars pointed skyward from the ridge. She was anxious and troubled; it seemed to her that Mable Strillon was slipping beyond her reach, but the sight of these trees lightened her of some portion of her distress. She was turning near and near to her thoughts towards Warfield when even trouble knocked upon her door. In the moment of greatest perplexity his companionship, or even the thought of it, rested her like sleep. As she came round the bend of the road at the foot of the hill she saw him coming down the slope towards her. She quickened her horse and trotted up to him.

"You are here already," she said. "I am very glad. I was not sure that I had allowed you that hour."

"Oh yes," said Warfield. "I came at once. I guessed why you wanted me from the character of our meeting place. No work at all before. Is not that so?"

"Yes," said Pamela.

They walked to the door of the inn at the top of the hill. An older look charged Pamela's horse, and they went within in the park.

"You want me to find Strillon again?" said Warfield.

Pamela looked at him remorsefully.

"Well, I do," she answered, and there was compunction in the tone of her voice. "I would not ask you unless the matter was very urgent. I have used you for my needs. I know, with too little consideration for you, and you have allowed me to use you very you again.

Here were strange words from Pamela. They were spoken with hesitation, too, and the color burned in her cheeks. Warfield was surprised to hear them. He laid his hand upon her arm and gave it a little affectionate shake.

"My dear, I am serving myself," he said, "just as much as I am serving you. Don't you understand that? Here you forgotten our walk under the elms in Lady Millington's garden? If Tony returned and returned in time, why, then you might try your finger on the turrapigate and let it swing open of its own accord. I remember what you said. Tony's return helps me. So I help myself in serving his return."

Pamela's face softened into a smile.

"Then you really do not mind going?" she went on. "I am reminded in a way, because I asked you to go over before in this very moon, and nothing came of all your trouble. I want you to believe now that I could not ask you again to undergo the same trouble or even more, as it may prove, were not the need ever so much more urgent than it was then."

"I am sorry to hear that the need is more urgent," Warfield replied. "But, on the other hand, the trouble I shall face is less in much less. For I know where Strillon is."

Pamela felt that half of the load of anxiety was taken from her shoulders.

Warfield smiled.

"And what he is doing? He is serving with the Foreign Legion in Algeria. I thought you might want to lay your hands on him again, and I wished to be ready. I have given me a cheque on the postmark, a postmark, as the other by the way, as an example of Strillon's handwriting. It was the same hand writing as that which directed the envelope. So I was sure."

"Thank you," said Pamela. "Indeed you do not fail me," and her voice was musical with gratitude.

"He was at Ain Seira, a little town on the frontier of Algeria," Warfield resumed, and Pamela interrupted him:

"Then I need not make so heavy a demand upon you, after all," she said. "It was only a letter which I was going to ask you to carry to Tony. Now there is no necessity that you should go at all. For I can post it."

She produced the letter from a pocket of her coat as she spoke.

"Ah, but will it reach Strillon if you do?" said Warfield.

Pamela had already seated herself at the table and was drawing the blotting towards her. She glanced at Warfield's question and looked up.

"Surely Ain Seira, Algeria, will find him."

"Will it?" Warfield repeated. He sat down at the table opposite to her. "Even if it does, will it reach him in time? You say the need is urgent. Well, it was last summer when I saw the postmark on the envelope, two days after we talked together in Lady Millington's garden. I had business in London."

"I remember," said Pamela.

"My business was just to find out where Strillon was hiding himself. He was at Ain Seira then. He may be at Ain Seira now. But it is a small post, and he may not. The headquarters of the Legion are at Sidi Bel Abba in the north. He may be there, or he may be altogether out of reach on some Saharan expedition."

There was yet another possibility which occurred to both their minds at this moment. It was possible that no letter would ever reach Strillon again; that Warfield, worried he never so thoroughly, would not be able to find the man he searched for. There are so many graves in the Sahara. But neither of them spoke of this possibility, though a quick look they interchanged revealed to each its presence in the other's thoughts.

Besides, he wanted to be hidden. So much I know, who knows nothing of his story. Would he have entitled under his own name to do you think? Or even under his own nationality? It is not the common practice in the Foreign Legion. And that's

(Continued on page 1222.)

A Match between the Brooklyn and Kings County Teams—"stepping out" to meet a long pitch

Washington vs. Kings County—"pulling around to leg" (the Ball has just been faced made by the Batting)

Brooklyn vs. Kings County—Running for a brace

"pulling to left" (the Batting is intercepting a Ball, which may be seen in the air at his left)

CRICKET IN AMERICA—SNAP-SHOTS OF SCENES IN PUBLIC MATCHES AT PROSPECT PARK, BROOKLYN

This summer there is a notable revival of interest in cricket in America. A series of matches are played weekly in the vicinity of New York alone. Prospect Park, Brooklyn, is the scene of half of the matches, most of which are played on Saturday afternoon. The event east of the Hudson Valley attracts players to England resident, in the spring watch at the home of the game. The annual Regatta of the Hudson Valley is held in the month of the interest in cricket among American sportsmen. In the vicinity of New York, public matches are played at Yonkers, Westchester, and other places.

Photographs by Graham

TEN CENTS

FOR A MASTERPIECE

TEN CENTS

PATIENCE AND TRUTH

ARTISTIC old wood-cuts are like old furniture, old prints, old silver—they increase in value every day. Wood-engraving is becoming a lost art. Rarely is a wood-cut made nowadays. Therefore, those that have been made grow more and more valuable. They are already heirlooms of a past age.

We will send you any one of the following pictures, representing the work of the masters of wood-engraving, for ten cents (in stamps), including a sample copy of HARPER'S BAZAR or HARPER'S WEEKLY. For twenty-five cents we will send you three pictures and a sample copy of HARPER'S MAGAZINE. It is because we want you to know about Harper's periodicals that we make this unexampled offer. The pictures are 10½x2½ inches, and are printed on heavy-surfaced board paper suitable for framing. Suggestions for framing, furnished by our Art Department, will accompany each picture. Each picture cost several hundred dollars to produce.

NICOLA BARBARO—Columbus Before the Dictator
C. HUDSON BARBER—Faithful and True
BOUCHER—The First Jewels
BOUCHER—The Women at the Sepulchre
F. A. BRIDMAN—Crossing the Red Sea
CHAPMAN—The Choir of the President
F. A. CHURCH—Christmas With Ransel
F. A. COOK—Building for Christ
FRANK DADD—The Custom of the Town
HILMAN BOUTER—The Blessed Blood
VAN DYCK—Portrait of Charles van der Gucht
VAN DYCK—Portrait of James Stuart
VAN DYCK—Van Dyck as a Youth

POUNCE—A London Flower Girl
EDITH GARDNER—Two Mothers
GARDNER—A Girl's Heart
FRANK HALL—The Amateurs
FRANK HALL—The Belshazzar
FRANK HALL—The Jolly Toper
FRANK HALL—Portrait of an Admiral
FRANK HALL—Portrait of a Lady
FRANK HALL—Portrait of a Young Man
HARRIS—Portrait of a Young Woman
J. HERRICK—The Countess of Oxford
LEFFERTS—Victoria Colono
SIR PHILIP L. LINDSAY—Ginny Girls Playing Ball

MARRIAGE—The Soul of the Forest
MARRIAGE—An Open Book
P. R. MORRIS—Foes or Friends?
MORRIS—The Repose in Egypt
CHAMBERLAIN—A Dream
W. RAYNER—Breaking-Up of the Christmas Party
REYNOLDS—The Apostle
REYNOLDS—A Poet
REYNOLDS—Rembrandt as an Old Man
RICHMOND—Uprising of the French Peasantry
(with engravings)
ROBERTS—Helen Fountaine
SHAW—The Beggar
VALANQUE—Don Quixote de la Mancha

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS, FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK

THE GIVERS

BY

MARY E. WILKINS FREEMAN

THESE are Mary E. Wilkins Freeman's latest stories. All are filled with the humor and pathos of New England life—the type of story which is indisputably the author's own, and in which she scored her remarkable early success.

Of the stories in this volume, the title story—"The Givers"—has created more widespread interest and called forth more letters from the author's readers than anything else Mrs. Freeman has done. It is a laughable tale of the revolt of a sturdy, strong-minded woman against the inappropriateness of the Christmas gifts with which she is deluged by her well-to-do, unthinking friends. How she leads each in turn to replace her gift with some homely, serviceable article is a triumph of rough-handed New England diplomacy and a highly amusing tale.

Sophia Lane is but one of the many characters in this book who are good to know and not soon forgotten.

Illustrated, Cloth, $1.25

HARPER & BROTHERS
PUBLISHERS NEW YORK CITYIn Search of the Unknown

By

ROBERT W. CHAMBERS

Author of "The Maid of Paradise," "Cardigan," etc.

THIS captivating story describes the strange adventures and novel love affairs of a young student of science who accompanies a learned professor on expeditions in search of the unknown in nature. The professor is on the track of some entirely new facts, with which he intends to astonish the world. In the meantime the student meets several girls, and half a dozen love affairs develop. A unique and highly entertaining story, in which Mr. Chambers has drawn his girls with his usual felicity, and their engaging charms are all the more piquant displayed in such fantastic surroundings.

Post 8vo, Cloth, $1.50

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK

The Largest Amount
Ever Invested by One Man for Life Insurance.

The Mutual Life Insurance Company of New York

Rate is the same for large or small Amounts.

No. 35
HART'S
WEEKLY

THE MUTUAL LIFE INSURANCE
CO. OF NEW YORK
New York City

GENTLEMEN:—What would it cost me to provide for myself or my beneficiary an income of $..... My age is

Name

Address

$663,023.28 is the sum deposited by Mr. Eben Smith of Los Angeles, Cal., with The Mutual Life, which provides

A Life Income for Himself and in the event of his death

Life Incomes for His Two Children

Life Incomes for His Six Grandchildren

in addition to large cash payments.

Richard A. McCurdy, Pres.

MR. SMITH WRITES:

"It is my belief that life insurance is one of the best, if not the best, form of investment ever devised. The depreciation in other securities which I hold has strengthened my belief in life insurance in a Company like THE MUTUAL LIFE. I am glad to say that this investment in THE MUTUAL LIFE is probably the best one that I ever made."

These policies are written in amounts to suit the needs of the insured.

CUT OFF AND MAIL THIS COUPON TO DAY.

HARPER'S WEEKLY

Edited by George Harvey

SINGING LOW

HARPER & BROTHERS NEW YORK
August 13 1904 Price 30 Cents

Mark Twain's Six Funniest Books

Tom Sawyer

Innocents Abroad

Vol. 1

Innocents Abroad

Vol. 2

Pudd'nhead Wilson

Roughing It

Vol. 1

Roughing It

Vol. 2

Six Beautifully Bound Books

*With Illustrations by E. W. Kemble, Peter Newell,
B. West Clinchist, and J. G. Brown*

Of all the books of the great humorist these are the ones that have made his name a household word wherever the English language is spoken.

Their Fun is Immortal—Worth Reading Twice

This is the first time that these volumes have been put within the reach of any but the rich, and published in a uniform low-priced set.

Everybody Can Afford Them

OUR OFFER—We will send you the entire set of six volumes, charges prepaid, on receipt of $1.00. If you do not like the books when they reach you, send them back at our expense, and we will return the $1.00. If you do like them, send us $1.00 every month for 11 months. In order to keep you in touch with us during these months, on receipt of your request for these books we will enter you as a subscriber for one year, without additional cost to you, for either HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, HARPER'S BAZAR, or THE NORTH AMERICAN REVIEW. In writing, state which periodical you want.

Harper & Brothers, Publishers, New York City

HARPER'S WEEKLY

JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION

VOL. XXVII

New York, Saturday, August 13, 1904

No. 3416

Copyright, 1904, by HARPER & BROTHERS. All rights reserved

"Git outer my patch, durn ye!"

"Go 'way, boy; can't you see I'm only a lamb?"

young. His flesh is solid and rose-tinted. It does not hang from his chin in the heavy folds of old age. His beard, hair, and eyebrows show more black than gray. His eyes are clear and sparkling. He could probably give any of the other three candidates a good walk for their money."

How does he manage it? Hal he laughs, "I do not drink wine—much; and I do not use tobacco at all. I neither smoke nor chew. I go to bed every night at eleven o'clock and I get up at seven in the morning. I manage to get eight hours of good, refreshing sleep every twenty-four hours. I don't feel a year over fifty, and I don't carry a cent of life-insurance. I have no doctor, and no use for one. I eat a breakfast that makes my secretary, who is twenty-nine years old, feel like an invalid. Then I put on my long boots and my farmer's broad-brimmed hat and I walk around the farm. When I feel like it, I do some haring on my own account." That is a good point—about the wife. Mrs. Hayes reached the White House on the same platform. We do not quite like the qualifying "much," though some consideration, of course, is due the party. But how is the fatal ritual going to get around the broad-brimmed hat and the rose-tinted hair? He cannot wear a hat all the time; he would get held if he did. And he hasn't a bow to his name. A happy thought! He can borrow BAYARD'S.

A fine-tooth comb drawn through the columns of the Times has not produced a solitary criticism of the quality of the Judge's visitors since Mr. CHARLES R. MURPHY went to Europe. Mr. OGDEN, we believe, is in Europe.

We have never questioned the political policy of Judge PARKER's telegram. After silence had served his purpose he found speech when that in turn could serve him. But we have never been able to take it seriously as the indication of an heroic and self-sacrificing spirit, which, regardless of political expediency, could break on conventions.—The Tribune.

Then what did you mean when, in a leading editorial in your issue of July 19, you said:

Judge ARTHUR B. PARKER's refusal to stand for the Presidency on a platform which ignores the money question and bases its bidding upon the Democratic doctrine of the free-silver orange planks of 1896 and 1898 does signal credit to the firmness and courage of his public character. Judge PARKER is widely respected in this State for the conspicuous ability he has shown in politics and on the bench, and for the purity and integrity of his private life. Every man who knows him esteems him. The Republicans of New York have nothing but good words to say about him in his private capacity and in his political activities. His message, therefore, to the convention, which, misled by the unbounded assurances of his representatives at St. Louis, offered him a nomination on terms offensive to his self-respect, will surprise no one familiar with Judge PARKER's honorable achievements and honorable record. . . . Judge PARKER's action clears him absolutely of any complicity in the cowardly surrender of his rejected managers in the committee on resolutions and in the convention.

If this was not "taking it seriously" what was it? Were you making a grumping effort to be humorous? And was that as near as you could get? Fudge! 'Tis better to be an American man than an American ambassador any day in the week. But why not be both? Nobody objects.

The loud and obscure note that wrought that platform at St. Louis.—The Sun.

Strady! strady!

It seems odd to speak of the editor of the Spectator of London as a man of ardent temperament, capable, under provocation, of bursting into song. Yet this was what we find in his stated columns:

At this moment President BAYARD is probably the most interesting political figure in the world. He is one of the protagonists in what is certainly the foremost of constitutional debates, but he is also the inaugurator of a new era in American public life, a revolutionary who has dared to face the ghosts of the cultivated classes and the ingrained corruption of party politics, and by the sheer force of a masterful personality has compelled the majority of his countrymen, many, no doubt, against their will, to think with him. Whether he succeeds or fails, things can never be quite the same again. America's eyes have been opened to the chances in her destiny, old catchwords have been discarded, old phrases exposed. A thrill of electric energy has gone through classes who at one time saw in the political life only a soulless career without honor or plebe. Like MANACAT, he has been a "smotherer of formulas," and he has forced his people to discard the veil of mist and rhetoric, and look facts simply in the face.

That surely is pitched on a key sufficiently high to satisfy the most critical that even an Englishman may be inexpressible. When on his first visit to this country a year or more ago, Mr. STANLEY visited the White House, and was obviously stirred by the British despatch by the bewitching personality which he found there. That the impression was lasting is evidenced by the fact that he is still under the influence, that circumstances have arisen since this was written which necessitate somewhat the subject's appreciation of the tribute. The lion had not then become a lamb. Nowadays the Colonel does not like the word "revolutionary"; it grates upon too many sensitive ears. Moreover, it is much easier to swallow formulas than to digest them. The comparison with MANACAT sounds fetching, but there may be a question of its timeliness. After the 5th of November, anything will go, but just now—well, the probabilities are that, if MANACAT were a candidate, the Judge would beat him. We remember to Mr. STANLEY a thoughtful study of the picture upon the first page of the cover of this paper, with a view of consultation. Otherwise he may find himself demonstrating his personal admiration and friendship in injudicious ways.

"I do not expect to lose a pound of flesh or an hour's sleep in this campaign," said THOMAS TANTER to a friend soon after he had been elected chairman of the Democratic National Committee, and he pulled off his coat and went to work.—The Journal.

You must sleep in his coat; he seems to be pulling it off in all his waking moments.

According to the daily papers, the big corporations are not refusing to contribute to the Republican fund—the Democratic collector hasn't been around yet—but they are doing it on the installment plan. No money is offered for the fullness of the offering, but hope is held out that it may be only a sample of more to follow—and maybe not. All depends upon prospective assurance. The money-owners do not want to buy Safety and Sanity in a poke. They want a look at the pigs. If satisfactory assurances shall be forthcoming and if they shall be suitably explicit and authoritative, more will be contributed; otherwise not. That is the long and short of it—and we perceive no cause of complaint. There were good and sufficient reasons for large contributions in 1896 and in 1900, but there do not exist this year. We hope and have reason to believe that none will be made.

We have always regarded the Judge as a kindly man, but there certainly was a species of crumbly apportioning refusal in inviting J. EDWIN STANBURN to Europe and then not letting him talk. It was like asking JOHN D. CARVER to an Irish picnic and telling him that some one else was going to Irish it.

The World continues to job at Mr. BELMONT. The latest report is that he is so disgruntled by the National Committee's preference of TOM to himself that "the Democratic managers say he has 'laid down'." The names of the "managers" responsible for the assertion, of course, are not given. As a matter of fact, Mr. BELMONT's course has been characterized throughout by breadth, tolerance, and unselfishness. That he would have appreciated keenly the honor of holding the position filled by his distinguished father in two successive campaigns we have no doubt. But he had no ambition to be gratified at the expense of the Judge's candidacy, and when he said that, although he did not represent Wall Street, under no circumstances would he give that candidacy a significance it did not really possess, he spoke as a patriotic and sincere upholder of a cause which he believed to be in the best interest of the country. Nobody begrudges Mr. BELMONT's paper all the credit it deserves, or, indeed, all it claims, but it certainly renders no service to the Democratic party by constantly displaying manifestations of interest from men of the inheritance and type of AUGUST BALDWIN and HARRY FAIRBANKS.

We are surprised that the distinguished editor of the Springfield Republican—himself a perfect gentleman, despite Mr. LAFAYETTE's rebuffing appellation of SUMNER, and a connection by marriage of Judge E. R. BROWN and Senator GEORGE FRANKLIN HOAR—should so far forget his manners as to refer to the President of the United States as "Teddy." It is eminently proper and quite in consonance with American custom to refer to a candidate colloquially, often affectionately, as "the Judge" or "the Colonel," but as Chief Magistrate he is always President ROOSEVELT; never "Teddy" in whatever capacity spoken of. SUMNER ought to apologize.

The Herald reports from Washington that Secretary SULLIVAN is "chafing" under the restraint of writing till GEORGE BAILEY makes out his field of oratory. The Secretary is said to consider himself the best speaker in the cabinet, and he is gawking at the bit. After noting that California is eager to be spellbound by Mr. SULLIVAN, the correspondent nicely observes that GEORGE BAILEY may let him speak "once or twice in Maine." It is not for us to advise, as Mr. CHARLES R. MILLER used to announce before he visited Essex, but it is painfully manifest that, if Mr. SULLIVAN can do no better than when he fired the opening gun on the banks of the Goussans, GEORGE BAILEY will make no mistake in confining him strictly to Maine, where many votes can be lost without endangering the cause. If he must go to California, the Canadian Pacific is the preferable route. Tail-end speeches in Manitoba can do no harm.

Oyster Bay feels better since the Colonel got that speech off his mind. When he left for Washington—but let the Evening Telegram tell it:

The President, tanned brown, jumped nimbly from the high wagon to the station platform. He assisted Mrs. ROOSEVELT and Mrs. LARA to get out, and, adjusting his glasses, looked at the crowd of summer residents, acknowledging their applause by lifting his hat. . . .

Just before the train pulled out, the President called to GEORGE BAILEY, the veteran backson of the village, to come over.

"I want to give you a farewell hand-shake," the President told him.

Where put out his hand, and the President shook it cordially.

Richard himself again! If the oldest Esquimaux backson ever had a chance, he has it now.

The Democratic search for a treasurer is not nearly so urgent as the search for a treasury.—The Tribune.

Nor is the Republican search for a treasury nearly so urgent as the search for something to put in it. The only serious face among the campaign-managers up to date is that of the good man, with whose name we are not familiar, who is conducting the canvass of the Rev. Dr. SILAS C. SWALLOW. He doesn't even have to chase rainbows.

You can't keep Uncle DYAN down long. He drew back into his shell when he felt the full effect of his four pie in St. Louis, but his old head is beginning to appear again at intervals. The familiar items announcing his mysterious arrivals and departures, as of yore, are found more and more frequently in the papers, and he continues to "say nothing" with menacing looks. His first appearance at Esopus was signalized by one of his oppressively vulgar observations that, as the bearer of the proxy for Alaska, he was able to report great enthusiasm on the left bank of Herby Strait. The best service he could render the Judge would be to go to the place—be represented by proxy and stay there till the fifth of November. If that is not feasible, we would suggest that he be stowed away in a more modern cold-storage vault, padded locked and barred, or, better yet, that he be pickled and added to Mr. HANSEN's stock of otherwise desirable varieties.

Uncle REDFIELD PROCTOR brings cheering news from Vermont. The weather up there has been a little larkish of late, and he ain't quite sure, but he guesses the old-soldier vote will pull the ticket through if it will only stop raining long enough to let 'em get the hay in.

That exquisite specimen of America's foremost statesman, former Mayor ROBERT A. VAN WYCK, informs the Paris Herald that the atmosphere was very blue in Carlsbad until word came that the Judge had taken the bit between his teeth and planted his party on a rock of gold. "At once," he adds, "the sentiment changed," so it is now probably safe to put Carlsbad in the Democratic column. "A second CLEVELAND" is the way Mr. VAN WYCK speaks of the Judge, without perchance reflecting that it might be better to be a first PARKER. The Mayor does not say what particular ill he is seeking a cure for, but whichever of money it is, he needs it, and would confer a favor upon his countrymen by staying in Carlsbad until it is pronounced permanent. There is no such luck, however. He says he is coming home "to work for the independent vote." Great Scott!

How hard is the heart of Mr. EMIL ROOS? It must be flint indeed if he can hold out against the entreaties of his Republican fellow citizens of New York that he shall lead them in their State fight this fall. And yet why should he lose them? Nobody supposes that Mr. ROOS wants at this time to be Governor of New York. He has just got out of public office after a long period of very hard and important work. Most of his pay for that work he took in reputation, and in the consciousness that he was doing his duty, and promoting confidence in the administration of his friend CALVIN ROOSEVELT. Must he give himself up indefinitely to promoting confidence in Colonel ROOSEVELT? Is it not possible that Mr. ROOS may feel that the Colonel is entitled now to have an unfettered chance to inspire confidence in himself, and that the people of the country, and especially of the President's own State, should be left, undistracted, to say whether they want him or not? In an emergency, the work of inspiring confidence in another man may be worthy of the largest of men and the noblest of patriots. Mr. ROOS has had his now well through. There is no sufficient reason why he should run for Governor of New York unless he wants to. It takes two whole years to be Governor of New York, besides the trouble of running. If Mr. ROOS wants to be Governor, let him run; if he thinks the people of the State need him at Albany, let him run. But he should not be expected to run to oblige a friend nor to make any one President except himself.

The worst defect the Boston Herald could find in Mr. ROOSEVELT's speech was Speaker CANNON's variegated record on silver, which it rebukes with the gloom of a discoverer. But why try to saddle upon the candidate the inconsistencies of a generous old demagogue? The Colonel has record enough of his own, and declares his readiness to stand or fall by it. What more should he asked?

Five thousand people gathered in the great hall of the Cooper Union to rejoice in a murder is not a pretty sight. It was seen on the night of July 29, and the rejoicing was frank, outspoken, and as hearty as the police would permit. The meeting was held under the auspices of the Jewish radical East Side paper, Forward, to celebrate the assassination of the Russian minister VOY PRATSKIN. The anarchists were out in force, coming from the near-by New Jersey cities, and from their lairs in Manhattan. It was a red meeting; the women wore red ribbons in their buttonholes; bits of red fluttered everywhere at every outbreak of enthusiasm. There is every reason why Russian Jews should hate VOY PRATSKIN and all his works, and should be enthusiastically resigned to his death. Their rejoicings in the fall of their enemy, however indecent, are understandable, and in a way excusable.

but the anarchists whose shouts rose with theirs the other night would be just as ready to shriek approval if the assassin's bomb had cut short the life of the best and wisest ruler on earth. VON PLATZ, as he is known to American readers, stood for all that was worst and most hopeless in the Russian practice of government. But we can condemn and lament the manner of his taking off, because we do not believe that any good cause was ever helped by assassination. We hate political murder quite as much as Russian Jews hated VON PLATZ, and for reasons quite as good, for it has sorely injured us. But it has injured Russia far more, and we cannot but fear that this last resort to it, at a critical time, when great changes are possible in Russia, will make bad matters worse, and defer reforms that seemed imminent. Anyhow, a public meeting in New York to glory in a political assassination was a disgusting spectacle. The best that can be said for it is that it may be better that those who rejoice in murder should rejoice openly and be recognized and counted.

Mr. MULLIN, who came out of the West with an excellent reputation to be president of the New York, New Haven, and Hartford Railroad, may go back to the West again at his early convenience for all the people of Connecticut care. They are heartily displeased with Mr. MULLIN and his kind of rail-roading. All along the shore of the Sound rises every morning a host of disparagement of Mr. MULLIN. It lasts all day, and is strongest in the late afternoon. It rolls north, and is met by a similar wave from that direction. Mr. MULLIN does not run his road to suit the people of Connecticut. In midsummer, after people had committed themselves to their summer plans and gone as planned, counting on stated trains as advertised to bring them back and forth, Mr. MULLIN says travel is light, and takes a lot of his trains off. That was bad, directly and indirectly. Indirectly, because the trains that are left, being overloaded, cannot make schedule time, and no traveler by them hopes any more to make the connections the time-table suggests. Accordingly, all Connecticut and a corner of New York are hopping mad. And not without reason. No doubt President MULLIN had reasons that seemed to him good for running his road so much to the inconvenience of his patrons, but, whatever they were, even he must have cause to doubt the expediency of that course.

The proposition to tie up the yellow journals during the prospective visit to this country of the Archbishop of Canterbury naturally meets with much favor, but is not a practicable suggestion. No Archbishop of Canterbury has ever before honored us with his illustrious presence, and of course we want to make the best impression possible upon the mind of such a visitor. But it should be an honest impression. He must see us as we are rather than as we would wish to be, and our yellow journals are a part of us. They are better than they were; that is one comfort; and another is that his Grace will make his longest stay in this country in our city of Boston, which, in appearance and perhaps even in fact, is the most glibly and respectable of all our big towns. We are very glad he is to visit in Boston. He arrives in New York about August 27, goes immediately to Canada to visit Lord Minto, thence to the coast of Maine to stay with personal friends; thence to visit President ROOSEVELT; thence to New York, and possibly to St. Louis, to Boston on October 4, and after the Episcopal convention there to New York to take ship for home on October 14. So the last deep inspection made on his mind will be made by Boston, that civilized town, where his host will be the Bishop of Massachusetts. We believe the Archbishop will have a good time. He will be the most distinguished visitor whom our World's-Fair year will bring us.

This is interesting news that comes to us from Washington, according to which the National Board for the Promotion of Rifle Practice, acting under the authority of the War Department, has adopted a plan for the formation of a huge national reserve of qualified marksmen. All members of the National Rifle Association and of affiliated organizations are eligible to enter the reserve, provided they can satisfy the tests of marksmanship. The only conditions are that the applicants for membership must be citizens between the ages of eighteen and forty-five, and that they must use the United States magazine rifle, or a rifle inspected and stamped by the National Rifle Association, together with the United States Service ammunition, or private makes that come within the official rules. The board expresses the belief that, by the plan proposed, the United States within a few years will possess more than a million of men who, for practical purposes on the line of battle, will answer nearly all the requirements of the most efficient soldiers in the world. The report points out that as our permanent military establishment, or regular army, is now, and will continue to be, small, we should be obliged, in the event of a war with a first-class power, to depend mainly upon the militia and on volunteers for our fighting force. To this end it is especially desirable to bring about an effective use of firearms by the younger element of our population, because by far the larger part of an army in the field is certain to be made up of very young men. The board, consequently, would encourage rifle practice, not only in the militia of the several States, but in military and other schools, so that a large fraction of boys over fifteen years of age might become expert rifle-shots. The example of the Boer war was not lost upon Japan, and it should not be lost upon ourselves. About all that could be said for the Boer farmers, considered as soldiers, was that they were, almost to a man, good marksmen. Their responsive aptitudes, like that which the Japanese are now exhibiting, was, of course, obtainable only by practice.

The following interesting facsimile of Judge PARKER's famous telegram is printed by courtesy of the New York Herald:

Hon Wm F Steadman
 Natl Jefferson
 I regard the Gold Standard as firmly and inviolably established and I shall act accordingly if the action of the Convention to day should be ratified by the people. In the platform is silent on the subject my view should be made known to the Convention and if it proves to be in-satisfactory to the majority of the members I feel free to decline the nomination for me at once. So that another may be nominated before adjournment.
 Nelson R. Parker
 7-5-1894

Mr. Roosevelt's Speech of Acceptance

At Oyster Bay on July 27, Mr. ROOSEVELT was notified of his nomination by the Republican party for the Presidency of the United States by Speaker CANNON, chairman of the committee appointed for the purpose by the Chicago convention. The speech in which the nomination was accepted has attracted relatively little attention, because it is generally believed that the platform adopted at Chicago had practically been dictated in advance by the nominee. There was nothing left, therefore, for Mr. ROOSEVELT to do except to repeat himself, and, at the same time, to allay, if possible, the misgivings of those who have imputed to him an arbitrary disposition, and an impulsive, aggressive personality. When he says that he and the party of which he is the standard-bearer come before the people content to be judged by their record of achievement, he does not maintain the position taken by ex-Secretary BLAIR in the speech addressed to the Chicago convention, and subsequently defined at length in the Republican platform. When, however, Mr. ROOSEVELT claims for himself the political record of his party during the last seven years, it is at least open to question on the part of his opponents whether there has been a continuity of policy during the four years of the McKinley administration, and also during the three years of Mr. ROOSEVELT's tenure of the Presidency, is a question extremely desirable in the matter of tariff revision, and in the matter of turning to account the reciprocity clauses of the Dingley act? All that Mr. ROOSEVELT now deems it expedient to say touching the expediency of tariff revision is that "whenever the need arises there should be a re-adjustment of the tariff schedules"; but he hastens to add that "such changes can with safety be made only by those whose devotion to the principle of a protective tariff is beyond question." The utterance is, of course, only an echo of the dilatory and insincere assurance inserted by the standard-bearer in the Chicago platform. We need also say Mr. ROOSEVELT's wish to state fairly the position taken by his predecessor, when he says that "we believe in reciprocity with foreign nations on the terms outlined in President McKinley's last speech, which urged the extension of our foreign markets by reciprocal agreements, whenever they could be made without injury to American industry and labor." Apparently the President has forgotten the terms of Mr. McKinley's last speech at Buffalo. Twenty months ago he was himself alive to the fact that the reciprocity advocated by Mr. McKinley was the reciprocity of the absolutely free market, and that would meet with the approval of the "stand-patter." Declaring in his second annual message (December 2, 1902) that the adoption of reciprocity treaties was greatly to be desired, Mr. ROOSEVELT pointed out that, while, on the one hand, such international agreements would widen our markets, and open larger fields to the activities of our producers, they would secure, on the other hand, a practical lowering of duties when there was no longer needed for protection in our home markets, "or when the minimum of duty can be disregarded for the sake of the maximum of good accomplished." Evidently Mr. ROOSEVELT took for granted twenty months ago that reciprocity might cause incalculable damage to certain industries, while benefiting others, the expediency of a particular reciprocity treaty being determined by the question, on the whole, if promised profit to the American community. There is, virtually, no such thing obtainable as a reciprocity treaty by which one of the parties would have everything to gain and nothing to lose.

When Mr. ROOSEVELT asserts of himself and of his party that they know their own minds, and mean the same thing from year to year, it is obvious that neither he nor his party agree the same thing to-day with reference to tariff revision that they would have meant had Mr. McKinley lived to carry out the fiscal changes recommended by him at Buffalo. It is also a matter of history that the Republican party required a great many years to become converted to the gold standard: that Mr. McKinley himself was a bimetalist up to the meeting of the convention by which he was nominated for the Presidency, and that it was against his personal wishes that the gold plank was inserted in that convention's platform. As it was, the convention justified itself by an insouciant profession of a desire to bring about "international bimetalism." It is as preposterous for Mr. ROOSEVELT to credit the Republican party with a national and consistent monetary policy during the last quarter of a century as it would be to impute the panic of 1893 to the Wilson-Gorman tariff, which was not enacted until the following year.

Mr. ROOSEVELT's reference to the behavior called for the clean sweep which we expected of him. He says that "we conducted the negotiations for its construction with the nicest and most scrupulous honor, and in a spirit of the largest generosity towards those through whose territory it was to run." The President does not explain whether it was the negotiation with the Bogota government, or that with the Republic of Panama—towards which we served as foster-parent when we prohibited the suppression of it by a usurper—in which we displayed the "nicest and most scrupulous honor." It is certain that few Colombians regard as "scrupulous" our construction of the Treaty of 1846. But to this we attach little importance, in view of the fact, as we happen to know, that the President stood ready at any time to grant suitable compensation to Colombia for the loss of territory which by her at least was deemed extremely valuable. We add that, when we call to mind the approval of the canal treaty, expressed by the Democratic majority of the House of Representatives, and by almost half of the Democratic Senators, notwithstanding Mr. KIDDER's attempt to secure the adoption of a different course, we can see no ground for Mr. ROOSEVELT's assertion that it would be unwise to entreat the construction of the interoceanic railway to "those who have endeavored to defeat the whole undertaking."

The President's reference to the treatment of the Philippine problem by the Republican party is felicitous; and it might also be accounted reasonable in substance, if we could overlook the dangerous effect upon American citizens at home of accepting definitely the doctrine contained by far out of the same judges of the United States Supreme Court, that the Constitution does not follow the flag. It was Mr. OLNEY who, in his latest speech, pointed out how fatal a solvent of our traditional conceptions of liberty and of the relation of governments to the governed the doctrine propounded in the insular cases may prove. Were we to waive for the moment that fundamental question, we should not be prepared to dispute Mr. ROOSEVELT's assertion that suddenly to withdraw our government from the Philippine archipelago at this time would mean to the average native the loss of all even such civil freedom as we have conceded to him. The also which Governor TAYLOR undoubtedly kept in view was neatly stated by the President, when the latter said that "we have established in the islands a government by Americans assisted by Filipinos. We are steadily striving to transform this into self-government by the Filipinos assisted by Americans."

Does Mr. Bryan Mean to be Mischievous?

THERE have been times when we have regarded Mr. WILLIAM J. BRYAN as an honest politician. We have been inclined to see and then to credit him with a sincerity carried to inconvenient excess. We have seen in him a fanatic rather than a hypocrite and a trickster. We have, therefore, described his influence as mischievous rather than malicious or malignant. On more than one occasion in the past he has been obviously a mischievous man, but it was by no means equally clear that he meant to be mischievous. In view, however, of one of the statements issued by him at Lincoln, Nebraska—a statement purporting to explain why he should support PARKER and DAYTON—it is scarcely possible any longer to acquit Mr. WILLIAM J. BRYAN of a deliberate design to injure the Democratic cause. He begins, indeed, with a show of good feeling, by setting forth four reasons for denoting the Democratic ticket superior to the Republican. It will be observed that three of these so-called reasons are sham reasons, because they do not refer to matters in which the American people seem deeply concerned at this time. Mr. BRYAN alludes, for instance, the Democratic declaration in favor of reducing the standing army. He comments, also, the proclamation against the retention under the American flag of transatlantic dependencies in the status of colonies. He asserts, in the third place, that the platform and program of the Democratic stand for peace and arbitration, as against blood, force, and conquest, provided in the Republican standard-bearer.

Now it must be obvious to Mr. BRYAN, as it is to any keen-sighted man, that, with reference to none of these three matters are party lines sharply drawn, and that none of them is likely to figure in the foreground of the campaign. As regards, on the other hand, the question of the race issue into American politics by the Republican platform-makers, this would, undoubtedly, be recognized as of vital importance, if the Republican party was believed heartily to approve of the adoption at Chicago of a Force bill plank. That some of the longest heads in the St. Louis convention doubted whether the race issue was likely to play a great part in the campaign now begun is evident from the fact that no allusion to it was contained in the relatively compact, coherent, and well-considered platform reported by the subcommittee to the full committee on resolutions. The subcommittee evidently thought that the contest would turn mainly on the question of tariff revision; provided, of course, the attitude of the Democratic party toward the gold standard, on the one hand, and toward the trusts on the other, should be definite and satisfactory.

So far as the tariff is concerned, Mr. BRYAN intimates a suspicion that Judge PARKER, while he would have placed himself willingly on the conservative ground taken by the subcommittee with respect to tariff revision, will fail to net upon the sweeping declaration which Mr. BRYAN persuaded the full committee to make—the declaration, namely, that protection is not the deduction intended to be drawn from the principle thus roundly asserted being, of course, that no money or consideration need be given to robbers and receivers of stolen goods. Mr. BRYAN, however, in the statement under review, admits that "some little" progress toward tariff revision might be hoped for in the event of Democratic success. On the other hand, he renewed harsh criticism concerning the letter that the laboring men is likely to drive from Judge PARKER's election. He points out that, in the platform framed by the subcommittee at St. Louis, the full committee on resolutions insisted on inserting planks in favor of an abridgment of an eight-hour day, against government by injunction, and against the treatment of the Colorado miners by the Executive of that State. Mr. BRYAN indicates that if Judge PARKER, in his speech of acceptance, should be silent or ambiguous on any of these subjects, the inference would be justified that the financial influences back of him would not permit him to take the working-man's side in controversies between capital and labor.

We came to the position taken with relation to the trials in the St. Louis platform as this was ultimately reconstructed by the full committee. The position is deemed by Mr. BRYAN much more commendable than that which was adopted at Chicago. He has in mind, no doubt, the demand inserted in his declaration for a rigorous enforcement of criminal, as well as civil, statutes or parts of statutes applied violations of the Anti-Trust Act. He surely knows, however, that the anti-trust plank eventually fashioned at St. Louis was virtually nullified by the nomination of Judge PARKER, also, as we are told by the Nebraskaan, need not be expected to pursue a different course from that followed by President ROOSEVELT, unless, indeed, he should counsel himself, in his speech of acceptance, to drastic anti-trust legislation. But the many questioners, Mr. BRYAN warns Free-soil Democrats that nothing can be hoped for from Judge PARKER. If the latter, as President, should not go as far as the Republicans would, to gratify the "Wall Street element," it would only be, says Mr. BRYAN, because he would be influenced by the Democrats in the House and Senate.

If, in the Lincoln statement now before us, Mr. WILLIAM F. BRYAN had confined himself to discussing the difficulty of reconciling a platform framed largely by himself with the supposed views and wishes of a conservative florentine, the expediency and value of such "support" might have been questioned, but the Nebraskaan might have escaped the accusation of misbehavior. It is hard, however, to discern anything except spite and malice in his denunciation of the method alleged to have been pursued to procure Judge PARKER's candidacy—a method which Judge PARKER himself is taxed with countenancing—as "a plain and deliberate attempt to deceive the party." Mr. BRYAN evidently views with rage, instead of admiration, the early message sent by Judge PARKER to the St. Louis convention in the forenoon of Saturday, July 1. This is what the Nebraskaan has to say about that upright and straightforward act: "After six [Judge PARKER] had secured the nomination, he injected his views upon the subject [the gold standard] at a time when he could not be taken from the ticket without great demoralization." Mr. BRYAN's conclusion is that "the nomination was secured by crooked and indefensible methods." He is felix avaritior. By denouncing Judge PARKER's course in regard to the gold standard as "crooked," Mr. BRYAN has revealed himself in his true colors. Under the lion of the robe of the reformer and the philanthropist he has disclosed the chosen fiend. He is the prey of evil and base passions. In imputing spite, sinuous, and despicable methods to Judge PARKER, the Nebraskaan has proved himself a vindictive, venomous, treacherous man.

Venezuela Again, and the Germans

Time will show whether President URBANO CASTRO is the Napoleon or the Bonaparte of Venezuela. He has shown qualities suggestive of both. The New York and Bernardino Asaph Company has been in hot water with the government of Venezuela ever since it obtained its first concession on Lake Fribol. President CASTRO has given advice through his ministers that he intends to bring suit against this company for fifty million bolívares—that is, $10,000,000—on the ground that the company was an active participant of General MARIAS in the revolution of 1902 and 1903; that the defeat and extinction of this revolution cost the Venezuelan government an immense sum, and that this sum was increased by fifty million bolívares as a result of the aid rendered to the revolutionists and President MARIAS by the Asaph Company. But what use do the Germans make counts and their relation to the Executive, we cannot but sympathize with the company. It is further alleged that President CASTRO's government has failed to carry out its undertaking to set aside one-third of the customs in order to pay the sums awarded by the Hague Court, and Venezuela is once more threatened with the separation of Trinidad, Venezuela, and Guayana from Trinidad that the British minister at Caracas has entered a strong protest on behalf of the English bondholders against the seizure of the asphalt land at Guayana, so that all appeared point to a reversal of just diplomatically pressure on Venezuela by Germany and England at the present time.

The Recrudescence of Nihilism

The assassination of Minister von PLATKE, following so closely on the heels of that of General Bismarck, recalls the days of the great Terrorist conspiracy which culminated in the assassination of ALEXANDER II. There is an evident relation between war and revolution in Russia. Immediately after the Napoleonic wars, which had a profound effect on the life of Russia, revolting as they did not only the invasion, the burning of the Kremlin and Moscow, and the calamitous retreat of the French army, but the return tide, which carried the Cossacks to the banks of the Neva, came a revolutionary period in Russia which culminated in the December outbreak so vividly indicated in Tolstoy's great novel War and Peace. In the same way, the Crimean war was followed almost without interval by a period of moral and social revolution, the most remarkable event of which was the emancipation of the serfs in 1861, two years before LINCOLN's famous proclamation. But the freeing of the serfs was only one of many reforms which broke up the old order, and introduced the new. The whole field of education was similarly affected, the doors of the schools and colleges being thrown wide open to classes that had never hitherto profited by them, and eventually to the sons of the emancipated serfs. The education of women also entered on a more liberal phase than ever before in the Russian Empire, and the new woman made her appearance in the land of the Czar.

A new fermentation of Russian society began to take place about the time that the Slavophile dependencies of Turkey were preparing to make a new fight for freedom. Speculative nihilism, which was a scholastic rather than a political creed, had long been at work. HETZLER had carried on a vigorous and abundantly gifted propaganda from Geneva, where a radical press had for some time flourished. BAKUNIN, the father of speculative anarchism, had been building up the great revolutionary society called the International, which WILLIAM BLAKE has painted in Maxims. In Russia itself a like propaganda had been carried on, especially in the universities, and the wonderful writings of life, as in spirit books like Utopia and Rousseau and influenced much more of TURKOVICH's work, were everywhere felt. At that time the other great Russian, TOLSTOY, was wrestling with the darkest and most complete divisions of materialism, having broken loose from the national tradition of religion, but having not yet reached any first standing ground in behalf of his own. All these new elements of moral fermenting and dislocation, and the crowds of educated and penurious men and women poured forth year after year by the universities, formed a fruitful soil in which the seeds of revolutionary ideas might germinate. It is worth noting that the colonies of TURKOVICH's disciples tried in vain to practice receiving the ideas which inspired TURKOVICH's Utopia and thus showing the solidarity of the different movements of new thought in Russia, a solidarity generally unrecognized by these movements themselves.

But the fermentation which was working in the life of Russia was not confined to speculative words and idealist theories. There was a strong and defined revolt against the forms and, even more, the abuses of authority. The Terrorist movement sprang into being, almost in a day, as the result of the assassination of a high official by a certain YEN ZAMOTCHIK, who sought to avenge what he believed to be the unjust condemnation of a Russian student. She scurped across the frontier, and, with LAUREN, became one of the moving spirits of the Russian Revolutionary Committee, to which so many political associations are to be traced. It is probable that much of the fever of the Nihilist and Terrorist movements was disquieted by the Russo-Turkish war of 1877-78. But certain of the leading spirits had gone too far to retreat, and, three years after the Treaty of San Stefano was signed, the great conspiracy reached its culmination. NIKOLAI has made us familiar with the progress of this conspiracy, with its details, with the scientific composition of nitroglycerin and construction of bombs; DIMITRI LINSKOE, the "saint" of the movement, as the writer of End-of-the-world Russia calls him; with SOFIE PERMYATOVA, the fanatic and enthusiast, who gave the signal along the Ekaterine Canal on the fatal morning when ALEXANDER II, liberator of the Russian serfs, liberator of the Bohemian Nationalities, and prospective founder of Russian constitutionalism, fell a victim to a fatal and remorseless group of conspirators. That era had the darkest outlook of the millennium of the nineteenth century, and it is worth recalling that the unravelling of this widespread and destructive conspiracy was the work which made the name and fame of Minister von PLATKE.

The Terrorist outbreaks under ALEXANDER III. were not very important. There were a few attempts on his life, like that of SOFIE PERMYATOVA, who, like so many of the Terrorists, including JEROME HILFMAN and GILBERT WILSON, was a Jew by birth; but the wide-spread infirmation was no longer there. Now, however, under NICHOLAS II., we have something very like the conditions prevailing at the beginning of the eighties, or, even more, during the year of the Russo-Turkish war. A wide and far-reaching view enables us to see in this seething fermentation, this feverish inflammation, a new stage in the development of Russian life, holding the promise of many great and wonderful developments, of rich harvests for the future. Russia seems to grow in this way, sloughing off old coats of skin through a combination of war and revolution, just as England grew through the chaotic upheavals of the wars of the Roses, the way of the commonwealth, the decisive wars, and the struggle with Napoleon, which narrowly missed the accompaniment of a revolution at home. The symptoms of Russia's growth may appear alarming, yet from a wide view they are only such as most companies, and always have accompanied, the development of a strong and robust nation.

News from Latin America

PRESIDENT ROBERTO AYALA in his recent message to the Brazilian Congress calls attention to the important works that have been begun in the city and port of Rio de Janeiro for the purpose of improving their sanitary condition. We are justified in expecting very satisfactory results—even that Rio may become a healthful place—since the great Rio city, Buenos Ayres, has shown what it is possible to accomplish in this way. At the opening of the National Congress of the Argentine Republic President Roca said that the death rate of Buenos Ayres for the past two years has been only sixteen per thousand. And nearer home also, at Port Limón, Costa Rica, the local authorities are undertaking certain reforms in the interest of travellers from the Panama Canal region, who must pass through Port Limón on their way to the nearest health resort. Within a moderate distance from the canal zone (only fourteen or fifteen hours by boat and railway from Colon, and Port Limón) is the plateau of Cartago, in Costa Rica, which has a pure, dry atmosphere, the temperature ranging from 75° F. in the hottest part of summer to 20° F. in the coldest winter night. This region, at an elevation of 4500 feet, is said to be entirely free from yellow fever and malaria; and certainly has local supplies of good food and pure drinking water, besides the well known mineral springs. "Of great value," writes an American engineer long acquainted with that country, "for the cure of diseases incident to the canal zone"; in brief, "an ideal place for sick and debilitated workers from the isthmus." We might mention other indications of a new purpose that is active in many parts of Latin America—the endeavor to make the ports and chief cities fairly salubrious.

It seems proper to refer to these welcome signs when making our comment upon the announcement that some of the leading men of the North American countries before the Congress are advocating the reconstruction of a canal, described by the British minister to the United States as "connecting the head of navigation in the [southern] tributaries of the Amazon with the head of navigation in the tributaries of the Rio de la Plata, thus making all water inland communication through the heart of the continent from Venezuela on the north to Buenos Ayres on the south." Details of the plans for such a canal, though they may have been formed in Brazil and Bolivia, have not yet been made known in the United States; but the new Corporación Intercontinental (vol. xiv), which has just been issued, shows that in the vast central regions of South America the upper courses of great rivers lie side by side, approaching each other so nearly at many points that they furnish a number of almost continuous waterways between the northwest and southeast; and that therefore the reclamation of fertile territory several millions of square miles in extent waits upon the linking together of the navigable rivers and perfecting the mode of transportation in respect to which South America, above the Tropic of Capricorn, can be made to excel all other inland regions of either hemisphere.

These lines of new canals seem to us to be interesting in the highest sense. It is a pity that subjects of this class do not receive more attention from our people, and the petty squabbles of the Latin American politicians less. The latter are the incidents of a wretched transitional period: the former suggest the future development of the Andean and Antillean continents by means of immigration. For a fact worth thinking about is this: When the tropical cities and parts shall be made more habitable, when the tropical inland districts of South America shall be made accessible, then the South and Central American countries will secure all the European immigrants (and, for that matter, all the North American capitalists) they need. But it is self-evident that additions to the wealth-producing, contract-obscuring element must be made continually until the new element is numerically strong enough to give a new character altogether to the industries and politics of the present population of the most backward among those southern republics.

Temperamental Unhappiness

THAT there are many artificial means to happiness none would deny; culture, health, work, affection, hith all tend toward a cheerful frame of mind. But also a certain genial acquiescence in one's own insignificant place a long way toward the making of content.

There is a very suggestive engraving of WILLIAM BLAKE's, entitled "I Went." In it, upon a little bit of level land, jutting into the sea, stands a speck of a man at the foot of a ladder. The ladder reaches up higher than the distant hills, beyond a crescent moon, and descends into a faint line among the stars. The man, with one foot on the lowest round, grasps the ladder with both hands and looks up, while two other specks of mortality, a man and a woman, with arms linked together and their backs turned to the ladder, seem to be wandering toward the rolling hills and peaceful ridges of the background. The way of the ladder, though it end in the stars, looks warlike, and perilous, and lonely. There is no suggestion of companionship or of resting-place. The toddlers with their running brooklets, the trees with their nesting-birds, even the highest rocky hills will seem to be lost from sight, and there will be only the solitary, monstrous climbing between two worlds.

The recent whimsical, petulant, noble-spirited, and wholly delightful letters of Mr. ROSSINI in the Athletic Monthly have been quite full of the services of the stars who influenced his ladder against the stars. "I am tormented," he writes, "by what I cannot get said or done. I want to get all the TITIAN, TURNERS, PAUL VERONESE, TURNERS, and Sir JOSHUA in the world into one great free-freed, Gothic gallery of marble and serpentine. I want to get them all perfectly engraved. I want to go and draw all the subjects of TURNER'S 1800 sketches in Switzerland and Italy, elaborated by myself. I want to get everybody a dinner who hasn't one. I want to manufacture some new roads to heaven with broken birds' heads; and I want to hang up some known old of the way, not that I've any dislike of them, but I think it would be wholesome for them and for other people, and that they would make good crow's' meat. I want to play all day long and arrange my cabinet with new white wood. I want something to amuse me when I am tired. I want TURNER'S pictures not to fade. I want to be able to draw clouds and to understand how they go—and I can't make them stand still nor understand them—they all go sideways. Further, I want to make the Italians industrious, the Americans quiet, the Saxons romantic, the Roman Catholics rational, and the English Parliament loyal—and I can't do anything, and I don't understand why I am less."

We all more or less know the difficulty of allowing the Creator to run the rhumb his own way. We have all more or less wistfully questioned why we were born, since with all the desire in the world to reform the universe, the most we can do is to order some household, to add to some little child's happiness, or nurse a neighbor. Haring a hall-dance great reformers, three poets, one or two discoverers, no one man's achievement amounts to much. The mills of God grind slow; the machinery is enormous; too big for any human eyes to see in its entirety; each man is but a peg or a screw in the right place. To live cheerfully on the face of the planet requires many virtues and insight enough to know one's place and accept it. Not in the least in the spirit of CARLYLE, who responded sarcastically to MARGARET FULLER's exhortation "I accept the universe," with "God! she'd better!" but in KUBLER's:

For to admire and for to see,

For to behold this world so wide.

The last is, mortals are put under a discipline of accomplishment by doing small things faithfully. BLAKE did not elaborate TURNER'S 1800 sketches, but by dint of patient and reiterated talking and writing about TURNER, by pointing out and explaining his excellencies he taught masses of blind people to see what otherwise had been hid from them. No one man reforms the prison system, but each man who takes it seriously to heart affects somebody else and prepares a soil into which a seed may some day drop.

The finest achievements are compact of patience, fidelity, tolerance with some stray gleams of intelligence, insight, or genius added. To cry for the Pleiades and listen to the clamor of disciplined desires paralyzes the will, and a more cheerful occupation is to be busy laying the blocks that are at hand. The great astronomer is not the man who sits on a hill with a telescope and yawns for the stars; he is concerned with minute and detailed calculations on a slip of paper. Even BLAKE's little mortal will not be able to skip a rung of his ladder. He will have to keep his eyes fixed steadily one step ahead and no more, up round by round, or he will grow giddy and fall. He must give his brain and talent account of his losses. For the ascent to the stars is a difficult journey, and it is pleasant to reflect that TURNER, with his ladder balanced against the stars, had from time to time a human word of sympathy upon the incommensurate proportions of our desires and achievements.

THOMAS TAGGART, CHAIRMAN-ELECT OF THE DEMOCRATIC NATIONAL COMMITTEE

Thomas Taggart, who was elected chairman of the Democratic National Committee at a meeting of the committee at the Hoffman House, New York, on July 26, has been active in political affairs for almost twenty years. He was elected Auditor of Marion County, Indiana, in 1880, and re-elected four years later. In 1895 he was elected Mayor of Indianapolis, and was re-elected in 1897 and 1899. Mr. Taggart has been a member of the Democratic National Committee since 1892.

The Autos lined up for the Start opposite the Automobile Club

Photograph of the Start taken from the Automobile Club, Fifth Avenue and Fifty-eighth Street

THE START OF THE AUTOMOBILE RUN FROM NEW YORK TO THE ST. LOUIS FAIR

The start of the New York contingent of the automobile delegations on the run from New York to the St. Louis Fair was made from the club house of the Automobile Club of America, at Fifty-eighth Street and Fifth Avenue, on July 25. Fifteen machines were in line at the start, and half a dozen others joined this lot. The distance to be covered on the tour is 1,125 miles, and the trip will take about fifteen days. One of the contestants, Mr. F. A. La Roche, has announced that he will make the attempt to cover the entire distance without stopping the engine of his machine.

Photographs by Foxhall

Mr. Stuart Dunson's "Hasty Queen," Winner in Class 5 (Heavy Harness Horses)

Winners in Class 8 (Pair of Carriage Horses exceeding 12.5 Hands)—Mr. Stuart Dunson's "Roadster" and "Atlas"

Spectators watching the Saddle Horse Class

SCENES AT THE OPENING OF THE ELEVENTH ANNUAL HORSE SHOW OF THE MONMOUTH COUNTY ASSOCIATION AT LONG BRANCH, NEW JERSEY

The photographs are snapshots of scenes at the opening of the Eleventh Annual Horse Show of the Monmouth County Association at Long Branch on July 27. Among the prominent exhibitors who entered horses in the different classes were Mrs. John Gresham, Mrs. E. R. Ledner, Mr. Irving Rodman, and Mr. Stuart Dunson. The feature of the opening day was the exhibit in the roundabout class. Other classes in which interesting exhibits were shown on other days of the show were the Harness Pony, Tandem, Saddle Pony, and Hunter classes. These annual horse shows at Long Branch are among the most brilliant of the year.

Photographs by Fredrick

a banquet and say so. Incidentally, Paterno promised that he would look over the speeches and see that there would not be left in them the least possible particle of anything that General MacArthur and Judge Taft and the commissioners and generals might object to hearing. I suppose when it was all arranged they wrote to Aguinaldo about it, or to the Hongkong Junta, and received courteous replies in reply, because otherwise it is hard to account for the way it all turned out. Paterno was not a fool.

The Speeches that were never Read

On the afternoon of the banquet a newspaper reporter came into Paterno's office, saying that he had come directly from Paterno's house, and produced copies of the speeches bearing the "O.K." of that astute intermediary. They are now in the archives of the secret service in the Philippines. They had things in them about "independence now on the field of battle," of "glory for both the Filipinos and the Americans who had died in the combat," and the last one, which was Paterno's own speech, ended with a toast to Aguinaldo and to Mr. McKinley. Paterno took these words in to Mr. Taft. The dinner party was eliminated, and fluttering secretaries stood by a great and hushed speech. The expression of it was a letter to Paterno declining to attend the banquet; this was to accompany one from General MacArthur forbidding the speeches, of which he dictated paragraphs between sessions of the sole council which made even Paterno cautious. I delivered this to Paterno just as he was about to enter the banquet. He has never been quite the same man since.

Arguella's Warning

It was through my letters that Taft came to know the Filipino and how to treat him, and the Filipino to know, to wonder, to hesitate, and finally almost to worship. One of the first and certainly one of the most steadfast of his admirers was Manuel Arguella. He had been a colonel in the insurgent army and was one of the commissioners appointed by Aguinaldo to go to General Taft to see if a check could be averted which seemed so threatening in January, 1900. As this commission acted on the assumption that they were our recognized allies and had in some mysterious way been promised that when we had driven out the Spaniards we would come out and turn the country over to them, nothing came of the mission, unless it was that the insurgents opened fire on our troops a few days earlier than they had intended to.

When Aguinaldo had lost most of his army and much of his self-confidence he sent Arguella on smaller commissions, through the lines to Manila to ask for a respite to talk things over. General Taft had learned a message thirty years before from the great soldier who taught them all, and he sent back something like "unconditional surrender." The alleged Philippine government was not far from its primitive and romantic though uncomfortable days when leaders of the people were not treated well. Arguella was dragged around the valley of Luzon until London caught up with and smashed the tail of Aguinaldo's army in retreat. When Arguella was found in the ruins, paroled, and brought to Manila to tell his story. He was given a small position under General Taft and transferred to the commission as soon as it arrived. One day a letter came through the post addressed in pencil to "Mr. Gen'l Taft." It read like an excerpt from the immortal Nicholas Carter literature: "Be ware, Mr. Taft, all you say, all you do, is known to Aguinaldo. You have an enemy close to you who tells." It was written in English, Filipino English, and unsigned. There seemed to me to be lots of color in it, and it quite took the breath out of Arguella when I showed it to him for, of course, he looked upon it as referring to him, but I doubt if Judge Taft thought the matter of sufficient importance to be able to recall it. He said to throw it into the waste basket and to tell Arguella that that was the way we treated such things in America. I told this to Arguella and let him see me throw the letter into the waste basket. It was a great revelation. Later on he became some political campaign was at its height. Arguella underwent a contrition which was sent over the cable at the infinite risk of a hole cut in his back if news of its authorship should get back to Manila. It was the secret instructions of Aguinaldo to that insurgent commission, and it began: "While the United States has never promised us our independence," you will find in the speech with which Mr. Root opened the campaign of 1900 in Puerto Rico, Illinois, and you will find Arguella, about you can to look him up, pliantly translating Tagalog papers into English and learning the typewriter to do it the better, just as if he had never fought eight good-sized pieces of artillery against an American army. Taft did that with Arguella, and with a whole great race.

Taft and the Medals

It was the Presidential election agitation of 1900 which kept up the shooting and killing, and after it was over, the situation became so much better that in the spring the commission got into effect its local Civil Government bill. Governor Taft and his associates visited the capitals of all the provinces which were supposed to be in a proper condition to receive the benefits of the measure of self-government which that bill accorded, and the ladiness of personal contact with him did more to dispel the native idea that they were going back under a ruler similar to that of the Spaniards than anything else could have done. In one of the central provinces of Luzon there was an old native who, as a boy, had been a Spanish captain's valet and had learned French enough of Spanish and soldiering to become later a captain in Primo De Rivera's native volunteers, after which he was the most prominent citizen of his town. When the commission came to select a Governor he put on his old volunteer uniform, buried his Spanish sword, and pinned on his dress the badge of the Philippine Republic, which was a three-pointed star with a cross in the center, and a sword in the center. He wore a discolored collar, and a straw hat. Sometime afterwards a man of a good deal of importance visited that province, and, as the old native had become Governor, he went, at the head of the people, to meet him at the station. He wore white duck, a broad-brimmed straw hat, and instead of a sword, a walking stick. When he was asked what had become of the medals, he explained that it was "no longer the custom."

"Husling the East"

Some day a book will be written on the establishment of a civil government in the Philippines, and if it tells truly of the work it will be as interesting a story as Macaulay and O'Rourke told of the work of the English in India. The people of the United States who read it will be able to appreciate the work and trials and struggles and failures and successes of Mr. Taft during those first two years in Manila. They will see how, from the beginning, only a half dozen people believed that he could rear an edifice which would stand; how many things, people, and elements, fought to tear it down as he built it up inch by inch; how, now often then over, he was betrayed by his own people, and how little had enemy he found in quarters where he had a right to expect sympathy and aid. There was a time in the fall of 1900 when everything seemed at its worst. Mr. Taft was worn out and lay ill in the hospital, looking very white, and his friends were all about him, but he could not get up. The great question about the work he had done had ceased to be "was it right?"—he had solved that question; but "was it premature?" He was assailed on all sides by the propaganda that it was. He had certainly put in a real civil government more on the heels of an old and tried military government than any other man had done before, and this in the East where the years are as our Western days. I remember that he used to quote from his sick bed the words of a poem of Kipling:

The end of the fight was a tempestuous white,
With the music of the late December.
And the crimson death—'A foul fire here
Who tried to handle the East . . .

and to wonder if that would be so in his own case. When he became ill enough to go home the enemy which pursued him next relentlessly, the American press in Manila, advanced the theory that he had succumbed to the impossibility of the situation, and would not return. He gave out a statement from his bed that he would come back, and that his friends could hold it.

He redeemed the promise almost months later, although his doctors thought that it might kill him, and although he was offered a vacancy on the Supreme Court, which is his ideal ambition for himself. Perhaps some of all this will give rise to the question, as to the Philippines, I do not know. It was a remarkable situation, and it was well solved by a remarkable man.

Count Tolstoi on the War

By Charles Johnston

THE English mail brings the full text of Tolstoi's extraordinary discourse on the Russian Japanese war. One is struck, at the outset, by its difference in tone and purpose from the cabled summaries, which gave extracts of only one kind, and were therefore exceedingly misleading. Coming from London, these summaries not unreasonably confined themselves almost entirely to the attacks, very unparaphrasing and very varied, which Tolstoi makes on Russia, on its government and its church, and they left out, among other things, the equally severe things he has to say against the Japanese. This is not unusual, because what Tolstoi has to say about Russia is first-hand and certain, while what he has to say about Japan is hearsay. But the fact remains that Tolstoi had not at all in mind to write an attack on Russia, for the reason, if for no other, that he has done so a dozen times, and has said everything that can be said from his point of view.

His attacks on Russia, or, rather, the existing order of things in Russia, are certainly sufficiently scathing and drastic. Beginning with Nicholas II, he characterizes him thus: the Russian czar, the prince who exalted all the activities in the cause of peace, publicly announced that he would maintain all his efforts to maintain the peace so dear to his heart (efforts which express themselves in the seizure of other peoples' lands and in the strengthening of armies for the defense of these stolen lands). He, the prince, is the attack on the Japanese, commands that the same shall be done to the Japanese as they had conspired doing to the Russians—that they should be slaughtered; and in announcing this call to murder he mentions God, asking the divine blessing on the most dreadful crime in the world. The Japanese Emperor has proclaimed the same thing in relation to the Russians.

Again he speaks of the Russian Emperor as an adulterate, entangled young man, recognized as the leader of a hundred and thirty million people, continually deceived and enabled to conduct himself, who confidently thanks and blesses the troops when he calls his army to the slaughter in defense of lands which with not less right he calls his own. All present to each other hideous lies in which not only no one among the educated believes, but which uneducated peasants are beginning to abandon—all bow down to the ground before him, kiss him, and pronounce pompous and deceitful speeches in which no one really believes.

Toistol carls himself in invective, in a sentence like the following: all the ungodly, feverish, hot-headed, insane excitement which has now seized upon the upper ranks of Russian society, is merely the symptom of their recognition of the criminality of the work which is being done. All these insolent, amoral speeches about devotion to, and worship of, the monarch, about readiness to sacrifice life for one's king, for one's fatherland, for one's own (and not one's own); all these promises to defend with one's breast and which does not belong to one; all these eternal benedictions of each other with various banners and monstrous lies; all these Dei Gratias; all these preparations of blankets and bandages; all these detachments of nurses; all these contributions to the fleet, and to the Red Cross presented to the government whose direct duty is to exhibit it has the possibility of collecting from the people as much money as it likes; having declared war to organize the necessary fleet and necessary means for attending the wounded; all these National, pompous, senseless, and blasphemous prayers, the utterance of which is various; all these religious hymns, where; all this dreadful, deprecate newspaper verbiage, which, being universal, does not fear exposure; all this superstition and brutalization which has now taken hold of Russian society, and which is being transmitted by degree also to the masses; all this is only a symptom of the guilty consciousness of that dreadful act which is being accomplished.

Just one sentence more from this masterpiece of obfuscation: Men of science and of low, Monsieur Muraviev and Monsieur Stoukoff only try to prove that it is the recent call of all nations to universal peace and the present inclination to war, because of the seizure of other people's lands, there is no contradiction. Diplomats, in their refined French language, publish and read out circulars in which they circumstantially and diligently prove (though they know no one believes them) that, after all its efforts to establish relations in reality, after all its efforts to devote other countries, the Russian government has been compelled to have recourse to the only means for a rational solution of the question—to the murder of men. The same thing is written by Japanese diplomats, Scientists, historians, and philosophers, on their side, comparing the present with the past, deduct from these comparisons profound coincidences, and argue interminably about the laws of the movement of nations, about the relation between the yellow and white races, or about Buddhism and Christianity, and on the basis of these deductions and arguments justify the slaughter of those belonging to the yellow race by Christians; while in the same way the Japanese scientists and philosophers justify the slaughter of those of the white race by Buddhists, without concealing their joy, try to outdo each other, and, not hesitating at any falsehood, however impudent and transparent, prove in all possible ways that the Russians only are right and strong in every respect, and that all the Japanese are wrong and weak and had in every respect; and that all these are also bad who are inimical or may become inimical towards the Russians—the English, the Americans; and the same is pictured likewise by the Japanese and their supporters in relation to the Russians.

There is invective, obfuscation, vituperation as there is Jargon, as nothing so Junius. No such sweeping indictment has been written of any nation by its enemies in modern times, compared with it, Matthew Arnold's characterization of England's life: an upper class materialized; and middle class vulgarized; a lower class brutalized; is faint and pale. If one were to take sentences like these, and omit the short compensatory references to the Japanese, the whole thing is such a lank like a horse attack on the Russian government and church, and, as such, might be readily answered by a large section of the public, which holds similar views.

But there is such a thing as justice. And this view would be primarily unjust to Tolstoi himself, who wishes to attack, not at all the civil and religious state of Russia, but the materialism and atheism of the modern world, as they appear to him. His quarrel is not with Russia. His quarrel is with the modern world, with the ideals of the Sermonee upon the Mount, do we not like by them? Why do we continue to render evil for evil, to follow after the world, the flesh, and the devil? Why do we not seek pure and more of? Why do we not bring forth the good which we have, we, poor? Why, having the Light, do we prefer darkness rather than light? Why are the longanities of our hearts evil continually? Why do we lay up treasure upon earth, where rust and moth corrupt, and where thieves break through and steal? Why do we worship Mammon rather than God? Why do we bow down to the earthly and powerful, forgetting that blood are the poor in spirit, for theirs is the Kingdom of heaven? These are the questions that Tolstoi really has in mind; and we note the whole purpose of his message. If we take it to be merely an attack on the Cur's gotten world, a piece of academic nihilism. Tolstoi would have exactly the same kind of thing to say, and would say it with the same intense conviction, against the life of the average business man in New York, who lives in a state of war, not less fierce than that street Port Arthur, though a war of another kind. Let us consider, for a moment, Tolstoi's view of Russia, which is, with minor variations, the popular opinion, certainly, Russia is today. The Germans as a nation, the Austrians, the English, and most Americans think very much the same things about the Russian autonomy that Tolstoi thinks, and express themselves, though with less vehemence, in pretty much the same terms.

Tolstoi forgets, and the whole Russophile public forgets, that there is such a thing as historic development: that nations never consciously plan their growth, whether that growth be for good or for evil. It is the resultant of an infinite number of individual forces, no one of which is fully conscious; or, to drop scientific slang, history, whether of mankind or of nations, is made by the wants of men, and these wants are full of fancies, desires, loves and hates, darkness and fear, but rarely held a far off and clearly held purpose, but merely with quiet and conscious determination. The English did not set forth with determined intent to develop constitutional government, and the free individual. This was rather the result of generation after generation of robust and self-willing individuals, rubbing against each other, until all were polished into mutual tolerance. In just the same way, Russians did not say, "Let us make an obscure despotism!" and thereafter devise all kinds of perverse and tyrannical expedients. Nor could the Russians at the present moment say, "Let us make a model state, in which each man shall be enlightened in the cradle!" This does not happen in that way. There is an immense force of moral inertia to be reckoned with, and this Tolstoi in his reforming zeal wholly forgets, just as the ecclesiastical public opinion of Germany, England, and America forgets it, and so does great injustice to a people possessed of many and great virtues.

Tolstoi is, by temperament, an extreme individualist; a Trinitarian or Anglo-Saxon, firm in a Russian body. He has exactly the intensest sense of being always in the right, which Tolstoi has been reared his friend at the state, or which Luther had, when he declared, as tradition says he declared, that within twenty years there would be no Catholic Church. Humanity gains by such obstinate assertions of their own individualism; and Russia will gain much from Tolstoi. But when reading his fierce structures on the Russian state, we should remember that he has said equally crushing things, for instance, of Wagner, of Schopenhauer, of Schylin, and that he has done it all in the holy name of charity and toleration.

A recent Photograph of Count Tolstoi, taken at his Home in Russia

A POLITICAL DISCUSSION IN THE CUM

The drawing was made in the Cumberland Mountain region of Tennessee incident—an encounter between a politician from Whiteley County, Ga.

Illustration by George

Drawn by Fletcher C. Ransom

BERLAND MOUNTAINS OF TENNESSEE

seen by our artist, Mr. Fletcher C. Ransom, and pictures a recent trucky, and a local orator, with whose political views he disagrees

England and the Presidential Election

By Sydney Brooks

London, July 27, 1904

ENGLAND has more than one reason for being interested in the Presidential election. As the country that stands nearer to the United States in every way than any other nation, so the country that reckons a good understanding with America to be the foundation of her foreign policy, the personality and programme of the American Civil Executive are naturally matters that very nearly concern her. But there are some special reasons why English politicians should have watched the opening moves in the Presidential campaign with peculiar closeness. It was, of course, on the Democratic convention and its outcome that their attention was chiefly fixed. The Democrats had before them a problem exactly similar to one which confronts, and has for many years confronted, the English Liberals, and which may also before long have to be faced by the English Conservatives. The Democrats had to get rid of free silver; the Liberals for ten years and more have been striving to get rid of home rule; the Conservatives decide hence may be trying every possible expedient to wipe protection from their slate. There was, therefore, an unusual eagerness to see whether the Democrats would succeed in extricating themselves from the mazes of Bryanism and how far their success or failure would throw light on English conditions.

I wonder whether Americans themselves quite realize how great a political miracle was performed at St. Louis and how enormously the convention system has justified itself. For what was its outcome? It was this, that a party repudiated one, what was the same thing, silently agreed the measure that eight years ago raised the delicious riddle of all but a section, and that four years ago were again firmly inscribed on its banners. That is an achievement, I believe, to be unique in the history of the party. As a rule, the most difficult of all operations in politics, as in warfare, is a retreat. To ask a party to erase a policy that has once been incorporated in its programme is to ask what is nearly impossible. A measure once accepted, once made the battle cry of a party, acquires by that fact alone an unusual longevity. It is not the case of political parties to come out in the open, recant, repent, and confess they have erred. In a moment of panic, rashness, or subservience a party pins itself to a certain policy. That policy is repudiated by the country, not once or by small majorities, but repeatedly and overwhelmingly. Even those who have subscribed to it realize its hopelessness, and confess among themselves that until the ungodlike cargo is dumped overboard they can never expect to make the haven of office. Nevertheless, the zeal of some, the half-heartedness, timidity, or sense of shame of others, and the vainglorious tenacity of the opposing party combine to prevent the sacrifice; and for a period altogether irrational in length the party continues to represent, and suffer by, a cause in which it has lost all faith, which it acknowledges to be fatal to success, and which it is yet deterred from discarding.

This has been conspicuously the case with the English Liberals in their relation to home rule. Home rule and free silver have played an almost identical part in the recent history of English and American politics. Neither measure was a natural outcome of the principles of the party that adopted it. In each case it was grafted on the party programme forcibly and at word of command. In each case it staggered and scandalized the average elector, led immediately to a party split, and was absolutely repudiated by the country. For a while the English Liberals, like the American Republicans, became a virtually national party—no conspicuously representative of the sound conservatism of the nation that no one but a few fanatics wished to see them turned out. The Spanish war and the Boer war strengthened their position. On each side of the Atlantic the Democrats and the Liberals proceeded at once to show that their foreign was no better than their domestic policy. In each party the same discussions appeared, due to the same causes, and expressing themselves in the same forms; and the political effectiveness of the English Liberals and the American Republicans, such as it was, was lost from being positive or inherent, became simply the reflex action of the blunders of their opponents.

A party so situated inevitably splits into two sections, the section prizes itself on recommending facts, realizes the folly of perpetually advertising policies to which the country is hostile, and endeavours to steer the party back to its old anchorage. The other section, from nervousness or conviction, or under pressure from a commanding and indisputable leader, or in obedience to the blessed principle of "party regularity," reaffirms the new programme, harries the country's hostility once again, and of course, is roundly beaten for its pains. Among the English Liberals these sections are roughly represented by Lord Rosebery, who is prepared to drop home rule, and by Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman, who will not lose sight of its significance. The Rosebery movement—an attempt at regeneration from within an effort of a great party to conquer, not its opponents, but itself—precisely corresponds to the movement of the conservative Democrats who set themselves to eliminate free silver; and the attitude of Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman towards that movement exactly duplicates the attitude of Mr. Bryan. It is true that the sudden irruption of the fiscal issue has forced home rule into the background, and made the Liberals once more a united party. Nevertheless, the Irish question is still just about as far as ever from being really settled, and when it again emerges it is to find the Liberals once more in hopeless disagreement as to how it should be treated. There is nothing in English politics that at all resembles an American convention. There is nobody qualified to speak for the party as a whole. There is, therefore, no way of discarding an issue that has once been raised or of rejecting a measure that has once been adopted. Tied to a home-rule platform the Liberals know that an electoral campaign fought out on that issue must go against them. But they have no means of freeing themselves from the entanglement. They can but wait till time or chance or the growth and predominance of some other questions obscures, overleaves, and finally kills it. Already for twenty years they have been immorally bound to the policy which Mr. Gladstone forced upon them; they may be just as surely bound to it for another twenty. It is, therefore, with a personal interest and an anxious anticipation that they have to find the American Democrats in the short space of eight years shaking themselves free from the grip of free silver.

Judge Parker's telegram raised in England something like enthusiasm, the more so as it emphasized wisdom and force in the vacillation of one of England's most trusted leaders. In Mr. Balfour we have a Prime Minister who says he is opposed to Mr. Chamberlain's policy, yet acts as though he were in favour of it; who declines to make his position on the greater issue of the day clear beyond possibility of doubt; who has so desperately enveloped his attitude in a mass of subtleties, sophistries, and equivocations that no one knows what that attitude really is; who is, in short, indulging in a species of peasant politics. The Roosevelt decisiveness of Judge Parker's telegram, the evidence it gave of being dictated by a man, and by a man with the shrewdness to see that in politics the bold game is always the paying game, provided the free-trader with a text from which they have fired off I know not how many sermons at Mr. Balfour's head. Apart from this Englishmen realize that, thanks to Judge Parker, the Democratic party is itself again, that the contest is not by any means going to be a walkover for Mr. Roosevelt, and that the Democrats, having conquered themselves, may really succeed in conquering their opponents. Such a prospect is far from dampening them.

Knowing Mr. Roosevelt and admiring him, they would prefer, on all personal grounds, to see him elected. But so long as the Republican party upholds protection and postpones reciprocity to the Greek Kalends, and so long as the Democrats foster tariff revision, it is the latter party that makes the greater appeal to British interests. With the idea of anti-imperialism that is observable in the Democratic platform Englishmen have no sympathy, and they regard the proposal to treat the Filipinos as the Cuban were treated as deplorable run mad. On this point they find more to approve in the Republican platform. On the other hand, Englishmen are anxious to have it understood that they and their country are not the friends of any one party in America, but of the United States as a whole. It has so happened that the new era of Anglo-American amity has coincided with Republican administration, and that the Democrats, partly for political and partly for traditional reasons, have more or less stood aside from the birth and growth of the improved relations that now detain between the two peoples. Englishmen are no less valued that inclination, necessity, and the plainest dictates of self-interest be in the future make Anglo-American friendship, if not Anglo-American cooperation, still more secure, that a Democratic victory in November has no terrors for them. On the contrary, they would welcome it. It would give them a chance of showing that English cordiality towards America is not confined to any one party, and at the same time by realizing the Democrats once more into intimate touch with the realities of international politics, it would satisfy them, as it has already satisfied the Republicans, that for the United States under present conditions there is no more to be gained from a world-power and anti-British in little short of an impossibility.

Memories

By Louise Morgan Sill

FIRST, dear, I loved you like the dawn,
A cool new love, discreet and pale,
A love that trembled like a fawn,
Full of shy fear lest love should fail.

Then came the noon-love like a flower
That glows in the embracing air
It flung its beauty to the hour
And passing, left a fra, -ance there.

And now 'tis sunset, and the merr
Is all bloom like blossoming trees...
And now my evening love is here,
Half sleeping with old memories.

Snap-shot of the Life-saving Drill on the Fair Grounds

The Liberty Bell being Exhibited on Parade through the Grounds

AT THE ST. LOUIS FAIR—SNAP-SHOTS OF SCENES ON THE EXPOSITION GROUNDS

The photographs are snap-shots taken recently at the St. Louis World's Fair, showing the life saving drill and the procession of the Liberty Bell. The managers of the Fair have arranged an elaborate programme of events for each day of the Fair. A recent programme for a day's events included a guard mount, a drill of sea-coast guns at Government Hill, an organ recital at Festival Hall, a parade on the Plaza St. Louis, and a meeting of the National American Carfare Association at Festival Hall.

Books and Bookmen

By James MacArthur

"NEVER chew your pills" was, I believe, a proverb which Mr. Spurgeon introduced in his once-popular series of common-sense sermons for the people, entitled John Ploughshares' Talks. A candid hearer adopts the proverb, and applies it to the northmen, the damp points, the ink-stained trade of life in one of his recent "Correspondence" letters in the British Weekly, with that astonishing of rare truth in the commonplace, which always characterizes his business interpretation of the facts of life. Particularly pertinent to writers and readers is the following: "Never chew the pill of a laborious and unengaged task. Men who are easy in circumstance are eminently wise in choosing early some great work on which to expend their energies. In the absence of compulsion the task must never be fulfilled, but even so it is pleasant to think about it, and pleasant to talk about it. These are those who win a reputation on the score of a huge addition they were to make some day to the literature of the world. George Tichener was a fortunate American—fortunate in many things—but never more fortunate than in his conception and execution of his History of Spanish Literature. That work gave his life significance and dignity. It brought him into the best company of the world; it gave him an unchallenged superiority to all the rest of his countrymen in our important field of knowledge. It is easy to see how it sweetened his whole existence. Even Prescott, in the face of his severe physical disabilities, found endless pleasure in the preparation of his history. But when the task is irksome and when it has to be accomplished in a given time, it is very necessary not to chew it. By this I mean that a man should give the due number of hours to the work each day, and then make the best of what time may remain. He should turn his thoughts and energies into other fields. If he fails to do this, if he eats, drinks, sleeps, talks, and walks his work, that work will not only become intolerable to himself, but will in all probability look fresh and life and reflect only too plainly the weariness of its creator. What signs of weariness there are in Sir Walter Scott's Letter to Napier. Yet he looked at it dispassionately; he did his best; he turned over conscientiously the volumes of the Minstrel, which are the saddest sight in Alfordshire, 'the great French gun that had the power of bestowing him.' What a change from the free, untrammelled conditions in which he had wrought before! Carlyle made life terrible for himself and other people, while he squandered in the valleys of the shadow of Frederick the Great. He insisted on those who lived with him descending to dark duties, and living there with him. Still Carlyle, though he chewed his pill, did swallow it at last. In one of his lately published epistles he says that the stupor he experienced was, he, the sure necessary he found it to get to work at once. No fewer chew your pills while work is waiting, but you and like the towns in The Golden Balthus, who were always putting off beginning their work of genius, and ended by doing nothing at all."

A bust of Carlyle, modelled by Mr. Percy Fitzgerald, a well-known London man of letters, has recently been placed in the Chelsea Town Hall. The following letter by Mr. Fitzgerald, printed in Mr. Shorter's Literary Letter in the Sphere, tells how he came to obtain the rare privilege of a sitting from the Sage of Chelsea, and also relates some pleasant incidents which throw a general glow about the great old philosopher.

"The likeness of Thomas Carlyle—whether pictorial or plastic—are but few indeed; perhaps none are wholly satisfactory to those who knew him. Both in the late Mr. Watts's picture and in Sir Edgar Boehm's seated figure on the Embankment there is too soft and gentle a touch. They make him a pliant, suffering sort of person, which he certainly was not. The grand ruggedness and uncompromising—above all, the grim smile—are lacking. I knew him well. I may say, and he was always kindly and indulgent to me. I wrote to him and he answered my letters. He never allowed me to dedicate an edition of Boswell's Johnson to him—a privilege rarely accorded; and when he forewore dining out save on his birthdays I was one of the happy few privileged to meet him. I have even met him en petit comité at his friend Foster's, when I think Bos was also of the party. I have smoked a pipe with him; few men can say this. I recall a trait of his kindly tolerance. At one of these birthday dinners at Foster's when Edwin, Browning and his son, the late Earl of Lytton, and one or two more were of the company, the Irish Church became the topic after dinner, and Carlyle was delightfully vehement when I made some incoherent remark, which he answered with a roar. 'We'll just cut a ver throats first! Never shall I forget the delighted shout of laughter with which this burst was greeted, at the top of which Foster's own particular roar was conspicuous. I believe they were all intensely grateful to me for having thus 'poked up' the old lion, who was then rather sick and moody. Later in the drawing-room I was standing apart when I heard him beside me: 'Well, and how air ye getting along wif yer work?' No doubt he good-naturedly wished to make up for what he had said so roughly.

"In the last year of his life I had the boldness to propose to 'do' his noble old head, and in my entreaty he agreed. Accordingly I drove up one morning with a clay head roughly blocked out from photographs and recollection, with a man to carry all the apparatus upstairs. Fancy this at Chyne Row, the shade of his dear 'Gosnie' hovering about! His niece, then Miss Arden, afterwards Mrs. Alexander Carlyle, was staying with him and taking care of him. I cannot distinctly recall in which room the enterprise was carried out. I fancy it was in the drawing room, where he sat more frequently after his wife's death. It was a nervous business for a presumed artist. He settled himself in a chair and said, 'I am smoky.' I made a faint objection, wishing to secure every chance, but he made a gentle, growling protest, and, of course, did smoke, and from one of his favorite 'long clays' or churchmen. How he did talk, and how pleasantly—about 'Foster,' as he called him—then dead—and about Bos, every inch of him in a house now, but I particularly remember one phrase of his—his inquiry about 'our dear Premier.' I suppose I was there for a couple of hours, and succeeded in fashioning what may be considered at least a recognizable likeness. The bust has now found an appropriate home in the hall of Chelsea Town Hall."

A Bust of Carlyle Sculptured from life by Percy Fitzgerald, recently placed in the Chelsea Town Hall

of an octavo volume a price of nineteenth-century history, as it has been in turn moulded by and reflected in caricature. To this end, a very careful and representative selection of cartoons has been made and included in the text, numbering over two hundred. The range of the work covers four periods: "The Napoleonic Era"; "From Waterloo through the Crimean War"; "The Civil and Franco-Prussian Wars"; and "The End of the Century." This fourth part is less adequate and satisfactory, but the development of caricature has been such during recent years that to do it justice it would require a volume to itself. The fault, therefore, is not so much with the treatment as with the subject, which makes greater demands than the authors have been free to give it. It is a notable fact, by the way, that, as the authors state, "it was not until late in the sixties, when Thomas Nast began his pictorial campaign in the pages of HAZARD'S WEEKLY against Ring which held New York in its clutch, that the American caricature could claim a pencil which entitled it to any sort of consideration from the artistic point of view." One is also reminded that it is to Nast's pencil in the WEEKLY we owe the jargon of caricature of the Democratic party, and the labor cap and the fall dinner pail as emblematic of labor.

FISHED OUT

By Robert W. Chambers

Drawn by Sydney Adams

FISHED OUT is a phrase usually applied by an unscrupulous angler to waters in which he can take no fish. By use of rod and reel alone it is almost impossible to "fish-out" waters having auxiliary attributes of proper depth and temperature for spawning; also natural food and shelter sufficient to sustain fish life at all seasons of the year. "Fished out," in almost every instance, should be translated, "poisoned out," "drained out," "settled out," and "dynamited out."

Fish, in "fished-out" waters, may be superlatively wary and shy, inhabiting abnormal cautions and cunning from generations of savatores who have been worried and terrified and deceived by generations of fishermen. These fish may even have changed their normal habits, feeding, for example, only at night, whereas their ancestors fed by day. But the chances are that in many "fished-out" waters there are fish—plenty of fish.

I know of making more ichthyology than the dry bones of a stream, unless it be a stream in whose waters there is no life. The beauty of brooks is composite; no element lacking near the harmony. Take our delicate, graceful minnows from a stream, and it seems as empty as an abandoned palace—still beautiful, but only a shell. Beauty is defined in many phrases and synonymous substantives; perhaps a true definition of beauty might be varied life. Truly, it seems to me, that without life,—wholesome, busy, intelligent life,—our woods and fields and streams would be sadder than painted tapestries.

I have never seen a stream that has been fished out through the legal employment of the angler's tools; but I have seen many streams known far and wide as "fished-out" streams. One in particular I shall never forget. My discovery of it happened in this manner:

The last day of March ended the duck-shooting; the first day of April, at that time, and in that country, permitted anglers to take trout with rod and reel. It was the first day of March. Since dawn we had been point-shooting; and now, leaving my tent and byways, I landed on a marsh, with the idea of following a fresh-water creek through the salt marshes to the village, expecting on my way to catch up a black duck or two. I did see black ducks; there was a man ahead of me who was attempting to do so, accepting the situation. I reversed my gun and snatched along, warning the stream from fear of habit. A few small fish darted up and down the breakneck channel; here and there muskrat swam, diving at my approach.

About a mile up the brook, and just before the stone dike which separates the stream from the springing pool where it takes its rise, I saw a fish swim out from under the bank and lie motionless in mid-channel. At first I could scarcely believe the fish to be a trout; for I was then scarcely half an hour's railway journey from New York. But there was an indication the fish what I was looking at proved to be a trout that night he weighed half a pound or more. Climbing to the road I hailed a passing countryman, asking him if there were any trout in the little rocky lake above the bridge. To which he replied:

"Now! The hell blamed thing is fished out!"

I went over to the lake and looked in. The water was clear enough to see through, near the edge; and, after a patient hunt, I started a good-sized fish from a sunny shelter, and saw him sail off into deep water. That fish was a trout; and that was enough for me. Walking back to the hotel, I found a crowd of sportsmen, haysmen, and loaders in the barnyard, which was the only gathering place in the hotel.

"Captain! Mr. Peck," who presided over a restaurant when abroad, and the bar when ashore, replied to my question, that there were no longer any trout in the lake; and, appealing to the escautier for confirmation, I received the same old verdict. "Fished out" those ten years.

Thus, sheep, serpents, strings of ducks, willies were being hauled into the stage for the station. Duck-shooting was over; even-beds unloaded for March; among others my self. But before I left I told "Captain" Peck to expect me back on the midnight train, and to notify me hereon. Bob Keene, to hunt up a lost and launch it on the little fresh-water lake, so that I could find it there at daylight.

Bob Keene, the best layman I ever knew, not only did what I asked, but he did more; for when at midnight I arrived from Manhattan with rods and fish hooks, Bob met me with a quiet chuckle, informing me that he had discovered what I wanted, and that he had brought me, as guide, an old man who knew the little lake and who would act as baitman for me. Rembrandt or Vermeer alone could have done justice to this ancient relic of the past when I found asleep by the stove in the barnyard.

I shall never forget him as I first saw him dozing in the lamp-light, gaunt, rugged, bent, his aged face split into a thousand wrinkles, his great knotted hands suddenly fished.

"Hight!" shouted Mr. Peck, leaning over his hat.

The old man roused eyes unopened, peering up at me.

"This is the gentleman from New York who says there are trout in Sedge Pond," continued Mr. Peck.

The old man rose, erect as a weather-beaten spar; we shook hands gravely. His name was Hugh Montgomery; he was eighty-three years old, and had never been twenty miles from the village where he was born. Many years ago a President of the United States had fished Sedge Pond, and Hugh had acted as gilly. Since that time first and never trout had been taken, until, ten years ago, Sedge water was famed as "fished out," and even the village set, limping forth into the April sunshine, no longer turned his steps toward Sedge Lake, but skirted away the day beside his pole and can of bait, where the salt creek's channel widened to meet the shallow waters of the lake.

"Hugh," I said, "are there any trout in the lake?"

"Trout!" he repeated, in his high, cracked voice. "They was trout three fifty year since."

"And now?"

"Ye be he!" he chuckled, "fell, fell me it's phant fished out! But it was fair water once, young sir,—it was fair water fifty year since."

"Give him a drink," whispered Bob Keene.

The old man drank as they drank in an age long passed; he drank frequently and deeply, and his draughts were the heroic potations of heroes—such as they also consume eternally in the lonely meadows of Valhalla. But all he would say was:

"There are fish in the ocean, young sir, and there is gold in the earth. Them that know, know; them that get, get. Show me the trout in Sedge Lake, and I'll tell ye where they swarmed."

When I retired to sleep I scarcely expected to see old Hugh at sunrise. But I was wrong; there was someone without the sun, but old Hugh was there, snatched in cushions and propped with his feet, and I should be believed the cure, in his other hand a net-bag hung.

"What's that net for?" I asked.

"That depends on you, sir," he said, grimly. A hellish walk brought me to the little lake; it was drizzling, but, even as we embarked, the drizzle was turning to sleet and snow. Hugh at the oars watched me closely as I ascended my light rod and knotted on a trial cast. The rod was a strange one, I had no idea what the net for, as, as a baitman's case, I decided to feel them with these primitive standards, reel also, machine, and black gut,—a matter neither thought nor entirely illogical.

Over the broken water the sun and sleet whirled; the net went out my bare hands, afflicting my fingers as I cast. Never had I seen such hopeless weather on such unpromising water. After a dozen casts I glanced at old Hugh, who sat, resting on his oars, peering up at me with inscrutable eyes.

"Your fish, my more!" I told ye," he said, leading suddenly to the oars. The boat headed out into the lake; and, as I watched, it seemed to me that the tower was going some definite course, perhaps an unseen channel known to him since boyhood. Presently he peered on his oars again, bringing the boat head-on toward the west.

"Try it here," he quavered.

At the first cast a bulky duck shape came up in a whirl of gray water; the rod recoiled, and in an instant I was free to a three-pound speckled trout. There points and one more he waded dressed. Then, in a thickening snow storm on that first day of April (all Fords' day at that) began the most extraordinary two hours of sport that I ever have seen my fortune to participate in.

Correspondence

THE DEMOCRATIC FLOOD

WICHITA, Mo., July 25, 1934

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

Sir,—Now that the action of the two great political parties has passed into history, we may review the incidents connected therewith calmly and impartially.

The result of the Republican meeting at Chicago was determined long in advance, for, after death had removed Mr. Hanna from the scene of action, it was well known that no other name than that of Theodore Roosevelt would be presented, even to the convention, for with that abolitionist with which he dominated the councils of his party, the meeting was unwise to register the edict which he had himself prepared long before.

Not so, however, with the Democrats at St. Louis. While all thoughtful and closely observant men believed that Judge Parker would be their nominee, it was by no means certain that it would occur without an earnest and prolonged struggle. But the "Killer Angels" of the Democracy seemed to provide over its deliberations, and the distinguished New York jurist was nominated with practical unanimity on the first ballot, and the lofty moral courage and honesty exhibited in his now laudatory telegram showed clearly that the party had made no mistake in its selection. With such a leader it may meet with defeat, but no disclosure will stain its escutcheon.

But what of the outlook? Since the adjournment of the convention the writer has scanned pretty closely the columns of the leading journals of the land, Republican, Democratic, and independent alike, and has been conducted to the conclusion that Alton Brooks Parker will be the next President of the United States. Many things lead me to this opinion. In the first place, he is a perfectly "safe and sane" Democrat. He has agreed that is unassailable. His political history is without stain or blemish, and his judicial career for the past twenty years has been of the most brilliant and exalted character. In short, the Democrats, but as their standard bearer a man for whom no apologies will have to be made.

The Republican nominee, on the other hand, is on the defensive from the very start. It is an undisputed fact that a very considerable portion of his party regard Mr. Roosevelt as an erratic, neurotic, and, in many respects, an unsteady, though honest and sincere, man. I have long been of the conviction myself that his position on the race question will rebound greatly to the benefit of his opponents, and turn thousands of votes to the Democratic party.

The writer of these lines has seen the negro in slavery and in freedom, and the race has no warmer or stancher friend, nor one who would go farther, or risk more, to protect him in his civil and political rights than he, but mortal man, even the strenuous Roosevelt, cannot do that, which the eternal God of all has said cannot, and shall not be done, make the negro the social equal of the Caucasian, and this feeling, in my opinion, is just as strong in the bosom of the Northerner, as it is in that of the Southerner, man.

The erratic genius, who for the time being provides me the headlines of the "White House," where he presided over the race issue, by inviting Booker T. Washington, eminent though he be, to a seat at his dinner table with his family, committed a social sin, the impropriety of which was recognized even by his distinguished colored visitor, and which, in my judgment, ought to relegate him to the obscurity of private life. If he did this because he believed Booker Washington to be his social equal he is to be pitied; if he did it as a political trick to catch votes then he is to be condemned.

There is not an intelligent colored man in this land, North or South, who will read these lines, who does not know, that up to the time of this occurrence, the utmost harmony and good feeling characterized the intercourse between the races, and that all ill feeling and friction that has taken place since are traceable directly to that cause.

I repeat, therefore, that it is my honest belief that this untimely and ill advised act will transfer thousands of good Republican votes to the Democratic nominees, and make them President and Vice-President of these United States, and so note it, he,

[Our correspondent evidently cannot realize that Dr. Roosevelt invited Dr. Washington to dinner, neither because he believed him to be his social equal, nor because he wanted to catch votes, but because he wanted to talk with him. If that dinner invitation was a mistake, as in view of its results, we believe it to have been, it was purely a mistake of inadvertence. Not so, however, the Crum appointment and the post-office race. As to those matters the President acted with deliberation, and meant all he did. But he never meant to "make the negro the social equal of the Caucasian."—EDITOR.]

THE AGE LIMIT

MONTREAL, P. Q., July 23, 1934

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

Sir,—Under "Comment" in your issue of today you mention King Christian of Denmark and Senator Pettus and the case of Alabama as the only men of full fourscore who are still both active and conspicuous in the business of government.

Senator David Wark of New Brunswick, sometimes spoken of as the Grand Old Man of Canada, celebrated the one-hundredth anniversary of his birth on February 19, 1934. At the moment of writing he is still at his desk in Ottawa as usual. He was appointed a member of the Upper House when the Canadian provinces were united to form the Dominion in 1867.

I am, sir,

L. C. B.

THE NEW NEGRO CRIME IN MISSISSIPPI

CHARLESTON, Miss., July 21, 1934

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

Sir,—In three of your recent issues you made the surprising statement that there had been no case of the "new negro crime" (meaning rape) committed in the State of Mississippi since the adoption of the Constitution of 1890.

About six weeks ago I wrote you a personal letter in which I called your attention to the true state of affairs. Up to date I have seen no correction in your paper.

Inasmuch as your paper is the leading publication of its kind in the United States, statements appearing in it are usually accepted as true. Believing it to be your purpose to publish the facts without fear or favor, I addressed a circular letter to the sheriff of each of our seventy-six (76) counties, quoting the statement of HARPER'S WEEKLY, and inquiring how many cases of rape, or attempted rape, there had been in each county since 1890; how many such cases had been followed by legal execution, how many by hangings, and how many by imprisonment in the penitentiary.

I have received replies from forty-seven counties, with the following result: There have been sixty-three cases of criminal assault by negro men upon white girls and white women since 1890, and there have been twenty-four hangings.

It has been rather difficult to get at the true state of things, because of the unglorious notoriety given the victim of the black brute's lust if published; because no record has been kept; because the sheriff's tenure of office is only four years, and he can't succeed himself under our Constitution; and, finally, because the sheriff of every county took the oath on the first day of last January, and is not in a position to know his county's history as well as he will know it at the expiration of his term of office. For these reasons I feel sure that a number of cases have occurred that have not been heard of, outside of the neighborhoods in which the crimes were committed.

Considering that there have been sixty-three cases of this "new" negro crime, and that only twenty-four are negroes have been made to pay the penalty in Judge Lynch's court, it speaks well for the patience and temper of our people. Only those known to be punished have been punished. We have never practiced retaliation upon them, regardless of age and sex, as has been done in Illinois, Ohio, Indiana, and other States recently.

Trusting that you will give this space in your valued paper.

I am, sir,

Yours, JACKSON KAT.

CAMARADERIE

ANN ARBOR, Mich., July 15, 1934

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

Sir,—A. C. H. in HARPER'S WEEKLY of June 18, says "Of Women": "The camaraderie which exists between her and her youthful friends is delightful to her," etc., etc.

A handsome girl dressed all in white sat on a bench in a dancing pavilion. She looked to me to be about fourteen years old. She was what the comic papers call a "summer" girl. She was there besides everything. Presently up came a "camaraderie" and "sat down beside her."

"Hello, May!"

"Hello herself."

"Whysomever darsin'?"

"At that golden."

"She's golden—just—don't know!" jeered another gallant who sat on the railing some ten feet away.

This conversation was plainly overheard by many people sitting near.

"Quit yer joshin', Phil. Hark, yer lemme lone" (this to the gentleman beside her). "Tere yer ole dirty hase offere—quit that!"

"You've had Sippers on yer before—of anybody's yet?" came from her gentlemen acquaintance on the railing.

Then another of her high school mates came and engaged her for the dance.

I am, sir,

MANAGED WIVES

NEW YORK, July 21, 1934

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

Sir,—The letter you print from "Much-Manned Wife" bears the internal evidence that she is laughing at us. I have not seen the article she mentions on the management of wives, but I think her letter is another example of the coquetry and evasion of her sex. I would be willing to wager a round sum that "Much-Manned Wife" manages her husband, and is the most dangerous wife-fer him—the alarming way. I have seen wives do it—so far as I am concerned, do you suppose for a minute they do it unconsciously? Not on your—no! In bad garden. My wife looks unhappy when I use slang. (There you are!) Looks unhappy—and looks unhappy, that's all, and there you are!

I am, sir,

A THOROUGHLY-MANAGED HUSBAND.

THE QUALITY

BY A. E. W. MASON

SYNOPSIS OF CHAPTER

In the opening chapter Pamela Marston is introduced to the reader as a young society woman of London, beautiful and of rare personal charm. Late one night Pamela and Alan Warfield, who is in love with her, observe a young couple leaving the opposite house. They are Tony and Millicent Stratten, who live in a gloomy house provided for by the rich but unwise father of the young man. They are in reality kept prisoners in the palace of the tyrannical old man. Tony is sent by playing truant and going out by stealth late at night that they are able to meet at all times in the life of the outside world. But finally they both desert of their mysterious life, and Tony determines to go to America to make his fortune. In his absence Millicent becomes infatuated with Lionel Talbot, a violently adventurous young man who is to help her. She sends Warfield on a mission to find Tony and bring him home. Warfield finds that Tony, having lost all of his small fortune in New York, is now in the North Sea on a frigate. Warfield does every attempt to prevail upon him to come back, but he refuses. Tony remains on the frigate until the form of his crime is over impossible having learned of his father's death, and then decides to enlist in the French Foreign Legion, as an other career seems open to him. John Mosley, a friend of Pamela's, learns from her of the peril Millicent is in from Talbot. He looks up all Talbot's debts and places them in the hands of a single firm of solicitors, who insist on a settlement with Pamela's heir before Talbot receives a proposition from Mosley to experience an important enterprise of the father's in Chile, which his fiancée will 50 miles escape him to reveal Warfield, although he has proposed to her unsuccessfully before, again asks Pamela to marry him, and she allows him to think that in time it will be possible for her to accept him. This time, she will think, would make her take the step now. The return of Tony Stratten. Warfield, desiring of obtaining information as to Tony's whereabouts, goes to London to visit Tony's father Mr. Chas. who, he thinks, will be able to enlighten him. He finds on his arrival that Chas. was not only dead, but also that the bank's will and address on the envelope of a letter intended for the man Tony, thinks that he has found a clue to Tony's hiding place. Talbot returns from Chile and persuades Millicent to go south with him. They are seen driving together late at night in Regent's Park by Mr. Mosley, who tells Pamela that he suspects danger for Millicent. Pamela suggests Warfield to go and try to find Tony for consolation—the peak of the village has, in order to do so, a plan to help Millicent. Pamela, for the second time, persuades Warfield to go in search of Tony, and he gladly accepts. Pamela goes to Berpurgate, which she had visited as a young girl, and while there learns of the presence of Lionel Talbot.

CHAPTER XXIV

THE END OF THE EXPERIMENT

THE village of Ain-Sefra stands upon a high and fertile basin on the very borders of Morocco. The oasis is well watered, and the date-palm grows thickly there. It lies far to the south. The railway, in the days when Tony Stratten served in the Foreign Legion, did not reach to it: the barracks were newly built, the power-plant newly enclosed, and if one looked southwards from any open space one could a heavy belt of sand in the extreme distance stretch across the horizon from east to west. That is the beginning of the Great Sahara. Tony Stratten could never see that belt of sand but his thoughts went back to the terrible horse-catch march from Bir-el-Thlame to Thaurila. From east to west the Sahara stretched across Africa, breaking the soldiers who dared to violate its privacy, thrusting them back maimed and famine-stricken, jealously guarding its secrets, and speaking by its very silence its terrible "thus far and no further" as few could and a thousand times more truthfully, than ever did the waves of the sea.

On one morning Stratten mounted the steps on to the veranda of the hospital. He looked across open country to the great yellow line. He thought of the Thaurila hanging persistently upon the flank of his big fire, the long laborious days of thirst and hunger, the lengthening trail of graves which he left behind—the milestones of invasion. He felt as though the desert gripped him again and would not lose his hold, clinging to his feet with each step he took in the soft yielding sand. He had brought back his handful of men. It was true; they had stumbled into the night, and the last; but there were few of them who were men as good as they had been when they set out. Even the last, if almost seemed to him, had lost something of vitality which they would never recover; had a look fixed in their eyes which set them apart from their fellows, the look of those who have endured too much, who gazed for too long a time upon horrors; while the others were, for the most part, only fit to squat in the shade and to wait for things to come. There was one whom Stratten had passed only a minute before sitting on the ground under the shadow of the barnyard wall. Stratten was haunted by the picture of that man. For he was the only white man he had ever seen who did not trouble to raise a hand to brush away the flies from his face, but allowed them to settle and cluster about the corners of his mouth.

There was another in the hospital behind him. Him the Sahara definitely claimed. Stratten turned and walked into the building.

He passed down the line of beds and stopped where a man lay tossing in a fever. Stratten bowed over the bed.

"Barber," he said.

Further Barber had grown very quiet and thin during these latter weeks. He turned his eyes upon Stratten and smiled in a coherently. But there was recognition neither in his eyes nor in his voice. An orderly approached the bed as Stratten stood beside it; and in a low voice, but happily Barber should hear and understand, Tony asked:

"What did the doctor say?"

"Nothing good, my word," the orderly replied, with an expressive shrug of the shoulders.

"I am very sorry," said Stratten, gravely.

Veritably Barber looked to be lying at death's door. The bandage around his arm remained and the color of wax lay outside upon the corner of the bed. His eyes, unnaturally lidless, unnaturally large, showed deep sunken in dark purple rings. His eyelids were red, as though with much weeping, and below the eyes, his face was drawn with fever and very white. Stratten laid his hand gently upon Barber's forehead. It was burning hot. Stratten dismissed the orderly with a nod. There was a lagged restlessness in Barber's appearance, his long bony shapely hands, his little well-knit figure all betrayed the man of race. Yet he had once more to bauldness about perception at a fire in the desert like any mortal child.

A heavy step sounded in the ward, and Stratten's colored stool beside him, a steady built man with a white mustache and imperial and a stern yet not unkindly face. It expressed a deal of solitude at this moment.

"I have seen the doctor this morning," said the colored, "and he has given up hope. Barber will hardly live out the night. They should not have discharged him from the asylum as cured."

The idea of perception had become fixed in Barber's brain. He had never left him since the evening when he first gave utterance to it in the desert. The hourward march, indeed, had aggravated his mania. On his return he had been sent to the asylum at Bel-Aïda, but there he had developed cunning enough to conceal his hallucination. He had ceased to complain that his officers were in a conspiracy to entrap and ruin him, his threats were heard, no more dangerous sleeping glances detected. He was sent back to his battalion at Ain-Sefra. A few weeks and again his malady was manifest, and on top of that came fever.

"I am very sorry," Stratten said again, and then, after looking about him and perceiving that the orderly was out of earshot, he bent down towards Barber. Lower than he had bent before, and he called upon him in a still lower voice.

But Barber was no longer the same he used.

"Monseigneur le Comte," he said, first of all, and then, "Mon sieur de..." He uttered a name which the pretorian before had made illustrious in French diplomacy.

At the sound of the name Barber's face contracted. He started up in his bed upon one arm.

"Heads!" he cried. A most extraordinary change had come over him in a second. His eyes protruded, his mouth hung half-open, his face was frozen into immobility by horror. "There is some one on the stairs," he whispered, "coming up—some one

"Sir Anthony Stretton?"
Stretton was no longer seeking to evade discovery.

"Yes," he said. "The stranger's face became vaguely familiar to him. 'I have seen you before, I think.'"

"There," replied the other. "My name is Warriden. You saw me for a few minutes on the deck of a fish-carrier in the North Sea."

"To be sure," he said, slowly. "Yes, to be sure, I did. You were sent to find me by Miss Pamela Mardale."

"She wants me again," replied Warriden. Stretton's heart sank in fear. He had discovered the woman before. He remembered Pamela's promise to defend his wife. He remembered her warning that he should not leave his wife.

"She sent you, then, with an urgent message that I should return home," he said. "I carry the same message again, only it is a thousand times more urgent."

He drew a letter from his pocket as he spoke and handed it to Stretton. "I was to give you this," he said.

Stretton looked at the handwriting and nodded.

"Thank you," he said, gravely. He tore open the envelope and read.

To be Continued.

The Labor War in Colorado

(Continued from page 1251)

over the strike district. I saw copies of it on the telegraph poles, and even on the trees in the country. It reads in three languages:

"To All Mine-Workers: Wherever You Are—

We, as citizens, mind, under all circumstances, observe the peace."

"I make no distinction and keep other. Make no distinction which will get you into trouble. Do this in the interest of the mine in which you are involved. It is necessary for each and every one in the best of conditions; it is for the best interests of the United Mine-Workers of America."

At Del Norte there were sixty-three men employed when I visited the range, and these have been taken in a covered cage to and from work, in order to avoid opportunities for riot and insult. The other camps that I saw were breathlessly quiet, and there was no fire in the coke ovens.

The chain of the superintendents of the mines is that the mine's demands are unwarmed for two reasons: one that the industry will not stand greater expense on the labor side, that wages cannot be increased without affecting dividends and profits, and that the amount of geological work being carried on by the company gives the employees and their families greater opportunity than any increase would do.

The Colorado Fuel and Iron Company has thirty-one mines, twenty of which are coal-mines, and it has 35,000 coke-ovens, all practically in this coal-district. At the present time there are kindergarten and clubs, on the order of social settlement clubs, which are provided by the company. There are thirty-four regular sociological workers in the kindergarten, clubs, and hospital. A monthly publication, The Coal and Mine, is published by this department, and gives the news of the work being done among the employees and the various news items. This publication has a large circulation among the English-speaking employees.

The root of this strike has been heavy for both sides. It would seem that the experience of the motherhood of the Colorado ought to have profited the operators in Los Angeles County and elsewhere, for, and there is the loss in the production of their coal traffic and the expected loss to the Colorado Fuel and Iron Company, which has to keep the steel plant shut down because of the strike.

On the union side the disbursement some time ago amounted to $100,000. At first it was planned to give each unemployed member in the mine so much per week—$5 for each single man, $5 for each couple, and fifty cents for each child—but the expense was so great that the commissary supply system was adopted and groceries were given

BOOKS BY THE AUTHOR OF

"The Martyrdom of an Empress"

THE MARTYRDOM OF AN EMPRESS

QUEEN OF AUSTRIA

A personal account of the Empress Elizabeth of Austria, written by a close friend, and one of the very few to whom this remarkable woman ever really opened her heart. The volume has proved to be one of the most popular biographies of our time.

Illustrated with Portraits from Prison Photographs. Crown 8vo, Gleaned Cloth, Dotted Edges, Gilt Top. $2.50

A KEYSTONE OF EMPIRE

The intimate association of this anonymous writer with the Austrian court enables her to continue in this volume the entertaining recital of events known only to her. The Empress is made the subject of the book, but anecdotes and incidents concerning the late Empress are related, as in the author's former volume.

Illustrated from Prison Drawings and Photographs. Crown 8vo, Gleaned Cloth, Dotted Edges, Gilt Top. $2.25 net (postage extra)

THE TRIBULATIONS OF A PRINCESS

The anonymous biography of the author of The Martyrdom of an Empress. Its charm lies in the way in which it tells its story of a cool-headed woman, make it as fascinating as a romance, yet it is a volume of re-inforcement of true facts as the life of a woman of the great world, the friend of royalty.

Illustrated. Crown 8vo, Gleaned Cloth, Dotted Edges. Gilt Top. $2.25 net.

A DOFFED CORONET

The volume includes pages into the intimate history of Cairo, and a portrait of the Khedivial Court written in a manner worthy of Three Acts itself. The volume series of the book are had in Egypt after the Arabi Pasha rebellion, when Cairo was a hotbed of international intrigue.

Illustrated. Crown 8vo, Gleaned Cloth, Dotted Edges. Gilt Top. $2.25 net.

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS, NEW YORK CITY

ABBOTT'S ANGOSTURA BITTERS

THE ONLY SALESGROOMS IN GREATER NEW YORK FOR THE CELEBRATED

PIANOS SOHMER PIANOS

ARE LOCATED IN THE SOHMER BUILDING
FIFTH AVENUE CORNER 224 STREET
THE "SOHMER" HEADS THE LISTS OF THE HIGHEST GRADE PIANOS

Sir Mortimer

By
MARY JOHNSTON
Author of "To Have and To Hold"

THE love of Sir Mortimer for the fair Damaris Sedley, a lady-in-waiting, holds unswerving course through a narrative alive with stirring incidents of the days of Sir Walter Raleigh, when all England loved, sang, adventured, and fought, in the flush of youthful power. Herein is a love story of uncommon charm cast among stirring scenes—love in the lap of adventure, set forth with rare imaginative power.

Readers of "To Have and To Hold" will welcome in this tale of love and gallantry the distinct advance Miss Johnston has made upon her former success. The romance is instinct with new life and color, like the golden days with which it deals.

"The witchery of romance pervades its scenes, and one in the grasp of the story the reader will be swept along the current to the end." Chicago Chronicle.

"Her thousands of admiring readers will thank her for the book—a strong, vigorous, original story, with honor as its theme." Scraper Herald.

"May be classed among the gems of modern novels." Birmingham News.

"She has reproduced in a wonderful manner the time of Elizabeth, with all its greatness and its littleness." N. Y. World.

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK

Rulers of Kings

by
GERTRUDE ATHERTON
Author of "The Conqueror," "The Autocrat"

IN this novel is pictured the conflict between the two greatest forces in the world—American wealth and European royalty—in which the former triumphs. Gertrude Atherton, from whom the reading public has learned to expect surprises, has evolved a story both daring and original. Fessenden Abbott, the son of America's most colossal millionaire, in the midst of great financial undertakings that are watched by all the world, falls in love with the daughter of the Austrian Emperor. In her heart duty to the weakening monarchy of her fathers battles with an overmastering love for the young American. How Fessenden Abbott bends the will of emperors and alters the diplomatic relations of kingdoms to win the girl he loves is an original and most romantic piece of fiction writing.

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK

THE FUNNIEST OF BIOGRAPHIES

The Memoirs of a Baby

By JOSEPHINE DASKAM

NEVER before has the dignified title of "Memoirs" graced so funny a book as this latest tale of Josephine Daskam's—a writer widely known for her clever child studies. The wry side of life—the tribulations of the little tots—have no place in this irresistibly amusing record of the home life of a typical American couple. The baby refuses to develop psychologically or scientifically according to the theories set down in his Aunt Emma's books, but he grows to robust boyhood after a fashion of his own. All the various incidents of a lively youngster's boyhood here find laughable portrayal. The unceasing arguments between the common-sense young father and the theoretical "Aunt Emma" not only afford such amusement as Josephine Daskam alone can give us, but go to make a clever satire on "modern" methods of rearing children.

F. Y. Cox, whose pictures of baby-life have never been equalled for cleverness and humor, has illustrated the book copiously with pointed ink drawings. The pictures are every bit as funny as the narrative, and the book will provoke the laughter of any one who turns the pages.

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS, NEW YORK

THE GIVERS

BY
MARY E. WILKINS FREEMAN

THESE are Mary E. Wilkins Freeman's latest stories. All are filled with the humor and pathos of New England life—the type of story which is indisputably the author's own, and in which she scored her remarkable early success.

Of the stories in this volume, the title story—"The Givers"—has created more widespread interest and called forth more letters from the author's readers than anything else Mrs. Freeman has done. It is a laughable tale of the revolt of a sturdy, strong-minded woman against the inappropriateness of the Christmas gifts with which she is deluged by her well-to-do, unthinking friends. How she leads each in turn to replace her gift with some homely, serviceable article is a triumph of rough-handed New England diplomacy and a highly amusing tale.

Sophia Lane is but one of the many characters in this book who are good to know and not soon forgotten.

Illustrated, Cloth, $1.25

HARPER & BROTHERS
PUBLISHERS NEW YORK CITY

One Billion Dollars

OF LIFE INSURANCE IN FORCE IN THE PRUDENTIAL

INSURANCE COMPANY
OF AMERICA

JOHN F. DRYDEN, President.
Home Office, NEWARK, N. J.

Write for Particulars of Policies, Dept. T

Visit The Prudential's Exhibit, Palace of Education, World's Fair, St. Louis.

HARPER'S WEEKLY

Edited by George Harvey

HARPER & BROTHERS NEW YORK
August 20 1904 Price 10 Cents

In Search of the Unknown

By
ROBERT W. CHAMBERS
Author of "The Maid of Paradise," "Cardigan," etc.

THIS captivating story describes the strange adventures and novel love affairs of a young student of science who accompanies a learned professor on expeditions in search of the unknown in nature. The professor is on the track of some entirely new facts, with which he intends to astonish the world. In the meantime the student meets several girls, and half a dozen love affairs develop. A unique and highly entertaining story, in which Mr. Chambers has drawn his girls with his usual felicity, and their engaging charms are all the more piquant displayed in such fantastic surroundings.

Post 8vo, Cloth, $1.50

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK

Sir Mortimer

By
MARY JOHNSTON
Author of "To Have and To Hold"

THE love of Sir Mortimer for the fair Damaris Sedley, a lady-in-waiting, holds unswerving course through a narrative alive with stirring incidents of the days of Sir Walter Raleigh, when all England loved, sang, adventured, and fought, in the flush of youthful power. Herein is a love story of uncommon charm cast among stirring scenes—love in the lap of adventure, set forth with rare imaginative power.

Readers of "To Have and To Hold" will welcome in this tale of love and gallantry the distinct advance Miss Johnston has made upon her former success. The romance is instinct with new life and color, like the golden days with which it deals.

"The witchery of romance pervades its scenes, and once in the grasp of the story the reader will be swept along the current to the end."—Chicago Chronicle.

"Her thousands of admiring readers will thank her for the book—a strong, vigorous, original story, with honor as the theme."—Syracuse Herald.

"May be classed among the gems of modern novels."—Birmingham News.

"She has reproduced in a wonderful manner the time of Elizabeth, with all its greatness and its littleness."—N. Y. World.

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK

The Best is the Safest

SOME day men may not need weapons of defense, but since humanity is what it is to-day, arms must sometimes be carried, and those who carry them should insist on having the best.

You cannot provide yourself with a weapon without some feeling of responsibility. Properly used, the arm that you possess will protect your property and even save your life. You must have the weapon which is most reliable—the best.

The best is the safest; safest because simplest, made with the greatest care and of materials which experience has shown to be the most perfect for the purposes for which they are used.

It is precisely for these reasons that the best revolver is

THE COLT

Catalogue on Application.

Colt's Patent Fire Arms Mfg. Co.,
HARTFORD, CONN.

London Office, 26 Glasshouse St., London, W., England.

Rulers of Kings

by
GERTRUDE ATHERTON
Author of "The Conqueror," "The Aristocrats"

IN this novel is pictured the conflict between the two greatest forces in the world—American wealth and European royalty—in which the former triumphs. Gertrude Atherton, from whom the reading public has learned to expect surprises, has evolved a story both daring and original. Fessenden Abbott, the son of America's most colossal millionaire, in the midst of great financial undertakings that are watched by all the world, falls in love with the daughter of the Austrian Emperor. In her heart duty to the weakening monarchy of her fathers battles with an overmastering love for the young American. How Fessenden Abbott bends the will of emperors and alters the diplomatic relations of kingdoms to win the girl he loves is an original and most romantic piece of fiction writing.

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK

HARPER'S WEEKLY

VOL. XLVIII.

New York, Saturday, August 20, 1904

No. 347

Copyright, 1904, by HARPER & BROTHERS. All rights reserved.

HEIGHT OF THE RACING SEASON

(The Race is not Always to the Swift)

HARPER'S WEEKLY

Vol. XLVIII.

No. 2497

EDITED BY GEORGE HARVEY

THIRTY-SIX PAGES

NEW YORK CITY, AUGUST 20, 1904

Terms: 10 Cents a Copy — $4.00 a Year, in Advance
 Postage free to all subscribers in the United States, Canada, Mexico,
 Hawaiian Porto Rico, the Philippine Islands, Guam, and Isthmian Samoa

Entered at the New York Post office as second-class matter

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS
 NEW YORK CITY: FRANKLIN SQUARE
 LONDON: 45 ALBEMARLE STREET, W

COMMENT

PLATFORM: NO ISSUE!

The net result of the two letters of acceptance is a virtual definition by each candidate of the principle upon which he appeals to the people.

Imperfection (as defined by Mr. ROOSEVELT). Recognition of the necessity of meeting a condition, regardless of the possible effect of a precedent thus established.

Constitutionalism (as defined by Judge PARKER). Rigid adherence to theory, irrespective of temporary consequences.

Each apparently is satisfied with his position and willing to abide cheerfully by the judgment of the country. All other issues are incidental.

The Judge made a good speech. "Admirable," we should call it if he had not prompted the word in speaking of his party's leadership of a platform. But it was a praiseworthy utterance, able, dignified, judicial, to-be-sure—just the sort and the only sort of speech the Judge could make. Mere recitation of the vows of the Democratic candidate in the last two elections gives it a refreshing sound. We discuss it at length elsewhere, only pausing here to note the eagerness with which the candidate expresses his idea of the real issue, namely, government scrupulously within the restrictions of law as against government having less regard for form than for substance. He says:

The difference in these powers is the difference between a republic—such as ours, based on law and a written constitution, supported by intelligence, virtue, and patriotism—and a monarchy, sustained by force exerted by an individual, uncontrolled by laws other than those made or sanctioned by him; one represents constitutionalism, the other imperialism.

There is the whole case in a nutshell as seen and stated by the Democratic candidate. But he is careful, in fairness, to note that officials (i. e., the President) who have disregarded constitutional limitations have done so only for the purpose of accomplishing "that which seems to them good." This is frank recognition of the existence of the motives of the Colonel, the giving of which incidentally reflects credit upon the Judge. We attach little importance to the declaration against a second term. Not that Judge PARKER would do as Mr. CLEVELAND did, i. e., pronounce against a second term and continue ever thereafter to be a candidate, because he wouldn't. When the Judge says a thing, he means it. But there was no occasion for saying this, and it would have been better unspoken, despite the sincere conviction behind the words.

How will the new voters vote? In order to appreciate the importance of this question, it is needful to keep in view what proportion of the electorate is renewed every fourth year. The Northampton Tables, used by many life-insurance companies, justify us in saying that the average length of life enjoyed by voters after they attain the voting age (twenty-one) falls considerably short of a quarter of a century. We are thus well within bounds when we say that the national electorate is renewed once in twenty-five years. It follows that one-sixth of it must be renewed in about four years. Now the total popular vote in 1900 was nearly 14,000,000. If our premises are sound, upwards of 2,300,000 of these voters will be dead next November, and will have been replaced by new voters. Under normal circumstances, one-half of those new voters might be expected to be predisposed in favor of the Democratic party. During the last eight years, however, in such pivotal States as New York, Connecticut, New Jersey, Indiana, and Wisconsin, the so-called Gold Democrats have either waded for a candidate of their own (1896), or have refrained from voting at all, or have supported the Republican nominees for the Presidency and Vice-Presidency. This means that one-sixth of those Gold Democrats as have attained their majority in any of the years beginning with 1896 and ending with the present twelve-month, have been taught by precept and example to withhold their votes from Democratic candidates. Now it is comparatively easy for a father to influence a son before the latter is of age, but much more difficult later. Because many a quondam Democrat is this year disposed to revert to his earlier predilections, and to advocate the election of Judge PARKER, it by no means follows that he can secure the adoption of the same course by the son or sons who have been encouraged and accustomed to vote the Republican ticket since they were qualified to exercise the franchise. Those sons now range in point of age from twenty-one to twenty-nine; they have formed opinions of their own, and are quite likely to quote the past against the present views of their sires, appealing, as they may dryly put it, from Philip drunk to Philip sober.

It was only a question of time when some trained analyzer of human emotions would dissect the Judge. No such affliction confronts the Colonel because he has performed his own operations so thoroughly that little is left to be learned. But with the Judge it is different. If the truth must be reverted to, it is not so very long since less was known of him in a personal way than of a good many others, and now, while he occupies the centre of the stage, theaching void in the minds of the people must be filled. Mr. JAMES CLEVELAND, of the World, who personally superintended his nomination, then barbed the famous telegram out of him and put on the finishing-touch by printing a note he once received from the Judge—why instead he did not publish his letter which evoked the response we are still unable to understand—of course, did his best. But, despite the size of his canvas and brush, Mr. CLEVELAND requires so much space for the expression of his own serious thought that the result was anything but satisfying to those who earnestly attach more importance to the opinions of the Judge than to those of Mr. CLEVELAND.

With all thy faults, THOMAS, the Non—
 At this point the pen falters.

We are happy to be able to announce that the Herald has risen to the occasion. It gives a page to a most intimate and minute study of the candidate by Mr. GUYST KENN, a practised writer who knows a lot about music and a little about politics. The scope of Mr. KENN's able article is indicated by its title, "Round about the Mind of ALTON B. PARKER." His arms, legs, eyes, and hair had already been described, so Mr. KENN merely completes the picture by surrounding the seat of the Judge's intellectuality as neatly as the Japs are supposed to envelop Port Arthur. He begins with the X-ray and finds "a fair-sized library of general literature stored in his mind." Also there are some books in the house, notably those written by DICKENS, TWAIN, SCOTT, COOPER, and a complete presentation set of the works of THEODORE ROOSEVELT, bearing the autograph inscription of the author, "As a slight token of esteem and friendship." As the Colonel's literary product now approaches twenty volumes, the token is less slight than its donor modestly indicates. However, we can readily imagine the relish with which the Judge studies his contemporary's reflections, and consider it wholly possible that his admiration occasionally reaches a pitch which induces the unspoken hope that the brilliant author may in the near future have more time to devote to literature. In any case, if the Judge should desire to return the compliment, we permit ourselves to suggest that he present the Colonel with the copy (duly autographed) of COOPER'S Constitutional Limitations upon which his hand rested when Mr. MILLER-LAY painted his picture. It is a good and useful book and ought to be in the White House.

Travelling a step farther "round the mind," Mr. KOOME informs us that, in common with several others, the Judge read DICKENS while still comparatively youthful, and that when he first visited London a few years ago (arriving, by the way, "at night and stopping at the Savoy"—we are glad it wasn't the Cecil) he rode up the Strand on a "bus and knew, from his recollection of DICKENS'S descriptions, where he was. All we have to say to that is that anybody who can recognize the London of DICKENS in the Strand of to-day is a wonder. Of his favorite author's creations the Judge prefers Pickwick Papers and Black House, which leads us to suggest a reprint of David Copperfield, although we readily appreciate the advantage to a lawyer and a candidate of familiarity with Pickwickian expressions. Another favorite even to this mature age is The Steadfast Chief, but for this preference Mr. KOOME makes incidental apology. He does not want to put the Judge in the false attitude of an admirer of undue strenuousness. "He realizes that in the days of the Scottish chiefs the appeal was not to reason, but to the sword, and that those men met the requirements of their day." We congratulate Mr. KOOME upon the delicacy with which he makes his point without upsetting the æsthetic quality of his subject.

Poetry apparently is not the Judge's strong point. He likes FREDERICK FIELD and WHITTIER'S RHAPS—this ought to be worth a few votes in Indiana—but the poem that has impressed him most in recent years is the late Senator FOLEY'S somewhat doubtful verse entitled "Opportunity." It is as follows:

Master of human destinies art thou!

Fame, love, and fortune on thy footsteps wait.

Villains and felids I walk; I prostrate

Deserts and seas remote, and passing by

Heed and halt and pause, none or late

I knock unknown once at every gate.

It sleeping, wake; if fawning rise before

I turn away. It is the hour of fate.

And they who follow me each every state

Mortal desire, and conquer every foe

Save death; but those who doubt or hesitate,

Condemned to failure, penury, and woe,

Seek me in vain and uselessly implore:

I answer not, and I return no more.

How many times Opportunity may have flown safely over Eugene in the past we cannot say, but we do know that the last time it appeared to a certain reflective horseman in the early moon it got caught. The Judge answered the first knock he heard, and Opportunity stopped as advertised. Some maintain that she is still there.

For music Mr. KOOME reluctantly admits that the Judge has not had time to "acquire a cultivated ear." He probably would have done better to cultivate the one he had. However, in the inexpressible language characteristic of musical critics, Mr. KOOME pronounces the Judge's taste "trifling and, as such, interesting to analyze." We regret to note that he punches upon Gimmelp's preserves "when he goes about the house humming 'I'm Just as Young as I Used to Be,'" but "he also hums 'Grandfather's Clock,'" "doublets out of respect for his colleagues, and occasionally, after the chores are done and the wood is in the stove 'The Building on the Bank' to the hired man's 'Polka-Rose in the Park.'" This ought to fetch the undergraduate vote. Farther than this Mr. KOOME, the Waggoner, declines to conduct us. He seems to feel that he is treading delicate ground, and he walks gingerly around the musical section of the Judge's mind. Candidly we cannot confirm his implication of dissatisfaction. If in the songs mentioned could be added "Lead, Kindly Light," we fail to see why, for campaign purposes, the repertoire would not be reasonably complete.

When it comes to art, the Judge is a thorough American. He visited the galleries when abroad, "and admired much of what he saw. The Venus of Milo, the Winged Victory, the Comets, MILLER—they were very nice in their way. But when, at The Hague, he came to PAUL POTTER'S famous picture of the young bull, there he stopped and looked long and earnestly. There was something he knew all about. No painter could fool him on live stock. The picture caught his fancy as none other had in all the galleries visited, and it is a tribute to its value as a nature study that it is the one picture he saw in Europe of which he brought home a copy." This copy stands on one of the bookshelves in the hall at Bossmount. We reproduce it herewith. This sample of the Judge's artistic taste is interesting, and would be useful if properly exploited by Tom in the agricultural districts but for the breed. If the model had been a Jersey cow, nothing better could have been desired, but these "Hollands" as a distinguished literary lady once described them to us, are not really appealing except in point of looks. They are good-enough milkers, but twice as much is required to get the same amount of butter—and this has come to be a latter country. On the whole, we question whether the picture can be utilized successfully except perhaps in West Virginia, where the owner of the bull might pass for Grandpa in his young days. This is by no means a full synopsis of Mr. KOOME'S subtle analysis; there is much more of equal interest. But we feel that we have travelled sufficiently far around the mind to deserve, for the moment, a rest.

Sanity must be catching. Even Tom has a slight attack.

We thought it was getting to be about time to hear from OLIVER H. P. BEZMONT—and lo! here he comes with a letter to the World, pitching into that shy Journal for allowing traitor Democrats like himself who were voting the ticket while the World was canvassing at the party's defeat. The World replies that it has not abused them, in the first place, and that it does not care a continental damn for O. H. P.'s opinion, in the second. Such petulance is really very unbecoming in the truly great. Just why O. H. P. felt called upon to put his head into the lion's mouth and "keep it there a while," we cannot imagine, but it is silly for the World to pretend that it does not care. The favorable opinion of a man capable of getting for a wife the smartest woman in America is worth anybody's having.

Washington reports that the President is fretting about his figure. When he undertook his present job he weighed 182 pounds; he now weighs 208, and has been up to 212. This is pretty heavy for a man of his height, and he doesn't like it, especially in view of the fact that he has to exercise violently to keep where he is. He has given up eating sweets, things containing starch, etc., but to little purpose. He has not found the root of the difficulty. It is this: he drinks too much milk. No man who doesn't smoke can drink milk and keep or get thin. Let him substitute a light claret and avoid water and better results will be observable sooner than he thinks. In his present placid mood, moreover, an occasional mid cigar ought to taste good. It would also have a soothing effect. The Judge smokes.

The Times is the latest great journal to find its editor asleep at the switch. On Tuesday it printed a curious yarn to the effect that the chief backer of Colonel LAMONT as a candidate for Governor of New York was JAMES J. HILL, who did not approve of President ROOSEVELT's course in connection with the Northern Securities case. The story continued:

From a national committee source the belief was expressed last night that Mr. HILL could contribute fully $400,000 to the national campaign and $100,000 to the New York State campaign if Mr. LAMONT is named, and that his donations might reach twice that sum if the indications continued to point to party success and it could be shown to him where further contributions on his part would aid the cause.

Now the Times is, up to its lights, a faithful supporter of the Democratic cause; only a fortnight back, as we carefully noted last week, its editor, Mr. CHARLES R. MILLAR, was invited to Equus to help to heaven the hump. We can imagine the expression of his frow when he read in his own columns this account of prospective barter and sale. But he lost no time in apologizing. On the very next day he "confessed" in humility and contrition that his paper had been "deceived into publishing some very unworthy political gossip." He goes on to tell how it happened:

Among the base language at political headquarters such gossip is common enough, but no attention is paid to it. These statements came from no hanger-on, but from a member of the Democratic National Committee. Had they apparently been made in good faith the making of them might have been attributed to mere verbiage—new and untruthful figures always come to the fore in every campaign. But as the observations in question were plainly malicious and uttered with the intent to serve a purpose not avowed, the theory of ingenuous candor falls to the ground.

We hope we shall not have occasion to refer to further exhibitions of such tactics in that quarter.

This is lame enough to satisfy the Judge's worst enemy. What does the man mean, anyhow? Had the statements been made "apparently in good faith," they might have been attributed to mere foolishness; but since they were "plainly malicious," no room is left for "ingenuous candor." So don't let it happen again! That is the substance of this frank, brutal, and enlightening explanation. We sadly confess our own inability to make head or tail of it. What we should like to know and what the public is entitled to know from the New York Times is the name of the member of the Democratic committee who made this assertion, and, did he speak the truth?

Belief might be brought to the minds of some citizens by the anti-retraction assurance that no matter how the votes go Mr. D. B. HILL will not become Secretary of State. This relief cannot be afforded them. On the other hand, no positive pre-election assurance will or can be given that under no circumstances will Colonel ROOSEVELT act as his own Secretary of State. A certain measure of uncertainty is inseparable from the conduct of affairs. Whomever we vote for, some chances must be taken.

BORRICE COCKRAN is still for PARKER.

The Judge has a coat of arms. A Brooklyn girl who thought she might be related found out by writing to him and sending him her picture. In reply, after expressing thanks for the photograph, the Judge wrote: "The first of my line in America, so far as I have been able to trace, was JOHN PARKER, who married OLIVE TENPLE, at Shrewsbury, Massachusetts, in 1750. You may be able to tell if there is any connection between your PARKERS and mine from the coat of arms, which shows three stages and a chevron charged with a trefoil slipped." The Colonel can trace his Dutch ancestry much further back than this: he has a coat of arms, too, although he is not wearing it just now. But the PARKERS are good, sturdy folk. We have known a good many of them and cannot recall one who has given the family cause for blushing. There is no Scotch or Irish in them; they are

English undiluted, and descend from a Norman who came over with WILLIAM, and located at what is now known as Plymouth. The PARKERS who stayed at home or scattered to the north, like their cousins over here, never did any very great things, but they seem always to have behaved themselves and kept faith. How about that coat of arms, though? It sounds a trifle aristocratic from one who is standing on a platform which vehemently demands "a return to Jeffersonian simplicity in mode of living."

"Chain everything," says TOM, taking off his coat; "Admit nothing," admonishes GEORGE BUTTZ, adjusting his eyeglasses. So the good work goes on.

The Tribune is like the leopard. We dare say it would change if it could, but it can't. Listen to this from a letter to Editor Rood printed approvingly:

It may be good Republican politics to speak of Judge PARKER as a brave, honestly upright, and high-principled man. That means, however, that an honest, high-principled man consents to reap the fruits of an, as yet, disavowed, dishonest, and low principled deed.

In its very beginning Judge PARKER's candidacy is stained, through and through, with the leprosy of deceit. Z. Y. Pittsfield, Mass., August 2, 1904.

Strong language this—vigorous thought! What an earth is the "as yet, disavowed, dishonest, and low-principled deed!" And pray, who is the leper practicing deceit upon everybody except Mr. Z. Y. of Pittsfield, Mass.? There ought really to be a special ward set aside in the Home for Incubables for the Z. Y. family, and an inclosure, at least, for editors who print such rubbish.

"Now plain ALTON B. PARKER," is the head-line over the newspaper account of the candidate's resignation as Chief Judge. Technically, perhaps, true, but in a broad sense far from it. He will always be "the Judge," and he is anything but plain. In point of fact, so far as looks go, he is much handsomer than the Colonel.

We give it up. HARPER'S WEEKLY surely has the Courier-Journal dead to rights. So speaks MARCE HENRY.

The Washington Post suggests that the average domestic trouble maker by comparison with the spectacle of Senator ELKINS's effort to be a good West Virginia Republican and a good son-in-law at the same time. This is not the first time in the recent political history of the State when Mr. ELKINS has found himself in Debsmann's predicament, "confessing a divided duty." Close and cynical observers of prevailing collisions between sentiments in the Senator's breast have ever to the conclusion that his Roman virtue is more than a match for his family affections. It happened not very long ago that a Representative was to be chosen from a certain Congress district, and ex-Senator DAVIS's sympathies were strongly enlisted on behalf of the Democratic nominee. All his influence was exerted on his favorite's behalf, and during one forenoon he convinced himself that he had captured all the working-men voters of a given locality by strong personal appeals. In the afternoon of the same day, however, Senator ELKINS visited the place, and had a confidential, heart-to-heart talk with the same close-furrowing citizens whom his father-in-law believed to have "conquered." So it came to pass that, to the bewilderment of ex-Senator DAVIS, his young friend found himself "snowed under" when the ballots were counted in that locality.

There is no doubt, however, that ex-Senator DAVIS would this year have had a walk-over for the Governorship, had he not accepted a nomination for the Vice-Presidency, because it was settled that the Republican party would not put forward a competitor. How absolute is his control of the Democratic party in his State was demonstrated at Parkersburg on August 4, when, at his request, the Democratic State convention rejected by 887 to 87 votes a proposal to insert a "white supremacy" plank in the State platform. If Mr. DAVIS had been running for Governor, the plank would have been approved by a unanimous vote, but he and his friends had the good sense to recognize that such a declaration would be, to say the least, inopportune, from the view point of its possible effect on the prospects of the national ticket in pivotal States. The greatest menace to the commonwealth in West Virginia was proclaimed by the convention to be the debauchery of the ballot by means of "repenting" and of illegal voting, which, it is asserted, has been carried on systematically in many counties of the State by a ring of corrupt officials, State and Federal, and which has been rendered possible by the systematic importation of illegal negro voters. What the State needs, apparently, is a registration law.

It was not, of course, technically necessary that the Democratic nominee for the Presidency should resign the office of Chief Justice of the Court of Appeals of the State of New York before accepting the nomination of the St. Louis convention for the Presidency, because his fellow citizens of the Empire commonwealth do not vote for him directly next November, but for Presidential electors. There is no doubt, however, that had he availed himself of this quibble, he would have violated the spirit of the State statute, which forbids a member of the judiciary to run for any office except a judicial one. Not only was the resignation a rightful act, but it was announced at the right time. Had the announcement been made earlier, it would have been impossible for Judge PARKER to keep office with a clean docket. A conception of the volume of business which had to be disposed of may be formed when we note that at the very short midsummer session of the Court of Appeals held in Albany on August 5, no fewer than sixty-two decisions were handed down. Only two had to be left over, because the judges who were to write the opinions are in Europe. The most cordial cooperation on the part of his colleagues was needed in order to make it possible for Judge PARKER to leave the bench with a clear conscience. We may mark in passing the fact that of the sixty-two cases decided, Judge PARKER was in the minority as to none of any importance. At the hour when we write, it is unknown who will be appointed Chief Justice of the Court of Appeals ad interim by Governor ORRILL.

He is likely to designate a Republican. If Judge PARKER had postponed his resignation three days longer, Governor ORRILL's appointee would have kept his place upon the bench for a year and nearly five months. As it is, he will only serve until January 1, 1905, when he will be superseded by the Chief Justice to be elected in November next. With reference to that election, we hope that public opinion will pronounce itself overwhelmingly in favor of the non-partisan movement started by many influential members of the New York bar. The proposal is that both of the great political parties shall nominate for the Chief Judgeship of the Court of Appeals EMMA M. CULLEN, of Brooklyn, now Justice of the Supreme Court, and for the Associate Judgeship of the Court of Appeals, which will become vacant on December 31, Justice WILLIAM E. WERNER, of Rochester. Justice CULLEN has been all his life a Democrat, and Justice WERNER is a Republican. There is no doubt that both of the judges named are able and conscientious interpreters of the law. It is certain that Judge PARKER, in the event of his failure to be chosen President, would have been re-nominated for Chief Justice of the Court of Appeals in November, 1905, had he postponed his resignation for three days, because in that case, as we have said, there could have been no election to fill the vacancy this year, and Governor ORRILL's appointee would have held over until January 1, 1906. In view of possible contingencies, some astute politicians would have taken care to keep a second string to their bow. The fact that Judge PARKER did not maintain averbly the reflection that Mr. FAIRBANKS has not yet resigned his position as Senator from Indiana.

We hope the report will prove well founded that our State Department has determined to protest against the decision of the Russian prize-court at Vladivostok in the matter of that part of the cargo of the neutral steamer Arctia which was consigned by American shippers to private merchants in Japan. The Arctia, it will be remembered, at the time of her seizure by a Russian cruiser, was carrying one hundred thousand barrels of flour from Portland, Oregon, to Yokohama. After an examination of her papers, the prize-court came to the conclusion that the vessel should be liberated, together with so much of the flour as was consigned to a neutral port—Hongkong. On the other hand, it pronounced "good prize" and, accordingly, confiscated 50,000 pounds of flour—a good is about thirty-six pounds—which was destined for Japan, and all the railway material on board the Arctia. It is said to have been proved that the railway material, although primarily to be landed at a Japanese port, was to be transhipped thence to Chempulop, and was to be used in the construction of the military railway now in process of construction by the Japanese authorities between Seoul and the Yalu River. It will scarcely be denied that the railway material, if purchased for the account of the Japanese government, was contraband of war. It is the treatment of the American flour by the prize-court which, unless we should resent it promptly and firmly, might have consequences of tremendous import. Without going back any further than the last six years, we may recall the fact that our government, in our own contest with Spain, and, again, during the South-African war, propounded the principle that food conveyed under a neutral flag to an unblockaded belligerent port cannot be regarded as contraband, unless it is consigned directly to a belligerent military or naval force. It is, of course, theoretically possible, if not probable, that, after food thus conveyed should be landed, it might eventually be employed for military purposes, but our government has held that a belligerent cruiser cannot go beyond a neutral vessel's manifest, and that if food products entered thereon are consigned to private merchants, they must be exempt from capture.

It is easy to see why Russia on the one hand, and the United States and Great Britain on the other, would be impelled by their respective interests to take different views of the subject. Russia, in normal years, is not only self-nourishing, but a large exporter of food staples. She has, therefore, nothing to lose and much to gain by insisting that all food transported in neutral vessels to belligerent ports should be dealt with as contraband of war. It is equally obvious that if England, the principal consumer of our surplus food products, should become involved in war with a Continental coalition, American producers would be keenly interested in the enforcement of the view that food sent by a neutral to a belligerent should be exempt from seizure, unless consumed directly by the belligerent government. Great Britain is even more vitally concerned in securing the establishment of such a rule of international law, for she is dependent on foreign countries for more than half of her food supply, and in the event of war with two or more Continental maritime powers, could literally be starved, if the principle asserted by the Vladivostok prize-court, in the case of the American flour shipped on the Arctia from Portland, Oregon, to Yokohama, should meet with general acceptance.

On August 1, by a decision of the House of Lords, the highest court of appeal in Great Britain, about twenty-nine obscure ministers and congregations, mostly Gaelic-speaking Highlanders, were declared to be the legal owners of the property of the Free Kirk of Scotland. The value of this property is reported to be about sixty million dollars, of which fifty-five millions is in churches, colleges, and manors, and the rest in money, or income-producing investments. Another report says twenty millions; but all this property, whatever there is of it, has been accumulated by the Free Kirk since it left the Established Church in 1843, on a question of patronage and authority, and chose to become self-supporting. There was another independent Presbyterian body in Scotland—the United Presbyterians. With this body the Free Kirk determined to combine in 1900, and did combine, forming the United Free Church of Scotland. But the twenty-nine obscure Free Kirk congregations were opposed to the union, and declared that as the only true Free Kirkers they would bring suit for the Free Kirk property. No one dreamed that they could succeed, but now, on appeal from the Scottish courts, they have won their case. The decision affects eleven hundred ministers. To say that there is consternation from end to end of Scotland is to put it mildly.

Sixty years ago the Free Kirk ministers walked out of their manors and churches under the leadership of Dr. CHALMERS, gave up their livings, and exchanged the assured support of the Establishment for such doubtful maintenance as their sympathizing congregations might provide. It was a moment the heroism of which is still a tale that Scotland is proud to tell. Now their successors find themselves again bereft of houses of worship, income, and shelter for a stunning legal decision which is absurd in equity, however good in law. What will follow cannot be predicted. The only legal remedy for the Free Kirk's plight is an act of Parliament. A compromise with the twenty-nine Highland kirks is theoretically possible, but the vicars hating war on a question of creed and conscience after a hard fight, are likely to hang on stubbornly to the spoils. There is said to be no prospect of help from Parliament before it adjourns, and meanwhile the day of the decision every Free Kirk treasurer has been re-trained for injunctives from paying out money for church purposes. The Free Kirk may reasonably see in all this evidence of the special solicitude of Providence that its spiritual upliftings shall not be obscured by material hindrances, but the chances are that it will try hard to get back its property. Some immediate solace it may find in the quickened spirits of its ministers. There will be great sermons, born of affliction, and the Scotch appreciate a sermon.

In spite of the Eastern war and the strikes and the candidates, the first week in August was rather a slack time for news, and Bishop Porter dealt kindly with the newspapers when he came down from Copenhagen and made a speech at the opening of the Sulway Tavern. It has made an interesting scandal that a bishop should appear at the opening of a saloon where liquor, undisturbed and undisturbed, is to be sold, and the resulting denunciations, approbations, and discussions have filled the local papers and spread far and wide through the land. Did the Bishop do right? He did what he thought was right, which is as near as any of us usually comes. Whether he did wisely is a harder question. Mr. Johnson, the inventor of the ethical tavern, says in a letter to the New York Times: "I am not pleased that the motorist which has befallen us has increased our sales so largely. I would have preferred that the experiment be given a chance without the visits of the curians." It was the presence of the Bishop that gave the new tavern most of its notoriety, which Mr. Johnson regrets, and invited the visits of the curians. But of course Bishop Porter knew that his action would make a stir, and thought the stir worth making. He took a definite and conspicuous stand on one side of an important and much-mooted question.

Incidentally he rebuked the opinions that have resulted in the suppression of the army canten. "If you place the saloon under the ban," said the Bishop at the opening, "you would make one of the most tragic, or comic, failures in history. Are you going to make the saloon and what it stands for so execrably bad that a man cannot go into it without losing his self-respect? The temperance question is as far from solution now as it was twenty years ago, with the addition that false methods have bred a large amount of hypocrisy." His purpose, then, at the opening of the new tavern, was not to give encouragement and approval to drinkers, but to rebuke hypocrisy, and reveal his conviction that since men are going to drink, and there must be drinking-places in great cities, it is far better that the drinking should be done in decent, reputable places than in dives. That is precisely the position that has been taken by the defenders of the army canten, and it is sound. Of course the new tavern could have been opened without the Bishop's presence and could have gone its way. He could have avoided all the row, saved Bishop Nicholson's blushes, and escaped a huge amount of recreation. But he is a bold man, and a man of affairs as well as of religion, and does not mind rows—except church rows—if he thinks one is needed. Church rows he tries to avoid, since most of them arise from the desire of one party to put shackles on another.

Judge CORNELL of New York has been so profusely charged with advocating a shotgun policy with unruly automobilists that he has thought proper to explain what basis there is for supposing he held the views attributed to him. He says it is true that one day, seeing an automobile dash wildly through Thirty-fourth Street, driving cars up on to the sidewalk and pedestrians to the stoeps of houses, he said, unofficially, to a bicycle policeman, "If the automobilist had run over any of these people, I should not have blamed them very much if they had shot at him." The judge is a judge, and it was doubtless indiscreet of him to talk about checking or punishing automobilists except by due process of law. Of course the habit of shooting at automobilists would never do, for prompt and accurate discrimination would rarely be possible, and the chances are that when an automobilist was bagged it would be the wrong one. Practically it is much more dangerous for the shooter to shoot at a culpable automobilist than to endure his aggression and let him go. But the aggressive and reckless automobilist is an enemy of society. When contrary to law and right he runs down or imperils the life of an innocent citizen, he ought not to get away unscathed. He commits an assault, and if an assault with an automobile is not an assault with a deadly weapon, what is? Theoretically any way of stopping an automobilist who is running amuck is excusable. Practically, of course, it is exceedingly unwise to shoot.

At Fort Sheridan, near Chicago, six non-commissioned officers have been reduced to the ranks for running what is technically known as "a blind pig," or unlawful canten. When the men grumbled that they were doing no more than the commissioned officers did, Colonel WUTTERHALM, it seems, disclosed with some emphasis that what was met for officers in the post club-house was not necessarily proper for privates in quarters. The papers say that he said: "To put the private on the same footing as the commissioned officer would be ruinous to discipline. We must have caste in the army just as there is caste in outside society. We have the same class distinctions, and without them we could have no discipline."

Colonel WUTTERHALM's sentiments are sound enough, but if he was quoted accurately, he was not fortunate in his method of expressing them. Military law gives officers privileges which privates do not share. It creates an artificial caste for military purposes, though whether it formally gives officers larger liquor privileges than it gives to privates is arguable. But in outside society American law recognizes no caste and no class distinctions. Our men are as good as another, and no better, except in so far as he can make himself superior to some of his fellows by obtaining superior qualifications. There is no definite artificial barrier between classes in general society, as there is between officer and private in military society. Superiority in fortune, in breeding, in education, in character, raises men above their mates. There are plenty of superior people, and their children are apt in their turn to inherit their advantages, but that does not constitute caste. There are no rigid divisions between folks in this country. Inevitably the Ins are going on and the Outs are coming in. Inevitably society is dying at the top and being replenished from the bottom. There is no caste in American society. Money, character, and brains are at the bottom of all our social inequalities.

The fashionable hotels and restaurants of New York are pleasant places for people who can afford to use them. They are luxurious and brilliant. A contemporary newspaper writer suggests that they are lending the clubs as places of resort. They have the best food and drink in the market and nowadays they seem to have the liveliest society. They don't exclude women; that is their chief advantage. Women are very decorative. Men like to dine with them, and if not with them, at least within sight of them. The show of women at one of the great New York restaurants on an evening in summer is almost worth the price of admission. The commentator whose suggestion we have noted recalls that the oldest clubs began as taverns and presently excluded the public, but now, he thinks, "the open bar is recovering its importance with us." That may well be, for another defect of the New York clubs, besides that they exclude women, is that they exclude too many men that men who use them want to see. No club (nor any three clubs in New York) includes all or nearly all the men whom the average grown-up man in New York wants to stand a chance of meeting. But at the big restaurants there is a chance of meeting all the world. So long as a club merely keeps out people you don't want to meet, it is advantageous. When it keeps out four-fifths of the people you do want to meet, its advantages as a social centre begin to be debatable, though it may still be very valuable as a place of rest and seclusion, a second home.

Judge Parker's Speech of Acceptance

It was a difficult task to which Chief-Judge ALTON BLOOMER PARKER addressed himself on Wednesday, August 10. In the speech shortly to be signed, he accepted of the Democratic nomination for the Presidency. It was difficult because, in his message to the convention, he had objected to only a single feature of the Democratic platform. Was it to be inferred that he gave an unqualified endorsement to every part of the platform of which he did not utter disapproval in advance? If such an inference were to prove warranted, he could hardly be expected to counsel himself to those conservative Democrats and Independents who hold that the St. Louis platform, as manipulated by Mr. BRYAN, and notoriously reported by the Committee on Resolutions, was objectionable, not only by reason of its silence concerning the gold standard, but in many other particulars. Let us say at once that Judge PARKER, in his speech of acceptance, has graciously condescended to his own platform, and in so doing the fact that, in words which we cannot but deem provocative, he has described the platform framed at St. Louis as "admirable." It is true that he enumerates specific grounds for admiration, but impartial persons are likely to find more justification for his approval in his personal interpretation of the spirit of the document than in any of the criticisms made from the letter of the text. As expounded by the Democratic nominee, the programme to which he pledges adherence is much more definite and satisfactory than the incoherent forays of professions put forward at St. Louis. While what he says about the trusts will certainly seem not aggressive enough to suit those who would regard capital, who, whether consciously or unconsciously, are converts to socialistic doctrines, there is nothing equivocal in Judge PARKER's declarations touching the imperative duty of each of the three departments of government to respect the limits traced for it by the Constitution; touching the right of every citizen, including the non-union workman, to live and labor where he will, and to pursue his calling as he chooses; touching the urgent need of tariff revision and touching the vital importance to American citizens themselves and to their posterity of remedying openly and definitely any intention of exercising permanent rule, no matter how enlightened and benevolent, over the inhabitants of the Philippines.

It is obvious that Chief-Judge PARKER has in view certain acts of the present Chief-Magistrate as the interpretation in the antislavery struggle, the assumption of the existence of a constructive reason between two immediately consecutive sessions of Congress, the establishment by Executive fiat of an age-limit of physical and mental disability, and the notification lately given to Latin-American republics that, if they wish to escape interference on the part of the United States, they must pay the debt incurred to foreigners, including those arising out of contract—when he points out that, nevertheless, "because the limitations placed upon the departments of government by the Constitution are disregarded by officials desiring to accomplish that which to them seems good, whether the power exists in them or not, it becomes desirable to call attention to the fact that the people in whom all power resides, have now fit, through the medium of the Constitution, to limit the governmental powers conferred, and to say to departments created by it, 'Thine far shall thou go, and no further.'" With this sentence, which is plainly levelled against the exhibition of a self-willed and arbitrary, as distinguished from a judicial, temperament, may be coupled the repudiation of the spirit of militarism which of late has gained ground in this country. It is not disputed, in the speech of acceptance, that such armament, military and naval, as may be needed for the security of the republic, and the protection of the rights of its citizens, at home and abroad, should be maintained. Any other course is repelled as "false economy."

At the same time the Democratic nominee protests against the feeling, which, to his eye, is now too prevalent, "that, by reason of the commanding position we have assumed in the world, we must take part in the disputes and brawls of foreign countries; and that, because we have grown great, we should intervene in every important question that arises in other parts of the world." Judge PARKER denies that our government was "created for a career of political or civilizing condescension in foreign countries or among alien races," and it is his conviction that "the most efficient work we can do in uplifting the people of other countries is by the presentation of a happy, proper one, self-governing action as an ideal to be emulated, a model to be followed." He repudiates, too, the notion that either physical courage or patriotism is a civic virtue generally or generally required in the arts of peace, and when no large military armaments are kept up. Such was the situation of the United States—with the exception of the brief and small war with Mexico—during the half-century preceding the civil war, but those who imagine that the nation must have grown effeminate during that period are misled by Judge PARKER in reading the casualty rolls of the armies on either side at Shiloh, Vicksburg, Fredericksburg, and Gettysburg, at Stone River and Chickasaw. The heroic deeds wrought in the civil war are ever prompted by devotion to the country, and not by the sedulous cultivation of a bellicose spirit.

With regard to the tariff the Democratic nominee speaks with moderation and sobriety. He invites the voters who desire tariff revision to consider whether, judged by the record of performance, rather than by that of promise, on the part of the Republican party in this regard, it is not probable that in the event of that party's success, its attitude toward the tariff would be so shaped as to gratify those interests which are opposed to any change whatever. As it is an unquestionable fact that, with absolute control of both the legislative and executive departments since March 4, 1897, the Republicans have made neither any reduction, nor any attempt at reduction, in tariff duties, it is not unreasonable to assume that a future Congress, in which that party shall have a majority, will carry out no revision of the tariff downward.

Judge PARKER at the same time acknowledges that the Democratic cannot hope to secure a majority of the Senate during the next four years, and, therefore, will be unable to secure any modification of the tariff, except with the help of some Republican members of that body. So firm is he, however, in the belief that the demand of the people for a reform of the tariff is just, that he indulges the hope that, should a Democratic House of Representatives and a Democratic Executive be chosen by the people, even a Republican Senate may lend the warning, and not give at least some measure of relief. To the end that the hope may be fulfilled, Judge PARKER proposes an invention of capital impotence, an innovation calculated to disarm much of the resistance usually offered by manufacturers to tariff changes. He emphasizes the expediency of inserting in any project of tariff revision a stipulation that such a reasonable period shall intervene, between the date of the enactment of the statute making a revision and the date of its enforcement, as shall be deemed sufficient to enable the industry or business affected by such revision to adjust itself to the changes and new conditions imposed. We do not hesitate to say that this proposal, though novel, is, on the face of it, a suggestion that ought to be printed in letters of gold. There is not an intelligent manufacturer or business man who will not acclaim the suggestion of a method by which, manifestly, tariff reform can be reconciled with industrial and financial stability.

The section of the speech of acceptance that deals with the "Greens" will, undoubtedly, be eyed with suspicion by that wing of the Democracy which regards Mr. BRYAN as the great prophet. What the Bryanites want is additional Federal legislation of a drastic kind against all combinations of capital which, conceivably, may acquire monopolies, and the inevitable enforcement of all existing and future statutes. Judge PARKER expresses a grave doubt whether any Federal statutes are needed to avert or suppress such combinations, and in so doing he is, we think, to be commended. He protests against the assumption that the decisions of the United States Supreme Court, of the New York Court of Appeals, and of the courts of last resort in many other States—affords a complete legal remedy against monopoly. The fact, if it be a fact, that monopolies have multiplied in number and increased in power, is attributed, not to the failure of the courts to apply the law, when properly moved therein by administrative officials or private individuals, but to the failure of officials charged with the duty of enforcing the law to take the necessary procedura to procure the judgments of courts having appropriate jurisdiction, coupled with the fact that the legislative departments of some State governments, as well as Congress, have by legislation encouraged the propagation of monopolistic combinations.

What is needed, in the judgment of the Democratic nominee—in addition to a reasonable revision of the tariff—is, not so much, other and different laws, as officials having faith the disposition and the courage to enforce existing laws. We repeat that Judge PARKER's view of the obliquity of the common law for the control and coercion of trusts is likely to cost him the votes of a good many Bryanites. He deserves all the more credit for facing unflinchingly what he must foresee may be the consequences of truth-telling.

One of the most notable paragraphs in the speech of acceptance is that in which Judge PARKER announces that, inasmuch as if chosen Chief-Magistrate, he will not be a candidate for reelection—Mr. CLEVELAND said that in 1891—that he will not accept a re-nomination. He declares any intention, in making this declaration, of criticising any President, from WASHINGTON down to ROOSEVELT, who has either held the office for two terms, or sought to exercise himself. On the contrary, he is merely making a strong argument may be advanced in support of the reelection of the President. It is, nevertheless, Judge PARKER's deliberate and irrevocable judgment that "the interests of this country are now so vast, and the questions presented are frequently of such overpowering magnitude to the people, that it is indispensable to the maintenance of a fitting administration before the people, not only that the Chief-Magistrate should be independent, but that that independence should be known of all men."

To sum up the purport of the letter of acceptance in a sentence, we repeat that the Democratic nominee has by no means strengthened himself with the Bryanite wing of his party, but he has indicated precisely the sort of President he will make, if elected.

The Last Days of the Session in England

NOTHING more remarkable has been seen in a long time, in English Parliamentary life, than the intemperance of vigor which is marking the last days of the session. Mr. BALFOUR is gently but firmly asserting himself, and it is becoming evident to all parties that his influence in the House of Commons is as great as ever, perhaps even greater. He continues to govern by sheer sweetness and light, as MATTHEW ARNOLD would have said, or by the innate gift of the governing class, as we have already expressed it. His impetuosity is hardening and growing steadier with every week. In spite of the tropical weather, which tempts so many members out of town and away to the moors, in nearly every important division, for the last week, or two, Mr. BALFOUR has had a majority of from seventy to eighty, all adverse by elections to the contrary notwithstanding. At this rate, should every election go against him, he will still have a working majority three years hence, a sufficiently remarkable political phenomenon.

The impetuosity of all this fire, of course, in its bearing on the great question to decide or not to decide. If Mr. BALFOUR feels his position firm and solid, if he has a good working majority, there is no reason in the world why he should not continue to hold the reins of power, at least until February next, when Parliament again meets. It will be able to do as it pleases, as soon as the session is over, unhampered by fears of adverse divisions or Parliamentary schisms. The whole power is in the hands of the ministry, between two sessions, and Mr. BALFOUR has shown that, whatever may be said as to his fiscal and economic theories, at least he can use power to admirable purpose in the daily conduct of the empire.

The last days of the session have been remarkable for a clearer expression of his views by the Premier than he has hitherto deemed it opportune to give. "I am a free trader," he has declared; "though I do not accept all the definitions of free trade put forward by the opposition." Even more important is his sound and far-reaching criticism of Mr. CHAMBERLAIN'S views on certain privileges of the fiscal question. "Mr. CHAMBERLAIN thinks," says Mr. BALFOUR, "that the imperial tariff system is or calls it, is a simple and natural arrangement. He thinks that to take the colonies into our confidence on foreign affairs is quite a simple operation. But it is quite difficult enough for any government to take even the House of Commons into its confidence on foreign affairs; how, then, could we possibly carry out my honorable friend's suggestion as to taking the colonies into our confidence? Whether in time some great constitutional inventor will find a method of having a representative institution dealing with the affairs of the empire, I do not know, but I have never expressed a doubt that it is our business to find out what the colonies can give, and what we can give, what they want, and what we want."

This is sound, practical sense, absolutely and broadly sound, and shows that while Mr. BALFOUR'S theories lack the rigidity of a mathematical theorem, or, perhaps, just because they lack that rigidity, his instinct is sound and sane, and may be trusted to reach a wise and workable conclusion.

That was Mr. BALFOUR'S reply to a very strong appeal from Mr. CHAMBERLAIN to dissolve Parliament and let the electorate speak its mind on the great fiscal issue. "In my opinion," Mr. CHAMBERLAIN has said, "this policy is ready to be submitted to the people of this country. I do not say it would be accepted at once by a people accustomed for sixty years to another policy, but that it will be accepted eventually, I am as certain as that I stand here. And the sooner it is submitted to the country, the sooner that consummation will come. If it is legitimate to make a reciprocal arrangement with a foreign country, why, in Heaven's name, is it not proper with your own kindfolk?"

Speaking a few days ago at Welbeck Abbey, the house of the Duke of Portland, Mr. CHAMBERLAIN outlined the definitive form of his policy, returning to the original lines he had drawn at the outset, and banishing every shred of compromise, whether to his friend the Premier or to the more convinced free traders, like the Duke of Devonshire. He came out clear and distinct for a tax on food, a tax of five shillings a quarter on wheat; a tax on flour, as high as to be prohibitive, and to put the grinding of the nation's bread wholly in the hands of English millers; a tax on meat, on eggs, on butter, and every form of food, practically, except sugar, which hardly enters at all into the diet of any class in England. From this extreme position Mr. CHAMBERLAIN evidently does not intend to recede; and if by-elections have any meaning at all it is precisely this policy which the British electorate will have nothing to do with on any basis. Here in a contrast, sufficiently marked, with the sweet reasonableness and patience of the Premier, and it is on this policy that Mr. CHAMBERLAIN wishes his honorable friend to go to the country, on institution which his honorable friend has no intention of accepting. The breach is, therefore, much wider than it was in the beginning of the session, when Mr. BALFOUR and Mr. CHAMBERLAIN were almost at one on the expediency of a protective tariff. Mr. CHAMBERLAIN is unwilling to wait, because he cannot very well afford to wait. If Parliament were dissolved at once, the Liberals would probably have a majority sufficient to enable them to hold together for two or three years at least, and only after that could Mr. CHAMBERLAIN'S turn possibly come. But by that time he will be seventy-two, hardly an age at which one could begin a new epoch of imperial statesmanship. Mr. BALFOUR, who is only fifty-six, can afford to go ahead, but Mr. CHAMBERLAIN is naturally in a hurry.

A Loss to Literature

WILLIAM McLENNAN, of Montreal, who died in Vallanholme, Italy, July 28, at the age of forty-eight, was not only, as JOHN RUSKIN has said, "one of the most substantial contributors to Canadian literature," but a distinguished writer of fiction. He is best known to American readers by his novels Spanish Jack and The Span of Life—the latter written in collaboration with Miss JEAN S. McLENNAN—published serially in HARPER'S MAGAZINE (1902 and 1903), with illustrations by the celebrated French artist, F. DE MEYERBECK. Spanish Jack dealt with the fortunes of the Scotch Pretender to the throne of England. The Span of Life is a story of the French and Indian war, and ends with the capture of Quebec. Both novels were among the best historical romances of the latter part of the nineteenth century, more truthful than SCOTT'S, and equally powerful and picturesque whether portraying court or camp life. In quite another vein, this author's stories of old France—published earlier in HARPER'S under the caption "As Told by His Grace," were the best of their kind, and would not suffer by comparison with ALPHONSE DARTRE'S sketches in the same field. Mr. McLENNAN was also the author of a number of poems of rare lyrical excellence.

He was emphatically a man of letters, a careful student of literature as well as of history. To know him best one should have met him on a winter evening in his well-selected library and have chatted with him before the open fire, mostly listening while he mingled with his talk about books humorous and characteristic anecdotes and descriptions of Canadian and European life. Those who met him thus, especially if they were admitted to his list of friends, know how much has passed with him away from earth.

Those who have only known him by what he has written will regret a loss which has come to us, and, after years of physical suffering, which he bore as bravely as STEVENSON and STODOLSKY.

Repression

IT is reported that the boss hands of the country, which had prepared themselves to stimulate the Republican gathering this fall with the strains of "A Hot Time," have been generally notified that that tune will not be in favor, and that they must restrict themselves to pieces more consonant with the present mood and querulous humor of the Republican confabulate—fourth page.

What's that the band's a-playing, Grouse?

The tune of Cuba free!

It's no safe time for bands to play

"A Hot Time," Grouse, for no!

I know it makes my pulses jump.

The best of times, I know!

But, oh, don't let them play it, Grouse!

We're not in Cuba now!

For got to be a Grouse, Grouse.

For ten long weeks and more.

And never speak a strenuous word.

And never touch a gun.

And walk a chalk-line every day.

And fold my hands, and wait.

We've got to keep my shirt on, Grouse!

Until November eight!

But Grouse, my Grouse, it's uphill work.

On that that band is playing.

It's hard enough without that tune.

For me to hear the hit!

If they'll come round election night.

And things have gone our way.

"A Hot Time"? Well, I guess so, Grouse!

That's what the band shall play!

Copyright, 1914, by Dorn & Seaton

THE LATEST PHOTOGRAPH OF MRS. ALTON B. PARKER

Finish of the Saratoga Handicap, "Lord of the Vale" winning, "Red Vega" second

The first Race of the Meet—the Struggle in the Stretch, "Minnow," on inside, leading

Finish of the Flash Stakes, won by "Sycoby" by Six Lengths

SNAP-SHOTS OF SCENES AT THE OPENING OF THE RACING SEASON AT SARATOGA

The racing season at Saratoga begins on August 1, and will continue for twenty-one days. One of the most important races during the meet is the Saratoga Handicap, run on the first day, which was won by "Lord of the Vale." "The Picket," "Alexander," and "Major Deussenfeld" were among the great horses defeated by "Lord of the Vale." The most valuable race of the Eastern turf season, the Great Republic, for $50,000 stakes, was run on August 6, and won by "Belth."

Photographs by Fredrick

"Roughie," which James R. Keene pronounces the greatest Colt of the Century, and for which he refused an offer of $100,000

"Roughie" on the Jump in the Ballston Gap Steeplechase

Fitchell Kerner (at the left), Edward L. Smith, and James R. Keene at the Saratoga Race-track

VIEWS TAKEN DURING THE RACING SEASON AT SARATOGA

"Roughie," the winner of the Flash Stakes and the Saratoga Special, is considered by his owner, Mr. James R. Keene, the greatest two-year-old yearling in the world. Mr. Keene recently refused an offer of $100,000 for "Roughie," which is $50,000 more than was ever paid in America for a two-year-old colt. "Roughie" has never been beaten. Mr. Keene is also the owner of "Delhi," winner of the Great Republic Stakes. Four interesting steeplechase events have been run during the meeting at Saratoga, among them the Ballston Gap, the Meyersbrook and the Saratoga Cup, but these were less and less satisfactory, owing to the fact that the local horses refused the hurdles in some of the most important events.

College Reminiscences of Senator Fairbanks

By Julius Chambers

THE college year was about to begin at the Ohio Wesleyan University. Recitations were to start on the following day. President Frederick Merrick, an aged man, who wore a beard, rather like that of Homer, literally, was seated at a table upon which lay an open book. Before him stood two boys, candidates for admission to the college and about to go through the solemn formality of "matriculation."

Two lads now dissimilar in appearance could not have been found among the hundreds of students, active and prospective. They were farmers' boys from an adjoining county. Their fathers, who had driven nineteen miles along country roads to bring them to the town of Delaware, had parted with the boys in tears only a few minutes previous to their appearance before the college president. The younger had been raised on adjoining farms, had wrestled and romped together on the village green, had attended the same county school, and had come, literally hand in hand, to the nearest seat of learning to simultaneously struggle for an education.

The taller of the boys was addressed first by the president. Letters of introduction and references from his teacher were demanded. They were produced. To pay for his tuition the candidate offered scrap iron for ready funds when the institution was founded. It was a funny and comical bit of money, but on its face were the words "Good for four years' instruction at the Ohio Wesleyan University." On the faith of that promise rested the hopes of the candidate; he hadn't any other means. His answers were satisfactory, the scrap was acceptable, the former boy was matriculated first at the table, a job was placed in his hand, and, with his tongue in the corner of his mouth, he wrote, in bold but awkward characters:

"Charles Warren Fairbanks, age fifteen, Enonville Centre, Union County, Ohio."

His companion, Ira Ambrose, some six years older, underwent similar catfishing, signed the roll, and the two boys became members of the senior preparatory class.

My only excuse for dwelling upon this scene is because I happened to be present, as a sophomore, to watch for a candidate for my native town. Years afterwards I saw this same Fairbanks, grown to lank and wealth, take the oath as a Senator of the United States; but the grade that filled the boy's heart and made ready his sun-faded face that September morning, 1867, far outshone the graduate that came to the light on forty-four.

Carrying their matriculation cards in their hands, these two "preps" from Enonville Centre walked to the white sulphur spring on the campus and, kneeling upon its brink, drank for the first time of the bubbling water. The spring was then, as now, the pride and glory of the college and village.

On that occasion, likely as not, the strangers first heard a tale that never grows old at Delaware: How Professor Harris, afterward a bishop of the Methodist-Episcopal Church, was "dicked" by irreverent colleagues. "Harris," Professor of Moral Philosophy (a word that may have been a misnomer), was fondly and earnestly toward his pupils. He often humiliated them in the classroom, and they bore him no love.

The pedagogy was indignantly fond of the springwater. His passion exceeded that of temperance. He revolved, "how thirsty! Amid the high grass near the spring, and hidden, he believed, by a board which the professor carried to the fountain and placed across its head, stone high. Upon this wooden support he would stretch himself, and with his face among the bubbles, drink deeply.

The dark night this board was sawed neatly through and replaced. When the complacent instructor, puffing and blowing, lay down next morning to enjoy his draught, he took a sulphur bath! For this mishap several students were expelled.

I doubt if Fairbanks registered the delight in which he would have stood had he been in college at the time of the Harris episode. Not that he was object to pranks; but he was a carpenter. Had his kit of tools, and worked at his trade on Saturdays. Among that outfit were many saws. He revolved, "how thirsty! Amid the high grass near the spring, and hidden, he believed, by a board which the professor carried to the fountain and placed across its head, stone high. Upon this wooden support he would stretch himself, and with his face among the bubbles, drink deeply.

The dark night this board was sawed neatly through and replaced. When the complacent instructor, puffing and blowing, lay down next morning to enjoy his draught, he took a sulphur bath! For this mishap several students were expelled.

I doubt if Fairbanks registered the delight in which he would have stood had he been in college at the time of the Harris episode. Not that he was object to pranks; but he was a carpenter. Had his kit of tools, and worked at his trade on Saturdays. Among that outfit were many saws. He revolved, "how thirsty! Amid the high grass near the spring, and hidden, he believed, by a board which the professor carried to the fountain and placed across its head, stone high. Upon this wooden support he would stretch himself, and with his face among the bubbles, drink deeply.

In these days, even in Western colleges, the classics were an enforced study. The only Wesleyan institution in Ohio boasted the possession of Professor Syntaxis Williams, whose (local) reputation was that of the first Greek scholar in the West. The door of his classroom was the phrase, in Greek characters, Μόρρις εστίν—(Study is everything). The memorable translation about Professor Williams was that he insisted upon translations in the Greek verb. The "Amphibian," for example, was required to take this: "All things and things are things to be, on the one hand, Airtaureas; then, on the other hand, Cyrus."

Students under "old Syntaxis" thought his methods of instruction very silly until they took up Greek prose composition, then they recognized the wisdom of the professor's wisdom. Consequently, they learned the order in which the words must stand, and only aimed to dig them out of the dictionary.

In addition to his other studies, the care of his room, and preparation of his meals, Fairbanks "clevered." German, which was a sophomore study, and entered the class under Professor Lachow. The candidates for instruction in the modern languages were so few that one professor sufficed.

The subject of this sketch was essentially religious, regardless of his attendance at chapel and church; but he was fond of sports, and revelled in skating and swimming. Though the southern part of the college town of Delaware flows (flowing) Creek, a dam across this stream supplied power for a saw-mill, depth of water for a swimming-pool in summer, and a run for a mill-race in winter. The dam was in winter, the creek was a mile above the mill, on a narrow bank and under a group of maples. The water was "over your head" at all seasons, owing to the stability of the dam's masonry.

During his freshman year Young Fairbanks made himself generally known to the village of Delaware. He and his class enjoyed the excitement of attending fires. The town owned two hand-engines, largely manned by student volunteers. When the count house bell was heard, the collegians would promptly turn out. An old day-mill was a frequent offender, but its fire occurred in daytime, the one occasion, however, a serious conflagration broke out at night in a closely settled district, and when the foreman of the company did not appear, Fairbanks took command. The students, under his direction, put out the fire and rescued several women and children from burning.

Near the campus, the chairman of the Wesleyan Union joined the "Christianian Literary Society." Joseph H. Fowler, who had been prominent as a student for three years, had left Wesleyan that fall (1868) for Cornell University. Being in the junior class, it is doubtful if Fairbanks knew him.

If the Union County boy had not met over the people of the town as a freshman, he captured the hearts of his college companions when he became a sophomore. The coup was made in this way:

Two of the elevated upper classes were John E. Lock and John E. Lock, and a limited number of freshmen. First rivalry existed between these two literary societies, and a contest was arranged. College politics prevented the selection of either Lock or Jones as speakers. When a "mock program" made its appearance on the night of the affair it was traced to them, and the faculty suspended the two juniors.

Fairbanks of '72 saw his opportunity and seized it.

A students' meeting had been called. To this Fairbanks went, and, harrowing official condemnation, made a stirring speech, criticizing the faculty's action as an interference with the rights of American citizenship. He held that the "mock scheme" did not constitute anything scandalous or blasphemous, and, therefore, was not calculated to bring disrespect upon the university, its officers, or its students. He demonstrated its humor by reading portions of the sacred constitution of the United States, and by expelling the men ridiculed until they disclaimed any feeling of annoyance or humiliation. The preparation of the "kit," the speaker asserted, was merely an exercise of the right to criticize an exhibition arranged among the students, for their own education and amusement. The faculty had no business to meddle in a literary controversy between two associations of collegians; to do so was usurpation of authority, which, if unchecked, might infect the whole body politic, subvert the rights of man, and even render the constitution of the land. He "viewed the aggression with alarm"—remember, Fairbanks was not trying to be humorous; he was gravely earnest!

Everybody in the chapelroom that night conceded that the sophomore had made "a rousing defense" of Lock and Jones. Yet not one agreed that Fairbanks would be sent home for criticizing the action of the faculty. He would have been, if Dr. Merrick, an anthropologist in pedagogy, had had his way. But that faculty contained two remarkably progressive members. One was Dr. McCall, who should have been in the "Unionists" class; the other was Professor Whitlock, who "held down" the chair of advanced Latin.

At a special meeting of the faculty, called next day, these up-to-date teachers took sides with Fairbanks. They spoke up, and declared that students should be encouraged to have opinions and to express them.

Dr. McCall's speech to the faculty brought tears to some eyes, for there existed a tone of human sympathy in his vocal chords that became silent when his heart was in his talk. He said that I am not the father of the "Amphibian," who spoke without regard of disapproving the King of England.

John Lock and "Clint" Jones, and the new officer, Fairbanks, were summoned before the inquisition. The sophomore, knowing that his bridges were gone behind him, repeated his address of the previous evening. It was more logically arranged, no doubt, for he had had time to put the points upon paper and memorize them.

The suspended men were reinstated, and after that hour the name of Fairbanks was on every tongue. He became the most popular man in the Ohio Wesleyan University. Members of the faculty who had condemned his association with one another in showing him consideration in the classroom and on the street. The secret fraternities "crowned" him, the most aristocratic among these organizations gladly overlooking the fact that Fairbanks was the son of a poor farmer, making his own bed, cooking his own meals, and working at a carpenter's bench to earn his way through school. He joined the Phi Kappa Delta, with which literally dozens of his other friends were affiliated, and of which society he was the national president.

Fairbanks wasn't a phenomenon in his studies; but had there been a chapter of Phi Beta Kappa at Wesleyan he would have at least been so belonging to the first eight in his class. He was a tremendous orator.

Will Mr. Chamberlain Carry Home Rule?

By Sydney Brooks

LONDON, August 3, 1901.

I T seems fairly certain that the Irish are about to become once more the masters of English politics. For a long while, ten years almost, it has been possible to move or less decisively than from one's political calculations. Since 1885 the Unionist majority in the House of Commons has been large enough to outbalance the combined forces of Liberalism and Nationalism. The Irish party in consequence has been little but a party of protest and obstruction. It has been more than that, however, and sometimes less. During the floor war it rose to heights of tactical relief: during the debates on the Education Bill of 1892 it sank so low as to become almost a wing of the Unionist party. The Irish have been at times a party of protest, a party of assumed acquiescence. But though it has scored one or two minor victories and been responsible for a considerable number of "secesses" in the House, though it has fought every measure which it objected to with its old energy, the Irish party as a whole, has not been able to influence the course of events at all decisively. It has not been in that position which to a small party is the most desirable and effective of all positions—it has not been able to hold the balance of power. No English government since the collapse of Lord Rosebery's ministry has been obliged to depend for its existence upon Irish votes. There has, therefore, been no opportunity for the "deal" in which the Irish party could, on chance of borrowing its support in return for legislation that would square with Nationalist ideals, no hope of bringing to bear on ministerial measures a remorseless and devastating pressure. For the past decade the Irish Nationalists have been irregular auxiliaries to the regular opposition.

I need hardly say that the goal of Irish politics continues to be home rule, and that the attitude of the Nationalist M. P.'s towards the two great English parties is determined solely by the degree of their willingness to help Ireland towards that goal. The Irish entered on an alliance with the Liberals in the eighties, not in the least because they felt any sympathy for Liberal aims or principles, but because Mr. Chamberlain was ready to champion the home-rule cause. That alliance could only endure so long as the Liberals remained faithful to the Gladstonian heritage. Everybody knows that they have long ago scorned it, that some have definitely repudiated it, and that a consciousness of its political hopelessness has sunk deep into the minds of the rank and file. There is no possibility, even if the Liberals are returned to power at the next election, of a third home-rule bill being introduced into the House of Commons. That is recognized on all hands as axiomatic, and its recognition has naturally severed the old alliance between the Liberals and the Nationalists, and left the latter free to transfer their allegiance to some other quarter. I wish again to emphasize the fact that from the Irish point of view there is no more reason why they should be working with the Liberals than with the Unionists, as between those parties their actions are governed entirely by Irish considerations, and that the capacity of Mr. Chamberlain to have learned the value of perfect political impartiality. There are, indeed, several reasons why they should prefer to be in temporary alliance with the Unionists rather than with the Liberals. One is that Unionism today is far more sane and rational than it used to be. It has practically abandoned the policy of coercion, and it has passed two important measures—the Irish Local Government Act and the Irish Land Purchase Act—that go at least part of the way towards meeting Irish aspirations. A second and greater reason is that the Unionist party controls the House of Lords. The fundamental trouble with the Irish Liberal camp was that its results could not be guaranteed. The House of Lords always blocked the way. There is an irrefragable rule in the event of an Irish Unionist alliance would at once disappear. The Upper House will pass any measure that has once received the approval of the Conservative majority in the House of Commons. The Unionists are thus always able to do what they please.

So much for the general position. Let us now see how it is affected by the floor war. There are in the House of Commons 220 members. Of these 182 are Unionists, 34 are Liberals, and the Nationalists number 4. The Unionist majority in the House is thus large out of the question, as he is not supposed to have any votes, and his seat is never contested. Of the 182 Unionists some 120 are known to favor either Mr. Chamberlain's policy of reticence and educational preference, or Mr. Balfour's policy of reticence. 30 have definitely broken away from the party and voted on the free-trade side; and about 120 have yet to commit themselves definitely. The normal question which is coming to be with the floor war is the extent of the majority in the House of Commons of 100 over the combined Liberal and Nationalist forces.

A full dress debate on the floor question would probably give a majority of between 40 and 50, assuming, as we may fairly do, that the Unionists and the Chamberlainites supported one another. To give the Liberals and Nationalists a working majority over the presentists in the next Parliament it would be necessary for them to capture at least 60 seats. To give the Liberals alone a clear plurality over presentists and Nationalists combined nearly 100 constituencies will have to be stormed and taken. It is true, they are voting against the present government and doing all they can to turn it out; but that is simply because they hope that the result of the next election will enable them to offer a bargain with whichever party is prepared to bid the highest. If that party goes to be the Liberals the Nationalists no doubt would be willing to counter their protectionist sympathies. If it proved to be the Conservatives, so much the better. The Nationalists would then be able to induce their protectionist leanings, and at the same time real assets that any respect they might enter into would be carried out by the Conservative majority in the House of Lords. Is Mr. Chamberlain, who controls the two great English parties, a man who is prepared to prepare to bargain with them? I can hardly doubt that when the time comes he will be found not merely ready, but anxious. It is a characteristic of the man that whatever he is engaged upon for the moment always seems of infinitely more importance than anything else. The immediate object engages him, and he allows no scruples and no tame objection to inconsistency to stand in the way of its attainment. The floor war engulfs his whole heart and soul. It is a cause which he honestly regards as worth almost any sacrifice, and if it cannot be carried without an alliance with the Nationalists, then it must be carried with one. Mr. Chamberlain does not know the Nationalists; the Nationalists do not know Mr. Chamberlain; but if such can be needed to the other, the essential basis for negotiation is provided. If Mr. Chamberlain sees that he cannot win without the Nationalists and can win with them, one may be sure he will do what he can to come to terms. If the Nationalists see that by bargaining with Mr. Chamberlain they can advance the cause of home rule, it is almost superfluous to say the chance will not be neglected.

I do not of course mean that as the price of Irish support in getting Chamberlain to adopt protection and reticence as a basis Mr. Chamberlain would be prepared to bring forward a home-rule bill. That would be giving a little too far even for a man who by this time must be pretty well used to testing his words. But I do not mean that the Nationalists would be asked to do anything in the event of the Irish holding the balance between the free-traders and the protectionists. Mr. Chamberlain would be ready to take a long step in the direction of home rule, either by a complete recognition of the Balfour-Cecil system, or else by a large extension of "local autonomy"—that blessed phrase which is yet destined to give Ireland home rule in fact, if not in name. But could he begin to carry the Unionist party with him on such a scheme? What he is so skilfully negotiating is a bargain, and the Unionist party is so intensely protectionist, that it is not by any means impossible. Already the Unionist papers are showing out kind to the effect "Look, for instance, at this extract from a recent issue of the Irish Free Press, which is a leading paper on the whole, but represents the rank and file of the party, and is also, I need scarcely say, a thorough-going supporter of Mr. Chamberlain's policy." But there is a large and growing number of politicians who, like the protectionist devotees of a leader, put fiscal reform before Irishism. There is an unexpectedly large number of Tories whose sympathy with home rule was awakened, not so much by the Irish cause, as by the methods adopted by various national leagues to obtain it. If Ireland could be free from lawlessness and outrage menacing in the future as she is at present, these scotch Tories home-rulers may again raise their heads. That is an extract which should be filed for reference. There is contained in it a foreboding which is almost comically ironic—curious situations that English politics have ever known.

Books and Bookmen

By James MacArthur

I THINK it is Brander Matthews who says somewhere that the historical novel is to be true to its name—that is, to be a faithful reproduction in speech, manners, characterization of the life and times it depicts—must be written by a contemporary; all else that bears the name is, to definitely describe it, historical romance. So that the works of Dickens and Thackeray and George Eliot are truly historical novels, excepting A Tale of Two Cities, The Trainees and Henry Esmond, and Roundels, which, according to Professor Matthews, are, strictly speaking, historical romances, and all of Sir Walter Scott's tales. The present is never lacking in the romantic for those who have eyes to see and hearts to feel; but it must be confessed that it is more easy, as it is more tempting, to "romance" about the past and to give the imagination free rein in conceiving afresh a life that has passed beyond our ken, and lives only in contemporary records. There has ever been a fascination in grouping a dead world, and translating its buried speech and acts into contemporary and picturesque terms of the present. More effective than all the histories and documents that have been written have been the historical romances of imaginative writers in conveying to the mass of the people the glory that was theirs, the grandeur that was theirs, and the struggle of the continuous world drama as enacted by the nations of the earth of all times. The masses never die. We are told that the verge of historical fiction is just, but if it is, it has suffered decline by its own impetuosity and failure to convey its grandeur and gloriously the romance that moves all human effort and consummates all human achievement. Romance cannot die so long as the imagination lives, and men and women are quick to feel the thrill of conflict in the great human romance. Joy and sorrow, happiness and pain are the common lot, and the night has been is always a refuge and an inspiration as reflected in the lives of others through its sympathetic portrayal of genius. We learn to love our own nature more philosophically, and are lifted to new hope and aspiration, and conceive fresh possibilities of achievement from the contemplation of great deeds gained by courage and endurance, and the fulfillment of the mighty hopes that make us weak. I am speaking now of the serious historical romance, and filled with a high and noble purpose and a grave sincerity, and not of the easy-buckling tale that is written only to amuse and while away the tedious of an hour. Of such serious and sincere historical works of fiction is Verghilus, the new novel by Mr. Irving Bacheller.

It is natural that the mind should turn with avid interest and earnest inquiry to that period which rift time in twain, and formed the dividing line between ancient and modern history. The appearance of Christ marks a pivotal moment in time, and has ever been a theme of the deepest significance and universal interest. The New Testament story never can be surpassed for its inimitable simplicity and revelation of enduring truth. Yet because it has become a familiar commonplace, a work like Verghilus, which tells the glorious of romance over the oft-told and familiar narrative, is warmly welcomed and eagerly read everywhere. We know with what anxious sincerity and reverence General Lee Wallace approached the preparation of his work; with what honest doubt and humility he threw his mind and heart into the task, and as he worked, left the force of his confirmed faith and conviction of the truth of the miracle upon the pages of his story. It is out of such deep consciousness of spiritual realities that any work that is to foster itself upon the mind and heart of others must issue; a book must be lived through before it can become a vital element in other lives. It is the knowledge that Mr. Bacheller's new story, which is "a tale of the coming of Christ," was pondered long before it was written, with the same seriousness of thought and profound respect for the miracle of the Nativity and the great spiritual truth it signified that persuades one to believe it will be received gladly throughout the length and breadth of the land.

Mr. Bacheller's story, to begin with, has the advantage of novelty. Opening in Rome a few months before the birth of Christ, it closes on the night of the Nativity, under the Star of Bethlehem. The closing elements of the plot are drawn from Roman and Jewish conditions as they then existed, and the scene of action alternates between Rome and Jerusalem. The Emperor Augustus and Herod the Great throw their gigantic and powerful shadows across the pages of the story, actuating the drama, and propelling its events to ward the stupendous calamities which came so suddenly and obscurely into that despised corner of the world. The opening chapters disclose with glowing yet severe tones the noble love of Verghilus, a young Roman tribune, for Arria, a beautiful Roman maiden of patrician birth. Their love is sensually gratified by Augustus, only to be rudely severed by the imperial edict which separates the lovers and sends Verghilus on a perilous mission to the east of Herod in Judea. A sinister evil threatens the happiness of the lovers in Antipater, passion for Arria and his hatred of Verghilus. Antipater, now in Rome, is the son and heir of Herod, and is engaged in a conspiracy to remove his father and ascend the throne, profiting by the growing rivalry that have arisen in Judea, of a new king who is to come and restore Judea to her former prestige and glory among the nations. Verghilus is unwittingly involved in the intrigue, and is further embroiled in the net that has entangled him, as he too has enemies have set for him by the fascinating wife of Herod's beautiful daughter, Salome, the Jewish Venus. It would be unfair to the author to follow the fortunes of his hero father. I have but hinted at the thread of a story which is full of dramatic interest from start to finish. Verghilus is not a religious novel in the sacred sense, though the motif is the stirring in the minds and hearts of men and women of that noble, pure conception of the great hour which saw its embodiment and found its fresh explosive force in the coming of Christ. The final scene on the hills of Bethlehem is a triumph of picturesque art, and sounds the note of spiritual victory which lies at the heart of the New Testament story and has thrilled nineteen centuries.

"Of all the literary deeds I have seen," writes a friend of Mr. Bacheller, with reference to the pictures on the opposite page, "Mr. Bacheller's seems to me the most ideal. It is a study in the art of the picture-maker, with the use of the words which whisper lullabies or shouting glories; and the ever old, ever new panorama of day and night, sunrise and sunset, moonlight and star light, and sun barbing close by, ending the career of the morning and intolerant militarism. Somehow these utterances are just as they reflect the author of Ebene Holden and Verghilus."

A New Photograph of Irving Bacheller—Taken in his Den at Round Bay, Connecticut

A View of Mr. Bacheller's Workshop, taken from Long Island Sound

A View of the Interior of Mr. Bacheller's den at Sound Beach

PHOTOGRAPHS OF IRVING BACHELLER'S LITERARY WORKSHOP AT SOUND BEACH, CONNECTICUT

Mr. Bacheller has just completed a new novel, "Veronica," a story of Rome and Jerusalem, upon which he has been engaged for the past two years. A review of the book, together with a brief description of Mr. Bacheller's picturesque workshop, are given by Mr. James MacArthur on the opposite page.

Photograph by Joley

JUDGE PARKER RECEIVING THE FORM AT ESOPUS.

Downloaded by Google

"Champ" Clark

Allen B. Parker

AL NOTIFICATION OF HIS NOMINATION
AUGUST 10

"RAFFLES," "THE AMATEUR CRACKSMAN," ETC.

IT was on the non-stop midnight run between Euston and Finsbury that I first perceived my appalling likeness to Ronald Chandler; and the robin-hood of the discovery has left an even sharper impression than the truly horrifying sequel, probably because it came calm, and there was still time to think, not any apparent ground for serious apprehensions.

Yet the moment had its own uniqueness. This young man Chandler had startled London less by his vile, but, unhappily, commonplace crime than by the really remarkable manner in which the criminal had melted into thin-air. The lighthouse evening press was in its clearest; the missing man's guilt was beyond moral doubt; variation reports of the impost were headlined by every democratic epithet; inconsistent clue and impromptu commentary filled out the editorial columns; and I confess that I was settling myself for ten minutes' would entertainment when my own portrait sprang upon me from the painted sheet. I started back; was this face of last? I bent, and looked again. No, it was infamy—and Ronald Chandler? But, if I knew myself in the glass, his newspaper presentation would have stood for mine. I held my paper higher, but only to hide my discolored face and to think. I was not alone, and now I knew that this horrid resemblance was no mere accident of the printing house. It was a most disconcerting fact, patent at a glance to him who read and used his eyes. Already it had been patent to one or two, now that I recalled certain hitherto insignificant events of that very evening. I saw now why the cabman had looked at me so hard; guessed what he must have stopped to ask the policeman at the corner, who, fortunately, knew me as well as I knew him. Then there was the big man at Euston in the bowler and frock overcoat. He must have judged me from my risk to the looking-officer. I even remembered his following me in the queue past the window, without looking anywhere, after all, an occasion which caused me momentary wonder at the time, but none whatever now. I could only suppose that my intonation had been enough for that palpable presence from Scotland Yard. Nor is it my great loss to add that socially at least there was a somewhat obvious difference between Ronald Chandler and me.

That was all very well for the skilled detective intelligence; it would scarcely turn away the suspicious glances of the average newspaper reader; and there at the moment sat one behind his newspaper in the corner opposite mine. We had the third-class compartment to ourselves; so should have it to ourselves for three usual hours! I glanced at the fellow's face; they looked muscular, and the feet were firmly planted in substantial boots. What if he should see the likeness, and pin me for the murders where I sat? I might challenge him to pull the cord, might stop the train, and show my papers, but with this pretzel and my face I saw myself a prisoner in the guard's van from that to Finsbury. And I trembled at the prospect as might my guileful double in my class. A preventive measure was to cast the incriminating sheet out of window into the rushing night. The window near us was open one hole of the strap; and I was about to obey this impulse when I saw to my horror that the act would be useless and some thing worse. It was the same wretched rug in which my companion sat absorbed! Now, it was even frobed the same way; I could feel him glowing over the sensation of the heat, and under his nose my hairpins and the number's sign!

I say I saw all this to my horror. But I could still smile grimly to myself. After all, I had ample evidences of a decent identity upon my person; but there might well be an unpleasant scene ere I could establish it, and I hate and dread unpleasant scenes. They inevitably make me tremble, and I was beginning even now to tremble while I smiled.

I trembled the less I had already seen of the man behind the other newspaper. He had got in after me, and my casual impression was of an elderly man, bearded to the waist like a missionary, but still abnormally active and robust. The carpeting above his head had been sling up there by his own hands. Yet it was immensely heavy for the task. The middle-aged man who came home newly bleached and bearded from the tropics, as a rule, came had been. And my missionary for so I labelled him from the start had the makings of a sufficiently formidable antagonist.

Could one keep the same newspaper before one's face from Euston to Finsbury? Could one not go to sleep behind one's newspaper with perfect propriety at dead of night? To be sure, and pull one's cap over one's eyes and one's collar about one's ears! I was proceeding to do both when my companion addressed me, lowering his guard, as my ears assured me.

"What a dreadful row!"

For an instant I was not going to answer, for another I would tell him he had woken me up, yet in the very next I was acting in equal defiance of either impulse. How preparations for an important man to entertain the fears of the guilty! I would take the bull by the horns, and did so the spot; at least I lowered my own paper and took my elderly companion by the eyes.

"It is, indeed," said I.

"We mean the same thing, of course," said he, smiling, but not with his hard, clear eyes, which already had a rather unpleasant grip of mine.

"I mean the William Green murder." I returned, with a gruff under, assumed subsequently to meet suspicion half way.

"And so do I," said he, smiling at my aggressive tone, as though he read me and misread me as it was. "A nice young man, that Chandler?"

"Very nice," I echoed, laconically enough.

"But it's his youth I think of," went on my missionary, his metallic eyes on mine. "A youngster like that, really out of his teens, to be married at all in the first instance!"

"But they all do marry young in that class," I interrupted with some confidence, for I had not before reflected that, after all, I was right and twenty if I did not look it, while the murderer's age was twenty-two.

"They do, do they?" said my companion, his bright eyes close together, but sound teeth showing in a smile between the bushy grey beard and moustache. "And what may they do in your class? Ain't you married—eh?"

I considered my reply. I had already taken a rapid dislike to my impertinent interlocutor, and it was in my heart to snub him, as he deserved. His fixed stare, his familiar leer, his metropolitan accent, had between them soon dispelled my missionary theory, and I delivered instead a Cockney sneer with a strong fancy for himself. It was the hobby of the bicycle, and here was just the type then floating into heady prosperity on the bicycle wave. But, apart from the fact that I shrank from avoidable quarrel with a glib Londoner whose company I must endure for over two hours more, there was still a doubt in my mind as to whether he had seen the likeness or not. If he had not, civility again night at least start off the scene I dreaded. As it happened, I was married, and was leaving wife and child for the first time in our married life, on a visit to an old school in Scotland. I admitted the pliancy left.

"But I'm greatly thirty," said I.

"You don't look it," he replied, skewering me with his horrid eyes. "And where's your wife?"

"I have left her in town."

"Alive?" (he bristled again) but I held myself in without difficulty, for now, of course, I knew that he had seen the likeness all the time.

"She was at ten o'clock," I answered.

"And where did you leave her? Not Waltham Green way, I hope?"

And he beamed with the good humor, but I saw his strong hands ready to spring and clutch my throat.

"Well, at Chelsea," said I, in my determination to make no more bones.

"That's pretty 'ell," he returned; and for the first time he let me see his teeth. "No we'll read!"

"So it seems."

"Looks a nice young man, don't he?"

"You can't judge by rough cuts in the paper," said I, on the sly of a queer instinct, as though I really had been the flying felon.

My companion was much tickled, and showed it with a roguish grin.

"That you can't," said he, holding his paper out between us. "It's impossible to tell from this whether he's a tall or a young chap — the sentence snapped between his period —"

"Whether he isn't," was his final form.

"Not much of the stuff about him," I remarked. And his eyes gleamed again.

"Don't you make any mistake! He's a smart one, you bet!"

"Perhaps, but he is a greaser's assistant."

"And what are you?"

"Oh, I write a bit, that's all," said I, no doubt with that which opens honesty.

"And what's the difference?"

"Well, I sell my own stuff, for one thing; and I don't have to sell it across a counter, for another!"

I do not say my work was rightly placed; but there it was, and my manner as aggressive as you please: for I felt that, in some inexplicable way, I had pierced my adversary's skin, and the sensation was to be entered. We glared at each other, or, rather, he glared and I glared, for a change, while the express changed swiftly through the night. There was the last train's inevitable amount of motion, and we both swayed almost sensationally where we sat, while in my ears at least the jangling rhythm had long allied itself in a popular piano organ tune of the day. The lamps layered as dimly as the lamps always do in these absolute non-corridor third-class carriages. It was as well we had no more to read than a fresh-and-blood face paper. There was enough light for that. But so feverishly afraid about nothing did my companion seem — no indignation were the young wolf eyes above the old wolf's muzzle — that I could afford to let a certain jealousy.

"I must give you the smartness," said I. "It was a foul deed, but nevertheless smartly done."

"Who said he did it?" the fellow almost thundered through his teeth.

"Isn't it plain?"

"No one was him, any one; and in England a man's innocent until he's found guilty; don't you forget it, and I'll try not to," he went on, comparing his strange reaction with an output of native strength, and regaining his sinister gentility by the same effort. "You say I'm a greaser?"

"I thought I had treated him badly," he added, as though I had treated him badly.

"How so?"

I was successful in regressing a prosecutive tone.

"Most men would have pulled the cord and stopped the train," he replied. "And you know why?"

"Because of my likeness to this young wretch Chandler?" His eyes flashed, but he nodded.

"He's scowled, you see. He may be on his way to Scotland — there's some one very like him in this 'ere carriage!" — their four eyes had never been so close together.

"I suppose you think I think you're 'im?" he went on.

"My good fellow," said I, "I have seen that all along! And, according to this paper, I admit the likeness is astounding."

"Is it?" said he. "I wonder if I can't show you no absolute?"

He lifted his paper, and I thought he was showing it already until I saw his bright eyes still on mine above the rim. The paper rustled as he fumbled behind it. The paper fluted down between our knees, and it was as though a mirror had been placed there; I was seated opposite my living image, with other eyes, and a huge lobe heard, and a pistol revolver held on either thigh.

"Wrong again, you see," he grinned. "I never thought you was Bireley Chandler, because — I am!"

There could be no doubt of it. For one instant, despite his looks, I had found a triple coincidence to accept, and had set him down as a detective on my tracks.

Would suspected murderer travel deliberately with his double? Would he proceed to reveal himself of his own accord?

I was too bewildered by the sudden change of position to see for myself any conceivable object in such conduct. And yet I believed him on the spot, and only wondered that his young eyes and his young hands shone so cruel and so strong, had not betrayed him long ago.

His youth in mere years was as apparent as his maturity in all evil.

The jaw was powerful, silent; the full lips parted grossly under the mere expression of a mauler.

But might have been one better to mine. The small bright eyes gleamed close together.

The inverted mirrored, but the depth of shall belied its frontage. A bad face, a face capable of any given evil, given also the jaundiced eye of one who knew beforehand the evil that lay behind.

I ended that, despite this special knowledge, for, as I say, the case was as clear as crystal, I for one was amazed and distressed at its frank, its deliberate, its incongruously British expression.

"I've had a right, you ever said it 'appened," said the young murderer.

"You see, I knew about this before," and with two long strong fingers indicated our faces.

"How did you know?" I asked. I was interested, in spite of all. I had never even seen a murderer before, and this one was all unlike my preconceptions. Interest in his personality had already borne up beyond the confuses of fear, and now curiosity as to his motive overcame even a proper human abhorrence. The phase was fleeting, but while it lasted the young monster was no longer even objectionable in my eyes.

"Ever" said of a paper called "Jack Thistle" said he.

I had, and for my sins. My portrait had once spilt up its pitiless columns in context gilling to remember even in present company; nay, when I thought of the Black Thistle interview I was a murderer myself at heart. I must have changed color with my soul.

"That was what put me up to you," continued Chandler. "My friends need if it was one, and I told one girl it was, and that you mine was the one I wrote under."

"You shouldn't let those interviewing come give your notes away. I've fairly hated that fat of yours ever since I've been in trouble; if I hadn't said you were off to Scotland to-night, that's where I should be talking to you now. But this is better."

His vice bite lit with unobtrusive satisfaction; and I began at last to feel afraid.

"All the time I kept the smoking pistol out of her's view."

"But what good can I do you?"

"Ah! You'll see."

"You don't propose to murder me, too?"

Rowland Chandler had gripped his plated pistol. But it was only at my words that the devil broke loose in his face.

"What do you mean?" he demanded, with clanking embroidery. "Who's murdered anybody? You say that word again, though, an' some one will! Do you see? You say that again, and you'll be the first! . . . I never touched 'er. It may look black upon me, but I never . . . They can't prove it. They didn't see me. But I know them! I know their damned criminal evidence! They'd like an' hang me on that, as they've took an' hung many as good a man as me. They must hang some one; that's their game." He had worked himself into a white fury, standing over me with his pistol, but he shuddered through his identity, and the narrow, grim glinted under the lamp. "They don't hang me," he screamed. "I know too much; they don't get the chance!"

He withdrew, covering me—and to the far end of the carriage, but half way—and sat down muttering on his old side. His hand as trembled that I thought I should be a dead man before he left the revolver safely cocked. But it was the tremor still of brain rage.

"Now," said he, "you start take' off those clothes!"

And I began to understand, as I obeyed.

"Every stitch, and don't you move a thing from the pockets!" he thundered. "How much money 'ave you?"

"Between three and four pounds."

"Well, you leave it where it is, and it'll have to do me; and I'll have some while it is, and it'll have to do you," he added, with a grim chuckle.

"As many shillings?" I asked, in my short-dresses to the elbows. "I was philosophic enough so far. The situation demanded it. But already I began to feel a drain on my philosophy."

About as many pence, quoth Chandler, and was out of his own coat and waistcoat like lightning, while my hands were still laid in mine.

"Trowsers?" I asked.

"Shirt and vest first," said he. "Every blessed stitch! Let me see you stark in that corner, and every stitch on this seat next me."

He removed some of his own clothes while I stripped, but sparingly, at his leisure, with his revolver and his eye never off me for a moment. And soon enough I stood stark naked to mine enemy, my back to the door, hand on either rock, at one end of the carriage, while at the other, still watching me, and always armed, he had been young criminal got deliberately into my clothes.

"I can shoot through these as well as not," he would remind me, as hand and arm followed the soaked pistol slowly through a sleeve, and my terror was lost—he should shoot when best intending.

And then I got me into his hoarse garments, and so had another opportunity of resisting him with effect, since he could neither have dressed me undressed me, or even attempted either, without coming to quarters at which I should have stood some chance. But I had reasoned the whole thing out in my mind. It seemed madness to resist an armed man with one murder on his head already. The penalty for a second was absolutely not. And yet, had I but plumed the death of my miserable design, it would have been Rowland Chandler or I for it ere this.

His clothes fitted me wonderfully, and were even quite as good as mine, for the dangerous fellow was almost his class in ideas and tastes; but he had worn them; they were warm from a murderer's skin, and they swung fresh about from my reluctant members.

Had I but guessed his inhuman purpose? I was so far from doing so that even now the popular tale that I have mentioned ran rather pleasantly in my head with the staidest allegorists of the train.

"Don't turn out the pockets!" cried Chandler as I jettisoned respectable pipe and pouch. "This ain't a robbery, murder; it's a fair exchange!"

"I don't intend, you."

"No!" The wolfish twinkles was back in his eyes. "Well, you put the things where you found them."

"They're no use to me," I said, cowering with a shrug. "I might have said more, but in such a situation the only valor is his better pull."

"No!" repeated Chandler, grinning outright like a fiend. "Well, they may be of some use to Madame Tussaud's, when you're done with them."

"That," said I, drawing a well-kup Waterbury from his waistcoat pocket, "will be nearer three-quarters of an hour if your watch is right. You make it five minutes past two; we are due at Creve at 2.31."

"Ah, dar!" said he. "Doe, I grant you?"

"You mean to let the train, of course; and you mean me to be taken instead of you."

The murderer smiled, but with a sly and sinister reservation that made me pause.

"Of course," I continued, with less confidence, "they won't believe my tale in a newspaper; they do at all tonight, but they will to-morrow when they get me back to town. So all you will have gained will be that much start."

Chandler looked at me. We were still where we had changed, at opposite ends of the carriage, and beyond arm's length, or I had fallen on him, revolver and all, as the true significance of his look dawned on me in a flash. It was different; it was almost pitying.

But the full lips parted over tight-shut teeth; and in the cruel unrelenting eyes I read my death.

"Did you really think I would like all this trouble to get a night's start when I might have had a day and a night's if I hadn't've hung round waiting for you?" He gave a glance at his weapon, and came sidling nearer. "Did you really think that I was going to let you live in put a rope round my neck?"

"If I don't, you will put a second rope round it yourself!" said I, calm as another at the last, but bitterly reckoning the chance a bolder man might have taken before it was too late. In the beginning I should have hung myself upon him. But it was not inhumanism as much as fear that had deterred me then: I did not want to die a coward in my own eyes, and yet—dare I confess it?—even in the eyes of this accursed creature. And yet to make the slightest show of resistance now was but to precipitate my end, to argue with him, on the contrary, might at best postpone it; and it appeared that I had used the happiest argument as it was.

"They can't hang you twice," he had answered without thinking; but then come thought with the cunning gray flash I had drawn before. "They couldn't hang me once, not yet," he went on, defiantly. "They didn't see me; they can't bring it home. As, and this ain't going to be no case of a wonder, either. Back up, I promise you that. It's going to be a case of an' antic, that's it! Sounds better, don't it? Smile at Rowland Chandler, the alleged murderer, in the Scotch Express!"

He disabused my mind of my abnormal power of following clearly, of saving even further than he than he; my own dream served but to stimulate my brain. Yet it was the clever and audacious plot of a sufficiently clever and audacious criminal. Yet was I criminologist enough even then to see the weak point in both. It is the poorest type of criminal who makes your ready mare.

He invariably lacks imagination. That may be the charitable explanation of his cruelty; it is the sure cause of those unaccountable mistakes which bring the most calculating assassin to the gallows.

He foresees his own course of escape. His head is for the day and for his own skin. His mind's eye will not stay behind upon his gruesome handiwork. Yet here Rowland Chandler was notably above the average of his infamous kind. It was the body in the train that he most probably saw most clearly of all; the evidence of his own resolve, his own clothes, his own line, at the instant which should establish the murderer's death and remove him from the minds of men.

But there was one thing he had forgotten, with all his reasoning, and I told him so with the staidest deliberation of a man talking against time and eternity at once.

"And what's that?" he asked.

"I was getting out at Brentford Junction. They expect me to be there, where I was going to get on for a match all day to-morrow. When I don't arrive they will wire you (or I) will no longer provide the only subject of inquiry; there will still be two, of live, or dead, and after all, you will only get just start."

Then I'll get it now," he roared, with an oath; and my plotted death came nearer, nearer, with feeble flashes from the criminal lamp.

"Starrer still!" I urged with an inspiration that seemed to strike him as I thought. "You must bring me down at an inch if you wish me to look like a case of suicide!"

An oath answered me; the crafty bound had seen that all along, but he had not expected me to see it. I could read him raving with himself for ever having appeared me of his left intent. He had done it to cheat over me, instinctively, I think, but some the line for the gratification of his murderous lust, and it was to cost him dear as he deserved. Had he resisted this refinement he might have clapped his barrel to my temple and shot me all but unaware; as it was he had to feel and jab at me, and I had ten spread fingers to keep him off, and of a sudden five of them had the barrel tight.

Heaven knows how it happened, or which of us was the more surprised: I only remember the sleek stark, hard to grip, and cold as ice one instant, but hot as a red-hot iron the next. Then I knew he had fired twice, and I gave myself to the struggle as the express ran on with a rattle and a clack that no longer conveyed any tune.

It was as when the orchestra stops playing before the acoustic climacteric.

He was stronger than I. He bore me down; I slid from the seat; he fell upon me with both hands, striking me in the face with his free hand, and all without a syllable, but with soft eyes and ferret's teeth. And all this time I kept that smacking pistol out of his way, and when he got another hand to the butt, I got another to the barrel.

It was all I thought about, and I was still intent when the compartment filled with fresh night air. I had not seen the far door open as we ran rattling through the dark. It did not bode it, but I was too far toward above us a giant in a bowler and fringe overcoat.

"It's Chandler! It's the man they want for the murder!" the ready whetters yelled as he was dragged from my person and hurled upon the floor.

But there were our two faces, and the trained eyes knew which was which.

"Don't hurt him!" I remember saying, as I climbed into a corner with the revolver in my charge.

"Hurt him!" cried the big man over his shoulder, a bold man now, with great fierce eyes, at work like pistons. "I wouldn't hurt a hair of his head!"

And his tone was tender as an entomologist's with a new moth in the net.

R. D. Wren serving

Holcombe Ward executing the American twist serve

Burt C. Wright serving

W. J. Latard making a backhand stroke

THE FOUR MOST PROMINENT CANDIDATES FOR THE NATIONAL TENNIS CHAMPIONSHIP AT NEWPORT THIS WEEK

The National Championship Tennis Tournament begins at Newport on August 16. The present holders of both single and double championships are the Doherty brothers of England, who will not defend the titles this year. Wren, Ward and Wright, the East-ern champions in doubles, and Wren, Sullivan and Little, who represent the West, will meet in the semifinals at Newport, and the two winners this match will hold the championship in doubles. W. J. Latard, R. D. Wren, both former National champions; Burt C. Wright, Canadian champion, and Holcombe Ward, Metropolitan champion, are the most prominent candidates for the championship in singles.

Is the Education of Women with Men a Failure?

By Elv Van de Warker, M.D.

Commissioner of Education, at Syracuse, New York

As there appears to be some confusion as to the meaning of education, a few words in explanation may be necessary in order to make clear the position of the writer. Education is not education until the sex problem has entered as a disturbing factor. President Murray Butler says, in a recent article in a popular weekly, that fifty millions of children are being educated. That the children in primary, grammar, or secondary schools, living at home and under home influence and control, comply in any respect to the conditions controlling educational reforms is not to be taken seriously; neither is the statement of the President in this respect taken, as he actually says at the conclusion of his article, "but not in favor of the attitude of the present in under-education alone."

[illegible]

Commercialism and Coeducation

Commercialism cannot be carried further in educational enterprise. That the people who were responsible for this ill-adviced effort to realize upon an investment are not unconscious of their mistake will appear in the following extract from an article in the Independent by Professor Sisson of Wyoming University:

"The other charge, that economy was a dominant motive in establishing coeducational colleges, ought to be precluded, because it inflicts unnecessary suffering. It is not only false, but it hurts. Our fathers may have been mistaken when they founded coeducational colleges, but they were not stingers."

In order to see the extent to which commercialism has prevailed in the East in grafting construction on colleges for men, a few examples, selected from money, will suffice. After the Legislature of 1886 had passed the law for the establishment of Cornell University, the faculty objected that there were no funds to meet the increased expense. The women of the State raised $100,000, and women were admitted. The same sum of money was given to the University of Rochester, and women were admitted. Johns Hopkins University. Half of this was antislavery. The University of Rochester, Cornell University, after being liberally treated by a generous legislature, considered, in adult women, money as a means of raising funds. It is a fact that in the East that good business enterprise, and not the needs of the people, has underlain the whole superstructure of education. It is a significant fact that the money was raised mainly by the women.

Does coeducation educate? This is the supreme question. If it prepares men and women for the highest utilities, if it inures to its graduates a broad culture and a high standard of character, and gives this to a degree equalled by the college for men, or the college for women, it must be given consideration. It does not, and, from the limitations with which coeducation imposes, it cannot. Coeducation is a hybrid bred from an unnatural union between two systems that contain irreconcilable differences. It presents no method of self adjustment to the needs of women.

Harvard's Two Standards of Education

Harvard University is making an effort to create two standards of education: one is for utility and the other for culture. It means a difference of one year of college work. Let us suppose that an effort is made to adopt the idea in a college for men and women. It would merit the approval of the men who intend to take up post-graduate professional work, but where would it leave the women, a very small percentage of whom enter the professions? It would deprive her of the last and best year of college work, and without any compensation.

It appears that women have been made to believe, and the notion has been fostered by the equal-suffragist cult, that if she were educated after the manner of men she could do men's work as the way that men do it. The sex problem is actually ignored as one of the most important. No woman ever had a man's way of thought or thought his thoughts after his manner of thinking. She is far unweaved and then treated unbecomingly. There is no escape from this conclusion; neither do the advocates of the method not the question. This simply asserts, dogmatically, that it is better for her to be so educated.

In giving more specific reasons why education is hampered by the conventional method, we may quote President Jordan in the article previously referred to. He says: "Women take up higher education for the same reasons as men, but they are not men. Only men, broadly speaking, are capable of objective and dispassionate study. Only men can learn to face fact without flinching, unmoved by feeling or preference. The reality with women is the way the world appears to them. They are not objective. They are not dispassionate. They are not able to face the world as it is, but as it is being to men's world, not at all to that of the average woman. That women in college do as good work as men is beyond question. In the university they do not. They are not able to do it. They are not able to do it because they are not men. They are not men in technique, men in actual achievement. If instruction through investigation is the real work of the university, then in the real university the work of the most gifted women is inferior to that of the average man."

Continuing, he says: "Shall we give the girls the same education as our boys? Yes and no. If we mean by the same an equal degree of breadth and thoroughness, an equal fitness for high thinking and wise acting, yes, let it be the same. If we mean this: shall we reach this end by exactly the same course of study, then the answer must be no, for the same course of study will not yield the same results with different persons."

Men and Women in Medicine

Spore will put just a few references to post-graduate work—that of medicine. In no other relation are the nostrils east about women so nearly attained to the harking point. The medical man needs the more professional education as medical men! It is no longer a question of the woman's capacity, even her professional career as a specialist. A specialty with a man physician is a matter of choice; with a woman it is a matter of necessity. It would treat the students of her sex, admittedly one of the most difficult branches of medicine. Let a single instance of the manner in which the woman student is treated in the special department of the branch office, selecting one of the schools through country schools of medicine—the medical department of Syracuse University Gynecology is taught only during the last or senior year. The announcement reads as follows: "Didactic lectures, two women students, four months." Thus all the woman student can learn of what will constitute her life-work is acquired on the theoretical side in thirty-two lectures, and on the practical side in sixteen clinics. With the knowledge of the writer no other American medical school offers a specialty in gynecology. The woman student is not prepared for post-graduate hospital work as the man graduate, the situation would be partially relieved, but they are not as hot few female and open to the appointment of women interns. It is a fair and equitable division of medical education for men also to be given a specialty in gynecology. Why women? Why women? Why women? because they must! Why women will submit to this when there are well equipped medical schools for women, where they are specialized during their student life and well fitted to enter upon their professional careers. Is one of the anomalies of the medical profession in this country that the woman physician in medicine until she realizes that it is her sex and not the color of these who seek her aid and sympathy that define her place as a medical woman; that to be made equal to the demands that will be made upon her she must be educated not as men are, but as women should be.

Social Life at Coeducational Colleges

The social art of life in the college for both sexes cannot be considered apart from the educational value of the method. It is an unfortunate phase of the question for the advocates of coeducation. The attitude of the press toward this side of coeducation is either one of comical narration or of scolding. The higher education for women has, through the social stigma forced upon it by coeducation, lost its dignity and become a matter of doubt and apprehension. The mistake of coeducationists is to assume that the mixing of young men and women together for purposes of education is a necessary and inevitable part of the process. It is not that the presence of young women has a refining and elevating influence upon young men when mixed in educational work. The constant coeducation is made of the influence of "cultured young women" on President Jordan and his men. In elevating the standards of the men, the women are not doing what they are capable of doing. They are passive, untrained, and have not yet attained the stage of influence.

The strong personality always controls the weaker one. A score of instances could be given. Woman's sympathies are with the man every time. A few men students are suspended for a social deviation that leads to the open revolt of the whole class. They are joined by the women, who are more active than the other sex, in opposition to the faculty. The freshmen young women attempt to break up a sophomore supper by capturing the president and having her about town in a public hall until late at night. Female sophomores scale dangerous fire-escapes to remove a freshman flag. In one instance nearly a hundred young women, regardless of their reputations, attended questionable resorts to dance and loaf with the men, and this was a nightly occurrence. Social clubs and other means of entertainment kept the young women out three or four nights a week, rarely returning home until after midnight. The transgressions of the prodigal students, the bad classwork and recitations due to the late hours were without effect.

Marriage and the College Curriculum

Since in this may be in its all effect upon the mental, physical, and moral safety of the women, yet it is a minor matter compared with the lasting power to exist in student love and marriage. It would tax the credulity of one not born under the influence of American customs to be told that these colleges deliberately foster student marriages, which must also imply student love. In one Western college a day is deliberately set apart during Commencement week for the announcement of engagements between the students. The engagement of four students was officially given out at the graduating exercises of Northwestern University at the Auditorium in Chicago last year. It is difficult to understand how staid and serious men can see any need in student courtship and marriage. They are, however, too far to get married, as though it was a part of their college curriculum, and in step forth from the sheltering arms of their instructors and wife, untrained to battle with life, the most uncertain quantity, for good or otherwise, that can be condensed into the human dream.

In all that has been said about student courtship and marriage, but a word has been spoken about the rights of parents. The side of the matter has been hauntingly ignored. President Jordan, who endeavors to be fair, after the vocational way, while approving these marriages, leaves out all reference to parental wishes or authority for the interests or happiness of the son or daughter. Why should the heads of colleges, like President Jordan, discuss the subject at all? Why should another college president recognize it from the Commencement platform, and why should another college official spend hours, as though it were an unnecessary convention, that his college only presumed it when he had received the parental sanction? Is it worth while to try and lead into the hands of these men that they are bringing recommendations into desecrate and their colleges into chaos? Their function is to educate and not to establish matrimonial agencies, by so doing they are helping to wreck professional careers, they are helping to fill the divorce courts with the painful tales of broken hearts and sinned lives, and to fit that matrimonial joke upon necks, that in after life will hold in hands that are a mockery to call holy, tired and helpless women and hopeless, irritable men.

What are the Results?

There is yet a darker picture of the uncontrolled social relation of the sexes in these colleges. In an article of this kind it is impossible to give it more than a bare mention, especially impossible to state what presidents of famous colleges say of it. Again we call President Jordan to the stand. He says, "that evil recalls sometimes arises, not very often, to be sure, but once in a while. He knows the cause in 'adverse conditions,' as he calls them, 'when little girls of preparatory schools and schools of music are mingled with college students and given the same freedom,' or where young women are forced to read papers and 'conferences.' The facts do not bear this out. Both at Northwestern University and at Syracuse the actual disorders originated in the dormitories and not in the boarding-houses. The character of Syracuse University furnishes the next item of evidence. He does not explain it or state whether it is frequent or not; we simply know that it exists and that it is painful. 'It is never the practice,' he says, 'to dismiss a student for a single act, unless it is immorally.' Professor E. E. Benson places the blame for the evil upon the mixed colleges upon the women alone. He says, 'There are girls who are not fit to be sent to a vocational college, who get harm and do harm.' The friends of education may answer, that such instances occur in the same class outside of college life. This is true, but is not the answer a fatal objection? If it is a recognized evil, as it certainly is, what precautions have they taken to render the evil impossible in college life?

Nothing in the various counts in this indictment of education is to be taken by the reader as opposed to the higher education of women. On the contrary, it is in the interest of educated womanhood, and the writer believes, as do many others, that she is better and more broadly cultured where not educated.

The Discovery of a Star

By C. A. Young

Professor of Astronomy at Princeton

THE discovery of Saturn's ninth satellite, which revolves around the planet far outside the orbit of Jupiter, the remotest of the eight before known, was first announced, and the name of the planet assigned, early in 1906 by Professor W. H. Pickering, of Cambridge (not the director of the Observatory of Harvard College, but his younger brother). It was found on several photographic plates, made in 1904 at Arequipa, partly for the purpose of searching for new Saturnian satellites, as a faint speck which slightly changed its place among the star-images nearly to the same extent as Saturn itself, and so was evidently accompanying the planet. At the same time its position with respect to the planet was continually shifting somewhat, indicating a revolution around the planet, although the data then available were not sufficient to determine its orbit with much precision.

Probably most of our readers know that the observatory at Arequipa (Peru), is what the French call a "sacredness," or solitary station, of the Harvard Observatory, supported largely from the income of the so-called Harvard fund, a sum originally left for the establishment of an astronomical observatory at high elevation, and wisely turned over by its trustees to the director of the Harvard Observatory for administration. There, in an altitude of more than seven feet, is situated the finest and most numerous other important instruments, the Bruce photographic telescope, with its immense four lens objective glass, resembling that of an ordinary camera, but two feet in diameter and with a focal length of eleven feet, using plates fourteen inches by seven.

When pointed at the heavens it is accurately moved by clockwork to follow the motion of the stars, so that their images, often several thousand on a single plate, are drawn round during any day the planet or moving object, if the exposure is long enough, appears as an elongated streak, rarely recognized at a glance as something different from a star. If the exposure is short the detection of such an object can be done only by the comparison of negatives made at intervals of some hours or days, and is difficult and laborious.

The plates are developed at Arequipa, and after examination for any obscure and interesting peculiarities are sent to Cambridge for detailed study and storage. There a large building is already crowded with many thousands negatives made with various instruments at Cambridge and elsewhere, arranged for easy reference whenever necessary. It is to be expected that such negatives have already presented themselves, and important discoveries have been made.

The discovery of Pluto remained long unobserved—not very strangely, it is true, since the satellite is probably too faint to be visually observed by any existing telescope, especially as the planet is now very far south, while all the great telescopes are in the northern hemisphere. Then, too, Saturn has been passing over the region of the Milky Way so crowded with small stars as to render exceedingly difficult the detection of such an object as Pluto.

But not unnaturally, considering the long delay, astronomers had become somewhat skeptical as to the existence of the satellite, thinking it not unlikely that an easy mistake had been made by considering some speck, or bluishness on the negative with a real object. And naturally, also, the recent rediscovery of the satellite is greeted with great interest and enthusiasm.

A week or two ago a formal bulletin from the Harvard Observatory announced that Pluto had again been found upon a large number of Arago photographic plates of the region surrounding Saturn, and especially upon eleven made since last March and just received. There are now at least four accurate determinations of the elements of the orbit, and the details and results of the new discovery appear in a volume of the Annals, which is in press.

All that can properly be said at present is that the mean distance of the satellite from the planet is about one million miles, more than three and a half times that of Jupiter, and its period about eighteen months. Now what seems very strange, that its motion appears to be retrograde, while all the other satellites of Saturn move direct—i. e., in the same direction as the planet's rotation. Professor Pickering estimates its diameter at about 200 miles, its photographic magnitude being the 18th. As already intimated, it is hardly likely ever to be seen with our present telescopes, but we can photograph objects far below the range of visibility.

American astronomy has a right to prize itself upon the fact that all of the five new satellites discovered since the satellite of Saturn was first found by Lowell in 1891, have been discovered in this country. Hypersonic Saturn's seventh satellite, was found by W. C. Bond at Cambridge in 1899, though Lowell shows the honor of this discovery, having observed it only one day later than Bond, and carrying the discovery the most of the double discovery, crossed each other on the ocean. Division and Phobos, the little moons of Mars, were discovered by the elder Hall at Washington in 1877; the unnamed fifth satellite of Jupiter, by Barnard at the Lick Observatory in 1892; and more than thirty by the American Pickering at Cambridge in 1893, the first satellite captured by photography.

Correspondence

OUR WESTERLAND—THE GLORYLAND

New York, July 29, 1900.

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

Sta.—When God the King created all and set the bounds of man, He breathed forth life from His own Love and filled with it the air; He made the air His messenger to each created thing.

To man He gave His image, endued him with His power, each sense so tuned with His own thought that it reached there. He made him earth's own conqueror. He asked from man, but Faith and Love to Him and man. When singing hills and answering vales cooed the swelling plains, vain man, made drunk with being man, defied the King's own haught, with Pride and Lust and Hate.

Gloomed then the ghostly night. The ailing children plead in tears for Light, for manhood's Kingly right of "Peace on Earth, good-will towards men" which He had promised them.

The Pitying King gave out, and said: "There, circling by the pathless seas as by my arm around, lies there my Westerland, reserved for such as thee: there every choicest thing does more abound; there shall mankind work and on Earth—humanity."

"Air! Earth and Sea! obey! and there gaze men My richest gifts, nor glass, nor shalldoth, nor line id skin, nor Satan's gentle shall there deny his rights to man, My son! possess it! Where-so'er the air doth lead, there follow. There be a man."

Here is the Homeland, where Southern Cross and Northern light sing songs together. Here beams the Eastern Star, here bends the Bow of Promise, Here shines the Brightness Sun. Here sets the Star of Empire. The gloomy night is gone, Here sings mankind and children laugh and busy hands the wheel. Here eagle Earth and Air and Sea, songs, seas, mountains.

Here search in vain for boundary-lines sea and ocean. This brother is mine and also thine and yet enough for others; let's welcome them and all together—live here. Let him who hates and yearns for bloody feuds go back across the ocean.

[illegible]

Here Man, with wife and children crowned, is King and Priest.
His home both Throne and Altar. Here work is Majesty.

Ye people and our portmates away across the sea, here findeth friends for you and yours, here seek ye friends, who lack greed for thine, save skill and love; our sires and yours's were brothers; here send they ships and sons, thence welcome they and true times more, then more again ye're welcome and if perchance aloe! you suffer, need, as I'll feed or arm or curb you, not hate nor hurt. Thus strengthen as the bonds of love across the sea, which here are deeply anchored. We want not land nor crown nor decorations upon your transitive.

Fair Morning land of Hope and Courage, Then noontide land of labour, sweet Evening land of peace and joy, our libertyland forever.
Here! it's in the air and everywhere, from pole to pole, from sea to sea: "My Country, 'Tis of thee, Sweet land of Liberty, of thee I sing," I am, sir, JOHN WENFILD SCOTT.

SHORT-WAISTS AT ST. LOUIS

Marshall, Wm., July 24, 1895.

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly.

Six.—One of the allegations which our modern race make against the Puritans is that they interfered in the matter of dress, prescribing colors and cuts of garments which they did not like. The Puritans have lately asserted that they did not like American people certain fashions of dress which must be reduced to one of them in his capacity of moral policeman to reduce his rivals in the realm of error which he rules. The more powerful, though more numerous, the Puritans are, the more they are inclined to be tyrannical and despotic. This distinguished scientist, also some years since made the startling discovery that the white race on this continent is turning into Indians, and theory based upon the evidence presented him in the past, that the white race is degenerating, has been combined with his science in making deductions, the early German settlers had interrupted with Theodore, this scientist felt as that to have a soiled and perspiration-soaked shirt under the coat, and a coarse, comfortable, and convenient pair of trousers, and a normal and comfortable male, and a normal and fearless beneath a coat in the July and August sun is the thing. Pushed for a row, the professor has sought to say that that is not the reason. I have never seen a professor whose fundamental principle is that the white race is degenerating. I understand that in retaliation, shirt-waist degenerates might, in the ordinary acceptance of the word, call him a Jew; that his derby is a bargain from a five-shilling or less a conflagration than the Chicago of the Great Fire. Who bears him ill will or seeks to visit public contempt upon him because of his taste in apparel! The shirt and cult bears him no ill will because he wears a lion hat and his vest is reminiscent of the menus of years.'

[illegible]

Are the gentlemen from the salubrious clatters and their rest, and their shirt fronts liberally spanned with tobacco juice, not noticed admitted? They are. But the man is polished shaven, dressed in trousers, collar, tie, and immaculate shirt that must stay out. Their coats? Did you ever see them? They had fit, set, that didn't bulge, flap, and look generally unattractive. If they are particularly thin they show what is underneath, even down to color, and the effect is decidedly bad. The shirt and tie no longer sit close because it was comfortable and hygienic, but no longer does it also gratify the aesthetic sense. You can't get any pump spring into the only weight of coat tolerable in a St. Louis summer day.

It is strange that an opposition to innovations in dress and ornament if it is sensible and useful. It is strange that this particular innovation, originated by and prevalent among the most cultivated element, should suffer reverse and almost defeat at the hands of some of the least cultivated. So long as you cannot see the sense of the change, you cannot see the sense of wearing it. The graduates of London chop-houses and German bath-shedders forbid your presence in their establishments. What do they know of the elegance of life save superficially and empirically? When are they to assume to decide sartorial matters? They are not. They are not to be consulted. What is to be the power to bind their better? No consistent creature can do this with the table-manners of patrons. The ill-tempered do not go about rebuking people for leaving spots in their coffee-cup, for eating with their knives. President Francis has issued no resolutions on the subject. He is not to be consulted. The transvaux do this as well. If it is the fashion to be in the matters of dress, why not in grammar and religious and political opinions as well? What have purveyors of food and managers of amusement enterprises to say about fashions of dress that they do not say of equal impropriety and middlemoresness say about these other things?

Hygiene of eustoria are another our body during most of the year. When during a brief period we propose because of comfort not to smother it, our rise some individuals to tell us any. Some of the most efficacious "cures" are founded almost wholly upon the idea of putting the patients into as light garments as possible. "The patient," says one, "can't catch cold, and he never gets wet at the body. Why deny ourselves the benefit of light clothing in the little time when we can have it?" Hygiene as well as comfort and eustoria is on the side of the shirt-vest, and in the end it will prevail, in spite of professors of anthropologie, and aspirating inspectors, and the Louisiana Purchase Exposition.

—W.C.

L. arm. nig. W. A. C.

SPEAKER CANNON AND THE GOLD STANDARD

Bassett, M. 1996. Wetland Values. p. 140.

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly

Six.—Speaker answers, in his recent notification, ref. referred to the famous telegram of Judge Parker as follows: "Their choice leader, after his accusation, having been as silent as the Sphinx to that time, sent his telegram, saying in substance that the gold standard is established, and that he will govern himself accordingly, if he should be elected. Does he at heart believe in the gold standard and our currency system, or does he try now to run where he has not come."

(Of course all argument) concerning the motives of Judge Parker in this affair is fruitless. Partisans will persist in belittling the declaration and in imputing insincerity to its author. The occurrence is suggestive, however, of a condition which existed in the Republican party eight years ago, to which we may fittingly advert in this connection.

For a long time before the Republican convention of that year, the exact attitude which it would assume upon the currency question was extremely problematical. William McKinley was leading aspirant for the Presidential nomination, and in his speeches in Congress he had frequently championed the silver cause. For months before the convention his position was a subject of discussion. The leading journals of the country, among them THE WEEKLY, if I mistake not, repeatedly called upon the prospective candidate to define his position. He was as silent as the Sphinx. Not before the convention, not during it, did he utter a syllable in relation to the subject. He did not even say, until it was too late, "I am not a silver man," and then in a manner consistent with the platform and diametrically opposed to his former utterances on the subject.

To apply Speaker Cannon's inquiry to an occurrence much more appropriate for its propounding than the present instance, "Did he at heart believe in the gold standard, or did he try to stop where he had not meant?" I am, sir,

WALTON, P. STEPHENS.

THE SERVANTS

BY A. E. W. MASON

SYNOPSIS OF CHAPTERS

In the opening chapter Pamela Markle is introduced to the reader as a young society woman of London, beautiful and of fine personal charm. Late one night Pamela and Alan Warriden, who is in love with her, discover a young couple leaving the apartment house. They are Tony and Milly, and Milly, who lives in a garret house, persuaded her to go to the club and reveal the father of the young man. They are really kept prisoners in the white of the town and old man and it is only by playing truant and going out to meet him at night that they are able to enter at all into the life of the outside world. But finally they both deny of their immorality, and Tony determines to go to America in order to prevail upon him to come back, but he refuses. Tony remains on the tramp for the rest of his life, and is never seen again. Having learned of his father's death, and then discovering he is in the French Foreign Legion, he has other adventures open to him. John Minter, a friend of Pamela's, leaves from her of the well Milly is in from a letter. He has a son of the same name and gives him the name of a single firm of soldiers, who lived in a settlement within twenty-four hours. I have received a proposition from Milly to be introduced to an important company of the army in the field, which his financial difficulties compel him to accept. Warriden, although he has proposed to her unceremoniously before, again asks Pamela to marry him, and she allows him to think that it is now it will be possible for her to accept him. She tells him she will be his wife, and he takes the step now. The return of Tony Stratten. Warriden, desiring of obtaining information as to Tony's whereabouts, goes to London to visit Tony's friend Mr. Chase, who, he thinks, will be able to enlighten him. He finds on his arrival that Chase has died suddenly, and on consulting the hotel register and address in the register of a letter forwarded for the man later, finds that he has found a place in Tony's living place. When returns from Chile and persuades Milly to go south with him. This is seen driving together late at night in Regent's Park by Mr. Minter, who tells Pamela that he suspects danger for Milly. Pamela summons Warriden to an old traveling party of theirs for consultation—the party of the village here, in order to devise a plan to help Milly. Pamela, for the second time, commends Warriden to go in search of Tony, and the glad accepts. Pamela goes to Regent's Park, which she had asked as a young girl, and while there hears of the presence of Lionel Cullen, Stratten, especially, as well with a group of soldiers on an expedition across the Desert of Sahara. His plan to move on is given the commission of lieutenant, and he then decides to write to Milly. At that moment Warriden arrives with the letter from Pamela.

CHAPTER XXV

TONY STRATTEN SENDS PAMELA TO THE LEGION

IT was a long letter. Tony read it through slowly, standing in the narrow lane between the high walls of prickly pear. A look of incredulity came upon his face.

"Is all this true?" he asked, not considering at all of whom he asked the question.

"I know nothing, of course, of what is written there," replied Warriden. "But I do not doubt its truth. The signature is, I think, sufficient proof."

"No doubt, no doubt," said Stratten, absently. Then he asked:

"When did you reach Ain-Sefra?"

"This morning."

"And you came quickly?"

"Yes. I travelled night and day. I came first of all to Ain-Sefra, in search of you."

"Thank you," said Stratten.

He did not ask how it was that Warriden had come first of all to Ain-Sefra. Such details held no place in his thoughts. Warriden had forewarned him, and brought the letter which Pamela Markle had written. That letter, with its perplexities and its consequences, obliterated all other speculations.

"You have a camp here?" Stratten asked.

"Yes."

"Let us go to it. The news you have brought has rather stunned me. I should like to sit down and think what I must do."

The incredulity had vanished from his face. Distress had replaced it.

"It is all true, no doubt," he went on, "but for the moment I don't understand it. Will you tell me where your camp is?"

"I will show you the way," said Warriden.

"I think not. It will be better that we should not be seen together," Stratten said, thoughtfully. "Will you give me the direction and go first. I will follow."

Warriden's camp was pitched among trees a hundred yards from the western border of the village. It stood in a garden of grass, enclosed with hedges. Thither Stratten found his way by a roundabout road, approaching the camp from the side opposite to Ain-Sefra. There was no one at the moment listening about the spot. He walked into the garden. There were three tents pitched. Half a dozen mules stood picketed in a line, a little farther horse lay on the grass, some Abyssinian natives were taking their ease, and outside the chief tent a couple of camp chairs were placed. Warriden came forward as Stratten entered the garden.

"Sit down," he said.

"Inside the tent, I think," replied Stratten.

There he read the letter through again. He understood at last what Pamela had meant by the warning which had baffled him. Pamela revealed his meaning now. "Milly is not of those you are," she wrote, "who have a vivid remembrance. To tell her you must be near her. Go away, she will cry her eyes out; stay away for a little while, she will long for your return; make that little while a longer time, she will grow indifferent whether you return or not; making that longer time, she will regard your return as an awkwardness, a disturbance; and yet a little more to that longer time and you will find another occupying your place in her thoughts." Then followed an account of the growth of that dangerous friendship between Milly and Lionel Cullen. A summary of Cullen's character rounded the description off. "He never home," she concluded at once. "For no real harm has been done yet."

Stratten understood what the last sentence meant, and he believed it. Yet his mind revolved against the phrase. Of course, it was Pamela's phrase. Pamela, though frank, was explaining the position in words which could best spare Milly. But it was an unfortunate venture. It provoked a momentary wave of the past which swept over Stratten. There was a postscript. "You yourself are really a good deal to blame." Thus it ran, but Stratten was in no mood to weigh its justice or injustice at the moment. Only this afternoon he had been lying under the palm trees putting together in his mind the sentences which were to tell Milly of his success, to reestablish him in her esteem, and to prepare her for his return. And now this letter had been sent her a time lessening at the letter, turning its page over, glancing now at one phrase, now at another. Then he folded it up. "Cullen," he said, softly, and then again, "Lionel Cullen. I will talk with Mr. Cullen." For all its softness his voice sounded to Warriden the voice of a dangerous man. And after he had spoken in this way he sat in thought, saying nothing, asking no answer, and his face gave Warriden no clue as to what he thought. At last he stirred in his chair.

"Well?" said Warriden.

"I shall return at once to England."

"You can?"

"Yes. I shall start to-morrow," said Stratten.

"We can go back together then?"

"No. That is impossible."

"Why?" asked Warriden.

"Because I should be arrested if we did," Stratten replied.

"Arrested?" Warriden exclaimed.

"Yes. You see, I shall have to desert to-night."

Warriden started from his chair.

"Surely there is an alternative."

"None," replied Stratten, and Warriden slowly roused his soul. He was astounded. He had never contemplated this possibility.

"Anyhow, I must go to-night," he said, rising from his chair. In an instant he had become the practical man, arranging the means to an end already resolved upon.

"I can borrow money of you?"

"Yes."

"And a mule?"

"Yes."

"Let me choose my mule."

They walked from the tent to where the mules stood picketed. Warrisden pointed to one in the middle of the line.

"That is the strongest."

"I don't want one too strong, too obviously well-fed," said Stretton, and he selected another. "Can I borrow a mulester for an hour or two?"

"Of course," said Warrisden.

Stretton called a mulester towards him and gave him orders. "There is a market to-day," he said. "Go to it and buy." He enumerated the articles he wanted, ticking them off upon his fingers—a few pairs of trousers and knives, a few gaily silk handkerchiefs, one or two cheap clocks, some pieces of linen, needles and thread—in fact, a small pedler's pack of wares. In addition, a black yallahia and cap, such as the Arabs must wear in Morocco, and a native's underclothes and slippers.

"Bring these things back to the camp at once. And speak to me!" said Stretton.

The mulester bowed a mule to carry the packages, and went off upon his errand. Stretton and Warrisden went back to the tent. Stretton sat down again in his chair, took a black cigarette from a bright blue packet which he had in his pocket, and lighted it as though all the arrangements for his journey were now concluded.

"I want you to pack the mule I chose with the things which your mulester brings back. Add some barley for the mule and some food for me, and bring it with the clothes to the southwest corner of the barrack wall at eight. It will be dark then. Don't come before it is dark, and wait for me at the corner. Will you?"

"Yes," replied Warrisden, "that's my way." He raised his arm and pointed towards the tent door.

The tent door faced the west, and in front there rose a range of mountains, dark and lofty, ridge overlapping ridge, and wonderfully distinct. In that clear air the peaks and gaps and jagged arêtes were all sharply defined. The sun was still bright, and the dark cliffs had a purple bloom of extraordinary softness and beauty like the bloom upon a ripe plum. Here and there the mountains were capped with snow, and the snow glistened like silver. "Those mountains are in Morocco," said Stretton. "That's my way—over them. My only way. We are on the very ridge of Morocco here."

"But once over the border," Warrisden objected. "Are you safe in Morocco?"

"Safe from capture."

"But safe in your own case?"

Stretton shrugged his shoulders.

"It is a bad road, I know. Dangerous and difficult. The ordinary traveler cannot pass along it. But it has been traversed. Prisoners have escaped that way to Fez—twice, for instance. Deserters have reached their homes by following it—score of them, at all events. The road takes one a risk."

It was the old brown legend upon the leath Procureur which Stretton now repeated; and not vainly indeed. Far away to the south in the afternoon sunlight there shone that yellow streak of sand beyond which the valley had been ever proved. Warrisden's thoughts were carried back on a sudden to that morning of storm and foam and roaring waves when Stretton had stood easily upon the deck of the fish cutter with the great sea swinging up behind him and had for the first time uttered it in Warrisden's hearing. Much the same feeling came over Warrisden as that which had then affected him—a feeling of awe and inferiority. Stretton was a man of no more than average ability, neither a deep thinker nor a person of integrity and resource. But the mere sturdiness of his character gave to him at times a certain grandeur. In Warrisden's eyes he had that grandeur now. He had come quickly to his determination to desert, but he had come calmly to it. There had been no excitement in his manner, no suggestion of hysteria. He had counted up the cost, he had read his letter, he had held the balance between his sacrifice and Milla's necessity, and he had decided. He had decided knowing not merely the danger, but the difficult type of his journey and the dangers of his road amongst the wild lawless tribes in that unsettled quarter of Morocco. Again Warrisden was carried away. He forgot even Fama at Roquebrune waiting for the telegram he was to send from Tunis on his return. He cried:

"I will send back my outfit and come with you. If we travel together there will be more safety."

Stretton shook his head.

"Leave," said Stretton. "You cannot speak Maghribi. I have a few sentences, not many—but enough. I know something of these tribes, too. For I once marched to the Fingid oasis. Your company would be no protection; rather it would be an extra danger."

Warrisden did not press his proposal. Stretton had so clearly made up his mind.

"Very well," he said. "You have a revolver, I suppose? Or shall I lend you one?"

And to Warrisden's astonishment Stretton replied:

"I shall carry no weapon."

Warrisden was already pining his arms of defence upon the table so that Stretton might make his choice.

"No weapon!" he exclaimed.

"No. My last chance to get through Fez is to travel as a Jew pedler. That is why I am borrowing your mule and have sent your mulester to the market. A Jew can go to Fez where no Moor can. For he is not suspected; he is merely despised. Besides, he brings things for sale which are needed. He may be robbed and beaten, but he has more chance of reaching his journey's end in one piece than any other man."

Thereafter he sat for a while silent, gazing towards the mountains in the west. The sun, glittering upon the peaks brought back to his mind the flashing crystals in the great salt lake. It was at just such a time, on just such an afternoon, when the two mulesters had marched out from the tent of the High Plateau into the open desert with his grayish carpet of halia grass. Far away the lake had flashed like an arm of silver set in the ground. Stretton could not but remember that expedition and compare it with the one upon which he was now to start. And the comparison was full of bitterness. The high hopes had vanished, the company were marching out upon the Legion's special work; even if disaster overtook them, disaster would not be without its glory. Stretton heard the clear in spiriting music of the bugles; he listened to the steady tramp of feet. Now the sun was setting.

"I shall miss the Legion," he said, regretfully. "I had no idea how much I should miss it until this moment."

His proud past history had grown dear to him. The recollections of his soldier's, the endless perplexing variety of their character, the secrets of their lives, of which every man and then it a rare moment of confidence a good life was great happiness as though a curtain were raised and lowered—all these particular qualities of the force had given to it a grip upon his affections, of which he felt the full strength now.

"For any other life," he said, "cannot but be a little dull, a little uninteresting afterwards. I shall miss the Legion very much."

Suddenly he put his hand into his pocket and took out of it that letter from the French War Office, which his colonel had handed to him. "Look!" he said, and he handed it over to Warrisden. "That is what I joined the Legion to win—a good commission—I have just not won it. In a month or two, perhaps in a week, perhaps even to-morrow, it might have been mine. Very soon I should have been back at home: the life I have dreamt of and worked for ever since I left London might have been mine and mine life. It was to have been a good life was great happiness. It had forgotten, it seemed, that he would regret the Legion. "A life without a flaw. Now that life's impossible, and I am a deserter. It's hard lines, isn't it?"

He rose from his chair and looked for a moment at Warrisden in silence.

"I am feeling sorry that I ever came," said Warrisden.

"Oh no," Stretton answered, with a smile. "It could not have been still worse if I had stayed here ignorant of the news you have brought me, and had some home in my own time. The news would have been much more beyond all remedy. You know a man named Talon—Lionel Talon?" he asked, abruptly, and before Warrisden could answer the blood rushed into his face and he exclaimed: "Never mind. Don't answer! Be at the corner of the barracks with the mule at eight," and he went from the tent, cautiously made his way out of the garden, and returned to his quarters.

A few minutes before eight Warrisden drove the mule, packed with Stretton's purchases, to the southwestern corner of the barracks. The night was dark, no moon was ahead, the stars shined halcyon. He reached the barracks, and the shadows of the high wall watching this way and that for Stretton's approach; and a few minutes he was almost startled out of his wits by a heavy body falling from the top of the wall upon the ground at his side. Warrisden, indeed, was so taken by surprise that he did not turn.

"Hush," said a voice close to the ground. "It's only me."

And Stretton rose to his feet. He had dropped from the sun mit of the wall.

"Are you hurt?" whispered Warrisden.

"No. Have you the clothes? Thanks."

Stretton stripped off his uniform and put on the Jewish dress. He had shaved off his moustache and blacked his hair. As he dressed he gave two or three small packages to Warrisden.

"Place them in the pack. Hide them, if possible. The packages contain food. I may be short of it, but I shall need it. The other's long black. I shall want that for my hair. Glaze your face," he said, with a low laugh, "are not so easily proved in Alafrica as in Bond Street. I have been thinking. You can help me if you will. You can shorten the time of my journey."

"How?" asked Warrisden.

"Go back to Ocran as quickly as possible. Take the first boat to Tangier. Hire an outfit there, mule and horse—and get some men, mind—and travel up at once to Fez. If you are quick you can do it within a fortnight. I shall take a fortnight at the least to reach Fez. I may be a week. But Fez I find you ready to start the moment I come to the town, we shall save much time."

"Very well. I will be there."

"If I get through sooner than I expect I shall go straight on to Tangier, and we will meet on the road. Now let me climb on to your shoulders." Stretton made a bundle of his uniform, climbed on to Warriador's shoulders, and threw it over the wall into the barrack yard.

"You that will betray you," cried Warriador, in a whisper. "They will find your clothes in the morning, clothes with a secret stripe."

"I cannot help that," replied Stretton as he jumped to the ground. "I do not intend to be shot as a traitor. For that is what may happen when a man drowns and takes his uniform with him. Don't fall for me in the morning."

He held out his hand, and as Warriador grasped it he said:

"I have not said much to you in the way of thanks. But I am very grateful, however much I may have owed to have been made unhappy by your coming. Since things are as they are, I am glad you came. I thank you, too, for that other visit to the North Sea. I will give you better thanks when we meet in Peru."

He cast a glance back to the wall of the barracks, and in a voice which trembled so deeply was he moved, he whispered to himself rather than to Warriador:

"Oh, but I am glad Tennyson is dead." All rise that he had said since he dropped from the wall had been said hurriedly and without emotion. These last words were whispered from a heart steepled with remorse. They were his farewell to the legion. He turned away, and driving the mole before him vanished into the darkness. To be continued.

Travel by Air

To regulate the height to which a balloon shall rise or fall is one of the interesting problems of aeronautics, and it usually has been solved by throwing ballast overboard or allowing the gas to escape. In balloon-balloons, which have recently been tried in successful experiments, this is accomplished by having independently airlocks into which air can be forced or withdrawn. While the idea is old, going back to the time of the first hydrogen balloon in 1783, it has only recently been put into successful application, though in 1864 air reservoirs were employed to regulate the shape of balloons. During the first year Henry de la Vaulx and Albert Barré have made experiments whereby successful ascents and descents have been made, and the altitude of the balloon slowly regulated. The balloon is an airtight compartment of long-chapel section placed around the lower part of the balloon proper and provided with suitable valves. By forcing air in or out of the balloon the displacement, and consequently the buoyancy, is altered. Thus in the first ascent made by M. de la Vaulx a crossing of the English Channel was made at a height of about ten feet with the balloon filled, the rising above the clouds the sun's rays would have expanded the air within the balloon proper and carried the ascents to its stars, where they would have been driven toward the Arctic Sea by the prevailing southerly winds had they not been able to descend to a lower level by rising the balloon. Thus the balloon was able to proceed in the desired direction on this particular voyage, landing in York after a trip of sixteen hours. By regulating the position of the valves which the balloon it is possible to save ballast, so that much longer trips can be taken with favorable winds. Further trips in this ball had were equally successful, and demonstrated the success of the balloon, and this arrangement should be advantageous in dirigible balloons or on air ships, as they would supply a simple means of regulating the buoyancy of the envelope containing the gas.

Mechanical Refrigeration on Railways

The scientific engineer has achieved a more victory over nature's law, and now has constructed a refrigerating machine for freight-cars, which forms an integral part of the car, and does away entirely with the necessity of constantly refilling the re-frigerating-chamber with ice during its journey.

This new device, which has recently undergone successful tests, consists of a small refrigerating-machine for each car, located in an enclosed casing beneath the car, and deriving power by gearing connected with the axle of one of the trucks. The machine includes a compressor for condensing the gas, usually carbonic dioxide, circulating pipes which cool the car, and a condenser for absorbing the heat from the condensed gas. The principle underlying is that according to most systems of mechanical refrigeration, and is based on the fact that a gas expanding extracts heat from the vicinity. The principle underlying is that according to most systems of mechanical refrigeration, and is based on the fact that a gas expanding extracts heat from the vicinity. The principle underlying is that according to most systems of mechanical refrigeration, and is based on the fact that a gas expanding extracts heat from the vicinity.

A small amount of ice must be carried at first, but this is not needed after the gas has turned on the condenser coils, and except for taking care that there is sufficient water in the condenser, there is nothing to be renewed on a trip. The cars thus equipped have an increased capacity, and the cost of operation is naturally much less than with ice.

To offset this must be taken into consideration the consumption of power from the axle, felt, of course, at the locomotive, and the cost of repairs and depreciation. The effect of the successful application of this system would be to still further increase the transportation of fruits and other perishable commodities from California to the East, or from the South to the North.

To the Point

REV. LEONARD PACE, who has become rector of St. Bartholomew's Church in Boston, was widely known in the latter place for the love he had for his flock, and for his facility of interesting them.

Since he has been in New York he has kept in communication with several of his little friends in Boston. Recently he wrote to one of his boys telling him how homelike he was, and ended his letter by asking: "Do you know of any cure for homeliness?"

Only a day or two passed before he received an answer. It read:

"Yes. Come home."

The Efficacy of Prayer

At a prayer-meeting in Mississippi during the civil war, a Presbyterian brother offered this prayer:

"O Lord, we thank Thee for all Thy heavenly goodness; for their risk and beautiful land of ours; for our brave women and valiant men. We thank Thee that we are fully able to take care of ourselves on land; but, O Lord, we do need leaders in the sky. Thy assistance when the Yankees send those infernal ghouls to destroy us."

A prominent Southern lawyer who had just repented of his wild ways and joined the church, was called upon in a religious meeting to pray. He started off very well, but did not know how to stop. After asking the Divine blessing on everything he could think of, he finally, with a determined effort, ended with these words: "Yours truly, P. C. Mason."

The Curse of Money

PATRICK A. CULLEN, Mayor of Boston, tells a story of a negro who was sent for stealing. He had been caught helping himself to the contents of the cash-drawer in the store of a Mr. Appleton. The magistrate before whom he was brought was a young man, and was much surprised to learn the charge against the prisoner. Looking at the negro earnestly, he said: "Now, I'm sorry to see you here. Didn't you know that so good a curse came from stolen money? There's a curse on it."

"Well, judge," replied the prisoner, "I didn't know. Mister Appleton stole that money. I couldn't tell that by just lookin' at it."

THE Official Photographs of the St. Louis Exposition which you see reproduced in the various magazines and newspapers are all made with the Goetz lens. The Official Photographers of the St. Louis Fair have all adopted the Goetz lens to the exclusion of all others.

In block 75 of the Liberal Arts Building the Goetz Optical Works show their automatic process of grinding and polishing these famous lenses in operation.

Main Office, Berlin-Friedrichs, Germany.
Branch Offices, 4 and 5 Holborn Circle, London, England. 22 Rue de l'Etape, Paris.

CATALOGUE FREE

Room 33, 52 E. Union Square, New York City.

Made in their own sweet way from the finest of every kind of fine candy.

Sole Importers

STEPHEN F. WHITMAN & SON,
1015 Broadway, N. Y. C.

PETER'S CHOCOLATE

The Original Swiss Milk CHOCOLATE

For Eating Only
For Travelers, Campers, Yachtsmen, Cannermen, Golfers, Aviators, Etc.

A small package of PETER'S CHOCOLATE makes a substantial treat.

Irresistible Delicious—No room—Nothing else can compare to it.

A sample and copy, upon request, LAMONT, CORLISS & CO., Sole Importers
Head in 10 Madison Street, New York

You can live without life insurance, but you won't live so rich.

Nothing adds to the zest of living like knowing your family is protected by a policy in the

PENNY MUTUAL LIFE.

921-943 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia.

FOR MEN OF BRAINS
Cortez CIGARS
-MADE AT KEY WEST-

VERGILIUS

A TALE OF THE
COMING OF CHRIST

BY

IRVING
BACHELLER

Author of "Eben Holden"

UNIQUE BINDING
Post 8vo, $1.35

In this master-work Mr. Bacheller writes of decadent Rome, weaving a plot of strange interest. In a thrilling climax comes the Nativity, depicted with deepest reverence, vividness, and power. ❁ ❁ ❁

"Vergilius" has no parallel in fiction. The lovers about whom the plot is woven are both Roman patricians. Augustus, Herod, and his son Antipater are all vividly and intimately drawn, while a new light is thrown on the attitude of Jews and Romans toward the vaguely heralded "New King of the Jews." A delightful and exciting romance, unusual and unforgettable.

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS, NEW YORK

Schlitz

Is Just This:

Barley—selected by a partner in our concern—from the best barley that grows. And we malt it ourselves.

Hops—brought in large part from Bohemia—selected by our buyers from the finest hops in the world.

Water—from six artesian wells bored 1400 feet to rock.

Just a food and a tonic—brewed with the extreme of cleanliness—cooled in filtered air—sterilized in the bottle after the bottle is sealed.

It is one of the best things in the world for you.

Schlitz beer is pure, because our process is cleanly, and because the beer is filtered, then Pasteurized.

It does not ferment on the stomach, because it is aged—aged for months in refrigerating rooms before it is marketed.

It is a health drink without germs in it.

It gives you beer without biliousness. Ask your doctor what he thinks about drinking
Schlitz beer. Ask for the brewery bottling.

The Beer That Made Milwaukee Famous

HARPER'S WEEKLY

EDITED BY

GEORGE HARVEY

HARPER BROTHERS

- NEW YORK -

Columbia

LIGHT GASOLENE TONNEAU

MARK XLIII.

Without special gears or extra devices of any kind, regular stock model, with full tonning equipment, won event for cars costing from $1,000 to $1,800 in Mount Washington Climbing Contests; also Gold Medal in White Mountain Endurance Run.

PRICE, $1,750

4 cylinders with 16 valve engine. 2000 cc. capacity. 1000 lbs. weight. Columbia Electric Tonneau Co. 1412 Michigan Ave. Chicago, Ill.

ELECTRIC VEHICLE CO., Hartford, Conn.

New York: 134-138 W. 30th St.
Chicago: 1412 Michigan Ave. Section 74 Statehouse St.

"Pillar'd around by everlasting hills,
Robed in the drapery of descending floods."

NIAGARA FALLS

One of the natural wonders of the world. A charming place at any season of the year, reached from every direction by the

NEW YORK CENTRAL LINES.

A visit to the Falls is an object lesson in Geography; an exhibition of landscapes that no painter can equal, and a glimpse of the latest developments of the industrial world.

A copy of Four-Track Series No. 9, "Ten Days at Niagara Falls," will be sent free, upon receipt of a two-cent stamp, by George H. Daniels, General Passenger Agent, Grand Central Station, New York.

ALTON B. PARKER says: "I Read the NEW YORK WORLD Every Day."

THE WORLD Elected Cleveland.

"It may be said without reservation that if the Democratic party to my first campaign had lacked the perfect and potent advocacy of Democratic principles at that time by the NEW YORK WORLD the result might have been reversed."—Glover Cleveland's Letter to The World, May 10, 1893.

Bryan on THE WORLD

"THE WORLD never during the last twenty years considered itself a party paper. It promised to spread truly Democratic principles and truly Democratic ideas, and it did so so, and will do so, with every independence of biases, machines and platforms, and with the approval of the people."—Charles F. Bryan in the Convention, July 15, 1893.

Both Sides of the Great Political Battle Fully and Fairly Given.

Send $1 to THE N. Y. WORLD and you will receive THE WORLD every week day for FOUR MONTHS from the day your subscription is received, including every day of the Presidential Campaign. The regular price of the Daily World for four months is $2.00.

The World is not an error. It does not defend any candidate for the sake of party, nor attack any other candidate because of his party.

The World vigorously supported Cleveland in his two subsequent campaigns, and during his last term it exposed with equal vigor his Democratic policy, and his secret bond contract. It was the first newspaper to expose his renegade to the Wall Street syndicate, and it debated the secret treaty with the nation.

The World opposed William J. Bryan and "silverite"ism. Its editorial page led in the fight for sound money and against the "free coin and redemption" proposed by the Populist League temporarily as a part of the Democratic party.

In this Presidential campaign The World's news will always be fair and impartial. The foremost leaders in both parties will write for its columns. The World believes that the truth is always to be told.

It will fight for what seems to it right. It will be true to its record, as for instance, when it fought David W. Hill—and defeated him—for Governor of New York; when it opposed with all its might—and also defeated—the tainted candidate whom Hill nominated for the highest court of New York—Maryland; when it supported Seth Low against Tammam and McKinley against Bryan.

The World this year will strive to be even more than in earlier campaigns true to the ideal of an teacher when he said The World should be "both a daily schoolhouse and a daily forum, both a daily teacher and a daily tribunal, an instrument of justice, a terror to wrong, an aid to education, an exponent of true Americanism."

The result of the election will be foretold in The World's news in advance exactly as Cleveland's election was foretold in McKinley's triumph before The World gave the electoral vote by States with absolute confidence ten weeks before McKinley's election day.

An active agent wanted in every election district. Write for particulars, sample copies supplied free on application. This offer is for small subscribers ONLY. Address THE WORLD CAMPAIGN CLUB, Pulitzer Building, New York.

THE GIVERS

BY
MARY E. WILKINS FREEMAN

THESE are Mary E. Wilkins Freeman's latest stories. All are filled with the humor and pathos of New England life—the type of story which is indisputably the author's own, and in which she scored her remarkable early success.

Of the stories in this volume, the title story—"The Givers"—has created more widespread interest and called forth more letters from the author's readers than anything else Mrs. Freeman has done. It is a laughable tale of the revolt of a sturdy, strong-minded woman against the inappropriateness of the Christmas gifts with which she is deluged by her well-to-do, unthinking friends. How she leads each in turn to replace her gift with some homely, serviceable article is a triumph of rough-handed New England diplomacy and a highly amusing tale.

Sophia Lane is but one of the many characters in this book who are good to know and not soon forgotten.

Illustrated, Cloth, $1.25

HARPER & BROTHERS
PUBLISHERS NEW YORK CITY

HARPER'S WEEKLY

Vol. XLVIII

New York, Saturday, August 27, 1904

No. 2473

Copyright, 1904, by Harper & Brothers. All rights reserved

"With all his faults, we love him—still"

The "Sun"

fellow toilers under the glorious banner of the POOR MAN'S PARTY, and resist Plutocracy to the death. Behold! our faithful allies, our redoubtable champions, have preceded us and await us under the banquette. There perceive the worthy General JOHN D. ROCKWELL, listening earnestly to the suggestions of WILLIAM and JOHN D. JR.; close by, see the Scottish Chief CANNON and SCHWAB, and a little way off, HENRY C. FRICK; and, wait! in that the Poor Man's Naval Reserve rounding the bend! In very truth it is, the Corsair in the lead with Commodore MORGAN on the bridge; the Kanawha following under Captain H. H. ROGERS, the Jacobsine next under Captain P. A. B. WINNEY, and the Soma under Captain WILLIAM R. LEWIS; and now do we hear the whistle of General J. Gordon's special train approaching? we do; and is that generous-looking old gentleman with the patch on his trousers Park Rossall Street it is. And are EDWARD H. HARRISMAN and JACOB H. SCHIFF and JAMES SPEYER and EDWIN FRANK, and HENRY GOULD on board? they are; three cheers for the Poor Man's—last hold, the rest of a four-in-hand! Can it be our Parisian ally, JAMES H. HAY? it is; and is not that JAMES STEELMAN beside him? yes, yes; but what means that blooming of horses? ah! the automobile regiment of regulars—Colonel JOHN ASTOR in the lead, followed by the crack VANDERBILT company, Captain WILLIAM K., Lieutenant W. K. JR., ALFRED, CONNELL S., and Corporal REGINALD; and who, pray, is that intense gaze gazing hopefully toward the rising sun? can it be NATHAN'S brother Oswald? it is, it is, REMOND! And still they come! Let Plutocracy pale before those stanch hearts and horny hands! More on, ye POOR MAN'S PARTY!

By the way, what is CLARENCE H. MURRAY, member of the Auxiliary Republican National and Advisory Republican State Committees doing in the Democratic camp? Can it be that, in its eagerness to be rid of the well-to-do element, the Tribune despised the Republican ranks without the consent of the governed?

"In pose and intellect," HARPER'S WEEKLY thinks, Mr. JAMES is "immeasurably inferior" to Mr. BOOR; but not as a safe reflector. How about FREDERICK M. SUFFRAN, for instance? How would the WEEKLY compare this gentleman with Mr. BOOR in "pose and intellect," character and civil courage, and all-around ability for exercising the important functions of the greatest international office in the nation?—True Press.

We cannot make an impossible comparison.

Former-Senator JAMES SMITH, JR., of New Jersey, seems determined to nominate Mr. CLEVELAND for something. Having missed fire in St. Louis, his mind turns to the Governorship of New Jersey. This appears to be more feasible. Mr. CLEVELAND has comparatively little to do in Princeton, and could easily spare the time to drive over to Trenton twice a week and govern the State. Moreover, unless JOSEPH QUINCY ADAMS cared in accepting a position as justice of the peace after having served as President, there would be no sacrifice of dignity or prestige. New Jersey is one of the most interesting of our commonwealths, and ought always to have a good Governor. It has one now, one of the best, but the Constitution will not let him succeed himself. Consequently we are disposed to approve Senator SMITH's proposal to nominate Dr. CLEVELAND. Incidentally, we say that if he should become the Democratic candidate, the Republican nominee would never know he had been running. All depends, as Mr. TIMOTHY D. SULLIVAN would observe, upon the disposition of the "big fellow" himself.

The Press calls us to task for noting the fact that the leading independent newspapers which supported Mr. McKINLEY now advocate the election of Judge PARKER, and while not denying the truth of the statement, questions the motives actuating the journals referred to. "Some of the very newspapers enumerated by HARPER'S WEEKLY," it says, "are regarded by the public as prima facie evidence that there is danger to it in what those papers advocate. The endorsement of Judge PARKER by the Standard Oil Trust directly, as well as by its agents and servants, might as reasonably be advanced as an indication that public sentiment favored Judge PARKER. Among the strongest reasons which the public finds for voting for President ROOSEVELT is the kind of influence which is opposing him and the kind which is giving its aid to Judge PARKER. And one of the most powerful factors in WALKING THE PUBLIC AWAY FROM JUDGE PARKER is a certain brand of newspaper in this community which denounces Mr. ROOSEVELT as a menace to the country which he has served so loyally and fearlessly, though to the bitter hatred of the corporate powers."

Let us see about this. The newspapers to which we referred are the Herald, the World, the Times, the Evening Post, the St. Louis-Zeitung, and the Brooklyn Eagle. Does the Press really believe that the policies of these journals are dictated by "corporate influences"? Will it seriously declare a sincere conviction that Mr. BENNETT is not the sole director of the Herald? Or Mr. PUTNAM, of the World? Or Mr. OGIS, of the Times? Or Mr. RHOADS, of the St. Louis-Zeitung? Or Mr. VILLARD, of the Evening Post? Or Mr. McHEWITT, of the Brooklyn Eagle? What has any one of these newspapers ever done to indicate the contrary? We had no subtle purpose in declaring that "the leading independent newspapers are lining up for the Judge." We simply noted a very interesting fact. If, however, in common with the public, we have mistaken their true character and they are not independent of outside influences which the Press regards as pernicious, we should like to know it. Unless the Press can and does substantiate its serious charge forthwith, it must stand before the public as a wilful and malicious maligner of its contemporaries and unworthy of consideration in honorable journalism. We confess humbly to having declared thoughtlessly that "of all the big newspapers here in New York, the Tribune alone supports the Colonel"; but that was mere inadvertence. We should have been glad to mention the Press but for the fact that temporarily we forgot its existence. As further evidence of our intent to be fair, we now direct particular attention to the fact that since we wrote that paragraph another big newspaper here in New York has come out for Mr. ROOSEVELT. We mean, of course, the Sun.

While it is about it, we wonder if the Press could inform us whether the newspapers outside of New York which are in the same category as those mentioned are also contaminated. Here are the names of a few which opposed BRYAN and supported PARKER:

Boston Herald.	Springfield Republicans.
Pittsburgh Courier.	Buffalo Times.
Hartford Telegram.	Bridgeport Post.
Bridgeport Telegram.	Manchester Union.
Bacon County Chronicle.	Manchester News.
Detroit Free Press.	Troy Press.
Barnesport Leader.	Des Moines Journal.
Barnesport Democrat.	St. Paul Tribune.
Schenectady Gazette.	Baltimore Herald.
Lexington Herald.	Fort Wayne Free Press.
Exeterville Democrat.	Indianapolis Journal.
Windsor Journal.	St. Paul Globe.
Hastings (Neb.) Republican.	Louisville Courier.

Is the trail of the serpent over these also? Will the Press kindly inform us? Incidentally, too, will it not very particularly oblige by telling us the story of its own life? Was it not founded by ultra-protectionists for the sole purpose of championing their cause and safeguarding their interests, i. e., the interests of a unorganized class? And has it ever done or is it now doing anything else?

We think a former Secretary of War would make an admirable Governor of New York.

Mr. HARVEY KNOWS, and he will not deny it, that those newspapers (Mr. HARVEY'S) have more influence than all of the other newspapers combined. He might tell his readers that when he published HARVEY'S scientific book, The Riddle of the Universe, and it was reviewed in one of "HARVEY'S papers," that that single editorial review caused Mr. HARVEY to sell more copies of his book than he had been able to dispose of with the aid of all other reviewing and all advertising combined.

Mr. HARVEY KNOWS, and he ought to tell his financial and other friends for their guidance, that the "HARVEY papers," wherever they are published, exceed in circulation all other newspapers in America, and exceed them also in influence.—The Journal.

The statement regarding the effect of the Journal's review of The Riddle of the Universe is correct. That respecting the circulation of Mr. HEARST's newspapers—more especially those published in the afternoon—we believe also to be true. As to their influence, it is our firm conviction that they have infinitely less in proportion to the number read than any other newspapers published in the United States. Mr. HEARST broke his hold upon the class he was cultivating, with more or less success, when, by forcing his candidacy for the Presidency, he drove deep into their suspicious minds the belief that he was a self-seeker. Moreover, the American people were graduated from the kindergarten before ARTUR BLAUSKAMP was born.

The great question which confronts many Democrats who voted for McKINLEY is whether a vote cast this year for PARKER will make for the regeneration of the Democratic party. Has that party yet been chastened enough to be good? If PARKER should be elected, would his administration be like the last administration of CLEVELAND, in which the party wanted one thing and its President another, and the President spent his strength to keep his party out of mischief? In such a case has PARKER not the vigor, the disposition, and the grit to do what CLEVELAND did? Or, what is more important still, has leadership enough and able enough backing to shape a course out of the wilderness and constrain, or induce, his party to follow him? On the other hand, if PARKER could not gain the votes of the McKINLEY Democrats and was beaten, would not those Democrats be fairly open to the reproach that when their branch of the Democratic party was reorganized and their kind of a Democratic candidate put up, they denied him their votes and deliberately turned their old party back into the clutches of the Radicals? It is hard to see how the Gold Democrat who refuses to vote for PARKER can any longer call himself a Democrat. He may not become a Republican, but at least he is an independent; a man without party ties or party allegiance; whose part in politics is no longer active but judicial. It is not a position that attracts an active man. That THOMAS ROOSEVELT, for example, would accept it is almost unthinkable.

In some as persistent silence may seem to Mr. ROOSEVELT, he has decided, so we told, to make no public speeches during the present campaign. Senator FURNAS, on the other hand, has been heard on the platform, not only in Indiana, but also in Ohio, and is expected to speak frequently in the Central West. Nobody would call Mr. FURNAS an orator or a magnetic person; yet he is often effective on the stump, for when he knows his audience thoroughly, his utterances are not only brief, but telling. The Senator is kindly often to the fact that, unless he succeeds in carrying Indiana for the Republican ticket, he might as well abandon the hope of winning the Republican nomination for the Presidency in 1908. That he feels by no means certain of becoming Vice-President is a reasonable inference from his indefatigable refusal to resign his seat in the Senate. That we shall witness a desperate fight this autumn in Indiana may be taken for granted; because, if Mr. TAGGART, the chairman of the Democratic National Committee, should fail to carry his own State for PARKER and DAVIS, he knows that he will quickly be consigned to limbo. As yet, the Democrats seem doubtful as to whether it is worth while to make a strenuous effort in Illinois. In Wisconsin, on the other hand, they look with considerable confidence. That they cannot count upon Delaware if the American Republicans and regular Republicans agree upon Presidential elections must be recognized in view of the effect of the new State Constitution on the electors. In 1900 the Republicans had a plurality of 3631; in 1900, 3671; and in 1902, 4102. To measure the significance of this plurality, it is useful to bear in mind that even now the total popular vote of Delaware is only about 40,000. As regards the contest in West Virginia, Senator ELKINS, far from admitting that his father-in-law, ex-Senator DAVIS, may carry the State for the Democratic ticket, insists that ROOSEVELT and FURNAS will have the normal Republican plurality of about 20,000.

There is no doubt that Mr. ROOSEVELT will have the electoral vote of Nebraska. The rumor that Mr. W. J. BRYAN had sold out to the Republicans in that State was based upon the fact that the Democrats and Populists, although they will put forward the same nominees for State offices, have insisted on keeping in the field separate lists for Presidential electors.

Mr. BRYAN's reward was to be—so we were told—the election of a fusion Legislature, which could be relied upon to send him to the United States Senate. Whether the price will be paid is uncertain. Already in several districts the Populists and Democrats have evinced an unwillingness to make an candidates for the Legislature, while, on the other hand, it is improbable that the Republican rank and file will refrain from obtaining the control of their State's lawmaking body, if they can. It is interesting to recall what occurred in Nebraska twelve years ago. Then, too, the Democrats and Populists, though, had they fused, they were certain to carry the State, put forward distinct lists of Presidential electors. The result was that, while CLEVELAND got 24,943 votes, and WEILER 87,134, HUNTER secured 87,213, or a plurality of 8078. In 1900, the State gave a plurality of more than 13,000 to Mr. BRYAN, who was supported by both Populists and Democrats. Four years later, however, Mr. BRYAN lost Nebraska by nearly 8000, but in 1902, the plurality of the Republican Governor was considerably less.

If Judge PARKER ever had a chance of carrying the State, it has been lost by the refusal of the Populists and Democrats to make on Presidential electors. It is by no means certain, however, that Mr. BRYAN can be justly charged with the failure to bring about complete fusion this year in Nebraska. He seems to have tried, honestly and persistently, to persuade each of the two parties to accept a certain proportion of the Presidential electors to be named on a fusion ticket, but the project was foiled by Mr. THOMAS E. WATSON, the Populist nominee for the Presidency, who is said to have threatened to repudiate the nomination, unless his party presented in Nebraska a separate list of Presidential electors. The fact remains that one of the Transmississippi States, which it was supposed might possibly be carried, with Mr. BRYAN's help, for Judge PARKER, must now be definitely renounced. The only States west of the Mississippi which the Democrats now seem to have some chance of gaining are Colorado, Montana, Idaho, and Nevada.

On September 12 and September 13 State elections will be held in Maine and Vermont respectively. In neither State, of course, has the Democratic nominee for Governor any hope of being elected. Vermont, indeed, has been an impregnable stronghold of the Republican party since the civil war; but in September, 1880, the Republican nominee for Governor in Maine was beaten, to the consternation of GARFIELD's supporters and the corresponding elation of HAYES's friends. Since then the party managers have considered it imprudent to neglect the State election in Maine; and even in Vermont the Republicans make it a rule to seek in September the moral effect of the largest majority attainable. Speaker PAXSON opened the campaign in the Green Mountain region as early as Wednesday, August 10, and he will be heard also in the Pine-tree State. There seems to be no doubt that in both commonwealths the Democratic machinery is woefully out of gear. Thus the Maine Democracy, which in September, 1880, as we have said, had a plurality, could manage to cast in 1902 only about half as many votes as the Republicans; while the Vermont Democrats, who in 1876 numbered more than 20,000, and fell short of their competitors by less than 4000, could muster but 7304 votes two years ago, against almost 32,000 thrown for their opponents.

Mr. HEARST could make his political editorials very much better if he would tell all, and not a part only, of what he knows. He will learn that nothing succeeds as well as telling the whole truth, and nothing but the truth—even about politicians and unfriendly publications.—New York Journal.

Maybe so, maybe so. One thing we know that we haven't told yet is that Mr. HEARST's papers are not doing all they might do to elect the Democratic candidates. Why?

It will have been observed that neither the Republican platform nor Mr. ROOSEVELT in his speech of acceptance on the one hand, nor, for that matter, the Democratic platform and Judge PARKER in his speech of acceptance, name any definite date at which our government should consent to surrender control of the Philippine Islands to the inhabitants thereof. In the case of Cuba we did pledge ourselves to evacuate the island at a specified time, and we punctually fulfilled the promise. The Republicans direct attention to the fact that the Filipinos already have some share in the administration of their country, and that the purpose is to give them a larger and longer share as they shall become more qualified for local self-rule. There is no intimation, however, in the Republican platform, or in Mr. ROOSEVELT's speech of acceptance, that there is any intention of surrendering absolute sovereignty to the islanders. Neither is there any admission on the part of the Republicans that our permanent retention of colonies, based, as it would be, on the assumption that one people may justly govern another, would be likely to prove a fatal solvent of American ideals. Herein lies a distinction between the attitudes of the two parties with reference to the Filipino question. Judge PIERCE, in his speech of acceptance, reaffirming what Mr. HENRY OLNEY had said in a speech at Boston, points out that the assertion of a right to hold an alien people in subjection, no matter how enlightened, humane, and intelligent our rule may be, is totally irreconcilable with the fundamental premise of the Declaration of Independence. Under the circumstances, the Filipinos are warranted in believing that, although the Democrats themselves have refrained from designating the precise date at which complete independence should be granted to the islanders, such a concession is much more likely to be gained, and to be gained early, from them than it is from the Republicans.

The conclusion receives some confirmation from the speech made by Secretary TAYLOR in St. Louis on August 13—"Philippine Day." We do not refer to Judge TAYLOR's disclaimer of having ever had the thought that the United States might, at some future time, transfer the Philippine Islands to another power. So far as we know, no such proposal has ever been made by any American citizen, whether Republican or Democratic. To transfer the islands to another sovereign without their consent—which, in all likelihood, would never be given—would be an indefensible proceeding. What we have in mind is Judge TAYLOR's advocacy of a project which, however plausible, from the viewpoint of exploitation and civilization, would, by causing large amounts of American capital to be invested in the Philippines, create there a powerful interest, indirectly opposed to even a remote surrender of the islands. What he wishes is that Congress should authorize the insular government to guarantee for thirty years an income of five per cent. on the money invested in any Filipino railway. It is perfectly true that, unless railways are constructed in Luzon and the other large islands, it will be impracticable to turn their agricultural, timber, and mineral resources to profitable account. It is equally true that if American capitalists had been permitted to buy up large tracts of arable, timber, and mineral lands, the output of commodities suitable for export would have been far larger to-day than it is now. Nevertheless, Congress refused to permit such purchases to be made, on the undisputable ground that the natural resources of the islands should be reserved for the islanders. Experience should teach us, however, that if American capital is invested in insular railways, the pressure for permission to acquire huge tracts of adjoining lands for tillage, mining, and the procurement of valuable timber would become irresistible. If American capital gains a firm foothold in the Philippines, we may be sure that the flag will stay there.

Notwithstanding the extremely favorable reports from the cotton-fields in our Southern States, the bulls on the cotton exchanges are unlikely to be discouraged permanently, for it now seems to be generally acknowledged that the world's supply of cotton is no longer equal to the world's demand. In a paper read the other day before the Manchester Statistical Society by Mr. J. ARTHUR HEPBURN, the cotton crop of the world this year is estimated at 10,000,000 bales, of 500 pounds each. The output is distributed as follows: United States, 11,000,000; India, 3,000,000; Egypt, 1,000,000, and 1,000,000 from all other sources of supply. These figures undoubtedly attest an increase of 2,225,000 bales over the average annual production during the quinquennial period, 1894-8. Meanwhile, however, the demand for cotton has been augmented in still greater proportion. The yearly increase in the demand is computed at from 400,000 to 500,000 bales. In the United States alone the quantity needed for home consumption has undergone remarkable expansion. During the triennial period, 1884-90, our Northern mills consumed yearly 1,840,000 bales on an average, and our Southern mills, 400,000. On the other hand, during the triennium, 1901-3, the average yearly consumption of our Northern mills had risen to 2,250,000 bales, and that of our Southern mills to 1,025,000. That is to say, the United States now need for home consumption almost two million more bales of raw cotton than they required fifteen years ago.

How is the actual and impending shortage to be made good? Few experts seem to put much faith in the promise of eventual shipments on a large scale from West Africa and Central Africa, and, although the export of the staple from Egypt is now materially larger than it was, it cannot be expected to go far toward meeting the demand. It is now, as it has been for about a century, the United States that must be relied upon for most of the world's cotton, and, as it happens, conditions on this side of the Atlantic are not favorable to any remarkable expansion of the crop. There is no doubt that a larger area is being planted than was formerly the case, but, on the other hand, the yield per acre is decreasing. Various explanations of this state of things have been given. It is alleged, for instance, that in those plantations which have been for some time under cultivation, the soil itself is losing its fertility. A more efficient cause of the slowness with which the cotton crop expands is probably the growing inadequacy of the labor-supply in our Southern States. Formerly the mass of colored laborers could find employment only in the cotton-fields. Of late years numerous factories and sawmills have been established in the South, and market-gardening has been introduced on an extensive scale, the result being that a considerable part of the colored labor, which used to seek the cotton-fields, has been attracted in other directions. It is principally on this ground that careful observers account for the fact that, although more cotton-seed is sown, the harvest does not expand in a corresponding ratio. Yet the world's crop must be increased by at least five million bales within the decade now beginning, if the world's demand at the end of that period is to be met.

A Gentle Echo on Politics

(in the Swift and Doric Manner)

- THUNDER:
Ere no, I woen, will to my words reply,
And quaintly answer questions: shall I try?
ECHO: Try!
- THUNDER:
Ere, what are my prospects, dark or bright?
How is my clime, sweet Ere, is it right?
ECHO: Sit tight!
- THUNDER:
How shall I make myself best understood?
What sort of campaign speeches would be good?
ECHO: Be good!
- THUNDER:
What of the trusts, 'neath which the people chafe?
What sort of promise, think you, would be safe?
ECHO: Be "safe"!
- THUNDER:
But folks expect me to be rash and bray,
And if I'm not they'll murmur, "Is this TAYLOR?"
ECHO: Steady!
- THUNDER:
How about campaign lies, truey I not probable?
That Ananias from Wayback peddle?
ECHO: Back pedal!
- THUNDER:
When impulse calls, "Hoar, Thunderer!" shall I do it,
And in the sober thoughts that follow run it?
ECHO: Follow them!
- THUNDER:
Must I ape BROW, his words of wisdom con,
Sing sweet and low with him in unison?
ECHO: He's on!
- THUNDER:
What attitude towards Wall Street should I show
When campaign takings run surprising low?
ECHO: Sing low!
- THUNDER:
Ere, I'm glad your counsel I lauded,
The lamp to light me is already lighted.
ECHO: Dee-lighted!

BERT LINTON TAYLOR.

The Present Law of Presidential Succession

It will be remembered that Mr. ROSS, in notifying Senator FARRER of his nomination for the Vice-Presidency by the Republican party, directed attention to the circumstance that the Democratic nominee for the same office, ex-Senator DAVIS of West Virginia, will be eighty-one years old at the beginning of the next Presidential term. Mr. Davis is a great deal older than any man hitherto nominated for the Presidency or Vice-Presidency. While it is true that no Vice-President has died in office after succeeding to the Presidency, it is obvious that the chance of such a regrettable incident occurring is materially increased if the successful nominee for the second place on the ticket is a man of exceptionally advanced age. From these facts Mr. Ross drew the inference that thoughtful voters next November will consider with mingling, not to say anxiety, the question as to whom Judge PARKER, if elected, would be likely to make Secretary of State; because that functionary, in the event of the disability or death of both President and Vice-President, would, under the existing Federal statute, become Chief Magistrate. Suppose that functionary should be HAYEN H. HAY? Would voters survey with equanimity the possible contingency of his succession to the Presidency?

It is, in truth, a serious question which is raised by the present statute regarding the succession to the office of Federal Executive. The question is this: As the law now stands here and there about as much right to know before going to the ballot box who, in the event of the success of a given ticket, is likely to be invited to be Secretary of State, as they have to know when the Presidential electors named by a given party will choose for President and Vice-President?

Under the former law the voters were far less vitally concerned in a President's selection of cabinet officers. The law of 1792—it will be remembered that the Constitution left this matter to Congress—provided that, in the event of the death of both the President and the Vice-President, the President pro tem. of the Senate should succeed to the Presidency; and that, failing a President pro tem. of the Senate, the Speaker of the House should succeed. There was thus to be said for the arrangement, that neither of the possible successors could be described as the mere creature of Executive appointment, who had been forced the ordeal of the ballot-box, perhaps not only have secured the suffrages of a tenth part or a hundredth part of his fellow electors. A President pro tem. of the Senate would owe his place to the esteem and confidence of a majority of his fellow Senators, who their turn had been elected by State Legislatures. The Speaker of the House would be indebted for his important post to a majority of his fellow Representatives, every one of whom would have been elected by the people. This law remained on the Federal statute-book till 1842, during which time no fewer than five Vice-Presidents, to wit, GEORGE CLINTON, HANNAH RAY, JOHN CALHOUN, WILLIAM A. GURNEY, and THOMAS A. HENRIKSEN, died before the expiration of the Vice-Presidential term for which they were elected. As it happened, in no one of these five cases did the corresponding President happen to die or to be disabled; otherwise, of course, the President pro tem. of the Senate, or if there was no such officer, the Speaker of the House, would have become the head of the Federal Executive. In this regulation there were three objections, the last of which proved fatal. In the first place, it was clear that, if the President should be killed by either the President pro tem. of the Senate or the Speaker of the House, a member of the legislative department would be placed in the Executive chair. The Executive, having been chosen by the legislative department, would naturally feel himself dependent on it. Such a subordination of the Executive to the legislature would be contrary to the conception of independent and coordinate branches of government which shaped the Constitution, as distinguished from the preceding Articles of Confederation. In the second place, under the order of succession established by the law of 1792, the President of the Senate or the Speaker of the House, who would come into power in the event of the death of both President and Vice-President, might be of a different political party from the Chief Magistrate chosen by the people, and his accession might lead to a reversal of the policies voted for at the ballot box. Both of these objections were substantial; but the third, as we have said, proved decisive, namely, that, if the President and Vice-President should both die in the interim between the expiration of one Congress and the beginning of the next, there might be no President of the Senate, and there certainly would be no Speaker of the House. That is to say, we should be confronted with an interregnum for which no provision had been made by the Constitution or the laws.

Since a new Presidential Succession law was enacted in 1866, to the effect that, in the event of the death or disability of both the President and Vice-President, the cabinet officers shall succeed to the Presidency in a specified order, beginning with the Secretary of State.

The objections to the existing statute are very grave. The law of 1866 strikes at the very root of the conception of popular government when it gives a President the power to designate his possible successor. The consequences of the exercise of such arbitrary power might, as the law now stands, be grievous and exasperating. If in the early part of Mr. CLEVELAND's second term the President and Vice-President had both died, the accession of Secretary of State GRESHAM, who, up to 1862, had been all his life a Whigian, would have been bitterly and justly resented by the Democratic party. As even more intolerable outrage would have been in the eyes of the Whigs if President TYLER had died during the last year of his term, and Secretary of State CALHOUN had thereby become Chief Magistrate.

There is an easy and informal way to parry the blow leveled by Mr. ROSS at the St. Louis ticket. All that Judge PARKER would need to do, if he would ally apprehension concerning his fitness for the office of Chief Magistrate, would be to let it be understood that, if elected, he intends to defer the post of Secretary of State to such a man as HENRY DEXTER or Judge HAY.

The United States and the Far-Eastern War

WHEN the war between Russia and Japan began in February we pointed out that the United States were interested in the outcome of the contest on account of the large and growing trade with Manchuria, of which the treaty rights conceded to us by China were the foundation. It was to be expected that Russia should also have to the relief of Japan, would have been in her dominions, and, in that event, it was hazardous that American products would long be permitted to compete on equal terms with Russian commodities in the conquered region. On the other hand, Japan had declared that one of the main objects for which she confronted the risks of war was the maintenance of China's integrity over Manchuria, by which geographical name she understood to mean all that part of the three provinces collectively so called, which lies outside of the district known to Russia. With in that district, including Port Arthur and Dairen, Japan may reasonably demand that she shall be subrogated in the rights of a lesser belligerent possessed by Russia; but elsewhere Chinese custom houses will be respected, and the commercial privileges granted to foreigners by treaty all cease to be suspended. To this effect, at all events, assurances have been given by the Mikado's government to all the neutral powers, including its contingent ally, Great Britain.

During the last few months, however, we have become interested in the Far Eastern contest on other than commercial grounds. It was on the initiative of one State Department that an agreement was secured from both belligerents that the neutrality of China should be respected, provided, of course, the Middle Kingdom should, on its part, fulfil scrupulously a neutral's duty. Until recently the agreement seems to have been carried out on all sides. The Chinese army under General Ma, which consisted itself to that part of Manchuria which lies west of the Liao River, and which is understood to have been excluded by the consent of the combatants from the area of hostile operations. Neither, up to the week ending August 15, was it alleged that the neutrality of any Chinese harbor had been violated by either of the belligerents. When, however, the Russian destroyer Bozhitsin was attacked and captured by Japanese war-vessels in the harbor of Chelso, it became a matter of importance in the United States to learn whether protection had been given for this apparent breach of international law. For, if the act should prove to have been intolerable, our State Department could scarcely, without loss of dignity, refrain from remonstrating against the violation of an agreement which it had itself proposed. That is to say, Secretary HAY would be expected to insist that China should demand reparation of Japan, and that the Tokyo government, on its part, should promptly make amends for its infringement of the rights of neutrals. But, if such a remonstrance should be made, the question would arise, how far would the RUSSIAN administration go in exacting deference to its protest. The incident shows how easily a country, which does not hold itself rigorously aloof from a distant international quarrel, may be drawn into serious complications. Why should the United States, it may be asked, have taken it upon themselves to circumscribe the theatre of conflict in the Far East? That was a matter in which England, on the one hand, and France, on the other, were far more deeply interested, and it may, therefore, be thought that one of these might more properly have initiated the movement to assure the observance of China's neutrality. However that may be, the initiative, as a matter of fact, was taken by our government, and it would hardly become us, therefore, to renounce impulsive speculations of a breach of a compact which we ourselves suggested.

Whether or no the seizure of the Bozhitsin was a violation of international law depends on the circumstances under which the capture was made. If the seizure was unprovoked by any act on the part of the Russian commander, then there is no doubt that the captured vessel must be returned to the Chinese authorities at Chelso, and that an adequate indemnity for the high-handed proceeding must be paid to China. The latest provision on this point was furnished at the opening of the Franco-Prussian war.

when a war ship of each belligerent happened to be in the harbor of Hattuma. The two vessels having gone out to fight, the French man was beaten, and sought refuge in the harbor, but the German ship, however tempted to disregard its international obligations, made no attempt to follow its opponent, which remained at Hattuma until the end of the war. Six years earlier we ourselves had witnessed in a similar way the seriousness of a neutral harbor. When, in 1861, one of our war-vessels seized a Confederate cruiser in a Brazilian port, the Brazilian government protested, and demanded reparation. A foreigner we expressed regret, tried by court martial the commanding officer who made the seizure, surrendered the crew of the Confederate cruiser, and would have restored the vessel itself had she not been sunk. If, on the other hand, it be true, as the Japanese allege, that the seizure of the Reishikiyo was provoked by the hostile act of her commander, then the case would be governed, apparently, by the precedent established during the war of 1812, when our government maintained that the attack on the American privateer Essex by a British squadron in the Portuguese harbor of Funchal constituted a breach of neutrality. It was proved that the French frigate had first committed an aggressive act, and Napoleon, as umpire, held that a show of hostility by one belligerent in neutral waters gave another belligerent the right to resort to arms.

Other questions in international law have been raised during the present contest. There is the question whether coal, raw cotton, and, alone all food, are to be placed, as Russia seems to have placed them, in the category of articles "absolutely contraband," instead of remaining, where they have hitherto stood, namely, in the class of "conditionally contraband." The distinction is simple and reasonable. Live food may be treated as absolutely contraband if it can be shown to be intended for a blockade port, or for a belligerent's army or navy. It is otherwise, however, if food be consigned to private individuals in an enemy's country, although, conceivably, it might minister in the end to the needs of a military or naval force. It is certain that Great Britain, which depends upon imports for at least half of her food supply, would fight sooner than impose in the classification of grain as "absolutely contraband," and it is probable that we, as the principal purveyor of wheat and flour to the British market, would take a similar stand. Evidently the international status of food is a matter in which we are keenly, if not vitally, interested.

Aids to Conversation

THE prevalence of the hotel porch in this summer season naturally leads to reflections upon the benefits and disadvantages of conversation. Doubtless few mortals, but by unopposed chance to spend their substance and their time upon this so unprofitable invention of modern days, except without devoutly sympathizing with Rip Van Winkle when he gazed on Hystaria Brown's men, and said: "All those your family? And all drinks? What wares they would make?" What a glorious summertime this would be were we but all dumb! Men, taken all in all, is not so bad to look at. Almost always his face offers something that is strong, or patient, or pithy, or to claim one's friendship, a tenderness that is apt to shiver when we turn attention to what groweth out of his mouth. There was, once upon a time, a certain crowded hotel porch upon which only one man appeared invariably uncluttered, trustful, and buoyant; it was the face of a young girl who was a deaf-mute. There were children, too, but unperfection has brought forth that abnormality—people who instinctively dislike children. Of these poor mortals it is futile to speak. As POPELTON said of FISHON:

So he is made; he never made himself;
I could not love him, but his mother did!

In default of the power to strike humanity dumb, the next best thing is to have a ready formula with which to turn the conversation into pleasant and impersonal channels when it tends toward the unscientific. "Now, let's talk about pigs," was the method of an enthusiastic hunt-man at the psychological moment. But in all history there is no simpler and more suggestive formula than that of Alice's Walrus:

And now 'tis time, the Walrus said,
To speak of other things,
Of ships and shores and sailing-wax,
Of cabbages and kings,
And why the sea is boiling hot,
And whether pigs have wings.

This is easy to remember, and it is replete with suggestion and illumination. Ships, with their unmeasured cargo of nondescriptness! How angry sea and tropical wenchy shiver before the mental eye, and the mind journeys from the craggy coasts of Maine to the flat and glittering beaches of the South; steep, English fisher villages built on a slant of cobblestones, whose denizens traced up and down, carrying burdens through a perfect unaided to a horse, rise to the mind. Is the word calls up the sea of L'Espresso and its crystal houses with gold windows and doors, the can discuss the delights of travel in the olden days when travel was indeed adventure; when, as STEPHAN said, one sailed the ocean, "with its storms and wrecks, its currents and eddies, its huge waves and mighty winds . . . they battled with it for years together in little craft which, if they had few other merits, brought those who navigated them into the presence of time and eternity, their Maker and themselves, and forced them to have some definite view of their relations to them and to each other." Whether that was an intimacy more or less enlightening than our present knowledge of ways and means, currents and tides, reefs and avoidable dangers is an argument never to be settled, and one that can endlessly prolong converse, and one may take either side, in the interests of debate, without conscience qualms.

Shoes, of course, is a mere starting point from which to discuss crafts in general. According to the sex or empire of the second party to the scheme, one may thrice branch off into arts and crafts or traditions and traits, the condition of the working people, college settlements, Hull House, Tolstoy's later writings, or that most entertaining illusion, the American art-crafter.

Sealing was introduced here, sealings, conflagrations in general, but one cannot linger long upon the three lost it lead by unexpected channels to accidents and diseases.

Cabbages are usually somewhere in view, and may induce long dissertations upon color schemes, painters and paintings, still life pictures, the Dutch school, vegetarianism, trucking and fruit farms, vine growing, the agricultural life, till the subject may fairly lead one to open the pith of the world.

Kings turn us to politics, and we have the inexhaustible theme of ROBERTSON, the German Emperor, and King EDWARD, JOLY PARKER and the telegram that raised him to heroic canon.

But the Walrus was not continuing converse to merge, monetary topics. He knew all the fascination of philosophic flights. He offered us:

Why the sea is boiling hot,
And whether pigs have wings.

Why the sea is boiling hot drops us deep into natural history, physics, zoology, the limitations of modern science, and the legitimate field of metaphysics. While "Whether pigs have wings" introduces the whole theory of evolution, and the question as to where in the chain of development the soul begins: the presence of the animal consciousness after death, of which ERIC RUSSELL has given us startling recent evidence. Altogether the sphere of metaphysics is now thrown open, and the doors may enter. If the uninitiated hesitate on the threshold, let him remember VAN NIMMER's definition of metaphysics: "When he who talks does not know what he is talking about, and he who listens knows no better—there you have metaphysics." Equipped with this and a few pet phrases, such as: Back to KANT—the interment of the Absolute—the one in the many and the many in the one—all things new and nothing abides—the outer fringe of consciousness—man, the measure of all things—let him take heart of grace, realizing that such faint murmurs at fitting intervals will keep the metaphysically initiated happy for hours.

The Walrus, as is shown in the tale in which he figures, was a person of no slight acuteness, and his suggestions lead to burn less and uninteresting converse: if the summer pilgrim still but keeps the verse in mind he will have a fair fair chapter of a manual on "How to be happy, though on a Hotel Porch." The second chapter, and perhaps several more, might well be given over to an alphabetical list of Don'ts.

As a mere suggestion and beginning, one might use the following: Don't talk of the cost of things; it causes the rich a chance for heartfulness and may be embarrassing to the poor.

Don't discuss children; if you have any, the chances are you are boring those who have not. If you have none, you are sure to be mortally wounding those who have.

Don't discuss dress; the lady whose short evening gown you are wearing may have come direct from Paris, wearing the newest thing, and the whole subject is a hopeless one, anyway. Conversations must pass before mortals will have the courage to wear anything beautiful, or simple, or useful, or healthful.

Don't discuss diseases or surgical operations. Without a natural pathological taste or a trained nurse's experience it is apt to disgust people.

Don't mention family friends. It embarrasses the listener, and you are sure to regret it.

Don't tell your personal interests, occupations, hopes, or aspirations. Nobody wants to hear them, and you give your dignity a mortal stain.

Don't indulge in personalities. They invariably return worse than they started out.

But however many "don'ts" the manual may contain, the list and best and final one must be: Smile bravely and don't speak at all.

Martin Littleton

William F. Sheehan

A SNAP-SHOT OF HON. WILLIAM F. SHEEHAN, CHAIRMAN OF THE DEMOCRATIC NATIONAL EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE, AND HON.
MARTIN LITTLETON, WHO DELIVERED THE SPEECH
NOMINATING JUDGE PARKER AT ST. LOUIS

From 1911-1912, copyright, 1912, by E. J. Connelley & A. J. Connelley, New York

Seen at the West: the locomotive, half buried in the mud, being raised by the Wrecking Crew

A Chair-car, filled with Victims, overturned in the Stream

PHOTOGRAPHS OF THE RECENT DISASTROUS WRECK ON THE DENVER AND RIO GRANDE RAILROAD

One of the worst railroad wrecks in the history of the country occurred on August 7, near Eden, Colorado, when the "World's Fair Flyer" on the Denver and Rio Grande Railroad ran into an abyss through a bridge over Dry Creek, which had been washed away. More than eighty persons lost their lives by the accident. The engine and first three cars of the train fell into the stream below, and only a few of the occupants escaped. The passengers in two sleeping-cars which remained on the track were uninjured.

Start of the 208 Pace, on August 9, for a Purse of $2000

"Galleguit," Winner of the 208 Pace, who went a Mile in 2:53 1-2, the fastest Mile made in a Race this season

Immediately after the Finish of a Heat—the Horses cooling out on the Track

PHOTOGRAPHS OF SCENES AT THE GRAND CIRCUIT TROTTING MEETING AT THE EMPIRE CITY TRACK, YONKERS

New York's first week of harness-racing this season began on August 8 with the Grand Circuit trotting meeting at the Empire City track, Yonkers. The meeting lasted for five days, and consisted of thirty trotting and pacing events. The most valuable event of the meeting was the 213 trot for a stake of $10,000, run on August 11. On August 14 "Major Del Mar" trotted a mile in 2:01 1-2, equalling the world's record for a mile without the aid of a runner or a wind-aid. The list of entries was the largest ever received for a Grand Circuit trotting meeting.

Photographs by Fredrick

What is a Safe and Sufficient Army?

By Rutherford Corbin

"We favor the reduction of the army and of army expenditure to a point historically demonstrated to be safe and sufficient."—Democratic platform, 1904.

THE United States army, after fighting several dozen Indian wars and debasing the extending border-land of the nation, almost always with little, if any, aid, has reverted to what was in those earlier days its secondary function—to be the nucleus around which the nation's voluntary soldiery may be organized in case of war. The former function it fulfilled admirably with pathetically few men; for the latter, if the campaigns into Mexico, about Santiago, and in the Philippines had not developed a ridiculously poor defense, it would have been as hopelessly inadequate to fulfill its functions as it was in 1861. There is no contention to abolish the army. It has become an institution, and its proper sphere, it is agreed by the Americans of both political parties, is that of the first line of defense. The suitable size for it is proper field for debate, as is the most effective and "expedient" system for its organization and the point where the national security may be fitted into it. But that the present size is not larger in proportion than the armies which the nation's laws have made possible in the past is so patent that the language of the Democratic platform is contradictory, if not misleading. If the Democratic party will take the spirit of its organizers and of its leaders in the past as establishing the proposition "historically demonstrated to be safe and sufficient," it will be found that to establish that proposition no reduction from the present standard of the Roosevelt administration is necessary.

The army was organized by the first set of the First Congress as a battalion of snailshells with a regiment of infantry, with a total of 886 men. President Washington procured by force the close of his term of office its enlargement, and turned over to his successor 3330 men, divided into four regiments of infantry, a regiment of artillery, and a squadron of dragoons, to which was added before the close of the Adams administration another regiment of artillery. Thomas Jefferson's administration is responsible for the creation of the fifth, sixth, and seventh infantry regiments and the "First Regiment of Riflemen," and the total was, by this act of 1800, raised to 5921. After the English war Madison's Congress fixed the total at 12,283, an increase of a regiment of infantry and a regiment of light artillery. During Monroe's administration, the regiment of riflemen and the eighth regiment of infantry were disbanded, and the total reduced to 6126, which was not again raised until Andrew Jackson's presidency. During the organization of two dragoon regiments, a Major Van Buren's regiment of infantry was added, and after the Mexican war (1846) a regiment of mounted riflemen, and during the administration of Franklin Pierce two more regiments of infantry and two of cavalry, which brought the total of the army up to 15,088, which was its size when Mr. Lincoln came to office. Of course the army was temporarily greatly enlarged in the Mexican and English wars, as it was during the war of the rebellion, but it is not thought that these figures will help in ascertaining what the size of a peace army should be. The regular infantry establishment reached its maximum in 1860 (15,641). It was reduced several times, and finally, during General Grant's term of office, a bill was passed making the maximum of 23,000 enlisted men, of which figure it remained for thirty-five years. The act of February 2, 1891, now in force, provides for the enlistment of a maximum of 10,000 and a minimum of 85,000 men. Since October, 1892, the army has been, by direction of Mr. Roosevelt, held at this minimum.

The army of to-day is, accordingly, a patchwork of the views of twenty-three Presidents as to what was a safe and sufficient size, for in this, as in no other province of legislation, has the recommendation of the President to Congress been followed. And by the way, it is interesting to note that of the twenty-three Presidents who have been military service, under eight Presidents the army, as left by Washington, has been increased; five of these were elected to office by the present Democratic party or its forerunner, and two of them were Thomas Jefferson and Andrew Jackson. Under no Democratic administration has it ever been so small, except under that of Monroe, after he had been elected to office by the votes of all his countrymen, regardless of their party affiliations, and under Polk, when, although a new regiment was added, the total was slightly reduced. The other three administrations that were in office during the reductions were those of Jackson, Grant, and Roosevelt.

Furthermore, if we should simply take population as a basis and further references to the military-political situation of the country, we would find that the Presidential administrations that of a safe and sufficient army would tabulate itself about as follows:

A comparison.		Proportion of total population of United States Army to total population of United States
	By Census of 1790
Washington	1790	8.6
John Adams	1800	8.2
James Madison	1810	7.8
James Monroe	1820	7.7
John Quincy Adams	1830	7.5
Andrew Jackson	1840	7.1
Francis Pickens	1850	6.8
Abraham Lincoln	1860	6.5
Andrew Johnson	1870	6.1
Ulysses S. Grant	1880	5.7
William McKinley	1890	5.3

Under the other administrations there were no material changes in either the actual or the comparative figures.

If the proportion of the 25,000 army be taken to the nation's population, as determined by the census of 1890, taken but seven months later, it will be seen that Mr. McKinley, at the outbreak of the war with Spain, had the smallest regular army in proportion to the population in the history of the country, representing only 3.7 soldiers for each 10,000 inhabitants. This was the army which Congress increased to the present, which, as told at its minimum by Mr. Roosevelt's order, represents about 7 soldiers for each 10,000 people. It will be observed that in proportion to the population in the history of the country, the army was 10,000 men and that when the 25,000 army was first established as the proper basis under Grant. It is proportionally larger than that of Polk or Jackson, but smaller than that of Jefferson or Madison, and well within the average of that supported by the Democratic administrations of the past.

How a National Campaign is Run

By Edward Lissner

THE management of a national campaign has become so thoroughly regulated along certain definite lines that its degree of effectiveness at the present day depends more on the state of the party treasury than on anything else.

In a word, the side with the most money can circulate more literature, hire its press men to attain a broader scope of usefulness, get up a larger number of great mass-meetings to influence sentiment, which they undoubtedly do, and pour more money into the doubtful States on the eve of election.

While it is said to have cost only two hundred thousand dollars to elect Abraham Lincoln in 1861, four times that sum was spent in the Hayes-Tilden campaign of 1876, while in 1888, with tariff as the issue, two million dollars was said to have been used by both sides, and the figures have mounted upward since in some of the later campaigns. It might be well without interest at the outset, therefore, to dwell upon some of the items which go to make up these expenditures, and to consider first what is called by some the "legitimate campaign expenses." The cost of maintaining national headquarters, with its army of employees ranging from forty to one hundred men and women, has been estimated to be about three thousand dollars a day. There are stump-speakers who receive one hundred dollars a week and expenses. The distribution of a single speech in printed form has cost as much as five thousand dollars, and there have been campaigns when twenty of such speeches have been delivered and circulated. New York and other cities have had brilliant processions costing as much as twelve thousand dollars, while three thousand more has been expended on a single mass-meeting for the music, decorations and hire of the hall. But these are only the minor items of disbursements. The heavy ones are made out of what is known as a secret or emergency fund. Both sides are continually drawing from it, and usually exhaust it on the eve of election. The bid is used to turn the tide in States that are considered doubtful, especially those on which the general result hangs. Thus in 1896, when both sides in West Virginia had that category, the Democrats sent forty thousand and the Republicans fifty thousand dollars into that State, and in that same campaign the former also sent one hundred thousand and the latter three hundred thousand dollars into Idaho. It will be considered doubtful, but this was the year of the famous blocks of five, a scheme by which the voters in Indiana, it is said, were divided into blocks of five and bought. Chairman Hanna sent two hundred thousand dollars into Iowa in one of his campaigns when he believed that State to be doubtful. Four days before the election of 1902 Matt Quay, the Republican chairman, notified Senator Platt of New York that he needed two hundred thousand dollars more. The money was raised with the assistance, it is said, of Collis P. Huntington. In the campaign of 1884, when New York, New Jersey, and Connecticut were doubtful, the Republican managers on the eve of election decided that they needed one hundred and fifty thousand dollars more in those States. They were able to raise only fifty thousand dollars in that short time, and turned to the candidate to help them out. Mr. Blaine had already contributed twenty-five thousand dollars. They told him that the one hundred thousand dollars would be raised after election and repaid to him, and then upon he advanced this sum to the committee. The amount was never repaid, and it is said, to secure his losses. Blaine was the first to do this in the history of the country. But it is the bribing of voters, and it is said, if any of these funds were used for such a purpose, is gradually diminishing. The secret habit is

A SNAP-SHOT OF JUDGE PARKER STARTING FOR AN AUTOMOBILE RIDE AT "ROSEMOUNT"

The photograph was taken recently at Rosemount, Judge Parker's home on the Hudson. It is noted that Judge Parker prefers automobile and swimming to any other form of exercise. He also takes an entire part in the management on the estate of Rosemount. It is also noted, however, an excellent horse man and a fine rider.

a reason, but not the all-important one. For the American voter has grown more independent, and has thereby increased the list of doubtful States to such an extent that it is impossible for any party to raise a large enough fund to sway them all, and this difficulty of concentration, as much as the secret ballot, has made for less of elections.

The sources of contributions upon which both sides count are, first, the business interests, especially those affected by the leading issue of the campaign. In years when the tariff or finance is the all-absorbing topic, contributions from such a source are very heavy. This was so in 1884, as well as in 1902. As far as the Republicans were concerned, in 1880 and 1900, though it is said that the silver-mining owners contributed very heavily to the Democratic campaign funds in both years. The silver-owners are the next source. While it is true that there is a large amount of their contributing and the impression prevails on the part of some that the law is obeyed, the men in the Federal service, nevertheless, give to the party in power a percentage of their salaries, as fixed by the campaign committee or the treasurer of the national committee. There is, in addition, a small class of wealthy men who are not practical politicians, but ambitious to hold public office, and they are heavy contributors.

Raising Money for the Campaign

Money is also raised from the rank and file by popular subscription. In 1900, the Democrats tried the popular subscription system. The Bryan men also started in 1900 a campaign fund three years ahead of time by a system of canvassing country districts for contributions of a dollar a month. It was never for the party out of power to raise funds in 1902 and 1904, then the use in power. In 1892, because the financial interests of the country were more friendly to Mr. Cleveland than to President Harrison, and in 1896, because they feared Bryan a financial policy. While the treasurer of the national committee is nominally supposed to collect contributions, he is usually assisted by some of the wealthy men of the party, or those in touch with them. Levi P. Morton has been a famous collector of campaign funds. His plan was to make a list of those on whom he intended to call, with the amounts he believed they should contribute set opposite their names, and as a rule their contributions corresponded. Charles A. Tilling was another famous collector, so was Marshall Jewell, who succeeded in getting one hundred and seventy thousand dollars in Boston in a single day. In the campaign of 1888 John W. Wampanet raised four hundred thousand dollars in Pennsylvania, and Cassius M. Yell and Levi P. Morton did the same in New York. Benjamin F. Jones, chairman of the Republican National Committee, and Stephen B. Elkins collected eight hundred thousand dollars in 1884. Despite these heavy contributions, however, there has usually been a deficit after election, which some of the chairmen of the national committee have made good out of their own pockets. This was done by Chairman Jones in 1884 and Calvin S. Brice in 1888.

Questions of Management

We now come to the active management of the campaign, the theories of the party managers which lead to the dismemberment of the funds. To understand this one must consider the problem confronting both sides, which neither knows until the polls close. It divides itself into three divisions—first, to educate the rank and file into the principles of the party platform and arouse their enthusiasm; not a difficult task, by the way, where the candidate has not been accustomed over the bitter protests of any faction of the party. The second is how to prevent arguments in a manner so clever and ingenious as to convert voters from the other side, and the great mass of independents, ever styled in derision "mugwumps," an increasing class, and the deciding element on election-day. The third is by what means advantage may be taken of the mistakes of the other side. In such situations may be created to bring them to light. All these propositions are ever before the campaign committee, and on the way they are handled the result, in a measure, depends.

Each side makes efforts in three directions to attain these ends. The first is through mass meetings, the other, the press. The second is through the distribution of campaign literature, the speeches of party orators, concise statements of the issues on ballots and badges and buttons with the party emblem and the portraits and names of the candidates. The third is the insertion of articles and editorials in a large number of daily and weekly papers throughout the country. The campaign managers on both sides consider this method highly effective. It came into vogue when the tariff was the issue, when both sides began to send out circulars on the controversy over free raw materials and the tariff. The press bureau reached a very high degree of efficiency in the last campaign, but all this is to be treated at greater length elsewhere.

The executive committee conducts the campaign from information it receives from two sources. First, the party members and those who are close to them politically. For all the sections of the country are represented in the compilation of that body, and each member is familiar with the situation in his territory or that part of the country which he is supposed to represent and conduct the campaign in. Second, from the chairmen of the state committees of the various States, who, in turn, are kept advised of the situation by the local organizations. In the campaign of 1900 Chairman Johnson of the Democratic Executive Committee planned to add to the sources of his information by having a direct representative in every electoral district, twenty-five United States. This was not original. For in 1876 Abraham S. Hewitt, who managed the campaign for Samuel J. Tilden that year, had two sets of blanks for every election precinct, one as a preliminary and the other a final canvass of voters. Which result was not considered a failure. It was, nevertheless, true that the work was too voluminous for the committee in order to take in conjunction with the other duties, and that it did not do as well by the State and local organizations. This was the method in 1892 and it answered the purpose. For that year at the close of the campaign, Chairman Harris was making a figure within ten of the votes which Grover Cleveland obtained in 1892 in the election of the President.

The executive committee divides the States into three danger classes. Those that are doubtful, with chances favoring the candidate, come first. The situation there on the eve of election is watched almost hourly, and the campaign is usually devoted by a member of the committee to that class of States, and he spends an entire time to that purpose. Both sides place New York, New Jersey, Connecticut, and Indiana in that category. The next class is States that are doubtful, but with chances in favor of the opposition. It is to them that the committee also pays much attention. If the Republican candidate is other than President Roosevelt, whose views, it is said, on the negro question are popular in the South, States like Tennessee would be placed in this column. Then there are the States which are certain, as Pennsylvania, Mississippi, and part of New England, except, of course, Rhode Island and Connecticut.

How the Free Bureau Works

We now come to a consideration of the workings of the press bureau. Two sets of men compose it, those who read newspapers and magazines in search of campaign material, and others who write the articles which the bureau sends out for publication. In 1900 the Republicans estimated the number in the first set, seven men in its press bureau, five of whom were readers, who the text prepared the matter for publication. The country was less get this in the shape of patent issues, the country takes as stereotyped stuff, while good pieces are mailed to the men in the press bureaus, and are apt to undergo extensive revision before publication. In the campaign of 1900 one list of country papers with a circulation of 165,000 received from one side three and a half columns of matter every week; another, whose circulation was one million, received plate matter. In addition, there were three or four classes of country weeklies and daily papers whose circulation aggregated three million copies, which were supplied with "materials."

Another class of papers received "indisputable." The independent papers were the only ones which profit steadily from the path of the press bureau, so far as the insertion of their matter is concerned. It was quite important, of course, to reach the independent voter through their columns. A step in the direction of solving the problem was taken when Murat Halsted and Willis J. Abbott engaged in debate in the columns of the Kansas City Star, by means of which the copyers of William C. Bryan were enabled to get their arguments before the readers of a paper which was opposed to him politically.

Campaign literature is written around the campaign text book, which each side gets out shortly after the nominee's letter of acceptance is published. It is not a document printed which is not intended for general circulation, but its distribution is limited to the political committees, the splinterers, and the press as a guide to the position of the party and arguments in support of it on all the issues of the day. The public is permitted to purchase the book. It is not distributed free. In 1900, however, the campaign literature did not await the issuance of the text book. This was because Senator Hanna feared the influence of Cohn's "Financial School" series on the voters of the West, and believed that any delay in refuting its arguments would prove hazardous. This was why he caused leaflets, presenting the question in a calm, dispassionate manner, to be sent to the Republican voters in those parts where Cohn's book was reported to have made inroads, and afterwards to the independent and Democratic voters. In 1896 two hundred million documents were issued by the Republicans, and the Congressional Record, printed in German, French, Spanish, Italian, Swedish, Norwegian, Danish, Dutch, and Hebrew. Campaign literature of every kind is shipped by the car-load to the chairmen of the State and local committees, who attend to its distribution. In the year 1900 over two million copies of the Republican letter of acceptance were placed in the hands of the voters.

One Factor in the Result

The poster is also a factor in campaign literature. During the campaign of 1900 the Republicans circulated five hundred, the Democrats one hundred and fifty thousand. The most popular was printed in five colors on a single lithograph, with the names of the candidates in the set of addressing a multitude of laborers before a factory, declaring it to be better to open the mill for labor than the mint, while Bryan stands in front of the mint welcoming everybody with his silver bullet for change.

The speakers' bureau is also the center of activity during the campaign. Its head must not alone listen to the splinterers and select them, but must also determine the character of the speaker whether national or local, map out his route, and choose the place for him to discuss and the manner of presentation. The Chicago bureau at Chicago managed the speakers' orators in the last campaign, exclusive of the number sent out by the State committee, whose selection and movements were also under its direction. Many of the hired speakers talked in foreign lands. The German bureau had fifty German speakers, twenty-five Norwegian, two Poles, ten Italians, five Frenchmen, and 145 Finns. Five thousand men applied for the job.

A Personal Sketch of George Bernard Shaw

By Gustav Kobbé

WILL ARNOLD Daly's Shaw production which he is planning for the coming season—a season almost at hand—be as successful as "Candida"?

You never can tell—and "You never Can Tell" is the title of the Shaw play that he will produce. It is Shaw's response to a driver.

With his usual withering contempt for stage and social conventionalities the author takes a dentist for his hero and opens the play in the dental office. Fortunately the dentist's name is not Hanks, and we are not treated to the infamous advertising couplet:

Hanks
Yanks-teeth.

But if, as the curtain rises, there is any doubt that the scene is laid at the dentist's it is quickly dispelled by an "ouch!" uttered in a feminine voice, while the view discloses the pretty patient reclining in the dental chair and the successful extractor of her refractory molar handing her a glass of water above which to raise her mouth.

Perhaps more of this play later. But now to the author, the most envied, the most un-English writer in English.

My first glimpse of Shaw's odd personality (and originality) was given me by his play agent in this country at the time his "Devil's Disciple" was produced here by Richard Mansfield. Miss Marbury is resulting a clerk in Shaw for his royalties expressed regret that it was not for a larger amount. He replied with a letter which he began by addressing his agent as "Rapacious Miss Marbury" and continued by upbraiding her for putting him to the inconvenience of starting a bank account. However, he survived the ordeal, and when Arnold Daly visited him this summer both in his London apartment and in his country house, he found him still engaged in the cheerful occupation of writing cynicisms and occasionally uttering them.

Shaw's apartment is in the New Reform Club of which he is a leading member and, I believe, one of the proprietors. (That bank account appears to have prospered.) Unlike American apartments it has two or three floors, and so the club is on Aldgate Terrace, it has a view of the Thames. It is a bank in fact, plenty of air and sun—when there is any. After all, cynicism does not preclude a cheerful outlook.

His country house is at Welles, a quaint spot about fifty minutes out of London. It is a small house and very odd, with a front door that is unpainted and seemingly a foot thick. Throughout the house the doors are the same. A noticeable feature of both the London and Welles abiding places of the author of "Candida" is the almost total absence of interior ornamentation. Moreover, the few ornaments tolerated there show a preference for simple outline. Hindu, incense-burners, branches are tabooed. Nor are there rugs on the floor. Not only does Shaw in this way show his contempt for the petty æsthetic error, the lack of rug and fantastic ornamentation has a utilitarian purpose.

"Nothing to collect dust," is his own explanation, and, in point of fact, the shades and Welles are delightfully plain, clean, and cool looking. Possibly this highly practical method of decorating one's habitation, or rather of not decorating it, is not due to his utilitarianism. For there is a Candida who is most aggressively in evidence—Mrs. Shaw, a charming woman, and the one direction in which his views are modified by emotion. His co-sitting with his Candida is the author's favorite method of exercise.

London's "first nights" are burial stairs and far more "dressy" than ours. But in the days when Shaw addressed his New York representative as "rapacious Miss Marbury," he was wont to substitute a blue flannel shirt for the evening dress coat of society. Now his attire, though at first sight it seems strange, is not strikingly out of far from middle, it yet displays no strenuous effort to get away from the prevailing style. Certainly it is not inappropriate to Welles, however it may appear on the Thames Embankment. Shaw still wears a flannel shirt. But it is a flannel shirt with a flannel collar attached. His suit is of khaki, and he sports a dark green tie.

Mrs. Shaw understands her husband thoroughly, as an incident of Mr. Daly's visit to Welles will show. The actor was anxious to induce Shaw to write a one-act play which would form a contrast to "The Man of Ivros," and knowing Shaw's love of music, he had thought of Shaw as a suitable subject about which to construct a strong, tender love-story, and to strike the emotions that are not in the Napoleonic play. He himself sketched out a scenario and showed it to Shaw. When the latter had looked it over, his sole comment was: "You can't get any sanguinary pathos out of me."

Afterwards Mrs. Shaw suggested to the actor that he bring up the subject again, and if her husband again declined, to hint that he was afraid to try his hand at a play with a strong love motive.

"In that way," she added, "we may get him to do it just to show us that he can." The rise was tried at supper, but all Shaw would say was:

"I don't mind writing a forty-minute play with a love-story for you, and you can have the first thirty-five minutes your way. It will let me have the last five minutes mine." About a week later he referred to the subject again.

"I am thinking of writing a play with a love-story. There is a young man in love with another man's wife, but when the husband accuses him of it he denies it. Thereupon the husband becomes intensely enraged. For he is so much in love with his wife that he expects every one else to be equally enamored of her."

The play has not been written. Probably the outline Shaw gave was his eye and ear of musing, the suggestion that he should write a play with a love-story—employ Shaw's best talent technique on a play that would not be Shaw. Nevertheless, he is writing a one-act play for Daly. It is to be on the subject of Cromwell, and probably to have the Protector's name for its title. That it is going to be possibly in Shaw's vein may be postulated from the fact that in the course of the action Charles I. awakes on hearing his own head under his arm.

Of course Shaw could not help showing his interest in the success of "Candida" in this country—the first genuine hit, I believe, which a play of his has made.

His criticism that had appeared in the American papers, as a whole he was satisfied with, but added that he thought he could have written better ones himself. He also expressed slight disappointment in having been disappointed while still alive. He had hoped that he would not have been "bound out" until some years after his death. But now? Well, he must make the best of it. He even suggested a Shaw Festival for New York—that the "Candida" company begin playing Shaw at 10 A. M. and keep it up until midnight, then saved a statue to him.

And yet Shaw does not make the impression of being a power. In fact, or fast acquaintance one is apt to be disappointed at his lack of pose, especially if expecting a display of Thackeray or of biting sarcasm. In fact, the pose is part of his social theory, part of the man's nature, and therefore part of his nature, part of the man himself.

His "pose" simply is the result of his contempt for Shaw. At present he is writing a play on the Irish land question, and in it he proposes to expose that theatrical blunder—the stage Irishman. The two acts he had finished were read by him last month to a small circle in his house at Welles of the Thackeray Irishman is introduced early in the first act, and later confronted with Shaw's idea of the Irishman. "I never met," said Shaw, "except on the stage, an Irishman who said, 'The top of the morning to yer,' or 'may yer shadow never grow less.'"

The latest Photograph of George Bernard Shaw

Michael Donnelly

A MASS-MEETING OF STRIKERS IN CHICAGO MEN WHO, SINCE JULY 12, HAVE A

The photograph shows President Michael Donnelly, of the Amalgamated Meat Cutters and Butchers' Union, speaking at noon on July 12, when the union employees of all the big packing-houses at the stock-yards in Chicago gathered for a mass meeting. In other cities where large packing-houses are located, involving about 50,000 men. The cause of the strike is the demand for higher wages. Since the beginning of the strike repeated efforts have been made to have the union and the Photograph by Frederick Wagner

GO-PHOTOGRAPH OF THE LEADER AND PTED TO CREATE A MEAT FAMINE

merica, addressing a mass-meeting of the men who are on strike in Chicago. The great meat strike began red work. Simultaneously the union men struck in Kansas City, St. Louis, St. Joseph, Omaha, and in the he failure of the executive committee of the union to reach an agreement with the packers with regard to adjust their difficulties, but up to the time of going to press no satisfactory results have been announced

What the present Meat Strike Means to the Public

I.—The First Authorized Statement from the Packers

By John R. Rathom

FOUR years ago some of the departments in some of the plants at the stock-yards were annexed. We paid very little attention to this fact, being not at all averse to unionism or unionism, but maintaining the open shop idea at all times. Two years ago, however, these unions became more completely organized, and as they felt their strength growing greater and greater, they began to throw several restrictions around the character of the labor that men in certain departments should do, and the hours that they should work at certain occupations. These conditions grew steadily worse, until finally we were placed in the humiliating position of practically permitting business agents of the unions to dictate our business to us.

We went along, however, under the shadow of this sort of injustice, doing everything possible of a conciliatory nature, until the 20th of May last, when our agreements with men in some of the departments expired. The unusual took advantage of this fact to present us with a new scale for our approval—a scale covering a great many departments and asking radical changes in some of them. But the one thing in which the unions hit hard was a demand that all common labor at the stock-yards, namely, without regard to whether it was heavy or light work, or whether the conditions surrounding it were easy or likewise, should be advanced from between sixteen and seventeen and one-half cents an hour to eighteen and one-half cents, while the scale also provided that no existing conditions should be lowered,—in other words, even higher wages than eighteen and one-half cents, being paid at the time, should be paid.

Mr. Donnelly and his associates were met in a spirit of fairness and good will by us, and were told that labor conditions in no part of the country warranted an advance, but, on the contrary, that a cold-blooded business attitude would declare for a decline.

It must be understood that this dispute, and all the subsequent proceedings, as far as the alleged issue of the strike is concerned, related only to common labor, and in no way touched on any skilled trade of any kind.

Mr. Donnelly's refusal to meet us again on this ground followed, and he declared that unless we receded from our position before noon the next day a strike would be called. That same afternoon we received a communication from us, which stated that we were certain of our ground and that we would be willing and glad to let the whole question go to arbitration, and then made an offer of arbitration in said terms. Regardless of this, and regardless of the fact that this offer was in the hands of the leaders before the strike meeting, the unions called a strike and walked out. It is unnecessary to say that public sentiment immediately ranged itself on the side of the packers, and that the press of the whole country almost unanimously voiced this sentiment and finally forced Donnelly into a conference with us.

We had several of these meetings, which finally resulted in the drawing up of an agreement that permitted each of the new men as we had taken on to remain in their positions if they need it, and placed on us the duty of taking back strikers as fast as we could make room for them, and permitting any of them who were not so taken back within forty-five days to take their individual cases before the board of arbitration. The whole question of wages was also left to the arbitrators.

This agreement was duly signed by Donnelly and the other leaders, and was heartily approved then and there by the vice-president and other officials of the Federation of Labor and the heads of seventeen allied trades, who had been permitted to attend the meetings in order to judge for themselves which side was in the wrong.

The second morning after the agreement was signed, almost before a single person in authority had reached the yards, the strikers got into line to go back to work. This was a few minutes after seven o'clock. At half past seven, about fifteen minutes after the work of receiving the men had begun, Donnelly, without seeking to approach us in any way or permitting us an opportunity of proving to him that we were acting in absolute good faith, called a general strike all over the country for the second time, thereby making his second grave blunder in the eyes of the public.

The truth of the matter was that the day before the men went back to work the cattle luthers—numbering about twelve hundred in all at our Chicago stock-yards—held a meeting and decided that if any of them were refused reemployment all would stay out and die. They did this, and stampeded the unions into an absolute infringement of the agreement.

No discrimination whatever was shown when the men started to go back to work, although, as we told Donnelly, when the agreement was signed, there might have been some individual cases where foremen sought to "get back" at personal enemies.

This second strike was followed by a sympathetic strike of the allied trades, with all of which we hold absolute contracts, many of them running up to next January, that provide for them remaining at work, regardless of what other unions may or may not do. We insisted that these agreements be lived up to, and we were laughed at. With regard to Mr. Donnelly's agreement, he asked that it be changed to one that would compel us to take back part of the strikers in forty-eight hours, and all the rest within five days. Our reply to this was that we already had an agreement covering this point—an agreement upon which the ink was hardly dry.

The agreements into which we have entered have been binding only upon us. What is the use of wasting time, money, and patience any longer, when confronting us at every moment is the fact that any agreement into which one of these unions might enter is not worth the paper on which it is written?

We have nothing against labor-unions. Many of us have acknowledged that if we were working men we should certainly be members of unions. But we believe that labor-unions under

J. Doyles Armour

Arthur Murray

Ten capitalists prominent in the meat strike in Chicago

The Meat Strike in Chicago—Crowds controlled by the Police at Ashland and Forty-third Streets for the most part of unskilled laborers can never put themselves on a stable basis,—for the compensation paid this class of labor will always be governed by the law of supply and demand.

But butchers now out on strike are on the highest scale that they have ever enjoyed and have no grievance whatever. But they have gone out in sympathy with the common laborer—an act that was brought about simply because the great percentage of common labor in most unions and the City went down per month of each year necessitated some show of sympathy of this character to hold things together.

At no time has there been a cessation of an hour of work in our plants. Our by-product business is suffering temporarily, but in every one of our thousands of branch houses throughout the country the supply is now fully equal to the demand and will remain so. While it is true that for two or three days after the beginning of the strike there was a shortage and an advance in prices, rates have been normal since that time. We are charging retail prices not one cent more at this time than at the same season in previous years, and any statement to the contrary is untrue. In a great many cities in the past two weeks we have actually sold our meats at a loss. The price of stock is high at this time of year,—that is a normal August condition. But if retailers and restaurant keepers claim that they are paying any more for beef on account of the strike they are wilfully seeking to deceive the public in order to make increased profits.

In a way, as everybody will concede, meat packers are practically public service corporations, and we are in duty bound to keep our plants running. But apart from the duty devolving upon us in this direction, we have another duty to perform that must not be lost sight of. It is to take care of the tens of thousands directly dependent upon our operation for their daily bread, and on the hundreds of thousands all over the world, who are indirectly dependent on us,—who perform various labors connected with our enterprises. We stand on our position.

II.—The Case for the Strikers

By M. Donnelly, President of the Butcher

Workmen's Union and Leader of the Strike

THE request for a statement of conditions surrounding the present unfortunate trouble in the meat-packing industry is even joined with misgivings, and the more so because of two facts. The first is that the request is unquestionably in the right and have made every move only after careful and thoughtful investigation; the second is that we have been persistently misrepresented, a chain of circumstances making it easy for the packers to deceive the general public with regard to our desires. The leaders of the fight for the packers have taken full advantage of these situations to shamefully twist our attitude of fairness and contribution into one of intolerant hate and unfairness.

In the first place it is unquestionably untrue that I called the strike in the first place in the face of an offer from the packers to submit all questions between us to arbitration. I received the offer to arbitrate five hours after the strike order had been issued and after copies of this order and official notification of its passage had been given to Mr. Aronson, who acted as chairman of the last past meeting. It was then impossible for me to state of the strike. Had the proposition been submitted to us at any time before it was, even after the negotiations had been broken off, we could have agreed upon arbitration.

Another deliberate misstatement of fact is the claim that we are fighting for an increase of wages. We are fighting against a decrease. Our original demand was for a minimum of twenty cents an hour for laborers. The demand was amended after our second conference with the packers in June. We then agreed to a wage of eighteen and one-half cents an hour, except in Chicago and St. Louis City, where the scale is nineteen cents. The packers, on the other hand, refused to pay more than seventeen and one-half cents an hour and declined to sign any agreement at all, except with a small proportion of the workmen. The question of skilled workmen was not discussed.

As far as the second walkout was concerned, here again the packers saw an opportunity to make a tricky appeal to the "public sense of fair play," and again they made the most of it, when all the right and justice of the case was on our side. I will try to explain what I mean, and I appeal in turn to the public to judge between us, after it knows the facts.

On Wednesday, July 26, the representatives of the teamsters and mechanical trades called upon the packers and stated that the condition in the stock yards was one that would cause a general strike unless some understanding was reached. This brought about a conference in which representatives of the latter workmen participated, and ended in an agreement which would have settled the strike had the packers made an effort to follow it out.

On the following day the representatives of the employees called upon the packers to make arrangements as to how the employees should return to work. They were told by the packers that all the men should report the next morning, giving the impression that a great number would be started to work. One or two of the carriers did recognize all their former employees, but the treatment the workers received at most of the plants was such that instant action had to be taken in order to preserve the interests of the organization. The language that was used to some of the employees is unfit to repeat.

In the agreement signed by the packers there was a distinct statement that there shall be no discrimination in the rehiring of the men. This was accepted by the officers of the organization in the return of the men they were told upon like terms. The foremen and superintendents, walking through the line would pick out a man and say, "You come up."

The next man would be passed out of line and told that he could not be used. And it is a shame the good, active union men whom they could not use. We understood the agreement perfectly, and the strike was only called after the packers had violated its provisions. They also hired men in some departments that morning who had previously not been employed at all.

Picking out of a man here and there would have demoralized the organization. That was the cause of the second strike.

The packers have admitted that the agreement was violated.

and said, after the men went out a second time, that they would try and do better. They also asked us to endeavor to put the agreement into operation once more. We could not see our way clear, however, to ask the butcher workmen to fulfill the provisions of the agreement, after the packers had ignored its terms.

We offered a number of propositions that would have restored confidence, but in each instance the packers refused to consider anything but the agreement, which they held was still in existence, and which was still being destroyed by the packers' wilful violation of its provisions.

We have been misrepresented throughout the strike. But every act of our men and their leaders since the trouble began has been honorable and peaceful, and for these acts, and for the methods we have used, we deserve and demand the approbation of the people of the country.

III.—Where the Public Comes In

By Henry Harrison Lewis

THE first-class hotels and restaurants throughout the country have not raised prices on account of the beef strike. The lion rests upon the huge-bosels of moderate means and upon those who are compelled to eat at the cheap restaurants and upon the workmen. In this strike the packers and their men do not form one twenty-five hundredth of the population, yet simply because they cannot agree on a comparatively unimportant question of wages—that is, unimportant to the great majority of people—the handling of a necessity of life is interfered with, and consumers throughout the country are made to suffer.

It did not mean so much to the public as individuals when Sam Parks cut a wide swath through public meetings as represented by the building trades, nor did we give many thoughts to the teamsters' strikes in Chicago, or the freight handlers' strike in New York and in New England. Now that beef has gone up three cents a pound it is a matter of interest to the individual householder. This means to the average man a family an increase of $25, a dollar a week, and in effect directly and indirectly fifty million people.

The packers claim that they have not raised the price of beef one cent because of the strike, and that the increased price is simply the usual August increase. This is not altogether true. Some one has raised the price beyond that. The small consumer has paid more, and is paying more today than he did last August, and the retailer says he pays more to the small wholesaler. The fact of the matter is that many small retail dealers and wholesalers have seized the opportunity offered by the strike to raise prices. The publicity given for the price has been an important factor in this increase. The newspapers have published scare-head articles about the shortage of beef and the possibility of an enormous increase in cost until the general public began to believe it. It was an easy matter for the wholesaler to add from one to one and a half cent on each pound and the retailer as much more. The public, as usual, paid the freight.

This was done everywhere the large beef packers sold their goods. The different Chicago packing houses supply beef and its by-products in practically nine-fourths of the country, and it has been estimated that the top notch of these dealers, the retailers and small wholesalers have worked this petty graft on the public. Really, what does the claim of the packers that they have not raised the price of beef because of the strike matter? What concerns the public is that a great deal more is being paid for beef than in justice and fairness should be paid.

And it is not only beef that has increased in price. The increased cost of beef made consumers buy more ham and bacon, and the prices increased on those products. The cost of eggs has also jumped a notch. The average cost of eggs during the summer runs from eleven for twenty-five cents to nine for twenty-five cents, according to locality. Now we are paying the same amount for eight. The egg dealers say it is the increased demand caused by the beef strike. The poor have been driven from even the very cheapest loaf to vegetables, and they are finding a tendency on the part of the market people to raise prices there. And, again, when less meat is eaten, more bread is consumed. It is announced now that the five-cent loaf is to be increased to six cents at once. Probably your baker will say that it is caused by the beef strike.

Another feature of this strike that affects the great public indirectly. The loss in wages will have far-reaching effect. The partial paralysis of such an industry is bound to cause a loss that will reach even the pocketbook of the individual consumer.

According to the most accurate figures obtainable, the working men connected with the packing interests have lost in wages a little more than $3,000,000 during the month's idleness caused by the strike. There are 21,000 men and women employed directly by the packing houses in Chicago, and possibly one-third more employed by the packing interests in other parts of the country. This cost means a part of the general public, and it is safe to say that the losses suffered by the men and women directly connected with the packers will indirectly affect almost all branches and degrees of trade.

The packers themselves estimate their possible loss caused by the strike at less than $10,000,000. When one adds to this the loss suffered by the consumers because of the increased price of food, a conservative estimate would be a total of $50,000,000. And this because a few have insisted on making a minor disagreement a national disaster.

It is not to be estimated up, the beef strike has cost the general public more in actual dollars than the amount of wages in dispute could equal in a quarter of a century.

The International Sports

By Sydney Brooks

LONDON, August 26, 1904.

IT was a square and handsome victory, won not by a Duke, but on its merits. No excuses can be made, and, so far as I know, none have been attempted. Beneath the beaming face of their generalissimo and in the presence of some six thousand spectators, among whom every other man was a householder name in British sport, the Harvard and Yale athletes met the picked men of Oxford and Cambridge, and beat them, thrashed them, annihilated them. That the score of six to five in their favor of the Americans fairly represented the comparative merits of the two teams is indisputable. True, the Englishmen were not running up to the top notch of their form, but even if they had been, I doubt whether they could have scored more than one additional event. Four times out of six the tenth would have ended as it ended on Saturday; for the remaining two it might have resulted in an American win by five to four. But nothing could have given the victory to England. Her men were out-paced, out-jumped, and out-ripped, and, barring accidents, they could never hope to beat the really wonderful team that Yale and Harvard put into the field.

It was the second day that New York was more often than London. For three weeks previous hardly a drop of rain had fallen in England. The heat had been almost unending, verging on American extremes; and Saturday marked its culmination—close, overcast, humid, the precise point of transition between a hot spell and the relieving thunderstorm. Unusually the day accorded the Americans rather than the Englishmen, and indeed the whole period of training coincided with conditions that must have made the Yale and Harvard men feel comfortably at home. As an Englishman who used to know something about athletics, and who has also lived for some years in the United States, I considered that, so far as weather was concerned, Saturday was just suited to bring out the best that the American men had in them, and that the English representatives would find it a little too oppressive, and fail to do themselves entire justice. This proved to be substantially the case. The Yale and Harvard men, for the most part, came up to their American performances; the Oxford and Cambridge men, for the most part, fell below their performance of last March, when the "Varsity sports" were held; I think it is fair to say that they were not at their best.

Something, but not very much. The real reason why the Englishmen failed to do as well against the Americans as they did among themselves four months ago is that they were only half-trained. The most remember that for Oxford and Cambridge athletes even when the March inter-varsity meeting is over, and the men go out of training, except in the case of one or two who think of going in for the Amateur championships later on in the summer. The great majority of the Englishmen had therefore to train de novo for Saturday's event. Now every one who has seen a runner at all knows that it is easier to get into condition in the early spring than in the summer. When the weather is as hot as it has been during the past few weeks in England, at least a couple of months of gentle but steady training is necessary. But Englishmen cannot be induced to submit to the discipline of athletics for as long as that. Reckoning themselves to be always more or less fit, they trust to a final three weeks' or a month's polish to bring them up to racing form. In the spring that is all very well; but in the unusual heat of the past month it does not work. Englishmen did not realize this until it was too late. They showed, in other words, a lack of good sense in judging the preliminary conditions of their task—a blunder which the American athletes, with their extra keenness and their usual and scientific habit of insurance against all risks, did not, and does not, commit. Of all the Oxford and Cambridge men who were racing, both last March and last Saturday, only one, B. W. Gifford, struck me as being as physically fit on the latter occasion as on the former. The rest being out pretty obvious signals of distress, the result of their inconsiderable mismanagement of the nature of the work that lay ahead of them.

Again, running is one thing and racing another. The American team seemed to me not only admirable performers, but trained to win. An immense attention to detail, such as no Englishmen could constitute, was observable among the Americans. They took no chances. During the high jump, for instance, when a slight drizzle was falling, the American competitor, G. F. Vetter, of Yale, brought on to the field with him a thick warm fog. When he had made his turn he scrambled high up in the air, thus staying off even the slightest change of circulation. His English rivals had no rug. After making their jump they lay flat length on the damp grass until their turn came round again. In the long jump the race notes of the Americans had a handsome chief put down by the side of the course to mark the point where it suited him to spring his hardest to the take-off—a perfectly permissible act, and showing just that spirit of casualness which counters and defeats severity. But it was perhaps in throwing the hammer that the excellence of American training was most manifest.

By the side of the finish and perfect certainty of Sheslin's performance, the Englishmen appeared more blundering tyros. Sheslin spun round like a dancing-dervish, and sent the hammer flying over a hundred and fifty feet. Spiver of Cambridge, a giant in stature and strength, could do no more than one hundred and eleven feet. From where I sat Sheslin's movements were indistinguishable, an incredible whirl not to be disintegrated. Spiver's, on the other hand, I could follow quite easily, as though he were engaged in nothing more tumultuous than a walk. The Yale man showed science and a consummate mastery of the knack of the game; the Cambridge man had nothing but undisciplined strength. Wherever subtly was required, in the high jump, for instance, and the hurdle race, the Americans scored. Wherever a straightforward, ding-dong way of doing things was sufficient, the Englishmen got home, as, for example, in the mile, half-mile, and two miles.

The race of the mile was unquestionably the quarter-mile. Barclay, the Cambridge crack, had the inside position, but he had previously run in the hundred-yards race. All the men got off well, but Barclay's long stride enabled him to keep the inside berth. He turned into a dash and was a good and a half ahead of Long, the Yale man, and a magnificent race home followed. In the "quarter" it is the last fifty yards that tell, and it did not take an expert eye to see that only sheer pluck was keeping Barclay going. That he kept to his inside position, I believe he would have won, but just at the crucial moment, when only thirty yards from the tape, he swerved another from sheer fatigue or because he thought he was a mere winner, I do not know. He had shaken off Long, and may have forgotten that Long was not the only American in the race. Anyway, that severe cost him the victory. The Englishman, the Harvard man, however, who had a heart-beating struggle by two feet in 49.4.5 seconds. The Englishman among the spectators felt disappointed, as well they might. Barclay's error was reprehensible and altogether beneath an international athlete. It showed, as he kindled before, that a good runner may not always be a good racer. Of the other events the hundred-yards and the hurdle race went, as everybody expected, to the Americans. Schick, who came almost from a bed of sickness to win the hundred in 9.4.5 seconds, is the most undervalued sprinter I have ever seen. I doubt whether any living Englishman comes within three yards of him. I keep of Yale, who won the hurdles, and third of Harvard, who came in six inches behind, James, Day, Schick, and Sheslin, to be in a different class from their English rivals. It was only in the long-distance races that the Oxford and Cambridge men managed to reverse the record, and here their superiority was even more obvious than was that of the Americans in the dashes and field events. There was never a moment, either in the mile, the half mile, or the two miles, when either of the Yale and Harvard men looked dangerous. In all three races they were led off from the start and made an unexpectedly poor showing. They do not yet seem to have learned the secret of keeping up a long and effortless stride. In the two miles, especially, the American competitors, compared with the flexible style of their rivals, seemed to be in a different class. But they struggled on with most sportsmanlike gameness, and I do not think the Harvard man who finished a couple of hundred yards behind the winner will forget the hearty bout of cheering which he met. Although he had his physical endowments and must engage meeting just the kind one would expect to be held between the four English-speaking universities that still uphold the best traditions of amateur sport.

Women and the Race Question

By Florence Jackson

OBVIOUSLY and naturally on a question of the day can be of greater personal significance to women than in the race question. Whether it be considered from the standpoint of the President, in his denunciation of race suicide (which might mean even more aptly called race homicide), threatened by the avoidance of parenthood, or from that other standpoint which the country takes in regarding apprehensively the mingling of persons of different and differing blood, associations, education, environment, mental and moral impulses and influences—all these things that go to the formation of national characteristics—the race question is a vital one to women. The latter consideration being the more common and at present the more absorbing one may be taken first, and the special significance of the race question must narrow to one race—that of the blacks.

Now it is through the women of a country that any race changes must be made, and it is especially through the women of this country that we strike at our race and confide of the race problem. It is because of the women of this country that even Northern men who were violent abolitionists would deny the black equality with the whites, and it is the fear that racial equality will follow any other grant that creates the desire to withhold privileges, civil and political. It is the white woman, not only as the reformer in present achievement, but as the mother of the future, who stands forth as the first and best of statesmen that could secure the destiny of the race, and it is the belief that the destiny of the white race would be imperiled by mingling with the black race, the belief that social segregation would bring about such mingling, that check white men may become the fathers of black children and care not at all if this offspring traces not the fermenting strain of blood which, through ages, must urge to a development that precipitates harshly deny to the blood it has mingled with, white women must be so guarded that no mixture of race will be constituted, and their motherhood, which could not deny its offspring, must be preserved for the latter progeny,—it is all this that makes the problem of social equality of the races so vital.

White women have been entirely willing to promote the standard set. Always aristocrats at heart, it is the women who have ever preserved the integrity of races. However democratic a land may be, however fervently republicans may be the form of government, women demand, arrange, and inaugurate an aristocracy if there is none, and carry on what is left if there has been one buried to hand. It is this inclination as women that has been, from older times to now, one of the chief of a republican form of government. It is this that is today is the secret of the present problem,—that that is "another day," to quote two great men.

Now it need not be considered strange that hitherto women should have been romantically aristocratic in feeling. The Bible taught them to be so, and, until recently, most women of our country read the Bible. The habit of thought induced by the reading has become so confirmed that it continues, even though the Bible is not so frequently opened as it was formerly. But this habit of thought is not being banished by the rising generation, owing to the fact that the Bible is nearly a closed book to them. It is no longer read at home, and schools are compelled to snuff from their own corner of study (the use of the Bible in the schools) and of the language, and though the growing minds may receive what impression they please from the statements,—compiled records containing out and suggested that a new writer can persuade the laud of education in English,—they may not have the benefit of the beautiful thought and idiom of the Scriptures. So, wisely discriminating are the dictators of the Age of Education!

Introduced thus subtly to consciousness through religious influences, the sense of inferiority grows and spreads. It is the feeling, leaning to it that loss, as much as moral sense, proffered virtue and thereby the race and that will continue to do so. At the same time, when matrimonial alliances are made between foreigners, it is more often the women than the men who marry aliens. It may be noted, moreover, that Americans from such marriages with foreigners of a higher class. I happen as some of these marriages have turned out to be, they all possess the same thing,—that the son to teach high has been a leading motive, and the race of the alien spouse, if different, was at least developed. The climaxing plea against the black race is that it is an undeveloped race, and union with it would mean degeneracy.

The great object of this article is not consistent in all particulars. For instance, the most valiant Southerner declares that whatever strides in advancement the black race has made must be toward the negroes given it by the strain of white blood it has—happily, even in thought it has been so implicated, to be admitted of. Yet this argument is trusted to the other side to show that a legitimate union of black and white would result in degeneracy to the offspring, and the white strain which, in the other case, is declared to have given the black his start in development, holds no value at all in the latter race, while everything is made of the point that the black blood will poison the white "Aryan" contradiction and our, be it noted, not made by women.

For, in this matter of race mingling, every hour has stood solid against controlling the point. From Florida to Maine, from Louisiana to Alaska, it is the same—no possible, not to be possible. There has, however, been a varied opinion as to the acceptance of the black race on limited racial equality. The consistency in the words "always justify, never expel" is seen, and may call it just to argue, as Governor Aycock did a few months ago, when he said, "It is first as far as possible under the Filibuster Amendment to disfranchise every race that is not white," thereby bringing the value of education to a ripper. Perhaps women should not satify at this, since it is true of these shores, that though "five, white, and twenty-one," they must remain unfranchised, devoid with their racial equality. The law, in spite of the education they have acquired and are acquiring. Yet women who realize that this means, would not have others deprived of a great opportunity to use what is justly

(Continued on page 1334.)

STAG AND ROEBUCK

Drawn by Sydney Adams

By Robert W. Chambers

IN European shooting the chances are that while after partridge you may start a roebuck—and miss him. If you are a Yankee, and have never seen a roebuck, the unexpected flushing of the animal, coupled with your inability to find those two lusk-shoot cartridges stowed away in vague expectation of a chance to use them, usually induces a hasty miss at half range.

The little red roebuck bounces up out of unlooked-for corners; you may almost step on him in the tall dead grass; you may catch a fleeting glimpse of his bay coat through vistas of salmon pines; you may roust him out of a thicket from which a pheasant should start; you may come suddenly upon him in a wet, rocky, boggy gully, or on a wooded slope, or in the open, knee-deep in tangled weeds. After one misfire you will kill him first shot; after that first shot you won't kill any more roebucks if you feel as I do about it.

Among other reasons, there are some kinds of game never meant for sportmen, like our lovely American wood duck, like the rare harlequin duck, like various Asiatic pheasants, and like the roebuck. Of course, necessity knows no law, not even that of instinctive decency; otherwise, except for scientific purpose, which is the highest, and for eating, which is the lowest purpose, I know of no excuse for killing that lovely and timid little deer, the roebuck. Play that one usually counts the offense before learning its fatality. For, in most cases, the roebuck, of all animals, is the easiest to kill. True, inexperienced that you may expect roebucks, and advised to carry two or three lusk-shoot shells in a handy pocket, there is no excuse for missing the animal, who usually lies close, flushes leisurely, and takes plenty of time to treat off. I admit that a sound roebuck can run; but so can a tallow eat. And the ear is almost as demeritless as the other; follow deer in an English park are scarcely more fearless. Of course one can frighten anything; constant shooting or running with hounds will create timidity in the roebuck. But, really, I do not believe that any enduring artificial fear can be permanently implanted in this cunning little deer. And it's a shame to try. If people must eat stunted roebuck, let's eat enough to resemble the dish through the matter-of-fact assimilation dealt out to hounds and calves.

However, as I say, when fear has finally done its work, a roebuck on the bare flank of an alp is sometimes no easy creature to stalk. And that is the only way of accomplishing the little animal's downfall that seems to be clothed with the slightest degree of justification. We had an amusingly hard experience, Feder and I, one early morning on the lower shoulder of the Black Alp, which was nothing, after all, but a vast, steadily rising series of mountain pastures, with the true peak glittering so far beyond that it looked like a separate mountain.

I carried a fine-line piece, having started with the idea that by some heaven-directed chance I might knock over one of those solitary mountain grouse-like game birds which haunt the shaggy pine forests, and which, I take it, is closely related to the capercaillie, if not that very bird itself. But no: Feder, squatting on a rock and sweeping the upper reaches of the mountain, had discovered a roebuck (English, roebuck) through his single-barreled spy-glass. I took a signal at the rocky spot on the rocks above; originally it was a case of open stalking, and the buck was big and three-toed. Another consideration: the chances were greatly against me showing the great winged sentinel phantom of the pines, but we stood a fair chance of getting a shot at the buck, and, as we subsisted almost entirely on the game killed, it was perhaps policy to settle down to stalking. The reader will notice that the writer is marshalling all extenuating circumstances to his snapper.

Zimbach, the heavy bearded, was promptly collected and leashed; the big jacker took a long silent survey of the situation; then, having marked down his quarry, led the way up the gentle ascent, which lay through a bealy gully toward the beech woods beyond half an hour's steady climbing brought us out on a wooded spur, the last cover we could expect to aid us. Beyond, the lower flanks of the Black Alp tumbled east and north in billows of rock covered by broken patches of stunted shrubbery, and alpine grass. There stood our buck, feeding leisurely two miles away in the open. If the wind held we were all tight. But now the real work began—a crouching posture, a gait which was partly a crawl, partly a snaking shuffle, told on my shins and knees. Even the heathy skin on the legs' bare knees showed danger. As for Zimbach, the length, this mode of progress suited his short bony legs; but the trouble was to keep his head down.

It was laborious work. I never before knew that so many thorny, prickly things grew in the Alps, and I never missed one with hands, shins and knees. Perspiration poured from us: I opened up shirt at the throat and rolled up both sleeves to the shoulder. Cautious peeps through the gloom reassured us from time to time; we might to draw within range very soon now. The snapper recomputed the buck crouching now, straight up the mountain. He stopped half a mile from where we had first seen him feeding; we dropped to our knees and crawled on, faster than ever, because the bracken no longer covered our movements, and we had to depend entirely on the contour of the rocks and on the stray bunches of grass and dwarfed shrubs to screen us.

Looking back on that tedious and painful stalk it strikes me that we made much ado about nothing. Had a stag or chamois been the quarry, that would have been another matter, but all the elaborate labor for a roebuck was inconsistent; for we could have had no trouble in shooting one in the valley below. However, this was a sort of artificial sport; this buck acted more like a chamois than a reb, and certainly we were having a stiff climb of it.

The buck now stood on the edge of a ravine, in such a position that, if the wind changed, we should have had either the certainty of losing him or the necessity of making a three-mile detour. They appeared to be not the slightest chance of the wind changing, but in the Alps no chance is every chance. And the wind did change shifting slowly but steadily to the northwest. Our situation was not pleasant; we had crawled into a pocket of snow, and now, not daring to stir, lay there, belly down, waiting for a chance to leave.

That chance did not come for two hours; and during those freezing hours the buck never seemed to take his eye off the scrub behind which we lay shivering. He was out of our range; I lost Feder's odd fashions when mounted single shot rifle, such a weapon as you see in pictures of Tyrolean pouches crouching calmly on the verge of precipices. The buck was suspicious and cautious. Roebuck have an antelope's curiosity. But, although he appeared to be aware that all was not right behind the bush where we lay, as a bill of faint air was blown to his delicate nostrils. He stood, he pretended to know, he pretended to be startled, and crouched off like a coll frightened by a train, only to return again to the edge of the ravine and sniff and stare and toss his pretty head.

"Feder!" I said at last, "I have simply got to move out of this freezing shack."

The old jacker cautiously looked around. There was a fat rock behind us, the top of which had not been covered by the snow-drift; and toward this he pointed, laughing silently. Then a car was thing occurred; as I wriggled crablike toward the rock, which was also screened from the eyes of the distant buck, another roebuck leaped up behind this fat rock, and within five feet of us.

Zimbach made a terrific leap, upsetting Feder, who had him in back, and defusing me with the flurry of snow which he raised in his frantic efforts to get at the deer. Blinded with the snow, I groped for my rifle, which, when my half-frozen fingers clatched, I had no use for. The reb was gone—vanished utterly. Curiosity had induced the creature to approach from the rear. For two hours he had, doubtless, watched us, and, seeing as almost as they were, he had gradually gained courage to draw nearer and nearer until, when I made my backward movement, he had come within five feet of us.

No sooner had the reh disappeared, no sooner was Zimnoch subdued, than we passed on at the other bark, the object of our quest. Curiosity, too, had drawn him forward; it was a long shot at best, but, in all probability, the only shot we were to have.

"Try," motioned Feder.

At the faint report the buck went down on his forelegs, then rose, and took one of the longest jumps I have ever seen, say living creature take, whether it be a chamois or stag or Virginia deer in a wildfall. Feder fired my fouling piece as the deer passed us, and down he went to rise no more as we loved Zimnoch in a whirl wind of flying snow. The reh had two shots in him, one a burkabit, the other a rifle bullet. That was the end—a pitiful tragedy in the Tyrolean Alps, witnessed by the circle of tremendous peaks, whose very silence was necessary.

I have seen many hunters with shoulder sacks bulging, from which four little stiff helpless feet struck out. And I hate to see it! We humans are an amusing lot of hair splitters, after all, and we are interesting only because of our inner sadness. I needles one day, while fishing, bearing a friendly hail from the highway looking across the meadow I saw Feder and held up a big front for his inspection. At first a moment's doubt lag at each other. I went over to the road.

Feder was in a postulate mood. Starting at dawn to get rehok, he had considered an old cross gathering jagate a sure sign of disaster and a warning to all sports to go home and wait for better success. But we, Feder floated superstitious and went on, and this is what happened. He missed a bark on the Bothe wand, he fell twenty feet, and wrapped all the skin from himself. In a strange way, talking to his best girl, he had a quarrel with an Austrian frontiers guard, and we called a stop.

While he was standing there in the high way retelling to me his wrongs, a rehok walked coolly across the road and entered upon the thinly wooded slope opposite, halting with its rags to look back at us. Feder turned pale, muttering that it was not a real rehok, but a bewitched thing come to look him in disaster. And all the while the buck stood there, observing us. Finally, with a groan, Feder raised his rifle and fired. The deer entered off, and I saw the chips fly from the foot of a clump twenty feet in the right. It really was rather unusual, as Feder was accounted a dead shot among the experts of the Tyrolean Alps.

In a certain stretch of country, including miles of mountains and forests and lakes, all of which is protected by law from invasion by hunters other than those invited by the owner of this magnificent territory, I have seen, sometimes, twenty head of game in sight at once—chamois, rehok, and stag; and many days I have seen a dozen stag, during a walk, all within range. The paper Sepp and I once had an amusing experience.

Three deer—a stag and two does—crossed the Austrian frontier and entered our own territory. Our task and object was to stalk them so cleverly that we should get between them and the frontier, beyond which we, of course, had no right to shoot, and indeed stood a fair chance of being shot as poachers by the Austrian game wardens.

For an hour we had enough work of it—in fact, there seemed no little chance of success that we might have given it up had not our gloves brought into full view the magnificent antlers of the stag—a splendid fellow with ten points. An other hour of manning being brought us into a better position; and then, just as we seemed to have a chance, a furious storm of hail, rain, thunder, and lightning struck the mountain. The crashes were so loud, the lightning so loud, to strike both sides of the ravine in which we were lying. True, the tree was hit, and I became convinced that my rifle was too much like a lightning rod for me to shoulder. As a matter of fact, the lightning struck repeatedly so close to us that Sepp and I placed our rifles under a tree and sat down in the open, not daring to remove under cover of the oak where we had found shelter.

That was, with a single exception, the most violent electrical storm that I ever witnessed, but rather had, and finally became the bed of a torrent knee-deep in places. The hail stones were not large, but they hurt when they hit our faces. It was all over in two hours with the sun shining on the Bothe wand and the air deliciously sweet. But we reached the head of the ravine in time only to see the stag of ten points and the does both gone but late Austria, and disappeared among the dark firs of the forest.

Sepp and I spent next day after chamois, seeing several and getting one shot at them. But we reached the head of the ravine and one rehok clattering off among the rhines and

(Continued on page 1239.)

"A stag entered the ravine among the mountains."

just at reaching a stag of eight points, and the sunset sky, and fell stones dead at a clump a thousand and one rehok clattering off among the rhines and

Correspondence

ENGLAND IN THE CIVIL WAR

CHICAGO, N. H. August 16, 1904.

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

Sir,—In your editorial of January 2, 1904, entitled "A Civil War Story Told," you cite a paper read by Hon. Charles Francis Adams, the president of the Massachusetts Historical Society, at its stated meeting in October last, in which Mr. Adams quoted a speech made by Alexander S. Hewitt, late Mayor of New York city, at the monthly meeting of the Chamber of Commerce of New York, held February 7, 1901. From the paper by Mr. Adams you quote the following reply of Queen Victoria at Windsor Castle to the late Mr. Charles Francis Adams, then minister to the Court of St. James (the father of the Mr. Adams now president of the Massachusetts Historical Society), to a question whether the British government was to recognize the Confederacy, that Queen Victoria in her most gracious manner said: "Mr. Adams gave your self no concern; no government will recognize the United States." Also your issue of April 2 and April 16 last contained editorials on the same question. And seeing any further replies to Mr. Hewitt's statement in your newspaper, the undersigned were appointed a committee at a banquet given by the Canadian Veterans Association at the Victoria Hotel, Chicago, on April 24 last (Queen Victoria's birthday), to write you on this question and give the testimony of those who were present at this banquet, men and women who lived in Great Britain during the time of the civil war of 1861 to 1865, and it was the unanimous testimony that the Queen and the people of Great Britain were always in sympathy with the American government, or the North, as it was then known, and we believe that General Grant, in his Memories, has given a true and correct statement of the situation at that time, which is as follows:

"The cause of the great war of the rebellion against the United States will have to be attributed to slavery." (Page, 543, Vol. II.)

"England's course towards the United States during the rebellion evoked the people of this country very much against the mother country. I regretted it. England and the United States are natural allies and should be the best of friends. They speak one language, and are related by blood and other ties. We, together, or even either separately, are better qualified than any other people to establish commerce between all the nationalities of the world."

"The hostility of England to the United States during our rebellion was not so much real as it was apparent. I am told that there was no time during the civil war when they were able to get up in England a demonstration in favor of secession, while they were constantly being gotten up in favor of the Union, or, as they called it, in favor of the North. Even in Manchester, which suffered so fearfully by having the cotton cut off from her mills, had a greater demonstration in favor of the North, at the very time when their workmen were almost starving." (Vol. II, pages 548 and 549.)

The following quotation is in answer to the question from a letter written to Henry Adams, Esq., of New York, by the late Hon. W. E. Gladstone, Mar. 30, 1869, and published in the Lancet American Review, June, 1869:

"As a member of it (the British cabinet) and now nearly its sole surviving member, I can state that it never at any time dealt with the subject of recognizing the Southern States in your great civil war, excepting when it learned that proposition of the Emperor Napoleon III., and declined to entertain that proposition without qualification, hesitation, delay, and dissent."

We thank you for the able and disinterested way you have published your editorials on the question, and trust you will add the testimony herein given to this important discussion.

GEORGE E. GOSCH,
President British-American Association.
JOHN W. JAMISON,
Manager "Western British-American."
CHARLES H. CYRUS,
Secretary Victoria Memorial Association.

RAISING A FAMILY

CHICAGO, N. H. August 16, 1904.

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

Sir,—One can scarcely pick up a paper or a magazine of late without seeing something in regard to "Race Suicide," most writers inferring from statistics presented that the majority of American married people are averse to having any children, or want but few of them.

From these articles one would be led to believe that the love for children is dying out of our race, that the fullest meaning of love, marriage, and home is not being realized.

If this be so, how hard, cold, and selfish are we becoming. No doubt there are many who have in their hearts and interests no place for that most beautiful and wonderful thing in nature—a little child—and could never appreciate such a gift.

There are others whose experiences have been such that they never had the opportunity to observe the beauties of childhood and the joyous side of parenthood.

But it is difficult to believe that one who has once experienced the thrill of joy in hearing the first cry of her own babe or of holding in her arms that bundle of humanity which binds her closer to her husband, and has seen the answering joy grow in her little one, can be averse to welcoming others—without any good reasons.

From the dozens one set of statistics is gathered, which show that many from choice or necessity wish to limit their family. There is, however, another set of statistics which run over is gathered, for they are heart secrets, in many cases not divulged to the doctor even. For many people consider their wives in regard to this subject too sacred to be spoken of.

The world never knows how many childless couples long for a little one.

The world never knows of the many who, having one or two, long for more, but are denied it.

Many there are who from ill health or lack of means feel that a crime would be committed if they brought another life into the world.

I know a mother who must content herself with two children; as the youngest grows out of babyhood she looks with hungry eyes at the mothers with little babies. As she lays away the old gown, baby clothes, a lamp rises in her throat and a mist is before her eyes as she thinks, "I suppose I shall never see those little garments again. I suppose I can never have my ideal family of four or five."

But of this she never speaks.

She, with her two children, would doubtless help to swell the statistics proving that Americans do not want more than two children.

And how many there are like her!

It makes such mothers indignant to constantly read such statements as: "Women are interested in sex and this life that they don't want to be bothered with a family."

Some there are, of course, that feel so. But more than we think are quietly and happily attending to their families.

In the society of her children the mother is renewing her youth, she is learning more wonderful new things and retaining such beautiful old things than all the clubwoman's books and lectures can supply. She knows that all too short will be her days and her little ones, and all too soon will come the level stretch of middle life when she may return to her active place in society and club.

These mothers are seldom heard from, however.

Doctors agree that the small family of the present is due in great measure to circumstances over which we have little control—climate, diet, and the modern mode of life.

It is due largely, also, to the greater feeling of responsibility now felt for providing for a family and the greater requirements for such provision.

Again, it is in very many cases due to the love and consideration of American husbands, who do not wish to endanger the lives of their wives.

Let us say, then, that the small American family, instead of indicating self-interest, laziness, and a dislike for children, really indicates a great amount of self-denial, a deep love for children, and conscientious thought for their welfare, and tender solicitude for the wife.

Let us believe that Eugene Field, in his beautiful poem of "Pittypat and Tiptypoo," has voiced the sentiments of the majority of American parents—

All day long they come and go,
Pittypat and Tiptypoo.

Footprints up and down the hall,
Playthings scattered on the floor,
Finger-marks along the wall,
Tell tale smudges on the door.
By these presents you shall know
Pittypat and Tiptypoo.

And when day is at an end
There are lights due to be kind.

Little frocks are strangely torn,
Little shoes great holes reveal,
Little hose but one day worn
Rudely cast on the bed!
Who but you could work such won,
Pittypat and Tiptypoo!

But when comes this thought to me,
"Some there are that chaffless be,"

Snoddlng in their downy beds,
With a love I cannot speak,
Tenderly I stroke their heads,
Fondly kiss each velvet cheek,
God help those who do not know
A Pittypat or Tiptypoo.

I am, sir,

A MODERN MOTHER.

A CORRECTION

San Francisco, August 1, 1904.

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

Sir,—I notice on page 1161, your issue of the 29th ult., that you state that the Britons arrived in North Dakota in 1806. This statement is incorrect, and I hope to lead you to the honest farmers of that State, you will note that fact.

I am, sir,

WILLIAM W. YOUNG.

THE RIVIERA MISADVENTURES BY A. E. W. MASON

SYNOPSIS OF CHAPTERS

In the sparkling summer Pamela Marlowe is introduced to the reader as a young society woman of London, beautiful and of rare personal charm. Late one night Tangey and Allen Warfield, who is in love with her, observe a young couple leaving the opposite house. They are Tony and Millie Stretton, who live in a gloomy house presided over by the rich but unjust father of the young man. They are in reality kept prisoners by the whims of the tyrannical old man, and it is only by playing truant and going out by stealth late at night that they are able to enter at all into the life of the outside world. But finally they both weary of their semi-secluded life, and Tony determines to go to America to make his fortune. In his absence Millie becomes infatuated with Lionel Talton, a brilliant but dissipated young man, who sends Warfield on a mission to find Tony and bring him home. Warfield finds that Tony, having lost all of his small fortune in New York, is now in the North Sea on a trawler. Warfield, who never imagined to prevail upon him to come back, but he refuses. Tony remains on the trawler until the death of his father, which means his inheritance. He then returns to England, and then decides to enroll in the French Foreign Legion, as no other career seems open to him. John Stodge, a friend of Pamela's, leaves from her of the post Millie is in town Talton. He buys up all Talton's debts and gives them in the hands of a single firm of solicitors, who had on a settlement which he himself had arranged. Talton receives a proposition from Stodge to participate in an important enterprise of the latter in Cuba, with the financial difficulties would have to be solved. Warfield, although he has proposed to her unsuccessfully before, again asks Pamela to marry him, and she agrees him to which that he knew it will be possible for her to accept him. One thing she tells him, would make her take the step now, the return of Tony Stretton. Warfield, desirous of obtaining information as to Tony's whereabouts, goes to London to visit Tony's friend Mr. Chase, who, he thinks, will be able to enlighten him. He finds on his arrival that Chase had just received a letter from the head of the firm, which he has found a clue to Tony's hiding place. Talton returns from Cuba and persuades Millie to go with him. They are seen leaving town one day at night in Regent's Park by Mr. Stodge, who tells them that he is going to danger for Millie. Pamela's simultaneous departure in an old travelling-car of theirs for examination the garage of the village inn, in order to disembark plan to help Millie. Pamela, for the second time, commiserates Warfield to go in search of Tony and be gladly agrees. Pamela goes to Boulogne, which she had visited as a young girl, and while there learns of the presence of Lionel Talton. Stretton, meanwhile, is sent with a troop of soldiers on an expedition across the Desert of Sahara. On his return to Morocco he is given the command of a regiment, and he then decides to write to Millie. At that moment Warfield arrives with the letter from Pamela. Tony reads the letter, and decides to desert the legion, with which he has enlisted for five years, and return to England. He starts in the guise of a pedlar for Morocco. Warfield is to await him at Fez.

CHAPTER XXVI

GOOD NEWS FOR PAMELA

WARFIELD struck his camp early one next morning, and set out for the railroad. Then he travelled to Fez. At Ouen he was fortunate enough to find a steamer of the Lambert Line in the harbor which was preparing to sail that afternoon for Tangier. Warfield had three hours to pack in haste. He sent off one of the steamer's crew and despatched his telegram to Pamela Marlowe at the Villa Pontignard. The telegram informed her that Tony Stretton was returning, though his journey might take longer than she would naturally expect; and, secondly, that he himself was sailing that day for Tangier, whither any message should be sent at once to await his arrival at the English post-office. The telegram was couched in vague phrases. Tony Stretton, for instance, was called "The Truant." Pamela became more and more disquieted by the vagueness of his wording. She pondered, and in vain, why in the world Warfield must be sailing to Tangier. It seemed certain that there were difficulties in the way of Tony's journey which she had not foreseen, and the nature of which she could not conjecture. She sent off a reply to Tangier:

"Both come to Boulogne as soon as possible."

For, on thinking over the new aspect which her problem presented, now that Lionel Talton had come to the Riviera, she had come to the conclusion that this was the safest plan. If Millie Stretton did not come to the south of France, no harm could have been done, whereas, if she did, and Tony went straight home to England, the last chance of saving her would be lost.

This message, however, did little to reassure Pamela. For the more she thought of Warfield's telegram, the more she was troubled. Tony was returning. Yes, that was something—that was a great thing. But he was going to take a long time in returning, and, to Pamela's apprehension, there was no time to spare. And the day after she had received the telegram she came upon still stronger reasons for despatch.

She went down to Monte Carlo in the morning, and again on Lionel Talton upon the terrace, and again noticed that he was absent. Yet on the whole she was not surprised. Millie Stretton's name figured as yet in no visitor's list, and Pamela was quite sure that if Millie had really come south the name would have been inserted. It was impossible that Millie Stretton could come to Monte Carlo, or, to imply, any hotel upon the Riviera, made a false name. She could not but meet acquaintances and friends at every step, during this season of the year. To assume a name which was not hers would be an act of simplicity too gross. Not the less Pamela was relieved. She avoided Talton's notice, and let him upon a sudden impulse, went out from the garden, hired a car, and ordered the coachman to drive along the lower Riviera Road in the direction of Boulogne.

Pamela was growing harassed and anxious. The days are passing and no message had yet come from Allen Warfield. She suspected the presence of Lionel Talton on the Riviera more and more. More and more she dreaded the arrival of Millie Stretton. There was something about her which she did not like. She had that had but which fails to women, the habit of waiting. But she could not wait with folded hands. She must be doing something, even though that something were altogether trivial and useless, it still helped her through the hours. In this spirit she drove out from Monte Carlo at twelve o'clock, without a thought that her drive was to assist her toward the end on which she had set her heart.

She drove past the back of the big hotel at Fez. Just beyond, a deep gorge runs from the hills straight down to the sea. The road curves round the head of the gorge and leads again to the shore. Pamela drove round the gorge, and coming again to the shore, went forward by the side of the sea. After a few minutes she reached the driver's stop. In front of her the road rose a little and then on the other side of the crest dipped down a story hill. In her left a pair of iron gates stood open. From these gates a carriage-drive ran in two zigzags between borders of flowers down to an open gravel space in front of a big one-story building. The building faced upon the road, but at a lower level than the flat road was below Pamela. The building was pretty built, and roses and magnolias climbed against the walls, making a gay show. The door in the middle stood open, but there was no sign of life about the house. Pamela sat gazing down into the garden with its bushes and brightly colored flowers.

Pamela spoke to the driver:

"What place is this?" she asked.

"It was only built last year," the man replied, and he told her enough for her to know that this was the Reserve at which Lionel Talton was staying.

"Was people come here?" said Pamela.

"It is not known yet," replied the driver. "It is such a little while since it has been opened."

The sun was bright. Beyond the Reserve the Mediterranean rippled and sparkled—here the deepest blue, there breaking up into patches of golden light. The Reserve itself had the look of a country house in a rich garden of flowers touched with hawthorn. In the doorway the spot was very quiet and still. Yet to Pamela it had the most sinister aspect. It stood in a solitary position, just beneath the road. In its very quietude there was to her harassed thoughts something absolutely menacing.

She knew that Talton was in Monte Carlo. She told her driver to drive down to the door, and at the door she stepped down and walked into the building. A large dining-room opened out before her in which two waiters hung round. There were no visitors. The waiters came forward. "Would you mind take luncheon in the room, or on the terrace at the back over the sea?"

(Continued on page 1236.)

(Continued from page 122.)

"On the terrace," Pamela replied.

She laughed quite alone on a broad, flagged terrace, with the sea gently breaking at its foot. The greater portion of the building was occupied by the restaurant, but at one end Pamela noticed a couple of French windows. She remained to the waiter who served her upon the absence of any visitors but herself.

"It is only this season, madame, that the restaurant is open," he replied.

"Can people stay here," she asked.

"Yes. There are two suites of rooms, one is occupied; but the other is vacant, if madame would care to see it."

Pamela rose and followed him. He opened one of the French windows. A dining-room furnished with elegance, and lightly decorated, a sitting-room, and a bedroom completed the suite. Pamela came back to the terrace. She was disappointed. It was possible, of course, that Missie Stretton should stay at the Riviera; but the whole look of the place troubled her.

She mounted into her carriage and drove back. In front of her the great hotel of Eze stood high upon a promontory above the railway. A thought came to Pamela. She drove back round the head of the gorge, and when she came to the hotel she made the coachman drive in. In the open space in front of the hotel she took tea. She could not see the restaurant itself, but she could see the road rising to the lovely hillside on which it was so very temptingly situated. She went into the hotel, and asked boldly at the office:

"When do you expect Lady Stretton?"

"Lady Stretton?" The clerk in the office looked up his books. "In three weeks, madame," he said. "She has engaged her rooms from the 21st."

"Thank you," said Pamela.

So Missie Stretton was coming to the Riviera, after all. She had refused to come with Pamela, yet she was coming by herself. She had declared she would not leave England this spring. But she had made that declaration before Lionel Calton had returned from Chile. Now Calton was here, and she was following. Pamela could not doubt that her coming was part of a concerted plan. The very chance of the hotel helped to convince her. It was so near to that at which Calton was staying. Twenty minutes' walk at the most would separate them. Moreover, why should Calton choose that lonely restaurant without some particular, nay, some secret object? No one, it seemed, visited it in the day; no one met the client there at night. Calton was not the man to fall in love with solitude. And if he had wished for solitude he would not have come to the Riviera at all. Besides, he spent his days in Monte Carlo, no Pamela well knew. No, it was not loneliness at which he aimed, but secrecy. That was it—secrecy. Pamela's heart sank within her. That had a momentary thought that would disclose her presence to Lionel Calton, and dismissed it. The disclosure would alter Calton's plan, that was all; it would not hinder the fulfilment. It would drive Millie and him from the Riviera—it would not prevent them from meeting somewhere else. It would be better, indeed, that, if they met there, they should meet under her name. For some accident might happen some unforeseen opportunity occur of which she could take advantage to separate them. It was not known to Calton that she was on the spot. After all, that was an advantage. She must meet secretly with secrecy. She urged her coachman to quicken his pace. She drove straight to the post-office at Monte Carlo. Then she despatched a second telegram to Alan Warriden at Tangier.

"Do not fail to arrive by the 21st," she telegraphed; and upon that took the train to Eze. She could do no more now; but the knowledge that she could do no more only agitated her fears. Questions which could not be answered thronged upon her mind. "Would the telegram reach Tangier in time? What was Alan Warriden doing at Tangier at all? What had driven him coming straight from Algeria to France? Well, then, these were weeks still. She sent up her prayer that those three weeks might bring Tony Stretton back, that Millie might be sent for him. She walked up the steps from Roquebrasse station very slowly. She did not look up as she climbed. Had she done so she might perhaps have seen a head above the parapet in the little square where the schoolhouse stood, and she would certainly have seen that head suddenly withdrawn as her head was raised. M. Girard was watching her furtively, as he had done many a time since she had come to Roquebrasse, taking care that she should not see him. He watched her with no other object than to watch the weary steps as when he had last seen her in that path so many years ago. But as he watched she stopped, and turning about, looked southwards across the sea, and stood thus for an appreciable time. When she turned again and saw no unusual thing about the steps, it was only that she had seen him. She walked homeward, like one full of faith, full of hope, and it caught a glimpse of her face. It seemed to him that it had been transfigured, and that the eyes were looking in some vision which was visible to her eyes alone. Pamela had come back indeed at the end of all her perplexities and conjectures, to the belief of her new fate, that somehow the world would right itself, that somehow in a short while she would have whirled upon the wind, answered by the ripples of the sea, and confirmed by the voice she longed to hear, the sentinel's cry: "All's well!"

The messenger who had brought the telegram had found him at Tangier. He found them both waiting him the day after they had been sent. He had twenty days to find him if Tony kept to his time, twenty days would suffice. He hired a run the next day, and the hotel messenger he obtained at Tangier was sent to the hotel. He sought a couple of herbs and some resins to add to his her speed and endurance.

"They will enable at six miles an hour for ten hours a day," said one whose advice he sought. Warriden discounted the statement, but bought the herbs. Early the next morning he set out for Eze.

To be Continued.

Women and the Race Question

(Continued from page 122.)

theirs, but they would all the more demand that a just race, as well as the mere possession, of the franchise be insisted upon.

Necessarily all women who think at all believe in an educational franchise, and such a franchise would quickly reduce the negro vote, particularly in the part of the country where its exercise at all is offensive to the whites, for at the South literary and Hampton institutes. The educational test should be not low and no scrupulously made at the North and for foreigners at the South for negroes. The mere ability to read and write is not enough. It is exactly that form of ability that makes a man a prey to knavery. The foreign immigrant can read more than sign his name, and though we hear less of him than we do of the negro, he is no more prepared for prejudice against race does not confine itself to the African, it is scarcely less contemptuous if not so bitter against all foreigners not of Saxon or Anglo-Saxon blood. No other nation has been so slow as the Americans in finding the worth of other races. We are making a great head now that we were the first to open Japan to the world; but we are still behind Europeans in admitting the social worth of Japan and of China. Until marriages shall have been legally made between races social recognition between them cannot be complete. The women of a race only can accomplish its full appreciation.

It is claimed by the South that the South only can settle the negro problem, that only the South suffers on account of it. This last, at least, is not true. The women of every land have suffered because of race and class questions, and every woman in the United States may feel personally interested in the present problem, since her assistance towards its solution can be great. It is folly to say that one person's opinion or example does not count. It always counts for or against. A child of no more than three years, seeing its mother's attitude to any one, imitates that attitude, because of an impression received that has influenced. It took Americans some time to learn, but they did learn from European example that one can eat in the room with a Hindu or Hottentot without receiving contamination or losing respect. By repeated example Southerners will learn that they can sit in cars where negroes are admitted with no more loss of dignity than they suffered in anti-bellum days when they had then about their persons respectfully. In recognizing the continent not lost ago a Southern woman with her children and a negro maid might in the same sleeper where I had a berth, the maid occupied might after night one of the berths. No objection was offered by any of the several Southern passengers, although had she been seen alone she would probably not have been allowed to enter the car. That her position was one of courtesy was what she had her pre-conceived ideas. Her negroes are now controlling by the right to buy parlor-car seats and Pullman berths, as do other passengers who pay the required tariff, and this contention is set at the North alone. That Pullman cars admit Thacker, Jackson, and other famous names, and that negroes are now controlling by the right to buy parlor-car seats and Pullman berths, as do other passengers who pay the required tariff, and this contention is set at the North alone. That Pullman cars admit Thacker, Jackson, and other famous names, and that negroes are now controlling by the right to buy parlor-car seats and Pullman berths, as do other passengers who pay the required tariff, and this contention is set at the North alone. It is natural that the discrimination against the negro should seem unjust to him.

It is such acts towards the colored race that needlessly aggravate the situation, and it is because the influence of women is so insistent, and not prevent, many such acts that their connection with the problem is direct. Women as the guardians of social order can afford to be gracious without being intimate or tender and such action would assuage the sense of injury, would give conditions time to alter or adjust themselves. Society is so built up that it is hard to change. It is not necessary to change the individual, but it is necessary to change the social life. Indeed, social life becomes ever more and less social than it used to be. Within the house are to be found gatherings of people of different tastes. The tendency is to bring together people of like or similar likes, and to exclude those of the opposite kind. In more often men without—that is, in public places, than within the house. And in gatherings of a public kind the heterogeneous tastes brought together form a social intolerance far from special that it has little chance of becoming more intimate. It is to drive apart the people from a passing acquaintance, to remark individuality that is interesting, and not invite to nearer relation. Those who are ready to stand apart at point of social equality do not see that it need be no part of it at all now; it need not be settled this week, this year—indeed, it is

net. The evolution of this, as of other things, must be gradual. Why raise a scare about it? Every time there are thousands of emigrants landed it would be absurd if a scare were started concerning their reception into society. Yet the scare is continued concerning the social reception of the blacks, although they keep as much to themselves as do the emigrants of whom we never hear after they are landed.

The Value of Individuality

And yet it is only in intercourse with individuals of a people that a key to their character, to the way they may be met, can be found. It is through the individual, too, that one gains something for one's self. I have often gained a good deal more in little chats with my cook (who, according to the country I was living in, was in turn a negro, a German, a Spaniard, a Frenchwoman, once an Indian, again a day, but none other a representative of one of Ireland's counties) than from the general talk at an afternoon tea or club luncheon. But if the cooks should entertain me at tea or luncheon I should gain (mentally) less from their general talk than I had from the individual chat. It is the individuality we get from people that counts. To-day, thoughtful men and women are eager to know the individual who can tell them something worth while to know. Why? They realize that in Europe is to be found. It is the instinct of self-preservation! Life is held on to with greater vigor than it ever was; it is valued more, understood better, and this brings me to the consideration of the President's attitude of the side what has been called race suicide and its significance in connection with this other race question.

Concerning "Race Suicide"

It is because the greater realization of what life is has been found that the responsibility of parenthood has taken on a new aspect. It would be strange if, in this thinking age, the responsibility were not more seriously considered than it was in the older time, when overpopulation was left to sort out itself, and killed off the unfit, though only after bringing needless suffering to thousands of mothers and children. That the increased cost of living makes the problem of providing for several children one that many couples cannot meet is undeniable. Nor should it be considered unusual to avoid burdening a country with a population so great that poverty must necessarily become the lot of thousands, with consequent depletion of national strength. The one fact that there are more many hundreds of children excluded from the schools or put on half-day sessions because provision for increase in attendance cannot be made fast enough points the moral.

The Question for Women

But aside from every consideration of trouble and expense in bringing up children (considerations, anything quite as, if not more, deeply with men than they do with women) there is one which engages more and more the thoughtful woman. It will be found in the query the conscientious thinker puts to herself: "What gutter can I offer to my life that it will have a reasonable portion of joy or peace or comfort of mind and body, and what right have I to compel a soul to wear the garb of mortality?" The inability to offer any reply in such query, the anxiety that the most fortunate do not escape suffering and death, may well make parents dry themselves in the joy of parenthood, the comfort in feeling that their children will share their delusive years.

A Suggested Solution

The connection of this race question with the other is less made. Because as mothers, or possible mothers, women are able to see individuality that each being has an individuality that should have opportunity. If this were to be so, and will give just the right of this country lies the ability to grant it, not, discriminatingly, such recognition as the individual of worth should have, but that

AFTER a morning's shopping nothing will recuperate you so much as one of those delicious Club Cocktails. They are the correct thing to offer your friends whenever they call. They are both a tonic and stimulant, and fill a distinct place of their own. Easily served and appreciated by ladies and gentlemen alike. Buy some Manhattan and Martini, and ask your friends which they prefer. Of all dealers. Specify CLUB COCKTAILS.

G. F. HEUBLEIN & BRO., - Sole Proprietors
HARTFORD NEW YORK LONDON

Original Drawings Pastels Water-Colors

Prints

Bronzes

Photographs

Rare Books

Autographs

Mail Orders

Carefully Filled

Fine Stationery

Works of Fiction

Book Plates

Fine Bindings

Old Prints

Engravings

Books in Sets

Orders Executed

on Commission

Send your address and we will forward you notices of our art exhibitions and special lists and catalogues as they are issued

WILD LIFE OF ORCHARD AND FIELD

An enlarged and revised edition of this author's "Friends Worth Knowing," with numerous additions
By ERNEST INGERSOLL

New Edition, with many New Photographs, - $1.40 net (postage extra)

HARPER & BROTHERS, FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK

ABBOTT'S ANGOSTURA
BITTERS

Take the best remedy. A beautiful remedy for all who are afflicted with indigestion, headache, nervousness, or any of the various ailments of the stomach. It is the only remedy of its kind. Important to see that it is Abbott's.

RED TOP RYE

GOOD WHISKEY

It's up to YOU

BERNARD WEINBERG & SON
CHICAGO, ILL.
ST. LOUIS, MO.
KANSAS CITY, MO.

THE WORLD'S FAIR AUTOMOBILE RUN—ARRIVAL OF NEW YORK CARS IN ST. LOUIS

The New York contingent of automobiles which left for St. Louis on the morning of the 15th inst. for the purpose of competing in the automobile run, arrived in St. Louis on the morning of the 16th inst. The cars, which were driven by a team of four men, were driven by a team of four men, and were driven by a team of four men.

Copyrighted by J. P. Morgan & Co., Inc.

VERGILIUS

A TALE OF THE
COMING OF CHRIST

BY

IRVING
BACHELLER

Author of "Eben Holden"

UNIQUE BINDING

Post 8vo, $1.35

In this master-work Mr. Bacheller writes of decadent Rome, weaving a plot of strange interest. In a thrilling climax comes the Nativity, depicted with deepest reverence, vividness, and power. * * *

"Vergilius" has no parallel in fiction. The lovers about whom the plot is woven are both Roman patricians. Augustus, Herod, and his son Antipater are all vividly and intimately drawn, while a new light is thrown on the attitude of Jews and Romans toward the vaguely heralded "New King of the Jews." A delightful and exciting romance, unusual and unforgettable.

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS, NEW YORK

Registered Trade Mark

H
DE CABAÑAS

Y

CARBAJAL

H. de Cabañas y Carbajal

“CABAÑAS”

cigars are known to almost all who have any knowledge of fine cigars, as the one Havana brand that unvaryingly holds its exceedingly high standard of excellence and mildness. The highest percentage of fine and mild tobacco from San Juan and San Luis sections of the Vuelta Abajo district that is grown in Cuba, goes to the world's most discriminating smokers in the CABAÑAS brand. The characteristic traits of the CABAÑAS brand are its aroma and mildness, what the Spaniard calls “suave.” It has made its reputation on these qualities more than on any others, so difficult is it to find a mild Havana cigar that has character; that is not neutral, yet not so pronounced that it is unacceptable:—that is really mild and yet has individuality. It has taken more than one hundred years to bring the CABAÑAS brand to its present perfection, and the fact that it is to-day the most aggressively imitated brand in Havana is the strongest evidence of its established, continued and present excellence.

Dealers who are not interested in substituting brands made to imitate the CABAÑAS brand will confirm these statements and recommend the CABAÑAS brand to you for these qualities.

All known sizes are made in the CABAÑAS brand.

H. de CABAÑAS Y CARBAJAL, Manufacturers,

Leopoldo Carbajal, Marquis of Pinar del Rio, President,
ZULUETA 10, HAVANA, CUBA.

HARPER'S WEEKLY

EDITED BY

GEORGE HARVEY

HARPER BROTHERS

NEW YORK

VERGILIUS

A TALE OF THE
COMING OF CHRIST

BY

IRVING
BACHELLER

Author of "Eben Holden"

UNIQUE BINDING

Post 8vo, $1.35

In this master-work Mr. Bacheller writes of decadent Rome, weaving a plot of strange interest. In a thrilling climax comes the Nativity, depicted with deepest reverence, vividness, and power. * * *

"Vergilius" has no parallel in fiction. The lovers about whom the plot is woven are both Roman patricians. Augustus, Herod, and his son Antipater are all vividly and intimately drawn, while a new light is thrown on the attitude of Jews and Romans toward the vaguely heralded "New King of the Jews." A delightful and exciting romance, unusual and unforgettable.

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS, NEW YORK

HARPER'S WEEKLY

Vol. XLVIII

New York, Saturday, September 3, 1904

No. 464

Copyright, 1904, by HARPER & BROTHERS. All rights reserved

A VISION OF NOVEMBER 8

Only the Remains left to Fight Over?

HARPER'S WEEKLY

Vol. XLVIII,

No. 2459

EDITED BY GEORGE HARVEY

THIRTY-SIX PAGES

NEW YORK CITY, SEPTEMBER 3, 1904

Terms: 10 Cents a Copy—$4.00 a Year. In Advance
 Postage free to all Subscribers in the United States, Canada, Mexico,
 Hawaii, Porto Rico, the Philippine Islands, Guam, and Irtimola, Samoa.

Entered at the New York Post Office as second class matter.

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS
 NEW YORK CITY: FRANKLIN SQUARE
 LONDON: 45 ALBEMARLE STREET, W.

COMMENT

Platform: No Hiding!

The independent newspapers supporting Judge PARKER were so oppressed by the effect of their candidate's speech of acceptance that they could do little for a time but gasp for breath. The Springfield Republican could not resist a shiver over what obviously impressed its New England conscience as an intemperate utterance respecting the destinies of the much-loved Philippines, but it sternly repressed its emotion and took what it could get with as much grace as possible. The Times did likewise. The World, on the other hand, actuated as ever by a forceful creative motive, insisted that the Judge should have been more explicit, and frankly confessed its disappointment. Just what Mr. PUTZGER would have liked to have him say is not clear to our mind, although we judge that he wanted him to speak up like a real GREEKMAN and promise to put the Archipelago into the theoretically independent position that Cuba now occupies. To make such a pledge more than perfunctory, however, it would be essential to specify a time when the stars and stripes should be hauled down and a racing and football of a Filipino banner raised in its place. None of the opponents of the present administration's policy, so far as we have observed, has yet ventured to suggest a specific date for this interesting operation. As a matter of fact, there is and can be no issue in our conduct of the affairs of the Philippine islands. Everybody would be glad to be rid of them, but nobody can tell when or how to do it without disregarding our moral obligations to the millions who, for the time being, at any rate, must and do rely upon our disinterested guidance. There can be no denial of the fact that, so far, our administration has been signally successful, and is now satisfactory to both the American people and the Filipino themselves. There also seems to be a good deal of sense in Secretary TAYLOR's notion that constant agitation here, tending to induce the more ambitious and turbulent spirits of the Archipelago to hope for immediate acquisition of power and plunder, can result only in harm to the great mass of helpless beings whose welfare we are bound in honor to conserve. Judge PARKER did well to let Mr. ROOSEVELT's Filipino policy alone. Neither he nor anybody else could improve it.

The Republican newspapers, on the other hand, persist in making themselves equally ludicrous by insisting that the gold standard is still an issue. Not much attention is paid to the futile harping of the Tribune and the Press, but the Times does trip up Mr. ROOSEVELT rather neatly. It takes as a text the declaration in his speech of acceptance to the effect that "We know what we mean when we speak of an honest and single currency; we mean the same thing from year to year." It then delects in late recent history, and records that in 1896 Mr. ROOSEVELT vigorously denounced "the extreme gold men" as being "as irresponsible in their fanaticism as any representative of the Rocky Mountain mine-owners." It also notes the fact that Mr. ROOSEVELT at that time developed in favor of international bimetalism, and said that "the people who oppose the move are, as a rule, men whom the insane folly of the ultra free-silver men has worked into a cynical folly only less acute." It also quotes the declaration in the Republican platform of 1896 to the same effect, and reaches the logical conclusion that Mr. ROOSEVELT's present insistence is not justified by the facts. It might have gone further and recalled the free-silver talk of Mr. McKINLEY, Mr. CANNON, and practically all of the Republican leaders in Congress, except Mr. RYAN. Such recollections are legitimate when attempts are made to sustain a false issue. As a matter of fact, they make no serious reflection upon Mr. ROOSEVELT. It is true that his views have changed along with conditions. So have Judge PARKER's. Technically, each is undoubtedly inconsistent, but no less certainly each is right. Therefore, again, there is no issue in the gold standard, and Republican attempts to keep it alive are as futile as Democratic hectorings over the administration's policy in the Philippines.

Dr. McKELWAY goes off on his own tack in the Broken Eagle. He apparently suspects that the South is not so solid as it might be, and takes occasion to quote from Mr. ROOSEVELT's Life of Benton, in which the author compared JEFFERSON DAVIS with BENJAMIN ARNOLD. Being himself an accomplished Doctor of Laws, and the holder of many degrees, Dr. McKELWAY experiences no difficulty in demonstrating that the comparison was unwarranted. In the course of his research, however, he makes the interesting discovery that Mr. ROOSEVELT also accused Mr. DAVIS of abetting Mississippi's repudiation of her State debt, and reveals that when the charges were brought to Mr. DAVIS's attention, the latter remarked: "Oh! They are not true, but Mr. ROOSEVELT made them the last impulse of prejudicial faith." Subsequently, according to the Doctor, upon a repetition of the charges by Mr. ROOSEVELT in a magazine article, accompanied by an intimation that Mr. DAVIS had failed to meet his personal obligations, Mr. DAVIS "wrote to Mr. ROOSEVELT a kind letter, pointing out his error and offering evidence to the contrary." To this communication there came a response, in Mr. ROOSEVELT's handwriting, as follows: "Mr. THURGOOD ROOSEVELT desires in communication with JEFFERSON DAVIS." The evidence submitted by Dr. McKELWAY in substantiation of charges which, after all, can be considered as hardly more than evidence of lack of courtesy and lack of consideration, is not so conclusive as it might be, and we dare say there is another side of the story. In any case we can hardly perceive the justification of a two-column, double-headed article, designed to establish "the havoc of temperament in politics and government." Moreover, we question the necessity of Dr. McKELWAY venturing any more of even the great quantity of space that he has at his disposal in solidifying the South. Mr. ROOSEVELT has attended to that himself.

We summarize elsewhere Mr. JOSEPH PUTZGER's powerful arraignment of the present administration. The writer, who, despite the tremendous disadvantage of physical blindness, maintains incontrovertibly his position as the foremost living journalist of the world, addresses to Mr. ROOSEVELT a second open letter, no less pungent and, in some respects, more forceful than his first communication. After dwelling, with what seems to us to be somewhat unnecessary repetition and emphasis, upon Mr. ROOSEVELT's frequent denunciations of "corrupts and wrongdoings," Mr. PUTZGER proceeds to point out with consummate skill the possible effect of the dominance of a spirit so militant upon the future of the republic. His theory and apparent belief are that such a temperament, virtually unhampered by the presumed coordinate branches of the government, cannot be restrained by any force whatsoever, and that Mr. ROOSEVELT, replenished with full authority by the people, would, if he should do no more than back up his own words with corresponding deeds, constitute himself the greatest peril to the nation. In many points of Mr. PUTZGER's indictment, although logically exact, we cannot perceive causes of so great alarm as he manifests. For example, our philosophical observation has taught us that Mr. ROOSEVELT speaks more freely and cautiously than he acts. Not his deeds, but his words, have given rise to apprehension in serious minds. We must admit, however, that this excuse cannot apply to carefully considered written communications, such as Mr. ROOSEVELT's letter to Mr. ROOT, which was read at the Cuban anniversary dinner on May 20, and in which he, speaking as President, virtually threatened every Central and South Amer-mean nation with armed interference by the United States, in the event of its failure to "keep order" or "pay its obligations." This is the most far-reaching pronouncement that any high official of the United States government has ever uttered. We cannot but hope that Mr. JOHN SMITH WILLIAMS's belief, that it was not seriously intended, is correct. Before Mr. ROOSEVELT was officially notified of his nomination, we expressed the earnest desire that in his speech of acceptance he would perhaps modify, but at least define more exactly, what he meant. His failure to do so justifies Mr. PATTERSON in accusing the President of "proposing to make us responsible for foreign debts aggregating $1,336,417,240—more or less (per cent. than the present bonded national debt of the United States—and this not counting $449,084,958 of domestic debt, liabilities of paper money, and hundreds of millions due to foreign citizens and corporations for subsidies, damages, and other claims." Add to this the self-assumed obligation of maintaining "order"—this government itself defining the word as action or impulse might determine—and some comprehension of what imperialism means may be had. That President ROOSEVELT, even if elected upon this declaration of purpose, would attempt to exercise such authority over the Western Hemisphere, we cannot and do not believe. It is inconceivable. But we do earnestly renew our previous solicitation that he will not again neglect the opportunity afforded by his formal letter of acceptance to set himself clearly in the right.

BURKE CHURMAN'S first speech was for PARKER.

HAVE the eight hundred thousand Republican voters of this State definitely and finally abdicated? Is ORRILL all there is left? The representatives of the party are to meet, we believe, in about a week, presumably to nominate a candidate for Governor, but everybody knows that they might as well stay at home. When Mr. ORRILL decides who, in his judgment, will best serve his personal interests, he will tell his party who his candidate for Governor is to be. While prating about "an open convention," he deftly hints that he has a dark horse in reserve and may spring a surprise. Was there ever a more impudent suggestion? True, not much could be expected from a man so deficient in common decency as to drag the name of a spoiled title conferred upon him by the people through the name of tainted politics and shameful business, but it does seem as if there might be sufficient authority somewhere to induce him not to flatter his impudently arrogant in the faces of those who, until recently, have been proud of their State. Still, since, in case such authority does exist, there is no manifestation of its exercise, we can only guess the name of the man whom the Governor-chairman—or should it be chairman-Governor?—will ask us to vote for. Vague hints have been thrown out that President NICHOLAS MURPHY BRYCE, of Columbia University, is the dark horse. This subtly circulated suspicion may be set aside forthwith. The nomination of DAVID BRYCE, like that of Mr. ROSE, would be too pleasing to Mr. ROOSEVELT, and the man himself is too high-minded and too clean-handed to do well the work required of an ORRILL creature. Why not EDWARD H. HARRISON? Why not the master himself instead of a slave? Mr. HARRISON is a busy man, but the work could be made easy. He could always have his toady with him, ready to carry his coat or hold his horse; moreover, he might be able to induce his friend Colonel McCook to pay back that $250,000. Then everybody—barring possibly the Colonel—would be delighted.

Meanwhile, what about the Democrat? The strongest candidate they could name is DR. LANCEY KYELL, but he could hardly serve as TUCKER'S assistant and run for Governor at the same time. McCUELLAN seems to be out of it, and neither JIMMIE nor GARY vity for us. So it seems to taper down to STANFORD, the once defeated protégé of CYRUS DAVIS. If he should be nominated, let us hope that the Republicans will name TIM WILSON and confine the contest strictly to religious affairs. In view, however, of the apparent impossibility of either party persuing one of its best men to run, why not match up the worst? Let the candidates be DANIEL BENNETT HILL, and BENJAMIN B. ORRILL, JR., and we shall have at least the satisfaction of realizing that our degradation is complete.

The editor of the Yazoo City Blade is an enterprising Democrat. Not satisfied with waiting for JOSEPH QUINCY to furnish an electrotype plate of the candidate, he prints the best likeness he can find in the job department. We reproduce it herewith. The Judge is not quite as bold as this, and he wears another type of scarf. His expression, too, is less alert and more reflective. However, the picture doubtless will serve its purpose, and we can perceive in real basis of complaint from either JUDGE PARKER or Mr. W. L. DOUGLAS. Both are good citizens and good-looking.

Of course Senator PLATT did not mean quite what his words conveyed when he said that "whenever Senator DEPUE speaks, thousands of Republicans turn out to hear him, and he makes converts wherever he goes."

To the list of independent journals supporting Judge PARKER must now be added Life and Puck. Mr. MITCHELL MANNING-MILLER-MITCHELL is not very strenuous in the brightly colored columns of the former, but it is not difficult to see where his gentle four-cornered heart is. Mr. JOHN KENNEDY HANES, on the other hand, is so flat-footed that he sees it. This is his ticket.

FOR EMPEROR:
THEODORE ROOSEVELT, of NEW YORK.
FOR PRINCE IMPERIAL:
CHARLES WARREN FAIRBANKS, of IOWA.
FOR PRESIDENT:
ALTON BROOKS PARKER, of NEW YORK.
FOR VICE PRESIDENT:
HENRY GANSAWAY DAVIS, of WEST VIRGINIA.

It is a strong ticket, and, having the usual doubt respecting the things printed in Puck, we are not quite sure that it is humorous. But not so intended, however, might not Mr. HANES have imprinted his suggestion by proposing: For President of the Corporation, THEODORE ROOSEVELT; for Chairman of the Board, ALTON B. PARKER.

Group's speeches do sound a little pitifully.

The Poor Man's Party is now well under way. While the faithful allies scared up by the Tribune await the sound of the tocsin under the banian-tree, the Press takes charge of the rank and file. "Every Poor Man," it firmly declares, "who burns KEROSENE oil has an individual grievance against the syndicate that is backing PARKER, and will vote accordingly." We guess he will. For example: Possibly Mr. GEORGE BAUER CORTELLOR could not qualify as a real Poor Man, but he is certainly burning a good deal of somebody's oil these days, and will doubtless "sue accordingly." Animosity seems to be the motto of the Press.

Mr. WILLIAM J. BAYAN has announced that if Judge PARKER shall fail to be elected next November, he, BAYAN, will undertake a reorganization of the Democratic party on Bryanite principles. The "safe, sane, and conservative" Democrats will have had their opportunity, and will have shown themselves, Mr. BAYAN says, incapable of turning it to account. Mr. BAYAN says, however, that he cannot monopolize the reorganization business. It looks as if Mr. THOMAS E. WATSON, the Populist nominee for the Presidency, means to do some reorganizing himself, and as if he might have the support of the Hesper newspapers, which are noticeably lukewarm in their advocacy of Judge PARKER, but persistent and enthusiastic in their praise of the Georgians, and of the principal planks in his platform, which are an income tax and government ownership of railroads. There is no doubt that Mr. WATSON is a man of wide information, high intelligence, and unquestioned integrity. He proved, too, the other day in New York city that he can make an effective speech. There seems to be no doubt that he is to undertake a strenuous campaign in the doubtful States of the North, with the aim of sobering the Bryanite element from the Democratic ranks. Instead of the 50,000 votes cast for WATSON PARKER four years ago, the Populists are claiming that Mr. WATSON will secure as many as half a million. If he does, he may be expected to turn the scale against Judge PARKER in more than one pivotal State, for there is no doubt that almost all the votes secured by WATSON will come from men who voted for BAYAN four years ago. A good deal of money will be needed for the campaign which Mr. WATSON is said to contemplate, and where he will get the funds is a mystery to some glibest onlookers. Not to the Democratic managers, however, who shake their heads in the direction of Republican headquarters, and privately moot the question whether, by way of reprisal, it might not be well to give a boost to Dr. SWALLOW, the Prohibitionist nominee for the Presidency.

It is scarcely worth while, at this time, to discuss the two most conspicuous planks in the Populist platform, although they may be adopted four years hence by the Democracy, should the latter party be surrendered to the control of the radical element. We gave at length our reasons for disapproving of an income tax at the time when a second experiment in that direction—the first was made during the civil war—was sanctioned by Congress during the second CLEVELAND administration. Since that mode of taxation was pronounced unconstitutional by the United States Supreme Court, the question has become an academic one, and will remain so until a demand for a constitutional amendment expressly sanctioning an income tax shall have been pushed to the front of the Democratic programme. It was not Mr. BAYAN's fault that such a plank did not figure in the St. Louis platform this year. As for Federal ownership of railroads, that is a project which, as yet, has not so much as crossed the threshold of practical politics. Even Mr. BAYAN seems aghast at the enormous disputation of the number of officeholders and office-seekers that would follow the assumption by the Federal government of the task of operating all the railroads in the United States. Such a stupendous expansion of Executive functions would have one of two results: either the old cry, that to the victors belong the spoils, would prove irresistible; or the vastly augmented civil service would constitute an army of permanent placemen, whose pressure for an increase of salaries an ambitious Chief Magistrate would be unlikely to withstand. An increase of salaries all along the line would render it impracticable to run the railways at a profit.

At the hour when we write, it seems probable that in Delaware the ANTI-S or Union Republicans on the one hand, and the so-called Regular Republicans on the other, will put two separate State tickets in the field, although they have agreed upon a common list of Presidential electors. We infer from the speech made the other day by Governor LA FOLLETTE that a similar state of things will be witnessed in Wisconsin. There is this pregnant difference, however, in the respective situations, that in Delaware the same list of Presidential electors will figure on both the ANTI-S Republican and the Regular Republican ballots. In Wisconsin a common list of Presidential electors has been agreed upon, but, according to a State statute, it cannot be associated with both the LA FOLLETTE and "Stalwart" tickets. It must be coupled with either one or the other; and it is alleged that the nominee for Presidential electors have one and all expressed a desire to be bracketed with the LA FOLLETTE nominees for State offices. Under the circumstances, the impression is gaining ground that it will prove impracticable for the Democrats to wrest Delaware from the Republican column, but that their chance of carrying Wisconsin is likely to prove even better than it was at first supposed to be.

Brag continues to be a good deal. Colonel F. W. PAXTON now exultantly informs us that Maine is not safely Republican. "A majority of the voters of this State," he says, "is opposed to the dominant party." Let us hope, for the sake of Colonel PAXTON's reputation as a seer, that they will so manifest their opposition in any peculiar way on the 12th day of the present month.

According to a table which was drawn up by a member of the cabinet just after a cabinet meeting, and which is supposed to represent the President's view of the situation, the Democrats have not the smallest chance of success. They are credited with only 159 electoral votes, including those of Kentucky and Maryland, the latter of which States was carried by McKENLEY in 1896 and 1900, while 12 of the former's electoral votes were secured by him in the first named year. In the doubtful column are placed New York, Delaware, Colorado, Montana, and Nevada, which, between them, have 54 electoral votes. Should these be lost by the Republicans, the Democratic total would be only 212, or 27 short of a majority. The cabinet officer claims as absolutely safe for the Republicans such States as Rhode Island, Connecticut, New Jersey, West Virginia, Indiana, Wisconsin, Idaho, Wyoming, Utah, Washington, Oregon, and California. It is certain that the Democrats will make a resolute fight in almost every one of these States, and they can scarcely be taxed with rancor-chasing when they assert that they have a fair chance of carrying West Virginia (7 electoral votes), Indiana (15), Wisconsin (13), and Idaho (5); besides New Jersey (12), where ex-President CLEVELAND has promised to make two speeches during the autumn, and where it is not inevitable that he may receive and accept the nomination for Governor. Nor, as we have seen, Judge PARKER would and has 27 electoral votes, in addition to those of the State acknowledged by the cabinet officer to be doubtful, in order to secure a majority.

The estimate ascribed to a cabinet officer is, obviously, optimistic from the Republican view-point. The estimate cannot be applied to the extremely conservative estimate and to have been made by the Democratic managers. They do not profess, we are informed, to count upon more than 26 electoral votes as sure for the nominee of their party. To this total the Southern States, which voted for BAYAN in 1900 (plus Kentucky), contribute 131; West Virginia, 7; Maryland, 8; Nevada, 3; and New York, 39. Even this list, stamped as it is with caution, includes West Virginia, which, as we have seen, a representative of the administration believes to be assured to ROOSEVELT. Nor will any Republican publicly admit that the loss of New York is certain. Accepting the estimate, however, for the sake of argument, we are naturally moved to inquire where the Democratic managers expect to get the 31 missing votes needed to elect their candidate. They are reported to think that their best opportunities will be found in New Jersey, Connecticut, and Rhode Island. But those States, taken together, have but 29 electoral votes. Judge PARKER would still be short by 8 votes of the number needed. For those 8 votes he would have to look to Indiana (15), or to Wisconsin (13), or to Colorado (5), and Montana (3). The last two States, if added to the list, as previously amended, would raise the aggregate of votes to 229, precisely the number needed to elect PARKER. Evidently, in the judgment of the Democratic managers themselves, the contest is to be an extremely close one, like that of 1892. Unless, of course, there should be a landslide, like that of 1892. Of a landslide, nobody, as yet, can dream any indication; but in 1892 few Democrats, outside of Mr. WILLIAM C. WATSON and the circle of his intimate friends, believed, even as late as the eve of election day in that year, that Mr. CLEVELAND would be successful. Indeed, as late as 10 P.M. on election day, the reports of Democratic triumphs in New York, Indiana, Illinois, and Wisconsin were received in Washington even by Democrats with incredulity. There is no doubt that in August, 1892, the prospects of Mr. CLEVELAND looked every bit as dark as those of JUDGE PARKER do now. The former, however, had on his side one of the most remarkable harmonizers and organizers of his time. Who is there in the Democratic council-room to take Mr. WHITNEY's place to-day?

When a Democrat tries to plunder, he lands in jail—BORAKA TURKMAN.
Or in Congress.

Tom's latest idea is his greatest. He proposes to round up the Democratic and independent editors, feed them at some suitable hotel—probably the Hoffman House—in this city, load them on a steamer, and take them to Espana to shake hands with the Judge and listen to some golden silence. An orator is to address them on the way up and a band will discourse sweet music from the poop-deck. With a single amendment the plan would seem to be—shall we say—"admirable"? Tom should not forget that these are rather hand campaign times this year and hands cost money. Why not let the editors furnish their own music? They are not unaccustomed to blow their own horns and would probably prefer to do it. Moreover, they are good performers. When HENRY WATKINS has played the fiddle ever since the "Arkansas Traveller" was written, Dr. McKELWAY has pounded the bass-drum for years, SAMUEL BOWLES kept of a summer night lulls the Longmeadow birds to sleep with his flute, CHARLES R. MILLER is a veritable LUTY on the cornet, and OSWALD VILLARD is a master of technique on any kind of a waiting instrument. Mr. HEUSER would probably have to grind a hand-organ in some other part of the steamer, but he is grinding so softly this year that he would hardly disturb the harmony. Mr. PEYTER, of course, would lead; otherwise Mr. CHEELMAN wouldn't go, and the whole show would be a fizzle. The platform should be: No PERSON. Good luck to the fertile-minded THOMAS! A good time to the able journalists! But pity, pity for the Judge!

The three poorest newspapers in threaten New York are the only ones supporting ROOSEVELT—the Tribune, the Mail, and the Press. And all of these practically owe their existence to their unimpeachable Republicanism. With the possible exception of the Tribune, they have no other excuse for existing—ignavia thoracica.

That is nonsense. Barring the Herald, the Tribune is as good a newspaper as any published in New York. The Mail would rank well also if somebody would kindly supply HOWARD DAYVING with ideas to take the place of yeast-cakes in his cartoons.

The London Spectator thinks the Judge's declaration for one term only will cost him many votes, "as under the Constitution he will hardly have time to carry out any great policy whatever." We dissent from the Spectator's opinion. The declaration amounts to no more than a pledge not to spend his first term scheming for a second. In our opinion the Judge will lose no votes by it, and may gain a few. Voters do not think of more than one term at a time.

Barring a politic anti-second term pledge which might have been made, perhaps, more gracefully in an inaugural address after election, nothing has come from Judge PARKER's lips, etc.

Now the story runs that if President ROOSEVELT listens to the suggestions of the men who are working day and night to bring about his election and at the same time enter the State of New York to him, he will give the assurance that he will not be a candidate to succeed himself in 1904.

Both from the Sun!

None of the papers report any tumult of rejoicing among the saloon-keepers of New York because their rulling has achieved a new respectability under the patronage of Bishop PORTER. The more urgent disapprovers of the Bishop's course in the matter of the Subway Tavern argue very earnestly about the harm the Bishop may do in making saloon-keeping respectable, but the barkeepers' gratitude lags. It is suspected, indeed, that the new tavern's saloon neighbors feel rather oddly towards it, considering that it represents not so much the elevation of a disreputable business as merely so much competition. When the saloon-keepers and all the more voracious foes of rum are on the same side of any liquor question, examine the other side closely. It is apt to have strong points.

BISHOP PORTER has made it clear that his course in giving countenance to the Subway Tavern was no green fruit of impulse, but was fully considered. It was the expression of convictions slowly matured and deeply held. The Bishop thoroughly believes that the prevailing methods of dealing with the drink evil in this country are fatally defective in theory and a failure in practice. A member of the W. C. T. U., lately defined it to be one of the aims of that organization "to keep drink and the associations of drinking as disreputable as possible." It is the direct opposite, she says, of Bishop PORTER's purpose. The W. C. T. U. believes that the cure and the only cure for the drink evil is the inculcation of total abstinence. The Bishop is not himself an abstainer and does not believe that total abstinence can ever be made popular enough to do much good. It works well enough with people who don't want to drink, but it does not help the drinkers. The drinkers being a vast multitude, the Bishop wants to help them. There is a great difference in drinkers. Those who drink with discretion and temperately get on pretty well in spite of alcohol. They constitute a large majority of our male population. The Bishop wants to improve their state, and extend their numbers to include as many as possible of the drinkers who drink to their own hurt. He says it is perfectly idle to shut up saloons in great cities unless you offer something better as a substitute. The Subway Tavern represents an attempt to provide for drinkers something less demoralizing and dangerous than an ordinary saloon. The Bishop looked the tavern, and persists resolutely in looking it, because he believes it is enough better than an ordinary saloon to be useful to the public.

Perhaps it may be possible to make the Bishop's point of view a little more comprehensible to some readers who see nothing but harm in his action. Suppose you are an average citizen in comfortable circumstances in New York and live about as your neighbors live, and work hard, and eat and drink like other folks. And suppose you have sons that you are trying to bring up to be good and useful men. One of the important things you look out for is their attitude towards alcohol. While they are children, of course, they let it alone altogether, and tobacco too. You can teach them with perfect confidence that neither alcohol nor tobacco is good for young boys. But they grow up seeing wine and spirits and tobacco used by people whom they respect. Perhaps they go to college. You don't expect them to be abstainers, but you know that it is of the utmost importance that their habits should be good, that they should be temperate in whatever use they make of either alcohol or tobacco, so controlling themselves that whatever pleasure they get from these things shall not impair either their health or their industry. And when they come back home again they come to a great city where there is a saloon on every corner. Are you afraid of the saloons for them? Not if their training has been successful, for they will have come to such a degree of knowledge and maturity as to know what they are about. But because young fellows are gregarious, and are bound to meet somewhere, and because it makes some difference where they meet, the older college graduates in New York have provided clubs for their young brethren. They think in so doing they do them a good turn, because they get them out of the streets and saloons in the evening, offering them instead comfortable homes, where they eat, drink, smoke, and confabulate as they list. Possibly these college clubs are an advantage to the young men who use them. They are subject to abuse, of course, and to some extent they promote clamorousness, which is a real defect, but their promoters find satisfactory reasons for believing that such clubs are welcome and salutary refuges for many young fellows who have no better place to go to, and could easily find worse places.

A service akin to this that the college men do for their young mates Bishop PORTER is trying to begin to do for the great metropolitan public. He wants to provide places in which the multitudes who are bound to gather somewhere, and who now frequent saloons, may find better entertainment and less temptation than the saloons offer. The chief end of an ordinary saloon is to purvey alcohol, but in a club alcohol is only an incident. Men drink in clubs, but they also talk, and rest, and eat, and read and write. And a club is no more than a good tavern with a limited and exclusive patronage. Just as experienced parents think that clubs are better than saloons for their sons, as Bishop Potter considers that the Salisbury Tavern type of saloon is better than the ordinary saloon for the sons of Dukes. That opinion is certainly not a wicked one, though how much practical good may result from efforts made in accordance with it is of course a question.

Oxford has reached across the sea and taken the leading American medical man to be her regius professor of medicine. Dr. WILLIAM OSLER, of Johns Hopkins, is the man. How did Oxford get him? There was nothing in his line in this country that he could not have had. Johns Hopkins was proud of him and devoted to him; Harvard, which gave him a LL.D. last Commencement, would gladly have had his help in the reorganization of her famous medical school, just now starting with a new plant and huge endowment on an career of great promise. And Dr. OSLER's private practice was just as extensive and remunerative as he chose to make it. But Oxford called him, and he has said Yes. There seems to be reason for explanation, and the explanation doubtless is that Dr. OSLER was born and grew up under the British flag in Canada, and though he has lived for twenty years in the United States, he is as much at home in England as here, and as ready to serve one public as the other.

We take it for granted that Dr. OSLER is an American citizen, as is also, of course, that other distinguished immigrant, Dr. SCHEIDTKE of Cornell. But in their feelings Canadians who come over the line in search of fuller opportunities probably come as near being citizens of two countries at once as it is possible to be. Indeed, if they are big enough men, they may really feel themselves to be citizens of a realm not less extensive than the whole of the United States and the whole British Empire, and where they make their headquarters depend much more on circumstances than on the leanings of their hearts. Consider Professor GOTTFRED SMITH, born in England, educated at Eton and Oxford, later a distinguished Oxford professor, later still a resident of America and professor at Cornell, now a resident of Toronto, and a constant observer of American public affairs, and a contributor to discussion of them in American newspapers. It must be that he, too, is at least a citizen of nothing less than the English-speaking world. A native American does not become an Englishman without some disturbance to his feelings; an Englishman becomes an American with loss of a wrench because he drifts with an old current and has precedent and company with him, but a Canadian turns very easily either to England or the United States, or from one to the other, and the American emigration to North-western wheat fields shows that Americans on occasion can transfer themselves just as readily into Canada.

It is a gloomy view of the physical future of the English people which was taken in the inaugural address delivered on August 17 at the meeting of the British Association by Prime-Minister BALFOUR, who this year is president of the body. He contended that the physical deterioration of the British race during the last half-century had been proved by statistics; and he could see no means of arresting the decay, because the process could be traced directly to the close approach to universal education brought about by the Board School system, of which the late Mr. FORSTER may be termed the author. The school system works in two ways, each conducive to a lessening of the physical stamina of the breed. In the first place, the facilities afforded by gratuitous education for rising from the lowest to the highest class tend in that direction, because the low-class men who profit by those facilities to raise themselves to the upper or middle class are almost certain to marry in the class to which they have arisen. The children, therefore, are liable to inherit from the mother the physical qualities of the higher or middle class, among which proclivities are not included. It follows that the children of the very men who best justify by their success the educational system tend to lower the birth-rate. In the second place, by learning to read, the children of agricultural laborers are made acquainted with the opportunities of improving their condition offered in urban communities. Of these opportunities they would have remained in ignorance a century ago. It is, however, the most energetic part of the rural population that profits by the knowledge of wider opportunities, and either drifts to the cities or emigrates. It is the less vigorous and less adventurous who remain in the rural districts, and it is upon them that the burden of perpetuating the race tends more and more to be thrown. There is an apparently irresistible tendency of the race to deteriorate, both in quantity and quality.

Another curious fact that seems to be demonstrated by statistics is that town life encourages the dark-haired, or Celtic, and discourages the light-haired, or Teutonic, element of the population. Political cartoon presented Mr. BALFOUR from expressing an opinion as to whether such a change would be hurtful or beneficial. Upon that point his own, Welshman, and Highlanders would have one opinion, and the descendants of Angles, Saxons, and Danes another. Since OLAVIN CROSWELL was shown to have been of Welsh descent, it has been impossible to convince Welshmen that the English people owe their vitality to their Teutonic strain. Mr. BALFOUR did not deny that, if universal education is only attainable at the cost of a lower birth-rate, the price would have to be paid. One would like to know whether the assumed effect of universal education on the physical quality of a race is attested by statistics, not only in England, but also in Scandinavia, where the ratio of illiteracy has long been exceptionally low.

The English army, halted at the gates of Lhasa, is woe-struck at the beauty of the sacred city, its golden domes like tongues of fire, and the exquisite greenery of the trees among its palaces and monasteries. It is a singular whim of destiny that within a few months the Sacred Forbidden City of Peking and the more sacred city of Tibet should both be exposed and invaded by the sacrilegious West. It is a more singular fact that this desecration of the holy places of Asia should take place just at the time when an Asiatic power, for the first time since JAY SHANKS defeated the Turks at Vienna, should be holding its own, and now thus holding its own, against one of the greatest of the white nations. The spiritual significance of the invasion of Tibet is only to be realized if we remember that Buddhism is still the most numerously represented religion in the world, having five hundred million adherents—about a third of the whole human race. And of these five hundred millions, more than four-fifths look to Lhasa with the same veneration that Catholics feel for Rome; the same veneration, and far more mystery. There are millions of Buddhists within the Russian Empire, beginning with the Kaltekins and ending with the Lammist Burjats, who border on Mongolia and Manchuria, all of whom look to Lhasa for spiritual leading, and go on pilgrimages to Lhasa, as the Moslem goes to Mecca, or the Christian to Jerusalem. Then among the Chinese, Buddhism was once the dominant religion, and still counts monasteries all over the empire, filled with monks who go to and from the sacred land of Tibet. The Koreans were converted to Buddhism by the Chinese, and they in turn carried the religion of Buddha to Japan, where the oldest Sanskrit manuscripts now known to the world are to be found. Buddhism also dominates Siam, Burma, and Ceylon, but these latter lands have less connection with the hierarchy of Tibet. We should remember that Buddhism is an Aryan faith, as much the growth of the Aryan mind as are PLATO and ARISTOTLE, BUDDHA and KANT; and that Buddhism therefore represents a great missionary wave of Aryan thought, sent forth two thousand years ago to the yellow and brown nations of Asia. That the West should once more be brought into intimate touch with this great Aryan system, at a time when the Asiatic is becoming a world force, is something destined to bear much fruit in the intellectual life of the future.

Joseph Pulitzer on the Campaign Issues

WITH whatever firmness Republicans may repudiate its conclusions, no one will dispute the remarkable ability evinced in the "open letter" addressed to President ROOSEVELT by Mr. JOSEPH PULITZER, and published in the World. The thesis which Mr. PULITZER undertook to demonstrate was that the permanent loss of the present campaign is not free trade as free others, but Tammany ROOSEVELT himself. Shall the people of the United States have for the next four years a personal or a constitutional government—the sovereignty of a party dictator or the sovereignty of the people—a Rough Rider or a Judge for a Chief Magistrate? In what grounds is this proffered the fundamental, permanent, decisive question to be answered at the ballot-box? In terms, by no means uncomplicated, Mr. PULITZER declares that the issue of ROOSEVELTISM is forced upon the country by the President's annual transparent and latent, by his strong, resourceful, ambitious, militant, passionate personality; by his versatile and surprising genius. It is alleged to be impossible to divert, as Mr. Roosevelt, in his speech at Chicago tried to divert, public attention from Mr. ROOSEVELT himself to the Republicans just freed, because, at present, to an extent unparalleled since the days of ABRAHAM JACKSON, the President controls the machinery, formulates the principles, and dictates the acts of the Republican organization. Mr. PULITZER admits that, as the French King said of the State, Mr. ROOSEVELT can, with great truth, say, of the Republican party, "It is I." It is unquestionably true, then, since the third nomination of ABRAHAM JACKSON in 1822, none of Mr. ROOSEVELT's predecessors have with such absolute authority prescribed the proceedings of a national convention. Under the circumstances, Mr. PULITZER, for his part, deems it impracticable and dangerous in any way to distinguish between the Republican party and its standard-bearer, or to argue that the voters should condemn the latter's shortcomings, in view of the former's antecedent services. There is, in a word, to-day, according to Mr. PULITZER, no such thing as a Republican party, considered as an independent, self-guided, self-acting entity: there is only a ROOSEVELT party.

Assuming, for the sake of argument, the validity of this premise, let us see what conclusions are drawn from it in the able edition of the World. Does it follow that, because ROOSEVELTISM—and not Republicanism of the McKINLEY type—is the pivotal issue of the campaign the people of the United States should refuse to give the President a further lease of power? Mr. PULITZER sets forth at length the reasons why. In his judgment, a second term ought to be withheld from the present tenant of the White House, not only because of the present campaign, but because of the past. We do not find in the list some of the performances which have been held to attest a willingness to disregard or override constitutional limitations. There is no allusion to the President's interposition in the antislavery civil strike; to the asserted existence of a constructive "recess" between the extra session and the first regular session of the Fifty-eighth Congress; or to the unprecedented and vertiginous "Long Walk" of Mr. ROOSEVELT as a Major General. These acts, though stress has been laid on them, as evidence of a self-willed, arbitrary temper, are apparently regarded by Mr. PULITZER as negligible, compared with other charges that can be brought home to the President. These charges, it seems, are suggested by certain positive statements, and by an equally significant omission in the President's speech of acceptance. The omission to which Mr. PULITZER refers is the absence of the words "economy," "retrenchment," and "reform," not one of which occurs in Mr. ROOSEVELT's speech. The silence on the subject, however, is pronounced pregnant, rather than surprising, when we recall to mind the fact that, during Mr. ROOSEVELT's term, the national expenditures have exceeded by $21,000,000 those of Mr. McKINLEY's administration; the latter has included the expenses of the war with Spain—and have transcended the cost of President CLEVELAND's second term by $10,000,000. As a further proof of extravagance, the fact is cited that the appropriations made by Congress, and either proposed or approved by Mr. ROOSEVELT, have converted the surplus of $80,000,000, which existed in 1895 into a deficit of more than $100,000,000 for the fiscal year just closed. The President, moreover, is accused of having added by a stroke of his pen, and without the authority of Congress, many thousands of prisoners to a roll already containing a million names. Mr. PULITZER is here pointing, of course, to the declaration, by Executive fiat, that the attainment of a given age constitutes prima facie proof of physical and mental disability.

The avowed basis of the President's speech of acceptance—that "prosperity has come at home"—is met by Mr. PULITZER with a challenge to deny that many thousands of working men have good reason to feel that prosperity has departed. The multitude of striking cotton operatives, for instance, whose wages since 1890 have been reduced 24½ per cent., can hardly be expected to admit that "wages are higher than ever before." Neither is an optimistic view of the situation likely to be shaken by the tale of thousands of employees who have been dismissed by our great railway systems—first now, moreover, the victims of the strike against the exactions of the head trust and not revolting in a "full dinner-pail." Passing to the President's declaration that his policy is "to do fair and equal justice to all men, paying no heed to whether a man is rich or poor," Mr. PULITZER asks whether these professions have been made good by deeds. Is an example of "fair and equal justice" afforded by a tariff law which enables favored manufacturers, in return for big campaign contributions, to levy tribute on the whole body of the people? Again, Will it be pretended that autonomy and the rights of labor are represented by the present cabinet? If so, by whom? Is it by the Secretary of the Treasury, who preaches that high prices are a blessing; or by Attorney-General MASON, who has not yet lifted a finger to enforce the anti-trust laws; or is it by Secretary MORTON, a railroad man, who lately was an ally of the best trust; or by Secretary METCALF, who is understood to be a representative of the Northern Pacific Railroad; or, finally, by Postmaster-General TAYLOR, long known as a legislative agent of railroad and other corporations? Nobody, certainly, would describe Secretary RAY, or Secretary HITCHCOCK, or Secretary TART as a spokesman of the rights of labor. Where, then, inquires Mr. PULITZER, is the proof of the President's "equal regard for all classes?"

It is not difficult to see how Mr. Secretary ROOT or Senator LORAIN would meet this arraignment of the President, so far as the counts named are concerned. It might not prove so easy for the cleverest advocate to defend the extraordinary position taken by Mr. ROOSEVELT in the letter read at the Cuban dinner. The conception of the Monroe Doctrine revealed in that document is calculated to excite repugnance on the part of the Latin communities in the New World, though, after all, it should not greatly surprise those who appreciated the significance of our State Department's acquiescence in the blockading of Venezuelan exports by European powers for the purpose of extorting payment of debts due to foreign creditors. As we pointed out at the time, the Monroe Doctrine never was intended to convey to our sister Americans repugnance to the impression that they with impunity could commit acts of violence against the persons or property of foreigners. On the contrary, our Presidents have always held that reparation could be exacted for such wrongs, provided such reparation should stop short of territorial dismemberment, or of such interference with the debtor government as would seriously affect its destiny. There is, however, a vast difference between public wrongs, on the one hand, and the non-payment of debts arising out of contracts on the other. No former President has ever intimated an intention of making this country a collecting agency for ordinary debts, or of committing at such a reclamation of the indebted country's revenues as would destroy or seriously impair its power of self-subsistence and self-development. The Monroe Doctrine will never, unless we permit others to reduce a Latin American country to the condition of Egypt, because, like Egypt, it has omitted to pay its ordinary debts, be, obviously, to expose the Monroe Doctrine in an alarming way, and to an ill-illuminated extent. Yet, as Mr. PULITZER points out, this is precisely what is implied in the letter of the President which was read at the Cuban dinner. "If a man is rich," said Mr. ROOSEVELT, "don't ask him how to act with decency in industrial and political matters. If he keeps order, and pays his obligations, then it need lead no interference from the United States." The inevitable and attributed inference is that, if a Latin-American republic does not pay its obligations, then it has reason to dread interference on our part. It is unquestionably true that this is a dangerous perversion of the non-interference doctrine of JAMES MONROE.

It must not be inferred, because Mr. PULITZER believes that the principal issue of the campaign will be the expediency of entrusting the Chief Magistracy to Mr. ROOSEVELT for another term, he overlooks the importance, and even urgency, of some other matters in which the two chief parties have taken conflicting positions. On the contrary, he enumerates a number of questions, which he describes as evil, rising, and burning. For instance: Shall the tariff never be revised except with the consent, and under the direction of its beneficiaries, or, in other words, by "the friends of its abuses, its extensions, and its discriminations"; or shall it be revised in a judicial spirit by "the friends of the masses, and for the common good"? Again, shall the corruptness, based on a long lease of power—as exemplified in the half-dressed postal frauds, in the land-office scandals in the pension abuses, in the sales of offices and the negotiation of corrupt public contracts by United States Senators DUFFIN and ST. JOHN, and in the recognition by the Executive of notorious corruptors and professional rogues—be condoned and excused, or shall the corruptness be perpetuated by the unrelenting effort against the "so-called" "benighted assimilation" in the Philippines, until it is too late to withdraw from that adventure in Asiatic colonization, and until the hybrid and irreparably alien natives of those islands shall be incorporated into our body politic, to cast the die in our national elections, as did the delegate from Hawaii at Kansas City in 1890? There are at least three out of ten questions, every one of which Mr. PULITZER would press home.

It is, as we began by saying, unnecessary to accept the premises, or to assent to the conclusions, of Mr. PULITZER's open letter. In order to appreciate the singular inanity and repugnance with which he has undertaken to state the case for the Democratic party

The Georgia Atrocity and some Excuses Offered for It

THE burning at the stake in Statesboro, Georgia, of two negroes who had just been convicted of murder, and sentenced to be hanged on September 9, has excited a great deal of discussion, because Georgia has been regarded as one of the most law-abiding of the American commonwealths south of the Potomac, and one of the least likely to tolerate the violent expression of courts of justice by a mob. Yet the facts as reported seem to demonstrate that the seizure and burning of the criminals were viewed with a sympathy, not only by many of the most respected white men in the community, but by the sheriff himself, whose duty it was to protect the negroes, and by the militia, who had been summoned to the support of the civil authorities. That the majority of the white people in the neighborhood should have been wrought to fury by the hideous nature of the crime is conceivable. Not only had a farmer, his wife (who had been previously assaulted), and their children been murdered and burned, but a belief was current in the existence of a conspiracy on the part of the blacks to kill all the whites in outlying farmhouses throughout the district. So far as the lynchers themselves were concerned, they seem to have been driven by terror to the perpetration of retributive atrocities. From this point of view they seem less culpable than the sheriff and his aids, who are said openly to have expressed approval of the purpose of the mob; and much less guilty than the military authorities, who, although they went through the formality of despatching militia to reinforce the guardians of the jail, ordered the soldiers not to shoot to kill, and took precautions to assure compliance with the order by serving out to them blank cartridges. Under the circumstances, the pretence of upholding the law was a mockery, and the officials who are responsible for the virtual connivance of the militia in the acts of the lynchers deserve the severest reprobation. It is they, rather than the lynchers, that have gravely weakened Georgia's claim to rank among highly civilized communities.

Attempts have been made to excuse the practical complicity of the sheriff and of his posse, and of the officers commanding the militia, in an act of savagery which must be held by all true friends of Georgia to have disgraced the State. It is pleaded on their behalf that, although a death sentence had been duly and promptly imposed upon the heinous criminals in the murders, the sentence was deemed inadequate, since it merely condemned the murderers to meet in a few seconds, and almost anonymously, an end which came to their victims only after hours of the most harrowing suffering. It is further alleged that, in the eyes of the civil and military authorities, as well as in those of the lynchers, the execution of the sentence, which had been fixed for September 9, was by no means assured. In the one hand, a pardon might be granted, while, on the other, recourse might be made to a court of appeals. There would have been some ground for such an apprehension in Delaware and in more than one other Southern State, where the death-punishment for rape and murder has been postponed, and even averted, by legal proceedings. In the Southern States, however, and especially in Georgia, there was not an atom of foundation for a doubt of the kind. There was not a man among the lynchers at Statesboro who did not know that the negro murderers would be hanged on the day named in the sentence. There is, we repeat, in Southern communities, and particularly in Georgia, absolutely no basis for the assertion that recourse is made to lynching because otherwise the crimes committed by negroes on white men and white women might go "unwhipped of justice."

A more ingenious defender of the Statesboro horror is put forth by a newspaper correspondent, who says that, although himself of Northern birth and education, he has learned, by a personal investigation of the state of things in every Southern State, to view the point of view from which lynching and the resort to "cruel and unusual punishment" is justified by many Southern whites. He avers that in Southern agricultural communities—the population of the Southern States is mainly agricultural—the execution of a negro by due process of law does not operate as a deterrent. Most of the farms are remote from towns, and, as the negro agricultural laborers do not read the newspapers, judicial proceedings are rarely talked about, or even heard of, outside of the county town in which they take place. It is alleged, moreover, to be a matter of common observation that, even when they hear of the proceedings, the conviction and execution of a criminal by due process of law has little deterrent effect upon the minds of negroes. They are not impressed, much less terrified, by the judicial mode of punishment. It is, according to the newspaper correspondent, because the Southern whites are keenly alive to the failures of the ordinary machinery of justice to act as a deterrent, that they have arrived at the conviction that some awful and unusual punishment must be meted out to the colored criminal in order that the "word may go on," and the negro heart be struck with terror. Nothing, we are told, approaches the effect that is produced upon the negroes by burning at the stake. The spectacle makes an appealing an impression that the report of it is transmitted by word of mouth over a whole State, and far beyond its borders, with the result that thousands of blacks, who may have been up to the perpetration of crime, are frightened into submission.

If it were true that the negro mind is so constituted that it was only be impressed by "cruel and unusual punishment," such a state of things might constitute an argument for changing the State Constitution of Georgia and other Southern commonwealths, and for reverting to the penal regime which existed in many parts of Europe in the sixteenth, seventeenth, and even eighteenth centuries, when torturing and burning at the stake were legal. It would not justify the white citizens of Statesboro or any other Southern community in setting themselves above the law.

Unless, moreover, the mental constitution of the negro is essentially different from that of the whites, it cannot be true that punishment must be horribly cruel in order to exercise a deterrent effect. So far as white peoples are concerned, the students of penal law are unanimously agreed that terrible punishments, like torturing and burning at the stake, instead of extinguishing, inflame savage and criminal instincts. By the passions which they excite they propagate, rather than exterminate, the criminal temperament. It was owing less to humanitarian motives than to the conviction that cruelty had egregiously failed to operate as a deterrent that the reformers of criminal law in almost all European countries concurred in forbidding a resort to the rack or to other instruments of torture toward the close of the eighteenth and in the early years of the nineteenth century. That the calculations of the reformers were well founded has been proved by criminal statistics. Relatively to the population, atrocious crimes are now incomparably fewer than they were when such officers were punished with commensurate severity.

Once more: though it should be admitted, for the sake of argument, that the burning of a criminal at the stake produces upon the negro mind an effect otherwise unattainable, can Southern whites afford to compass such an effect at the cost of renouncing their own race to savagery? Can they afford to revive in their selves and their descendants those instincts of ferocity which the age-long process of civilization has aimed to eradicate? The ostensible purpose of lynchings is to teach negroes to restrain their brutish impulses. Is it by precept and example that such teaching is administered when the whites themselves revert to brutality and the lust for blood?

A Subject Neglected by Our Colleges

WHILE the near approach of another academic year makes so many persons eager to discuss questions of equipment and the prospects for useful work "next term," we wonder if ever a single person will look in the newspapers this month to see what subjects of true seriousness of the time are reflecting day after day, and then to ask seriously: If there are one topic which more than others appears to be growing in popular interest; which is conspicuously fit to have a place in our curricula, but has not yet been provided for in any adequate manner? We have in mind especially, as far persons, those men of mark who shape the policy of our great institutions of learning from within, and men of millions who are sometimes just as potent through helpful suggestions from without, and in rare instances have the good fortune to enhance the value of their own foundations enormously, giving more in value than they give quickly in their gift to be a liberate, thoughtful response to a growing public demand in education in some new department. And as for the subject, we have in mind Latin America.

A special student in the field of Latin America is not to sit "tin to tin" to study any subject. The Germans know things about the countries below Mexico where we know none. These from Hamburg go to Buenos Ayres if you care. But say in the scientific sense the Latin American field should be made our own. A. H. (let us suppose) consults some recognized authority, putting to him this question: "What university shall I attend as a student in order to learn all that lectures and books can teach about South and Central America and the West Indies? Shall I choose Yale? Harvard?" etc. It is a shame that the state of learning in this country warrants only the unsatisfactory answer: "That's a good American question, involving a genuine American interest. But precisely at this point, where America is in special need of information, American colleges are weak."

We are tempted to enumerate at least a few of the separate news articles appearing in the daily papers at the time of this writing, all of which are strictly within this field. But in this trade in this fashion the opportunity—nay, the unavailability and—for scientific investigation might be to defeat our own purpose. We think that some of our readers will be more likely to appreciate the opportunity to apply scientific methods of study to the various topics made prominent, as though casually, by the press. If such readers do themselves more and keep the Latin American news articles published, as we have suggested above, in a single month.

A NEW PORTRAIT OF MARK TWAIN, PAINTED BY THE ITALIAN ARTIST E. GELLI, TO BE EXHIBITED AT THE WORLD'S FAIR AT ST. LOUIS

Producers watching the finish of a Race

The "Bessie" Steeplechase—"Fox-hunter" leading

Mr. Stephen Sanford telling Jockey Hildebrand how to Ride a Race on "Burnt Hills"

THE END OF THE RACING SEASON AT SARATOGA—SNAP-SHOTS OF SCENES AND INCIDENTS

Saratoga's racing season, which began on August 1, ended last week. Some of the notable closing events of the meet were the winning of the Merchants' and Citizens' Handicap by "Holly Rascal" in which she defeated "Africander" and "Lord of the Vale,"—and the winning of the mile-and-three-sixteenths handicap by "Africander," the winner of the 1905 stakes. The photographs are snap-shots taken recently at the spa, and show some interesting phases of the racing days of the season.

Photographs by Proctor

Members of the Philippine Commission

Secretary Taft

United States

General Hall

SECRETARY TAFT, MEMBERS OF THE PHILIPPINE COMMISSION, AND INVITED GUESTS, AT THE ST. LOUIS EXPOSITION ON PHILIPPINE DAY

The answering of the call of Manila was not equal to the St. Louis Exposition as a Philippine Day. The occasion was made notable by the meeting of United States generals and secretaries of the Philippine Commission, and the presence of the Philippine Commission members, Secretary Taft, General Hall, and Mr. W. P. Wilson, and Colonel Edwards. In the course of the evening Secretary Taft delivered a speech reflecting eloquently with the islands, and favoring the bill, which has already passed the House of Representatives, authorizing the Philippine government, through the commission, to guarantee five percent interest for thirty years on repaid invested in Philippine affairs.

An Illustration from "Harper's Weekly" of August 16, 1861, showing the sixty ninth Regiment, New York State Militia, charging a Confederate Battery at the Battle of Bull Run

An Illustration reproduced from "Harper's Weekly" of August 16, 1861, portraying the Retreat of Northern Troops from Bull Run by Moonlight, Colonel Hinkley's Brigade carrying the Retreat

THE ARMY MANOEUVRES AT MANASSAS—THE FIRST BATTLE OF BULL RUN, FROM THE ORIGINAL DRAWINGS IN "HARPER'S WEEKLY"

(See page 175A.)

exact centre of the manœuvre territory at Galveston. The Massachusetts army, and the other at Thuroston will be called the blue army, and the other at Thuroston will be called the grey army, and will be called the blue army. General Grant, a son of the famous leader of the civil war, will command the blue, and General J. Franklin Bell the grey. Each of these officers won his star in the regular service in the Philippines, and was graduated from the military school at West Point some thirty years ago. While the strategic location held by the antagonists is not exactly approximate any one position held by the two armies in either of the civil war conflicts, it readily shows the two armies into the position occupied by Jackson and Pope at the beginning of the second battle of Bull Run. The blue army, under Brigadier-General F. D. Grant, U.S.A., will contain:

- 2 Companies, Headquarters, and Band, 2d Battalion U. S. Engineers.
- 8 Troops 15th U. S. Cavalry, Headquarters and Band
- 1 Troop Connecticut Cavalry, Headquarters and Band
- 2 Troops, 1st Squadron, New York Cavalry, provisional
- 23d Battery U. S. Field Artillery
- 27th Battery U. S. Field Artillery
- 1 Battery, Massachusetts Field Artillery
- Battery A, 1st Virginia Field Artillery

Pierce Brigade Brigadier-General Theodore J. West, U.S.A.
 5 Companies, Headquarters and Band, 5th U. S. Infantry
 1st Georgia Infantry, provisional
 5th Massachusetts Infantry
 20th New Jersey Infantry
 24th New York Infantry

Smith Brigade Brigadier-General Taylor H. Bliss, U.S.A.
 4 Companies, 16th U. S. Infantry
 1st Florida Infantry, provisional
 10th New York Infantry
 1st South Carolina Infantry, provisional
 1st Tennessee Infantry

Troop Brigade Colonel Butler B. Fiske, 16th U. S. Infantry
 4 Companies, Headquarters and Band, 16th U. S. Infantry
 1st Alabama Infantry, provisional
 1st Maine Infantry
 1st Texas Infantry, provisional
 7th Virginia Infantry

Forbes Brigade General Robert Ford, Connecticut National Guard.
 4 Companies, 5th U. S. Infantry
 1st Connecticut Infantry

- 2d Connecticut Infantry.
- 2d Connecticut Infantry.
- 1st Separate Company, Connecticut Infantry.

The brown army, under Brigadier-General J. Franklin Bell, U.S.A., will include:

- 1 Company, 2d Battalion U. S. Engineers.
- 2 Squadrons, Headquarters and Band, 7th U. S. Cavalry.
- 1 Squadron Georgia Cavalry, provisional, 18 Troops.
- 1 Troop Maryland Cavalry.
- 3d Battery U. S. Field Artillery.
- 4th Battery U. S. Field Artillery.
- 1 Battery, Connecticut Field Artillery.
- 1 Battery, Connecticut, machine-gun.

Pierce Brigade Brigadier-General J. M. Lee, U.S.A.
 5 Companies, 1st U. S. Infantry.
 2d Georgia Infantry, provisional.
 2d Maine Infantry.
 1st North Carolina Infantry.
 2d Texas Infantry.

Sevier Brigade Brigadier-General Thomas H. Barry, U.S.A.
 4 Companies, 9th U. S. Infantry.
 2d Georgia Infantry.
 8th Massachusetts Infantry.
 12th New York Infantry.
 4th New Jersey Infantry.

Troop Brigade Colonel James Rogers, 9th U. S. Infantry.
 4 Companies, Headquarters and Band, 9th U. S. Infantry.
 1st Maryland Infantry.
 8th Massachusetts Infantry.
 2d New York Infantry.
 2d Tennessee Infantry.

Forbes Brigade Colonel F. A. Smith, 9th U. S. Infantry.
 5 Companies, Headquarters and Band, 9th U. S. Infantry.
 1st Battalion Delaware Infantry, provisional.
 2d South Carolina Infantry, provisional.
 2d Vermont Infantry and Band.
 2 Battalions West Virginia Infantry, provisional.

It will be noted that the four brigades of each army will be commanded, with one exception, by officers of the regular army, and that in each brigade there is one regiment of regulars to three militia regiments. The State regiments have been separated as much as possible, and a Southern regiment has in every instance been brigaded with one from the States north of the Mason and Dixon's line.

Map showing the Operations of the Northern and Confederate forces on August 28, 1862, with Addison indicating the Plan of the Army Manuevers. The outer Boundary-line on the Map indicates the retreat of the Field of Operations in the Army Manuevers. The two smaller Enclosures show (1) the situation of General Bell's Camp and (2) that of General F. D. Grant.

THE BATTLE OF BULL RUN, JULY 21, 1861, FROM THE ORIGINAL DRAWING IN
 "HARPER'S WEEKLY"

The reader is referred to the article on page 153 of this issue of the "Weekly" describing the place for the coming maneuvers on the Bull Run battle-field at Manassas, Virginia

Fletcher C. Robinson '04.

A CLOSE FINISH

Illustrated by C. G. C.

DESK BY FREDERICK C. BROWN

THE COUNTY FAIR

From the Presidency to the Senate

The Story told by an Eye-witness of Andrew Johnson's return to the Senate after his Impeachment Trial

By Julius Chambers

THE last hours of the Forty-third Congress were approaching—a session made historic by the enactment of the First Rights bill. Senators, as well as members of the House, were chiefly intent upon the final passage of bills in which they were personally interested.

Under such conditions, a short, broad shouldered, and aged man entered the main door of the Senate Chamber one afternoon alone. He stood, for a moment, staring around the room; then, with a sneer upon his cleanly shaven face, he walked to a sofa at the rear. Nobody appeared to know this stranger, although, obviously, he had the right to the floor, as a Congressman in a previous session. I had seen him for the first time on the preceding night at his hotel—had seen him in his shirt-sleeves, washing the dirt of travel from his face. He had given me a damp hand; but the cordiality of his greeting was unimpaired. Thereafter, I recognized the Senator-elect from Tennessee—a man who had sat in the Lower House in the forties, had presided over the Upper House, and as President of the United States, had been arraigned before the bar of this same Senate charged with high crimes and misdemeanors.

By the narrow margin of one vote he had escaped becoming the victim of a political persecution as vindictive as any since the time of Warren Hastings. This was the little man who had the entire nation by the ears in 1865—Andrew Johnson!

Senators who had voted to degrade him were present in the Chamber and in the same seats—men of unblemished will or slaves to party, not inclined to admit the prosecution of an innocent fellow mortal.

How many, such things had happened in seven years! The result of the Independent Republicans in 1872, far excoriated by the denunciations of Johnson, statesmen who so soon forgot their own intolerance.

And public opinion, too, had reversed itself. The American people had mentally effaced the Johnson who uttered wild insinuations and "smug" round the circle," but had installed in their hearts the fair and brave of him who was a sturdy, steadfast loyalist when the Federal Union needed friends.

The presence of that neglected old man at the rear of the Chamber compared up the picture of that same legislative hall on March 12, 1868, when the social and diplomatic world assembled to see the seating of a President who had become useless to his party. In that very room the menace of impeachment and eternal disgrace was confronted. The individual was prepared by seven partisans, every one of whom, remaining alive and in Congress, afterward participated in the $1,250,000 paid from the people's purse for the perfect of "back pay." The handsome and complacent was signed by Schuyler Collier, whose character, on investigation, discredited him for passing judgment even upon a halcyon criminal. The presiding chief justice was plotting for the Presidency, assisted by a reptile fund as vile as any ever got together in France or Germany; and the names of nearly rich members of the Whiskey Ring, who supplied the money, and of the corrupted newspaper entrepreneurs, who received it, were known to the silent man. Is it strange that he was cynical?

Could he forget the ordeal base with which the case was forced to trial? Never was from given shorter sheriff! His counsel, Stanton, Black, and Evans, asked forty days to prepare the defense: they were grudgingly allowed less—two of which were Sundays.

The trial was a farce—a mockery of legal procedure. The Senate Chamber was the scene of a social carnival—like an "intellectual debauch" or "profane history." Women of high estate intruded, cooed, and fought for tickets. Ambassadors were not then accredited at this court; but the ministerial spy of every petty monarch was present to gloss over the final disgrace of a republic that had barely survived a bloody civil war. There wasn't any White House cotillion; therefore, a daughter of the chief justice and wife of a Senatorial judge monopolized the Executive box, to enjoy the humiliation of its rightful occupant. The Morgenthau-Sprague and the Caprell-Anthonys had the two social factions, and reigned at different ends of the Senate gallery. The crush was tremendous. Historians, artists, diplomats jostled one another.

The sergeant-at-arms made proclamation, as if he were parting king at arms. The respondent appeared by attorneys. He did not come in person to lend the knee before the high chief justice. He continued to scorn the Fortieth Congress!

Then the charges were read—written articles that soon amounted to two! Three sets of reports of speeches made by Johnson at Cleveland and St. Louis were read. Some of the reports agreed in text. A violation of the Tenure of Office Act was made out, because Johnson had removed Stanton, who, with Chase, was plotting against him. A very grave accusation (at the time) was Johnson's veto of the Freedmen's Bureau bill—a bureau that afterwards became so corrupt that the men who had condemned Johnson abetted it. And so on, to the end. Interlarded, contentious to the counsel for the respondent, the mock trial lasted fifteen sessions. Then it took a vote on Article XI, (the kicking out of the inebriate Stanton), and the verdict was: Guilty, 33; not guilty, 18. The impeachment failed because the prosecution had not secured the requisite two-thirds.

Mr. Sumner, after rudely opposing the expression of personal opinions by Senatorial jurors, talked thirty-four pages of a report in explanation of his own vote. A calm reading to-day shows its unbecomingly opinion.

George H. Williams, afterward known as "Landauet," and denounced in disgrace by Congress, introduced five pages with the avowal: "I believe Andrew Johnson to be dangerous to the country."

The old man on the sofa reviewed these facts before he looked to a page and sent the boy to the only Senator present among the "miserable men who had voted 'Not guilty.'" The present Mr. McCreary was aware of Senator-elect Johnson's presence; he hastened to welcome him. The fine Kentucky gentleman was arrayed in immaculate brown and a waistcoat of perfect fit. The greeting was frank and hearty. The crowds in the galleries "took notice," and the incident became the dominating one in the Chamber. The big Kentuckian towered head and shoulders over the stocky, stooping man from Tennessee. Still clasping hands, they turned and overlooked the Senators between them and the rostrum upon which Vice-President Wilson was enthroned. And Wilson had said, "Guilty!"

An eye-stroke of the Chamber showed Johnson that of the thirty-five who had condemned him thirteen were still there!

Senator Brundage, whom Johnson was to succeed, kept out of sight. The Senator-elect was not on speaking terms with his prospective colleague, Mr. Cooper, because of alleged duplicity in the legislative election at which Johnson had been defeated two years previously. Cooper said, when the news of Johnson's choice by the Tennessee Legislature reached Washington: "He is a powerful man, I know, because I beat him myself."

Johnson tried to appear indifferent in the galleries that were soon directed upon him from all parts of the Chamber.

Morton of Indiana had a front seat on the main aisle. A look of defiance blazed up in his face; he was the "Brain de Bois-Gallbert" of the Senate, always ready for the lists of oratory, although a cripple, he was lenient. His long, dark hair crackled with magnetism; but the stoop-shouldered man near the door didn't appear to see the "War Terminator."

The face of Mr. Anthony assumed a far-seeing look. Simon Cameron, just back from the glamour of Russian court life, began to tatter about, affecting to be unusually hoary. Mr. Cragg kept his eyes on the floor.

Mr. Edmunds, or "St. Jerome," of the press gallery, was making an objection to a railing, but, when he caught sight of the group of Democratic Senators gathering about the former President, he sharply rebuked them. In his abstraction he kicked over a lot of law books on shelves at the front of his desk. His colleague, Mr. Morrill, had a new tariff bill on his desk. Such was the prerogative of the creator of the "Moral Tariff." Senator Mor on looked over at Morrill and sneered. When asked why he had not introduced a measure, he answered: "Because Morrill thinks he looks like Charles Sumner—and he doesn't!"

Roscoe Conkling's figure was one that never could be left out of a picture. His desk was in front of that now occupied by

Forwards of the Official Card of Admission to the Senate Chamber at the Impeachment Trial of President Johnson

Stewart of Nevada. Conkling was aware of Johnson's presence, and, taking up a letter, pretended to read. In reality, he was watching out of his left eye the attention bestowed upon the rehabilitated politician.

A hush fell upon the Senate Chamber. Mr. Johnson, on the arm of McCreery, began to move toward the high altar where sat Vice-President Wilson in a chair he had reserved for a few days. Mr. Fowler appeared at the top of the centre aisle, bowed stiffly, and attended his colleague. Amid impressive silence, the three men moved down the broad steps. Johnson had grown much paler. Several of the younger members, notably Carl Schurz, rose to do honor to Johnson's former greatness—as the House of Commons uncovered to Warren Hastings on his final visit.

Mr. Fellingbush, one of "the thirteen apostles of reform," was on his knees, looking back over his shoulder. Morrill of Maine, and Ferry of Connecticut, pretended to be chatting together, and affected sympathy for the man they had condemned.

John Sherman started the next moment frankly in the rear. Their eyes met. In his glare, Johnson forgave Sherman. The two men became friends. Senator Hamble, who hadn't censured Johnson, nudged Brewster, and pointed to the ceiling. The Massachusetts man didn't appreciate that reference to his speech in the House, during which he had descended "a hole in the sky through which alone the titans (President) could escape punishment."

In a grave and somber voice, Henry Wilson rose. To the man before him, the obligation of a United States Senator. Wilson was standing, an unusual thing for him. Was the act a tribute to the former greatness of the candidate, or an atonement for wrong? The cry of a sole recognized of irreparable injustice was shown. The scene resembled me of a jury I once saw condemn a man to death and afterward repent of its action.

When Senator Johnson was seen in the corridor, a little while after taking the oath, there were tears in his eyes, and he was walking on the arm of the sturdy McCreery.

"I feel very badly," said he, with the frankness of a child. "I would wish to shake hands with Hazard (naming the father of the Union) Senator from Delaware, Burdett of Pennsylvania, Davis of Kentucky, Boddlie of Wisconsin, Dixon of Connecticut, President of Maine, Gittins of Iowa, Fisher of Tennessee, Hon. John of Indiana, Johnson and Roberts of Maryland, Norton of Missouri, Rose of Kansas, Richard of Delaware, Trumbull of Illinois, and Van Winkle of West Virginia. I can never forget that they were steadfast when—when my own party had repudiated me and I needed friends."

Holidays in England

By Sydney Brooks

In Democracy, August 27, 1904.

"THERE is one word you will hear in England all the time wherever you go." It was an American who was speaking, an American who for thirty years has been an exile in England, and yet never wholly out of the outside point of view. His tone was one of dry detachment, and though we were sitting at our ease under a malberry tree in a two-hundred-year-old garden, sipping our after-dinner coffee, I do not think what he said was aimed to have a personal reference. "Yes," he went on, with quiet ease, "it is a word of universal use. You meet it among all classes in this country at every season of the year. It assumes me, and it is really immensely significant. That is the word 'holiday.' All English, sailor, spring, summer, and autumn, talking of its 'holidays.' Holiday, I ask myself, from what?" He might well ask. Judged even by the most easy-going of American standards in life in England seems pretty well all holiday, and the annual August reprieve from work is rather a calamity than an exception. Take an American, of whatever trade or profession, drop him down on England, and his first impression and his last will be: "These people do not know what work is." Everything is against him. You have to be old, a weathered, a depraved aristocracy which, while not idle, is too magnificent and too comfortable to take off its coat in earnest. You have, on a slightly lower social scale, the whole vast territorial class that lives in perfection the life of an idler, broken, if at all, by a little public activity—a seat on the agricultural bench, on the local district council, or perhaps in Parliament. You have a monarchy which, perhaps unfairly, does not enjoy the reputation of being overworked; which, at any rate, can hardly be said to set the example that might in time, if actually adhered to, stir the aristocracy from its preoccupation in elegant idleness. There grew the social tone to England. It is natural and inevitable that they should, and yet not a little curious. An interesting book might be written on the influence of the English land-owning class. Even in these days of iniquitous manufactures, when to look at a map of England is to wonder how it is possible for a landowning class even to exist, the social and political influence of that class is something more than maintained.

The influence of every successful Englishman is to have a "place" in the country, "in an old house on the square, or in a (terse) ladder; and the rest of the landed gentry are continually being recruited, more so perhaps to-day than ever before, by recruits from the industrial army. The immense utility of the English country gentleman will not be questioned by any one who really knows England. But, at the same time, it is equally undeniable that the sort of life he affects—the restless idleness as sport, the salmon stream, the grouse moor, the hunting box, the pheasant preserve, and so on—on the whole, one of more or less harmless, and often tremendous idleness, and that the well-to-do in which he lives is rarely apt to regard him as an example of strenuousness. The "country" everywhere stands for leisure; and so long as the country gentleman represents the supreme object of an Englishman's ambition and his social ideal, so long will England be leisurely.

Amis, in an old and stable land, with social standards as fixed as the social functions, and governed by a monarchy, the convention upon an enormous part of the conventions in England are all against hard work. It is the leisure class that rules, that makes up society, that holds all the positions most actively coveted. A sort of "Pony Club" atmosphere permeates England. In America one gets a whiff of it on Fifth Avenue and at Newport, but in England one is never away from it. The number of things, let me state, that a "gentleman" cannot do without being social ready is, in England, as prodigious as in form, if I may borrow a phrase from the present local controversy, almost a whole of forbidden industries. There are some trades and professions that are "respectable," and those that are not. It is an Englishman knows which is which, why a doctor ranks socially above a dentist, why the man who sells should be irretrievably below the man who manufactures—and he, the Englishman, knows it by an instinct which is born in him and which he never examines, and so cannot define. Any one who can tell why the merchant should consider himself, and be considered by others, the social superior of the biggest storekeeper in the kingdom, will be well on the way towards understanding England. The daughter of a wealthy manufacturer's brother marries the owner of the largest dry-goods store in London. Why should she be thought and spoken of as having married a little, though only a little, beneath her? Personally, I do not know. I merely observe, without attempting an explanation, that the man in the whole-sale business is never looked up to than the man in the retail business, that while the former is not averse from talking about his affairs, the latter is only too anxious to "sink the shop," and that social position in England is regulated by a sort of perfectly factitious and conventional considerations more readily left than expressed. Such gradations exist, of course, to some extent everywhere, but nowhere are they so stereotyped, nowhere do they strike so deeply, as in England. I have never yet been able to discover as an Englishman who had not the social privilege of despising some other Englishman, and the lower one penetrates in the social scale the more complex and mysterious and the more rigidly defined do these lines of demarcation become. The point is that throughout England the sense of the nobility of work for its own sake. If not actually lost, has become so confused by the intrusion of quite alien factors that the sphere of action open to a young man of whatever rank is sensibly dream-work. The country, while democratic in form, is not democratic in spirit. It has not accepted, and does not subscribe to, that gospel of work which lies at the root of American strength. American sense, American democracy. Any one who has looked into English trade-unionism must have realized how largely it is mixed up with class-spirit. The working man who knows that his employer drives down to the office at half past ten, takes a couple of hours for lunch, is home again shortly after five, and thanks himself somewhat of a "basher" if he is content with three months' holiday in the year, is not likely to have a keen appreciation of the dignity of labor. His ideal inevitably becomes that of doing as little as he can, of stringing to repudiate on his own plane his employer's mode of life, and of regarding his own as a palatable interruption of the real business of existence. Hence the "easy money" policy of English trade unionism.

Moreover, there is not in England that buoyant and pervasive hope, that sense of magnitude and palpable achievement that animates America. England is overworked to an extent hardly to be realized by those who have not raised some corner of the curtain themselves and seen with their own eyes the really ghastly struggle that is being fought out behind the smiling, conventional externals of English life. Congestion and convulsions combine to make the young man without wealth or influence work out the best part of his life in a barren apprenticeship that to an outsider seems little less than a life of misery. The young man's career is not fully open to talent. The prospect of material betterment, so near and shining to the young American, is dim and distant to the young Englishman. A sort of desperate resignation comes over this country, and there are subtle obvious tendencies that encourage rather than defeat it. I thought of this in a sympathetic of England when, being in a town of seven or eight thousand inhabitants the other afternoon, I tried and failed to buy a golfing rag. The reason was that it was Thursday afternoon, and Thursday is that particular town is "early-closing" day, and early-closing day means that at two o'clock in the afternoon every shop is closed and business at an end. Empirically one can see here, that the thing that is every Thursday afternoon and declining of any figure to sell a golfing rag will stay with me as something intensely English. I sympathize with my American friend's query, "Holiday from what?" England is a park, and there are many millions, too many millions, of Englishmen who would like nothing better than to be park-keepers. We have done nothing to deserve a holiday, and yet we always take one. When the schools break up and August strikes, London is a mere dissolving view. An ascending ray could not force its way through the multitudinous exodus of holiday-seekers. Indeed, in some ways I rank August and September as the most distressing months in the Englishman's year. He goes on walking tour like a Fury; he fishes, golfs, plays cricket, runs and shoots, with real and tingling energy; he makes excursions with a red in the face into making money; he inspects antiquaries with his nose; he would not dream of waiting on a day-book, and he endures the agonies of one-sided holdings with infinite patience and stoicism. On a holiday he is a genuine "hustler." It is only in his less hours that he rests.

Shall College Athletics be Endowed?

By William R. Harper

President of the University of Chicago

THE endowment of college athletics has been proposed. The authorities of at least three of the largest universities in the West have given consideration to the proposition. In fact, it is still being considered. No one's eyes are blind to the difficulties which it involves. Further study of it may prove conclusively that as a practical suggestion it has no value, but until that decision is reached it is surely deserving of earnest study, as a possible solution of some of the difficulties common with one of the serious and instructive problems of higher education—that of intercollegiate athletics.

It may be urged against the proposition that colleges to-day stand in greater need of endowment for other subjects. With the various departments of science and the humanities requiring far larger resources, why should money be diverted to college athletics? It is only necessary to study the subject to appreciate its force, that is to say, to begin the question to use the word "disert." The endowment of athletics will come, if it comes at all, from men who would never think, perhaps, of giving money for the endowment of a department of science, or one of the departments of arts and literature. This point should not be overlooked. Besides, if the department of physical culture, of which athletics is only a department, is worthy to be one of the departments in an institution of higher learning, is it not as deserving of endowment as any other department?

It is suggested, however, that the public is quite ready to pay the expenses of the athletic teams by the purchase of tickets at the gate. Why, then, should they not have this privilege? It is certainly possible in the case of this department, if it is to be reckoned as one of the university departments, to secure its support in this way from the masses. The peculiar advantage of this fact should not be ignored; and as long as the public is willing to perform this service should they not be permitted to do so? The force of this objection, however, is somewhat counterbalanced by the fact, as will be noted later, that other points in contention are the uncertainty of this kind support, and, still worse, the degradation which it carries with it. Shall the university depend for support on the purchase of tickets? Is it a crowd, a large proportion of which treats the game as it would treat the race-course, and patronizes it because of the opportunity which it furnishes for gambling? Shall a higher institution of learning enter thus to the lowest passions of the multitudes?

If it be true, as has been urged, that tickets must be distributed according to some plan, is it possible to devise a better or more economical plan than that now in vogue? Here, again, there is danger of losing sight of the fact that by the present plan, in accordance with which a high price is placed upon tickets of admission, many members of the faculty and still larger numbers of the student body are actually prevented from attending the games because of their inability to meet the exorbitant charges. At tender upon the athletic games throughout a single year in a certain institution is a cost of less than their department. This sum of money is a very serious matter for a large proportion of the students. A plan which would permit the presentation of free tickets for all games to members of the faculty and to all students would contribute largely to a stronger and higher institutional spirit, and, at the same time, be of financial advantage to those who need help.

The most serious objection to the suggestion thus far offered is, perhaps, the charge that such a policy would develop still further that unhealthy spirit of paternalism; for would it not almost entirely remove responsibility from the students themselves, and make the management of the athletic interests a perfunctory thing so far as student activity is concerned? One might ask two questions: If the student management of athletics has been so thoroughly satisfactory, and if it has contributed so greatly to the legitimate education of the student body, why is the tendency of recent years so strongly in the direction of substituting for it a more or less definite faculty control? And, furthermore, if it is distinctly to the advantage of the student body to be admitted in a substantial way to the control and direction of the college affairs, why should the principle not be carried still further and the control and management of other college interests be placed in student hands? Is there really any considerable danger of so great an increase in the development of paternalism as will prove a serious menace to the best interests of the colleges? This frequent raising of the bugbear of paternalism, in connection with every college question that comes up for discussion, tends to weaken the force of the cry, especially in this much as the freedom today accorded the student body of the larger institutions is greater than ever before. If a careful examination were made of all the facts, it would probably be found greater than the best interests of the student body really demand.

An important difficulty, of course, lies in the fact that it would be impossible to secure continuity of policy in any large number of universities. Some might be able to secure such an endowment, while others could not. But would this, after all, be severe? There is great diversity in the endowment of institutions in other departments, which should naturally be necessary in this case; but could not those institutions which are closely related to athletic work have a common fund, the weaker in this case receiving some advantage from the stronger? Co-operation of this kind would surely tend to develop an institutional spirit which is well nigh if not distinct advantage to other educational interests. It is apparent, therefore, that many difficulties lie in the way of realization of any such plan as that which has been suggested, but it may be worth while to note in passing a few of the points which are urged in favor of the policy.

If college athletics were endowed, and the same precautions taken in reference to the expenditure of money which controls in other departments, the actual cost of athletics would be greatly reduced. Some believe that this saving would amount to 25 per cent. of the total sum expended. No one doubts that the saving would be considerable. This statement does not imply that at present there is any gross indiscrimination. It means simply that with the elimination of certain wastes, the strict control of expenses, the more definite knowledge of resources, a real improvement would be effected in the financial administration of the work. We do not intend to reveal that the average expense of a year of single institutions ranges from $25,000 a year to more than $100,000, it can easily be understood that, at all events, there is a field for the practice of economy.

It is contended, moreover, that this policy would remove a large measure of that element of illegality which is now recognized as illegitimate. That this element exists in the East as well as in the West, no one can doubt, after the recent disclosures in connection with the difficulties at Brown University. The adoption of this new policy, many believe, would take away the incentive for concentration on the illegitimate side of athletics. The rivalry between institutions would be less intense. The contests would be lifted to a higher level. The sport would become in a true sense a gentleman's sport. The necessity of securing large returns from games and other enterprises before fostered by the athletic management for the sake of financial success would no longer exist. In brief, the character of the game would be transformed. The evils so manifest today may be traced, in nearly every case, to the financial side. Change the policy and the character of the game will change.

As has already been suggested, the claim is put forward that the work in athletics is a part of the work in physical culture, and that since the department of physical culture is a regularly recognized department in many institutions, coordinate with other departments of the university, it is equally proper that it should occupy the same position in its various subdepartments that is made for other subjects included in the schedule of the university. So long as the most conspicuous work of the department of physical culture is dependent for its support upon gate receipts it probably can never occupy the highest and dignified place which should be accorded it. If the athletic work of the department is not of sufficient value to the department, to the men, and to the institution concerned to warrant its support in a legitimate fashion, this work should immediately be given up. The evils which are associated with athletics, as now administered, are so many that thus being research upon this department, and, indeed, upon the cause of higher education itself. Reorganization of the athletic work, or its discontinuance, is demanded by public opinion as well as by the university.

Why, then, should the statement be made that if the adoption of this policy would bring about the changes that are predicted by its advocates, the endowment of athletics would be fully worth the cost involved. To dignify that which today is confessedly a cause of disgrace and reproach to the college authorities is to remove the incentive which is strong as to lead to illegitimate and immoral representations; to minimize, at all events, the rivalry in institutions which in so many cases has proved to be injurious in lifting the cause of higher physical education in a place as doing, if it can be done even at great cost.

But how is it possible to accomplish this? The most ardent advocates of the policy will concede at once that the charge, if

(Continued on page 1367.)

THE "LIVING FLAG" AT THE G. A. R. CELEBRATION IN BOSTON, AUGUST 16

The principal event of the event of G. A. R. celebrating in Boston was the great parade of August 16, when 25,000 veterans of the civil war marched in review before a gathering of the veterans was the "Living Flag," composed of 2000 soldiers dressed in red, white, and blue uniforms, and acted together on a grand stand. The parade was reviewed by Governor Bulfinch, Senator Henry Faber Lodge, and other distinguished spectators.

left; the dog quivered, took a stiff step forward, halted, crept on, such he felt, working toward the left.

After a moment's useless advance I felt that we had to do with a wily old cock-grouse; and we had. But the sophisticated Dan'l was his match, cutting the invisible bird from the swamp toward which he was plainly heading, keeping him to the uplings and the rising ground of the ridge. Twice again the cock halted, twice the dog froze stiff; but we went forward in vain, the cunning veteran refusing to flush. Then, without warning, a grouse sprang up to my left, and I dropped him with the second barrel. The rear of Charlie's muzzle-loader echoed my fusillade, and a big whirling cock-grouse collapsed in midair, and drove downward, bounding on the springy bruses as he struck.

"Not that frog," said Charlie. "Don't an' see we seen that trick too often. Good shot, sir. That's a this year bird you got."

I was excited; the strain of trailing the old cock had told on me; and I remember that I laughed aloud and talked a great deal and patted Dan'l and praised him while we drew our birds for his benefit.

Charlie grinned. "That sounds good," he said. "I kind of like to hear you laugh an' talk an' carry on. He done it. It's "Don't I?" he rejoined, with a leer.

He certainly did. Dan'l, no longer working close, sailed off into the wind, cutting that upland into slices, and, before I could realize it, he was crawling after a retreating and unseen covey which led away toward a villainous liver-billed swamp on the edge of the woods. We came up just in time for a long shot as the covey, a rattling big one, flushed wild and drove forward. I missed it; I did the shots, firing first into the trees and the second at a single bird; Charlie's long gun cracked, leaving the covey fresh sight as a white cloud of smoke. He did not employ the second barrel, saying that we had our first from that bevy. And that was true.

And so, carrying a pretty bunch of game, which Charlie treasured on me in spite of protest, I took the train at dark for Manhattan. It was a pleasant lesson in many things; it is pleasant to remember; it is pleasant still to know that my friend, Charlie, cherishes a souvenir of that day with something approaching the affection with which he fondles the beautiful hammerless gun which he does not use. As for Dan'l, he wears a very gorgeous collar of solid silver, which, I fear, he regards with more toleration than gratitude.

The rear of Charlie's muzzle-loader echoed my fusillade real variable to hear you laugh. To hell with a man what can't laugh when he gets a old cock like this!"

Then he gravely pocketed his bird and mine, rebounded the long brown loading piece, and flung it upon his shoulder.

"That's all, sir. We have our limit on this ridge."

I acquiesced gladly; and, side by side, we tramped back through the pathless thickets. Dan'l at head, while Charlie talked of the old days when his city friend was alive. We hugged two cotton-tails at the thicket's edge, Dan'l retrieving with a sneeze of dislike.

"He won't touch woodcock or snipe," observed Charlie. "Some dogs in that way, you know, sir. If kind of sickless 'em, I guess, though they stand 'em all right an' stand. It's all I can do to make him bring in a rabbit."

"It seems strange to think of grouse, woodcock, snipe, and rabbits in the suburbs of New York," I said.

"Good safe spot for 'em," he chuckled. "There's more than that here, too. An' as you're my friend, an' as you kind of favor me, I'm going to fix it for you so you can have one more shot."

With that Dan'l was set forward into a stretch of rolling upland set with low bunches of brambles, scrub oak, and frost-killed weeds.

"You don't mean quail?" I exclaimed

Recently, an eminent naturalist told me that in his country place, where he permits no shooting, wild creatures are returning, and flourishing in the leafy sanctuary. Among other game birds, the tufted grouse resuscitated; and, unfortunately, was almost exterminated through overprotection.

It occurred in this way: the naturalist built a high wire fence around his preserve; the grouse, flying by night in their headlong fashion, came into violent collision with the fence. Some he found hung up, heads caught in the wire meshes; others were killed outright. It was a sad ending for the creatures which he had tried so hard to protect.

I have seen the same thing in other parts of the country. A month or two ago I found a dead grouse under the window, squinting as though prepared for flight. Not a feather was ruffled, not a scratch appeared, and indeed for a time I stood watching the bird, expecting to see it stir up and fly away, an absolutely natural did it appear. But there could be little doubt about the manner of its death—a lightning head-on collision with the side of the house.

Twice, in my experience, I have known of ruffed grouse flying through windows and falling stunned to the floor. This is, I believe, not an unusual incident, though, personally, I have witnessed it but twice.

Correspondence

WAR PICTURES

New York, August 10, 1904.

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

SIR.—In the issue of Harper's Weekly dated August 13, 1904, that paper publishes, on pages 22 and 23, three pictures, one of them, "Japanese Fighting in the South," was published in a Publicist of April 23, 1904; the second, "The Russian Account," was published in a Publicist of March 20, 1904, and the third, "Stragglers in Fear of Japanese Army," was published in a Publicist of May 7, 1904.

These are the "latest" from the front, according to Publicist's way of printing pictures twice and fading the public.

In the issue of Publicist's Weekly of March 26, 1904, there is a picture of the Russian battle-ship Chester, launched which is written "Sunk February 1904." Its loss from the daily papers the Chester escaped from Port Arthur August 10.

This is an example of "correct news." We think it would be proper to execute Publicist's for giving such false information.

I am, sir,

WILLIAM J. BELLER

327 East Fifty-first Street, New York city.

[We cannot comply with this request; we never criticize our neighbors for making errors that are not useful. Editors would have to be more than human to avoid being misquoted upon occasion. Only a few weeks ago we ourselves printed a war picture which we had every reason to believe to be genuine, and which in all probability we never should have known was spurious if Mr. Collier had not editorially directed our attention to the fact.—EDITOR WEEKLY.]

"FRANCE AND THE VATICAN"

Boston, Mass., August 12, 1904.

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

SIR.—Will you kindly allow me to call your attention to an injustice perpetrated, unwittingly, I am sure, by one of your editorial writers in the article "France and the Vatican" in your issue of August 6, 1904. I believe the injustice founded on a total misapprehension of the causes and results of the international differences between these two powers, and because I have confidence in that spirit of fairness which shines so conspicuously over the many merits of your journal, I ask you to spare me a little space to point out the injustice and its source, and, thereby, in some slight measure, aid it in its remedy.

The editorial mentioned seems to take as an undoubted premise the proposition that the Catholic Church is a peccator upon the bounty of the French government, and that its reluctance to sever the connection is but the reluctance of the holder of a sinecure to surrender his emolument.

That this proposition is erroneous may be proved, I believe, by a glance at the text of the concordat of 1801 (le Prat, "Quatre Concordats," June 2, pp. 192 et seq.), the four main articles of which are as follows:

"Article 1.—The Roman Catholic and apostolic religion shall be freely exercised in France. Its worship shall be free in conformity with such regulations of the power as the government may deem necessary for public tranquility.

"Article 2.—The Holy See, in concert with the government, will arrange a new hierarchical fabric for France.

"Article 13.—His Holiness, by the power, welfare, and happy reestablishment of the Catholic religion, declares that neither he nor his successors shall meddle in any way the purchase or the confiscated church property, and consequently the pre-emption and titles to such property, and the revenues appertaining thereto, shall remain inalienable in those having juridical titles thereto.

"Article 14.—The government assures a proper salary to the bishops and prelates whose dioceses and parishes shall be included within the reorganization."

The Church organization in France, just previous to the signing of this agreement, consisted of excommunicated bishops and priests whose only religious work was the collection of their salaries, for Catholics neither read, heard, nor followed them, and non-Catholics had no desire for their ecclesiastical ministrations in any event. Yet there was then, as now, a deep religious sentiment in the hearts of a large part of the French people, and as they would have nothing to do with the Church the government had provided for them, the government decided to provide them with one with which they would have to do. But that Church was in existence, the Roman Catholic and apostolic, though its bishops had been banished and priests slain or exiled. The bishops were all inimical to Napoleon, and he restored them to their sees to reinforce his bitter enemies in positions where they could make serious trouble for him. To restore the old church organization and yet be sure that its high offices should be held by his friends was a plan which the Pope evidently thought not unreasonable, for he agreed to it and favored the resignation of all the prelates of the ancient sees of France. This agreement was recorded in articles 1 and 2. Each side gave and each side received a benefit.

But there was another matter not so easy of adjustment. The revolutionary government had seized the property of the Church and put it to its own or private uses. That property consisted of endowments for religious, charitable, and educational purposes, abbey lands, parsonages, asylums, hospitals, schools, colleges, libraries, works of art, cathedrals and churches. Much of it had been sold over and over again, and had reached the hands of numerous purchasers, and much personal property had been scattered. The total value of all this has been variously estimated at $300,000,000.

TO RETURN TO $1,000,000,000. To return it was impossible, to pay its equivalent in cash would have bankrupted the government at that day, and to propose either would have ended all hope of a rearrangement. As a method of bridging the debt Napoleon agreed to the terms of Article 14, and the Pope, on his part, agreed to Article 13. The clergy, then, represented under this agreement, no property, no more "state functionaries" than the holder of a United States bond is a public official.

The problem before the Vatican and France today is to terminate this treaty made between the Church and Napoleon. If the Church would demand the severance of relations, if the property should be restored and complete liberty given to her, it seems to me to be demonstrated by the willingness she should to the separation of church and state in Cuba, Porto Rico, and the Philippines. If France were as fair-dealing as the United States it would take but a slight time to settle the question by dividing to the Church property similar to that so freely turned over to her in our own possessions. If the state felt that the property, or any part thereof, was necessary to her welfare it would be no more difficult for France to get it fairly than it was for the United States to get fairly the lands of the friars. If France will not do this why should she continue to pay the amount so long carried in the budget of public worship? It is but the payment of a just debt, for the government of France has no moral right to take that property without recompense than the State of New York has to take the property of Trinity Church corporation, or than the national government has to take the pennies which will be dropped in the contribution boxes of the churches of Washington city next Sunday.

But beyond the question of property, the Church would keep even her right to her own priests. The French government would let her depart in peace. But that a really free church is the last thing intended by MM. Combes et al., is shown by the personnel of the commission appointed to draw up a law for the government of the Church, and the terms of the measure so far as considered. Not a Catholic on the commission, and even a moderate republican, even a man an avowed lover of the Church, and the most of them acknowledged atheists, and the draft of the bill, which is under consideration, makes farcical any claim the church has to the right to foster religion in France. And as Mr. Combes is not the most extreme of the laity, it is more than probable that the bill, when it comes forth from their hands, will be more drastic still. At any rate, it will not be any milder, and as the bill is reported so will it be passed.

Under these circumstances it is surprising that the Church is reluctant to change her present status, unpleasant as it is, and endure conditions much worse, slavery after robbery, or turn to the government of her country and do battle against all the forces France can bring to bear against her? And does it not appear that the Church of France is so much weaker than the post-sapped creature your editorial seems to imply?

And last; Bishops Gray and Le Nord were not summoned to Rome because of their refusal to a circular from the Pope. Such a circular has not been sent. Bishop Gray is charged with "flagrant immorality" and Bishop Le Nord with neglect of his episcopal duties. I am, sir, MATTHEW HARR.

APPROVAL

San Marcos, Texas, August 10, 1904.

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

SIR.—Permit me to express my appreciation of the health to which HARPER'S WEEKLY has attained under its present editor ship.

A few years ago more, in my knowledge, read it because it was a strong and ably edited paper that gave us things from an entirely different point of view than most of the papers of the time. There were among the many we were vitally interested in and read something of we read that we might see another point of view, or with which we disagreed perhaps, but were glad to hear that on such a typical New-Yorker, broad with the narrowness of Fifth Avenue.

Now we see all the questions of the day, those that concern Texas as well as New York, discussed with an insight and breadth of view that is the ideal for a paper of the WEEKLY's circulation and influence.

In all sections and all opinions are treated as they should be fairly and justly. Its opinions seem to be that happy medium that embodies justice in North, South, East, and West.

At least one Southern man has discovered his subscription because the paper was "so partisan and unfair"; now he can go back to his old pleasure in reading its pages carefully each week.

I am, sir,

COLEMAN YOUNG.

"ANNIVERSARIES"

New Orleans, La., August 8, 1904.

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

SIR.—Permit me to express the profound pleasure and high admiration with which I have read the article entitled "Anniversaries," in your latest issue. The weight of the thought and the perfection of the English make it a model for editorial writers. I shall be much obliged if you will convey my appreciation to the author.

I am, sir,

ARTHUR PHILIPS.

President and Associate Editor New Orleans Times-Democrat.

One Billion Dollars

OF LIFE INSURANCE IN FORCE IN THE PRUDENTIAL

INSURANCE COMPANY
OF AMERICA

JOHN F. DRYDEN, President.
Home Office, NEWARK, N. J.

Write for Particulars of Policies, Dept. T.

Visit The Prudential's Exhibit, Palace of Education, World's Fair, St. Louis.

HARPER'S WEEKLY

EDITED BY

GEORGE HARVING

HARPER & BROTHERS

NEW YORK

A Ladder of Swords

BY

GILBERT PARKER

Author of "The Right of Way"

"SHE SCANNED THE SEA"

Illustrated by the Kinneys

*Post 8vo
Cloth
$1.50*

IN wholly different vein from the author's last novel, "The Right of Way," comes this exquisite romance, delightful in conception, swift and compelling in interest, and written in the finished style of this great novelist. The story recounts the love of two Huguenot refugees and their fugitive life on the island of Jersey in the British Channel. Later the scene changes to England, where exciting intrigue and startling situations in the palace of Queen Elizabeth result in repeated dangers for the faithful lovers, but they finally escape the hazardous favor of the great queen and are united. The scenes on the island of Jersey are of idyllic freshness and beauty, and in the Seigneur of Rozel, the lord of the island, the author has produced a character of delightful humor and braggadocio. It is a thoroughly rounded, satisfying story, written with brilliancy and charm of style.

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS, NEW YORK

HARPER'S WEEKLY

JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION

Vol. XLVIII

New York, Saturday, September 10, 1904

No. 349

Copyright, 1904, by HARPER & BROTHERS. All rights reserved

HENRY JAMES

Henry James, the distinguished novelist, arrived in New York on August 30. It is his first visit to America for twenty-two years.

HARPER'S WEEKLY

Vol. XLVIII.

No. 2499

EDITED BY GEORGE HARVEY

THIRTY-SIX PAGES

NEW YORK CITY, SEPTEMBER 10, 1904

Terms: 10 Cents a Copy—$4 00 a Year, in Advance

Postage free to all Subscribers in the United States, Canada, Mexico, Hawaii, Porto Rico, the Philippine Islands, Guam, and Tutuila, Samoa

Entered at the New York Post Office as second class matter

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS

NEW YORK CITY: FRANKLIN SQUARE

LONDON: 45 ALBEMARLE STREET, W.

COMMENT

PLATFORM: NO HUMERUS

The Herald, for whose ability as a forecaster we have profound respect, apprehends a political revolution in the forthcoming election. "To the cool, independent observer," it declares, "the restless tide of popular sentiment seems to be turning distinctly Parkerward, with indications that the reaction which has set in will steadily grow until November 8 and meantime will be strengthened by the logic of events. 'Revolutions,' said WENDELL PHILLIPS, 'are not made; they come.' This is eminently true of our powerful political upheavals, which no human forces can stay, and when they do come they always surprise the party in power as much as the authorities of Martinique were surprised by the fatal eruption of Mount Pelée." We must admit our inability to perceive the signs of this particular eruption. If any Republicans are going to vote for Judge PARKER they are extremely shy in betraying their intention; personally, we have not heard of a sufficient number to carry an election precinct. Of course, if all members of both parties vote straight we shall have only the satisfaction of discovering whether there are more Republicans than Democrats in the country—but that never quite happens.

Our present, practical diagnosis of the situation is that the chief danger to the Republican ticket lies in the big campaign funds utilized successfully by Mr. HANNA in 1896 and 1900. Each year more than five millions of dollars were raised and expended. A good many of these dollars went, of course, for literature, clerical and oratorical expenses, etc., but a very fair percentage must have gone to "workers." There is no such direct vote-buying nowadays as there was when Indiana was split up into blocks of five, but there is no doubt that many, many thousands of tried and true citizens, who incidentally have the privilege of voting, were paid pretty liberally for the time they gave in the service of the Republican management in 1896 and 1900. Now every politician is aware to the danger of suddenly withdrawing rations previously supplied to this class of mercenaries. Resentment but mildly expresses their sentiment; revenge takes possession of their hearts, and is supplemented by a very practical determination to "teach 'em a lesson." How large the class in this year cannot be estimated with accuracy by one not in possession of the private records of the recent campaigns, but it is pretty big and it is confined within the borders of States where every vote counts. There are two reasons why we consider that in this condition lies the chief menace to Republican prospects. One is that there exists no common peril making possible the raising of so great a fund, and the other is that Mr. CORTYLAND would not know what to do with it if he had it. Moreover, we do honestly believe that both he and his chief would rather be beaten than profit by unwholesome agencies. So there you are!

The announcement of DAVID BENNETT HILL that he will celebrate New-year's day by shaking the dust of politics from his tired feet is the most satisfying bit of news yet recorded in the campaign. "Important—if true," is the comment of all the Republican and many of the independent papers. To this we say that in the event of Republican success, it is of very little importance whether true or not, and that in the event of Democratic victory, it will be found to be true, at least, so far as his getting a place in the cabinet is concerned. In connection with many others, we do not regard with undue seriousness any assertion made by Uncle DAVIS for political purposes. But when he made this declaration, he committed not only himself, but Judge PARKER, who could not fail to recognize it as sincere and final without confessing that he had accepted an election under false pretenses. Nobody knows better than he that thousands of votes which he may now obtain would be counted against him if the belief became general that Mr. HILL would be a conspicuous firm in his administration. Consequently there need be no alarm at the possibility of being duped by Uncle DAVIS. A moral obligation is as binding upon Judge PARKER as a pledge legally enforceable, and the people may depend upon it that he will keep faith.

But why did Mr. HILL make the announcement? And why doesn't he get out now? Answers to these questions are more readily found than some pretend to believe. He declared his intention to withdraw because his receptive attitude, coupled with his activity in the canvass, was seriously injuring the chances of the candidate. Primarily we are pleased to think this was his motive. But that was not all. Mr. HILL does not forsake politics because he wants to do so. The plain, brutal fact is that the newspapers forced him to announce his withdrawal. He could not fail to do so without convincing even the Judge, who is the most blunt of men, that he was even more selfish than reputed to be. And he was tired. Ever since he left the Senate he has done nothing but blunder. His acceptance of the nomination for Governor under the honest belief that he would be elected, his unmentioning of COLTON instead of PARKER, upon a government-grabbing platform, his attempt to bury the famous telegram, his reckless denunciation of Mr. ROOSEVELT as "a fraud"—each and all of these acts evoked a storm of condemnation that culminated in the necessity of seeking shelter. He has nobody to blame but himself. A shrewd man of really notable intellectual capacity, of tireless energy and vast experience, he might have attained one of the highest, if not indeed the very highest, of positions within range of his ambition but for one fatal defect. He never in his life had an honest conviction. Policy, not principle, has been his guiding star from the day he entered public life. By working incessantly while others rested or slept he made slight progress, but the better he became known the more he was distrusted, until at last even he realized that the people knew him for what he was and that further striving would be hopeless. So he drops by the wayside, rightfully disappointed—a living example to the youth of the nation of the unwisdom of insincerity and deceit. He postpones the date of his withdrawal, let us mercifully hope, because he thinks he can render good service in the canvass of his friend, but as we fear we must believe, in consequence with the traditional determination of discredited politicians never to withdraw "under fire," never to recognize the fact that after all is said and done, public opinion is the only ruler that American people have yet acknowledged.

Uncle DAVIS's asinine denunciation of Mr. ROOSEVELT as "a fraud" because of his presumed departure from McKinley policies has, nevertheless, stirred up some of the PARKER papers to an examination of records as viewed in the light of the President's first public utterance in Buffalo. Time was when one had only to pick up any stray copy of the San Francisco to refresh his memory respecting the precise terms of that pledge. But Mr. LAFAYETTE is busy with other things now and we have to turn over the files. This is what Mr. ROOSEVELT said when he took the oath of office on Saturday, September 14, 1901:

In this hour of our terrible national bereavement, I wish to say that I shall carry out, absolutely unbroken, the policy of President

McKinley for the peace, the prosperity, and honor of our beloved country.

It was strong language. We thought at the time that the words "absolutely unbroken" were unnecessary and might give rise to misinterpretation. But the country required the assurance and it was given with characteristic emphasis. How well the pledge has been kept is wholly a matter of opinion. Methods change necessarily with conditions, and nobody can tell how Mr. McKinley, who he lived, would have tried to solve the problems that have beset Mr. Roosevelt. Probably everybody will admit that he would have dealt with the South in a different way; how much further he would have pushed his reciprocity idea in view of the difficulty of obtaining even the Cuban concession is wholly speculative; that he would have pursued the original and daring course of his successor in settling the coal strike we can hardly believe; whether he would have attacked the Northern Security merger to the exclusion of other combinations is a question perhaps, but one for which few persons would hesitate to hazard an answer. But there is no point in indulging in speculation as to what Mr. McKinley might or might not have done and then accusing Mr. Roosevelt of breaking faith. The question is, has Mr. Roosevelt himself done right, and is he likely to continue to do so as he has done? He stands frankly and squarely upon his own record and the record of his party and asks the people to judge him thereby. Judge PARKER, unfortunately for himself, has less personal and more party record to answer for, but he, too, must stand upon what there is, and, finally, in the resolute language of the sapient Herald, the people must decide.

The dago worshippers are at it again. Drummer McKinley started the ball by bragging that he knew all the time that the Judge was sound at the core, but for reasons satisfactory to himself he had not seen fit to let on to the bandmaster and the first flute. Whereupon MEES, FULTON and BOWLES opened a few of the uncounted vials of wrath that they have in stock and poured the contents over the drummer's devoted head. We can attribute their conduct only to a spirit of envy. It was but natural for the doctor to let drop a sly hint that he was just a little "nearer" the candidate than any other member of the band; the dissemination of that idea would help his business; so he said:

We were at no loss to comprehend what was signified by the phrase (self-government) as used in the speech of acceptance. Long before there was any talk of the nomination, Judge PARKER's views were known by the Eagle.

We shrewdly suspect that he might have gone much further, but for the restraint of becoming modesty, and admitted that those views were really formulated by one L.L.D. and imposed upon the Judge's receptive mind in the course of a recent and somewhat garrulous conversation at Esopus. But the World is inexorable when it comes to running a national campaign, and promptly delivered this crusher:

Knowing Judge PARKER's views, does the Eagle think that it was just in him to leave his ambiguous phrase unexplained in order, as it said, to get for Judge PARKER the votes of all who like the course of McKinley and Roosevelt toward those American dependents who would bring about a change of administration—for other reasons?

"With neither shuffling nor shiftness," the doctor replies that "assuredly, the Eagle could hardly regard itself as at liberty to comply with demands sent to Esopus direct"—a somewhat enigmatical phrase which can only be interpreted as a polite intimation that hereafter the World would do well to make its daily requisition upon the candidate's nerves via Brooklyn. However, "the Eagle was not gratuitous, nor had it objection to interpose." There was, therefore, no lack of courage, but, with fine courtesy, "it did not tell what significance the phrase had for its author, though it knew."

Having successfully performed this act of self-absorption and marked a notable departure from custom by resolutely refusing to tell all he knew, the doctor felt that he had gone as far as a constructive journalist should be asked to go; moreover, the discussion was becoming harmful in a public sense and distasteful personally. "Meanwhile," he sighs with relief, "domestic matters press. Why obscure them to the advantage of the party in power? Why play into the hands of the enemy? It almost seems as though this is what the World is doing, unwittingly or otherwise." To this savage undertone the World responds by adding, in brutal fashion, "What kind of a campaign does the Eagle think this is? And where did it learn its political morals? In the school of Pax McCRACKEN?" Certainly not in the Futurity School of Journalism, of which, however, if our memory serves, one Doctor McCRACKEN is teacher. There the matter rests for the present and, let us pray, for all time. Brothers should and probably could dwell together in unity, but for the unfortunate fact that there is not room enough in one campaign for the full play of two creative, directive, journalistic intellects.

We guess Secretary TART did stretch it a little when he declared that "no man ever sat in the Presidential chair more anxious to avoid war than is President ROOSEVELT." Without banking back further than the administration of his immediate predecessor, we seem to recall a President who worked by day and prayed by night that war with Spain might be averted, while at the same time a certain Assistant Secretary of the Navy, who subsequently became a colonel of volunteers, was stamping around in great shape.

By the way, does Secretary TART recall that when in CLEVELAND's first administration there was friction with Mexico over some dispute, Mr. ROOSEVELT moved promptly on Washington to assure the administration that if the friction should result in war he could be depended on to raise six thousand troops in the cattle country? The CLEVELAND administration let the chance go by, and the cowboys were not collected until ten or twelve years later.

Still, in the Presidential chair, Mr. ROOSEVELT may be as solicitous to avoid war as Judge TART in his Montpelier speech has declared him to be. There is the story of the man who said "war" to him after he had moved into the White House. "War?" retorted the President: "war? And we cooped up here?" Well, I guess not? Hence we see how President ROOSEVELT's appetite for peace may be in direct ratio to Colonel ROOSEVELT's appetite for war.

Besides, hasn't the Colonel got about all that was coming to him out of war? He has had his fling; has faithfully recorded his adventures, including the mortality induced by his personal arms; has won a great reputation as a man who would have made a good soldier if his war had lasted long enough for him to learn the trade; has seen his claim made a Major-General, and has become President himself,—all as the result of one brief campaign in a war that was ended by the way before it got a fair start. War has very little left to offer to President ROOSEVELT. It is no fun for Presidents, anyway. They have most of the responsibility, very little of the glory, and none of the promotion. Presidents as a class are sincere lovers of peace while in office. War makes sudden reputations and upsets calculations. After a disappointing war the voters want a change, and after a successful one they want a soldier.

"BOYDRE CUCKRAN Plumbs for Righteous Living," is the newspaper heading. Politics being eliminated from this most commendable and, let us hope, effective plea, we are unable to inform our readers whom Mr. CUCKRAN is for, this week.

And we beg to remind the gentleman who got such fat retaining fees for their services to the trusts that if there is one question on which all the American people are agreed it is that when they go to the polls they need no advice from the class whose richest members for their professional work invariably come from their brilliant efforts to "beat the law," to delude the United States government, and to pervert the noblest institutions of liberty.—The Press.

Meaning Mr. Root, by chance?

Mr. E. WARREN TYLER, of Athol, Massachusetts, directs our attention to the fact that a Boston newspaper declares that Mr. CORTLANDT did not make the political forecast, "claiming everything," to which we referred recently, and suggests that, if this be the case, Mr. CORTLANDT should be set right. To this we say that the forecast appeared in at least two Republican papers in this city and be then attributed explicitly to the Republican chairman, and we took their word for it. We now have the best possible authority for the assertion that Mr. CORTLANDT BETT made or authorized the making of that statement. For ourselves, therefore, we express sincere regret at having unintentionally misrepresented him and, on behalf of the Press and Evening Mail, we apologize.

Give tariff time and it will fetch New England away from its Republican moorings. For example, the cotton-mills have to compete with the Southern mills. In the Massachusetts mills the hours of labor are restricted by legislation. In the South they are not. The Southern mills have cotton at their doors and pay low wages. The Massachusetts mills pay freight charges on their cotton and higher wages to their hands. The Massachusetts mills can only live by making finer goods. But for that they need the long staple Egyptian cotton on which they have to pay a duty. There were glass-works on Cape Cod; they used wood for fuel until the wood was gone. Then cheap Dominion coal would have helped them. But there is a duty on coal, and the glass-manufacturing business has moved to Pittsburgh where coal is handy. If Pennsylvania and the coal roads are strong enough to maintain the duty on coal, New England will eventually rebel. She had a furniture-manufacturing business for which she needs cheaper lumber. There is a duty on lumber, and New England has begun to buy her furniture and house-fittings in Minnesota and Michigan. So it goes. New England must live, and if eventually the problem of living makes it necessary to vote the Democratic ticket, she will vote that ticket. She won't break loose this year, but in time hunger will beat tradition.

HARPER'S WEEKLY errs in closing the Providence Journal with the newspapers "which opposed BRYAN and support PARKER,"—Providence Journal.

It opposed BRYAN, of course; but it does not support PARKER. That is true. We err and apologize. Is it a change of heart or of ownership?

The list of New York papers supporting ROOSEVELT (on which we lately made remarks) is incomplete without the Globe (late Commercial Advertiser), whose editor stands very near the thr—-the Presidential chair, and is heartily in favor of having the Colonel continue to hold it down.

The return of Mr. HENRY JAMES, after an absence of more than a score of years from his native land, is an occasion of considerable public, no less than literary, interest. It is promised that Mr. JAMES is to give us, after he has had time to adjust his gaze to the unfamiliar aspects which we shall present to his view, a volume declaring his impressions of contemporary America. We can think of few undertakings of a similar character which offer, in advance of the event, a larger measure of suggestiveness and elucidation. Of Mr. JAMES as a psychological analyst, as a curious and inexorable revealer of social and spiritual humanity, upon the imaginative plane, we have had abundant demonstration in various books. What the outcome will be when he turns from his realization of that interior vision which has so long engrossed him, and looks at us, will be anticipated with an eagerness not much impaired by some natural misgivings. Of immediate interest, also, is the forthcoming appearance of a new and important novel from his diligent pen.

One newspaper whose editorship superintended Mr. JAMES's arrival, reports that when he stepped out on that part of the pier which affords something of a view of Manhattan, he seemed so overwhelmed with the change in things that he paused and almost gasped for breath. Well he might, for of so much of the "little old New York" of twenty years ago that he remembers best, hardly has one stone been left upon another. Wall Street and all down-town have been transformed; Broadway is greatly changed and its upper part wholly changed; he will hardly recognize any part of Fifth Avenue above Fourteenth Street. Madison Square is vastly changed in appearance and still more in character; the only part of New York that will seem in the least familiar to him (besides Central Park) is a limited region about Washington Square and the lower end of Fifth Avenue. And even there he will miss the University Building, and find his eyes assailed by innovations. Really, it takes courage to come back to New York after twenty years of absence, though the sensation may be profitable, and in the case of a professional observer will doubtless be worth the shock. There is hardly a club that is where Mr. JAMES left it. There is no hotel that is what he left it. Most of them are new, and the old ones that are left are changed in the relation they bear to the city life. There are a few, a very few, families that live in the houses they occupied twenty years ago. Not more than a third of our present population was here when Mr. JAMES last visited us. A few churches and the City Hall are where he left them. There can never be such another meeting of the town in such a space of time. The upward current of business has reached the Park, and can hardly go farther, though it will spread. The great new hotels and business blocks on Broadway and Fifth Avenue are probably as nearly permanent as anything can be on Manhattan Island. How nearly permanent that is only a seventh son will venture to predict.

The first thing Mr. HENRY JAMES did, upon his return to America after an absence of twenty years, was to go to a post-office and ask for a three-cent stamp.

What will be the political complexion of the House of Representatives to be chosen next November? That is a question to which, as yet, comparatively little attention has been paid in the press, although the party managers have by no means overlooked it, but, on the contrary, have already done a good deal of quiet work in doubtful constituencies. As the Republicans have a majority of only thirty of the Lower House in the Fifty-eighth Congress, it is obvious that, if they fail to secure any seats now held by Democrats, and should lose control of sixteen of the seats now occupied by members of their own party, they would find themselves in a minority. It is not easy to see where or how, east of the Mississippi, Democrats can lose any of the seats acquired by them in 1900. They are certainly stronger in Maryland, West Virginia, and Kentucky, if not also in Delaware, than they were then, and nobody will pretend that they are weaker than they were four years ago in any of the pivotal States north of Mason and Dixon's line. On the other hand, it is possible that west of the Mississippi they may fail to carry a few seats that they obtained in 1900, for Mr. BROWDER is undoubtedly popular in that section, and it remains to be seen whether Judge PARKER can pull the whole Bryanite net. With a view to a trustworthy estimate of the composition of the next House, it would be prudent to assume that the Democratic Representatives of the transmississippi region will be less numerous by five than they are now. It follows that in the rest of the country the Democrats must wrest twenty-one seats from the Republicans in order to attain a bare majority of the next House.

Can this be done, and, if so, where? Even Republicans admit that some of the five Connecticut districts are doubtful, but elsewhere in New England they do not expect, they say, to lose any seats, except, possibly, one belonging to Rhode Island. It should be remembered that in 1902 the first Connecticut district was carried for the Republicans by only about 3000 plurality, the third by about 4000, and the fourth by less than 5000. Rhode Island sent to the House of Representatives one Democrat by a plurality of upwards of 800, and one Republican, who had a plurality of about a thousand. The eight seats belonging to Maine, New Hampshire, and Vermont are all occupied by Republicans in the Fifty-eighth Congress, and the Democrats seem to have no chance of recovering any one of them. Of the fourteen Representatives from Massachusetts, four are Democrats, and, if the attitude for reciprocity should play a considerable part in the campaign, the Republicans would be almost certain to lose the fifth district, and might be beaten also in the sixth. It is generally admitted that in the Greater New York the Republicans will lose the two districts—the third and fifteenth—whichever they succeeded in securing two years ago by a very small plurality in each instance. They also may lose the nineteenth (Westchester), where they had a plurality of only 540, and the thirty-sixth district (Buffalo). In the Fifty-eighth Congress New Jersey is represented by seven Republicans and three Democrats. This year the Democrats hope to carry the fourth and fifth districts, in which the Republican pluralities two years ago were about two thousand and twelve hundred, respectively. Republicans do not look for any reduction in the number of their Representatives from Pennsylvania, where they now hold twenty-six out of the thirty-two seats. It should, nevertheless, be borne in mind that the eighth district was carried by only about 2000 plurality; that, in the eleventh, there was a majority of more than 2000 against the Republican nominee, although he was returned by a plurality of some 2000; that, in the twelfth district, also, the successful Republican was a minority candidate; that, in the twentieth district, the Republican nominee won by less than 600 votes; and that, in the twenty-third district, the Republican plurality fell below 2000. Following the World Almanac, we have credited Representatives PETER and BROWN of the thirty-first and thirty-second districts to the Republicans, although they were elected on a Democratic and a Citizens' ticket.

Turning to the States west of the Alleghenies, we note that of Ohio's twenty-one Representatives, the Democrats have only four in the Fifty-ninth Congress. They hope to gain at least two next November. The hope is based upon the fact that two years ago the Republican plurality in the thirteenth district was but 327, and, in the fifteenth district, only 612. Let us look next at Indiana. At present, of its thirteen seats, the Democrats have but four. Of these the Republicans will try to gain those of the second and twelfth districts, where the Democratic pluralities were, respectively, 739 and 285. The Democrats, for their part, count not only on retaining the four seats which they now have, but on carrying the fifth, eleventh, and thirteenth districts, in none of which did the Republican plurality reach 2000. Of the twenty-five seats allotted by the new apportionment to Illinois, the Republicans had seventeen. Their pluralities were small, however, in the third, ninth, and twenty-second districts. In Michigan, which, it will be remembered, gave five of its electoral votes to CLEVELAND in 1892, the Republicans two years ago elected all but one of its twelve Representatives in Congress. It is true that the Republican plurality in the second district was less than 4000, but there is not much foundation for Mr. DANIEL G. CAMPBELL's rainbow-chasing in that State. In Wisconsin, on the other hand, the situation is very different from that which existed in 1892, when the Republicans secured all but one of the eleven seats. This year, owing to the quarrel between the Stalwarts and the followers of Governor LA FOLLETTE, the Democrats are almost certain to carry the fourth district, and there are three other seats which they have a fair chance of securing.

We assumed that the Republicans might gain five seats west of the Mississippi. Many Democrats would protest against the assumption, on the ground that they expect to carry the one Montana district and the three districts of Colorado, and to take also from the Republicans one or two seats in California. They insist that the aggregate number of Republican Representatives returned this year from the trans-Mississippi region will not, in any event, exceed that which was attained in 1892. One more question remains to be considered. Can the Republicans count upon retaining any Representatives from the former slave States? In the Fifty-ninth Congress, they have one from Kentucky, one from Missouri, four from Maryland, and five from West Virginia, or eleven in all. It is scarcely probable that they can keep more than half of these seats. The outcome of our forecast is that the contest for the control of the Fifty-ninth Congress will be exceedingly close, and that, upon the whole, the Democrats have a prospect of gaining from a dozen to twenty seats now held by Republicans. But, of course, if the tide should set strongly in favor of Mr. ROOSEVELT, his party may sweep many a Congress district which at present looks doubtful.

The Court of Inquiry to investigate the Statesboro (Georgia) lynching is sitting, and reports of its proceedings come North. The sheriff admitted that he had no mind to imperil his life for his prisoners, though he says he tried to hide them. Most witnesses recognized no one in the mob, but some good witnesses have given important names of men they saw in it. At this writing the inquiry is still incomplete. We shall see whether anything is done. All forms of lynching are bad, but some are worse than others, and burning is utterly abominable. The worst feature of the race troubles in the South is, that white women and girls are no longer reasonably safe there. So long as a considerable part of the population of such a State as Georgia believes that burning negro criminals promotes the safety of white women, negro criminals are likely now and then to be burned. The truth is, as we see it, that every case of negro-burning impairs the safety of the Georgia women. Brutality inevitably and invariably breeds brutality. Cruel vengeance invites reprisals. The negro-burners are the enemies not only of negro criminals, but of white women and children. If that truth can be inculcated in the Georgia mind, public opinion, and criminal prosecutions backed by public opinion, will put a stop to these savage orgies of vengeance. The leaders of the Statesboro mob are known. They can be punished if public opinion in Bullock County demands it. It would demand it if it was intelligent enough to appreciate the consequences of the mob's recent action.

It is a dismal report which comes to us from Washington, the report, namely, that the officials of the Bureau of Immigration are prophesying the extinction of the "pure-blooded American." This is one of those cases where one would like to see terms defined. What is signified by "pure-blooded Americans?" For how many generations must the stock, of which a given man is an offshoot, have been planted on this side of the Atlantic in order that the purity of his blood shall be demonstrated? Must his forefathers and foremothers all have emigrated to this country during the seventeenth century? Would not the present descendants of eighteenth-century immigrants be entitled to the appellation of pure-blooded Americans? To make good our title to the appellation, must we be able to show that the original settlers from whom we claim descent were natives of England proper? Before the seventeenth century had closed a great many Germans had come to Pennsylvania, and a good many French Protestants to South Carolina. During the decade or two preceding the outbreak of the Revolutionary war, there was no large an outflow of Irish Presbyterians to this country than a British major-general testified before a committee of the House of Commons that about half the prisoners made by the British forces had been born in Ireland. Would we deny to the descendants of Irishmen, Germans, and Frenchmen who came hither during the colonial period the name of pure-blooded Americans? Are the descendants of Scotchmen also to be barred? Must we restrict the designation of "pure-blooded American" to the descendants of English men and women who came to this country during the seventeenth and first half of the eighteenth century? In that event, the descendants of ALEXANDER HAMILTON and JAMES GALLATIN would not fall within the category whose limits we are trying to trace. If the officials of the Bureau of Immigration wish to say that the English families, which settled New England and Virginia in the first half of the seventeenth century, are dying out, it is possible that some evidence for the assertion may be adduced, so far as the perpetuation of the family name is concerned. Even then the blood might have been transmitted through females very widely.

This is a subject about which there seems to be a great deal of vague thinking and hazy speech. Unquestionably, the descendants of the early English settlers no longer constitute so preponderant an element, numerically, in any American community, north of MAINE and DELORE's line, as they did a hundred years ago. They still form the principal element, however, of the white population in the Southern States, and it is indisputable that, even at the North, their social, intellectual, and moral influence is out of all proportion to their numerical strength. The descendants of the Puritans, when rich, are observed, rich people everywhere, to prefer small to large families. That is a social rather than a physical phenomenon. It is a mark of foresight—selfish or unselfish, as one may choose to call it—but not of degeneration. As a matter of fact, a large majority of the most vigorous descendants of the Puritans have emigrated from New England, and there is no proof that in their Western homes they are any less prolific than were their progenitors. It is true that many New England farms, long since exhausted, have passed from the hands of descendants of the first occupiers into those of French Canadians, and it is quite possible that, in some rural districts of Connecticut or Vermont, the day may come when some old man or woman will be pointed out as the last of the "pure American race."

Judge Taft on the Philippines

It is anticipated that, in addition to the twenty million dollars originally paid for the Philippines, we have since expended many hundreds of millions on the repression of insurrection and on the maintenance of law and order in the islands. There are a good many Republicans, and a great many Democrats, who hold that, even if moral and political considerations should be waived, we cannot afford such expenditure. We cannot afford it, because there is no likelihood that the huge sums advanced will ever be repaid. Even if, ultimately, the Philippines should become self-supporting, in the sense of exhibiting a surplus of revenue over expenditure, centuries would pass before the accumulation of such a surplus, if paid into our Federal Treasury, instead of being devoted to insular improvements, would recoup us for the disbursements made. When did the American people authorize its Federal government to put hundreds of millions of the money drawn from them by taxation into such a hopeless investment? Will it be said that the elevation of the Filipinos in the scale of national well-being is an act of supererogation, of magnificent charity? Be it so. But where, ex-Secretary OLNEY would inquire, does our Federal government find any constitutional warrant for embarking in the altruistic business of expending a vast amount of the taxpayers' money in helping an alien people? Even if such expenditure could be shown to be warranted by the Constitution, not only ex-Secretary OLNEY, but his Democratic nominee for the Presidency, Judge PARKER himself, avails that it would be gravely inexpedient from the view-point of our own national interests. It would be inexpedient because, for us to continue indefinitely to hold the Philippines would be to repudiate the cardinal principle of the Declaration of Independence, which is that all just government depends upon the consent of the people governed. These, then, are the three grounds on which an early evacuation of the Philippines is advocated by the nominee and in the platform of the Democratic party. The retention of the islands is condemned, because, first, it is too costly; secondly, it is unconstitutional, and, thirdly, it is irreconcilable with the spirit, if not the letter, of our own national institutions.

Now we need not say that, in view of the impression made by it among many Republicans, this criticism of the Philippine policy of the administration needed to be met, and the Department has again showed sagacity in putting forward for the purpose the man best qualified to meet it. We say best qualified, because, although Mr. ELLIOT ROSS, as Secretary of War, was at the head of the department which has had charge of Philippine affairs, Judge TAFT was the agent on the ground, and is, therefore, competent to give first-hand evidence of the highest authority concerning the results of the measures that have been taken. Mr. ROSSVELL's administration, therefore, was well advised when it called upon Judge WILLIAM H. TAFT, the present Secretary of War, to make and take an elaborate defense of its Philippine policy in the speech which he delivered on August 20 at Montpelier, Vermont.

Even those who remain unconvinced by the arguments advanced in favor of retaining the Philippines acknowledge that they were stated by Judge TAFT with admirable lucidity and cogency. With the exception of the charge that the present or impending deficit in the Federal Treasury is, of itself, conclusive proof that we could not afford to spend many hundreds of millions for an altruistic purpose, every objection framed by the anti-imperialists is faced, and, in our opinion, faced successfully. Passing over the demonstration that what the administration has conceived to be its duty has been conscientiously and efficiently performed—here Judge TAFT was preaching to the converted, for, except in a few individual cases, the conduct of our civil and military officials in the Philippines has not been impugned—we would especially direct attention to what he has to say concerning the two principal grounds on which Mr. ROSSVELL's Philippine policy is arraigned, namely, first, that it is unconstitutional, and, secondly, that, even if it cannot be shown to be counter to the letter of our Federal organic law, it is unbecomingly inconsistent with the Declaration of Independence and with the spirit by which our institutions are pervaded. We take up Judge TAFT's replies to these assertions in the most convenient order, without reference to the order actually followed by him in his Montpelier speech.

It will be remembered that, in a noteworthy speech delivered at Cambridge not long ago, Mr. FITZGERALD OLNEY, formerly Attorney-General and Secretary of State, declared it to be his conviction that, if constitutional limitations are to be observed, the charity of the United States must not only begin at home, but stay at home, and the Federal organic law has clothed the Washington government with no authority to act as an almsman of the taxpayers' money to outside peoples. Judge TAFT denies that the Constitution, as construed by the United States Supreme Court in the insular cases, and by the Executive acts of successive administrations for nearly a century, will bear the restrictive interpretation which Mr. OLNEY would put upon it. He proceeds to point out that it is impossible to reconcile with such an interpretation the views previously expressed by Mr. OLNEY himself in reference to the Monroe Doctrine and to the general foreign policy of the United States. We are reminded that no man in the last eighty years has upheld the Monroe Doctrine with so much statecraft as Mr. OLNEY evinced in the Venezuela case. Yet, obviously, the Monroe Doctrine is absolute, and, as such, is unqualitative, severe, from the view-point of the Latin American republics on this hemisphere, for it is an assertion that in this popular government shall be undisturbed by any interference on the part of European powers which shall go in the extent of dismembering their territory or of controlling in any way their destiny. That it was not merely on self-interest, but also, and mainly, on altruistic grounds that Mr. OLNEY held the Monroe Doctrine to be defensible and praiseworthy, is proved by a citation from an article published by him in 1900 in the American Monthly. In that article Mr. OLNEY said substantially that the "pioneer in the wilderness while he himself finds in the law of preservation ample reason for not expending his feelings or his energies on the joys or sorrows of his neighbors, is assuredly no pattern for the modern multimillionaire, who could sell nine-tenths of all he has and give to the poor, and yet not miss a single comfort or luxury of life. This country, said Mr. OLNEY, was once the pioneer, and is now the millionaire. It ought to recognize the changed conditions, and awake to a realization of its high place among the powers of the earth. It ought to accept the burden, as others accept the advantages, of its commanding position. Its mission, he added, if it has any, is not merely to pose, but to act, and while making its own interests the first objects of its care, to forgo no fitting opportunity of furthering the progress of civilization practically as well as theoretically, by timely deeds, as well as by eloquent words.

By those who have read the article in the American, it will scarcely be disputed that Mr. OLNEY's fundamental objection to the administration's Philippine policy—the objection, namely, that our Federal government is not authorized by the Constitution to engage in altruistic business—is refutable out of its own mouth. Now let us see how Secretary TAFT attacks the position taken by Judge PARKER and by Mr. JOHN SHARP WILLIAMS, the position, namely, that, even if the administration's Philippine policy were constitutionally warranted, it ought to be renounced as inexpedient and improper, because it violates the principle promulgated in the Declaration of Independence, that, without the consent of the governed, there can be no just government. Judge TAFT, of course, cannot deny that the present Philippine government was established without the consent of the governed, in the sense that a large majority of the Filipinos would groan against it if they dared; but he maintains it, nevertheless, to be a just government. In other words, he regards the principle laid down in the Declaration of Independence as neither absolutely nor historically true, and he points out that it was not carried out in practice, even by the men who framed it. Those men knew that in the thirteen colonies hundreds of thousands of negroes were at that time held in slavery; that, in the United States, were governed without their consent; and that a large proportion, also, of the white adult males, being excluded from the franchise and not consulted with regard to the government, could not be said to have consented to it. Judge TAFT might have added that the Federal Constitution, fashioned only eleven years after the Declaration of Independence was put forth, not only refused from reaffirming the principle that a government, to be just, must have the consent of the governed, but expressly recognized the institution of slavery, and provided for additions to the number of slaves by importation during a given period, while it left to the several States the exclusive right of defining the qualifications for the suffrage, or, in other words, of determining who should express consent to the existing national and State governments. The simple truth is, as Judge TAFT does not hesitate to aver, that all people are not capable of self-government, and if the Declaration of Independence makes a contrary assertion, it says the thing that is not. If it were true that all human beings are capable of self-government, and that all forms of government require the consent of any of them can justly be maintained, then, not only every man, white or black, but every woman and child, white or black, should be allowed to exercise the suffrage. This is an application of the principle which, as Judge TAFT suggests, would severely suit Mr. JOHN SHARP WILLIAMS, who was chosen to represent in Congress the Yazoo district of Mississippi by a vote of just 1463 persons out of a population of 100,000. There is not little doubt that an equally large (1/3) fraction of the Filipinos would, if invited, express consent to the government controlled by the United States. Judge TAFT is justified in contending that the Republican party in the Philippines is only qualifying the principle requiring the consent of the governed, as it is embodied in the Yazoo district of Mississippi for the benefit of Mr. WILLIAMS, by making it applicable, not to people so ignorant that they do not know their own interests, but only to people who have sufficient intelligence and self-control to govern themselves.

We do not imagine that all anti-imperialists will be satisfied by the Secretary of War's defense of the administration's Philippine policy, but no man of sense will refuse to credit a man with whom we have made incomparably the best speech that has yet been heard on its side of the case.

Will Russia Continue the War?

THE logic of events has brought the first stage of the Russo-Japanese war to a conclusion. The once powerful fleet commanded by Admiral Makarov is as much a thing of the past as the gallant admiral himself. Successes in Vladivostok are little better than so much wreckage, and all danger, whether to the warships of Japan, or the commerce of neutrals, from that source, is at an end. The land campaign has not been less decisive or less disastrous for Russia. Port Arthur, once declared impregnable, has been taken piecemeal. General Khataturov no longer has any possibility of taking the offensive. The one question for him is to avoid being "Lafayette," with the active loss of the forces under his command. Retreat is his best hope, if retreat he still a possibility. It is difficult to see what more is required to make the campaign as conclusive as any battle of Napoleon's ever was.

One may compare the situation of Russia, in its military aspects at least, to that of the Transvaal and Orange Free State burghers, after Bloemfontein and Pretoria had fallen, and President Kruger, giving up hope, had left Africa forever. The question for the leaders, for Louis BOTHA, DELARUE, and CHRISTIAN DE WIT, was, whether it was better to surrender and end the misery and destruction of the war, or to prosecute it to the bitter end, being every adverse chance rather than surrender. It was then that the choice of the Boers was, and how intensely it enhanced the end of the war for the victor; and a like consideration may induce Russia to protect the Manchurian campaign, no longer with the hope of retrieving her fortunes, retaking Port Arthur, and re-establishing her dominance on the Pacific, since the greatest optimism in the Far's dominions can hardly believe that possible, but rather with the knowledge that Japan's financial resources are limited, and that every day in cooling her so clear that she will, in the long run, be forced to make peace as the alternative to national bankruptcy.

The announcement that Russia had increased the annual drafts of new recruits from some two hundred and fifty thousand to six hundred and seventy thousand is an indication that Russia wishes to push the struggle to the bitter end. The further announcement that the reserves of the four most important military districts in Russia, the districts of St. Petersburg, Moscow, Kiev, and Kazan, have been called to join the colors is another indication of the same determination. The departure of the Baltic fleet, for which she has already been sent to the East, and the Navy Canal and the Red Sea, is yet another evidence. No fleet, unless something climactic occurs, may look for a prolongation of the war.

A distinguished Frenchman, strongly sympathetic towards Russia, has published the opinion that it is hopeless for Russia to try to recover the ground she has lost, and that her one possible course now is to make overtures of peace. He has even gone so far as to suggest that the premier, M. KATZNER, should make a self-sufficiently extraordinary proposal, so coming from a Frenchman, and yet one which is recommended by the close relations which have long existed between the Kaiser and the Czar. It is hardly likely, however, that the Kaiser would risk such proposals, unless he was fairly certain that they would be well received in Russia, and this is just what is most subject to doubt.

The statement was attributed by a German journal to Prince DARTMOUTH, and immediately repudiated by him, that defeat in the East meant revolution in Russia; but in spite of this particular repudiation the view is generally held abroad that such is the case. If this be true it would be an additional incentive to the Russian government to prolong the war, simply from motives of self-protection. But, while there are abundant indications of discontent in Finland, and to a less degree among the Poles, the Armenians, and other subject peoples, while the Jews are growing bolder and more determined to gain broader civil equality with the rest of the Czar's subjects, and while there has been an unadmitted recrudescence of nihilism both within the empire and abroad, it is the strength of the Russian executive committee at Paris and Geneva, all this still leaves us far short of a general revolution against the autocracy. It is still broadly true that, for the mass of Russians of pure stock, as distinguished from recent like the Poles, Finns, Armenian tribes, Kalmyks, and so forth, the autocracy is still a religious institution, cherished with religious faith, and so woven into the imagination of Russian life that it would be impossible to Russia without the dominance of their Czar. Yet there is undoubted evidence of a great and growing impatience with the machinery of Czarism; and the total failure of Russian diplomacy in the Far East, followed by the disasters of the war, and the seemingly petulant attacks on neutral shipping, which have aroused such hostility towards Russia abroad, must fail to increase that impatience. The local governing bodies are everywhere feeling the influence of a national expression and national action, and one cannot but see in this a healthy and encouraging phenomenon. But to the bureaucracy this may look like revolution, and they may determine rather to drag us in a disastrous war than to face the dimming of their own prerogatives, for the ministers of the autocrat are far more aristocratic than the Czar.

It is conceivable that the first motion for peace may come from Japan. The Mikado's empire already holds all the territory sought in the war of 1894, and has gained a world-wide prestige which even the most ambitious of Japanese statesmen can hardly have hoped for. It is, therefore, thinkable that Japan may offer Russia a liberal treaty, that the latter could accept without total loss of prestige in the East. It was said at one period of the war that Japan, in consideration of remaining unscathed in Korea, would be willing to restore the Manchurian railroad to Russia, on the distinct understanding that there should be no more recent introduction of troops and absorption of Chinese territory, on any pretext. It is quite possible that Russia would accept such terms rather than carry on a policy which threatens the annihilation of the rest of her fleet and the further destruction of her armies.

Recent Additions to Our Navy

THE launching of the battle-ship Louisiana at Newport News on August 27, coupled with the announcement that her sister ship, the Conqueror, will be launched at the Brooklyn Navy Yard within thirty days, has directed attention to the additions to the United States navy which have been lately made or authorized. We are still, indeed, far distant from the place which we occupied at the close of the civil war, when we were strong enough at sea to cope with the combined naval forces of Europe, even Great Britain then having but two ships which could have ventured to contend our monitors. Even as late as the beginning of the first Czarist administration—less than a decade ago—the United States were at the foot of the list of the powers which had any pretension to figure in naval warfare. We ranked, for instance, below Italy. With the launching of the White Squadron the creation of our new navy began, and, although a good deal of progress was made in the next dozen years, yet at the outbreak of the war with Spain not a few naval experts on the other side of the Atlantic, including some French and English admirals, predicted that our navy would be found, in respect of efficiency, inferior to its Spanish opponent. Now, on the other hand, no naval expert would deny that in 1907, when the present authorized programme of our naval department shall have been executed, our fighting power at sea will exceed that of Germany, and surpassed by that of Great Britain and that of France. Indeed, an inspection of the figures should convince us that we would have no reason to dread a contest with France upon the ocean. We shall possess in the year mentioned thirty-six battle-ships and thirty-nine cruisers. Germany at the same date will have thirty-five battle-ships and thirty-five cruisers. France, thirty-seven battle-ships and fifty-five cruisers, and Great Britain, sixty-five battle-ships and one hundred and forty-nine cruisers. If, however, we look exclusively at the highest grade of battle-ships and cruisers, the superiority of the United States to France, as well as to Germany, will be manifest. In 1907 we shall have twenty-five first-class battle-ships, while Germany will have but twenty-two, and France but seventeen. We shall then have also fifteen first-class armored cruisers, against the thirteen then being to France, and the six possessed by Germany. With Great Britain, of course, we could not cope on paper, because she would have forty-eight first-class battle-ships and forty-two first-class cruisers, but the necessity of distributing her fleet all over the globe might render it practicable for us, moving on shorter lines, to test her in detail. If now seems improbable, however, that public opinion will permit another contest between the two English-speaking nations, and the most interesting deduction from the figures which we have cited is that in 1907 and thereafter, if we continue to increase our navy at a proportionate rate, the sea power of Great Britain and the United States should be a match for that of the rest of the world. Just at present more battle-ships are building in the United States than in any other country. Those begun or projected number fifteen, against ten in Great Britain, nine in Russia, eight in Germany, six in France, and four in Italy.

In respect to torpedo-boat destroyers, torpedo-boats, and submarines, we have been, of course, outstripped by Great Britain, nor have we even attempted to vie with France. Of such minor vessels, however, we have sixteen torpedo-boat destroyers, thirty-six torpedo-boats, and nine submarines. Not much light has been thrown on the usefulness of the last-named craft by the naval operations which have taken place during the present war in the Far East.

Of what use are ships if we cannot man them? To what end do we increase our navy if we do not contemporaneously provide for commensurate additions to its personnel? The number of men who may be enlisted for service in the navy has been fixed by Congress at 34,000 men, including 2500 apprentices. The men actually enlisted fall short by only 1500 of the number permitted by the act. No inordinate is the aggregate that, even now, when we are at peace with all the powers on the globe, we have not a war-ship about which is perfectly manned. The result of such a state of things is that the Navy Department is compelled to put at least ten vessels out of commission for no other reason than their shortage of men. It is computed that, by the end of the current year, notwithstanding the measures that have been taken to diminish the drafts upon the personnel, there will be a shortage of 120 officers and 4000 men. The urgent necessity of providing for more enlisted men, and of devising some means of increasing the number of qualified officers should be brought home to the Fifty-eighth Congress during its second regular session.

Walking Tours

IN the wonderful death scene of SOCRATES, when his disciples turned to him and asked what they could do to serve him, he replied: "Take care of yourselves; by so doing ye shall best serve me and mine." Perhaps the truth is too easily lost sight of, by keeping our finer pleasures alive and alert, we best serve the world. There are few greater joys than to meet a companionate bit by innocent, cheerful and lively health, and nothing so conducive to both these spiritual expressions as the simple habit of seeing the world on foot.

In our country the habit of thinking of distances on a vast scale has somewhat gone away with walking tours, and yet there are stretches of land as beautiful and as possible as Brittany, Normandy, Thuringia, or Touraine. The Catskills, the White Mountains, the coast of Maine, and, above all, the Adirondacks offer every advantage to that only truly luxurious traveller, the walker. Let no man who has legs and health ever the owner of an automobile. To spread through the country seeing how fast one can go ran claim the denser, the sluggish, and the dependent man, but for a man with eyes, ears, and nose, alert and endowed with healthy limbs, it is a mode of progress as vigorous as a rail-road-train; a more convenient way of getting to a place, while every one knows true pleasure is in travelling. Then there is a sense of degradation in having so much luggage. What is the body, that it should so demand, and so be misinterpreted into? How far can the body project the soul on its lone way? Why be cluttered with trunks, bags, and tea-baskets? The independent man is he who can carry all his needs as a fisherman's cavel slung over his shoulder, and who bravely starts out fasting, trusting to the air to feed him, or to chance berries and roots along the way, until he meet with hospitality.

To travel through a country afoot is to know the by-paths as well as the dusty high-roads, to have counted the wild flowers, and noted the birds' notes, to remember just what kinds of pine and birch grow, and where to expect the maple, oak, and elm, the cherry and mountain ash. To peruse through the landscape of a carriage window at the gurgling brook is one thing, but to follow it along till the feet burn and ache, and then to sit and bask there in it as it really one starts up renewed and refreshed for the home run is another and a far more memorable experience. There is an unforgettable intimacy established with such a brook and its song; its silence, its miniature falls and soft grassy places are a part of our mental life in seasons of dryness and under wintry skies.

To travel afoot too is to know the abundant joy of seeing blood setting the body all afloat, and to get acquainted with the folk in the villages and along the highway. To know men, met at haphazard, down the road lifts the mind from the narrow provincialism of class and national distinctions, and saves one from the fore-learned condition of those English people, emerging from the theatre where they had seen BEAUMONT, in "Anthony and Cleopatra," who commented: "But how different was CLEOPATRA's home life from the home life of our own dear queen?"

Perhaps we have been inclined to pity the poor, and to be morbidly anxious to relieve them from a situation so devoid of accessories.

To walk the roads and ask the hospitality of the chance corner is a lesson in the equalization of happiness. A hale old man of sixty, travelling with an equally hale old woman in a wagon containing their whole cooking apparatus and a tent for the night lodging, gladly shared a meal of corned beef, butter-milk, and Irish potatoes deliciously roasted in the ashes of a little bonfire, while he expatiated on the charms of the moonlight life in terms fit for a juggling party. A blacksmith by trade, he said he was, but he handed over the business to the apprentice, while all summer long he and his wife drove through the land, pitching their tent by night and sleeping on balsam boughs with the fangs of the tent thrown open to the stars. It took no longer than ten minutes to picket the horses and pitch the tent when they found a grassy spot and a spring toward evening. It was a cheap way of living, for it cost every bit of thirty dollars a month to raise their establishment at home, whereas living in the open they reduced the sum to eighteen or twenty a month, and without any privations. Moreover, he looked out for horse-trades along the way, and when turned a pretty penny, and he lost out the cow to his poor neighbors while he was gone, and a charity like that counted on one's credit side in the Beyond. Then the Beyond, one sometimes, looked bigger, and he continued: "There is folks as don't believe in enjoying 'ye life while ye get it. But I do. Why, what did our Saviour say on earth? He said: 'Ye eat, drink, and be merry; to-morrow ye may die.' He was an astute fellow, the blacksmith, and felt the seal of approval upon his career. During the war he had gone South, not to fight, but because he knew the soldiers would want their pictures taken to send to their 'girls,' and again he had been on hand for the chance poses in the capacity of photographer.

The shy, shock-headed, barefooted, round-eyed child of the by-paths has his own stock of ready wit to baffle the talkative stranger.

"How old are you?" asked the amateur walker of one such subject who stood digging his toes into the sand, and then lifting them to let it sift as through a sieve while he gazed into vacancy. "Are you 'out?' the amateur encouraged.

"Might be more!"

"What, five?"

"Might be more!"

"What! I not six?"

"By the way, but don't know the I bet!" and he sped, clucking at his own wit.

The farm lady with a severe countenance thought to good thing of walking, and looked the tramps up and down, and said: "I suppose you like what you're doing or you needn't be doing it?" No little are the intimate joys of one soul comprehensible to the alien-minded. Again, far from the highways and hid in obscure corners are many sabbats, sitting with an almost-visible halo shining and none to see but the three or four who habitually pass that way. Two strangers threaded a field, waving gray wool and hooked on a farmhouse door and asked for food, "Come at! You're welcome, but you'll have to get it yourselves. I can't move." She was as beautiful and as serene as a RELIGIOUS Madonna, and she was cheery and bright and smiling and full of trust and good-will. "Dear me!" she said, "I'm not ill! You can't let it ill. It's just a kind of rheumatism. I haven't been able to move out of this chair for twelve years now, more, except when they lift me on to the bed. But I'm used to it, and I can't say I suffer much. I accomplish a good deal for a woman without any legs or hands. Just open the pantry door over there and you'll see the bread-box. There's milk and butter in the larder. It's a good thing I just finished putting up my raspberry preserves. Yes, I can do most of my own preserving. I eat little things with my wrists. I've got six children, five big boys and two little girls, and they're all so helpful and can do so much I've never had to have a hired girl. My best one is a housewife better than any hired girl ever was. I hardly ever miss my legs and hands. When I get tired sitting here by the door they just sit me in the field where the flowers are. I sat in the hayfield a good deal this July when I had time." To look at the smiling unlined face would almost have convinced one that the summit of human happiness was to be tied motionless in an invalid's chair. There was a strange atmosphere of submission and acquiescence in that smiling, homely kitchen, and no one could sit there as long without an exalted conviction of the power of saintliness.

But there are other than human intimacies to be cultivated by a wayfarer. Who that travels in train or conveyance knows the birds' nests or sees young thrushes getting a first lesson in flying, as does he who follows a mossy slope and slowly opens his eyes to hear the scolding of a mother thrush, and to see four small, downy, tramping birds perched on a twig listening to counsels of perfection for birds. It is the foot traveller only who counts sixty different kinds of wild flowers in an easy mile stretch, and who hears the vesper-sparrows sing at sunset.

There is the glory of utter independence to be tasted. To feel one's own completeness one need only travel fifteen to twenty miles a day for a week, and find out how difficult it is to get rid of five dollars in that time, to know the insistent camaraderie and good-fellowship of the road to those on foot. Whether it was the real glory of being mistaken for a veritable tramp or whether

The market girls and fishermen
The soldiers and the sailors too, simply wanted to feast the light-hearted poverty of their lives on the faces of those habitually deprived, it would be difficult to decide. But nowhere else in our world is there such hospitality and kindness, such trustful cordiality and confidence as greets the footsore and weary when he unbuckles his pack and makes a halt in his tramp.

When at last one returns to the unaccustomed life it is with a heart full of pity for our overfed, overworked, overcivilized, gluttonous lives, and for all poor mortals cut off from the joys of peasant tramps who see the world "without money and without price," with the sky for a roof and balsam boughs for a "wooden gun," under in a rocky pit for a bed, and with the great vast of summer-scented air to breathe all day and all night, and every where the hearty welcome waiting that all give on the open road.

A black and white photograph of a horse race in progress. Several horses and jockeys are visible on a dirt track, with a crowd of spectators lining the background. The image is oriented horizontally on the page.

THE "FUTURITY," RUN AT THE MEETING OF THE CONEY ISLAND JOCKEY CLUB AT SHEEPSHEAD BAY, AUGUST 27

The "Pamphlet" offering the first and the American leaf was one of the 160-paged Shin now found on Internet. It was written by Mr. Han Myung Ki (1913-1978). The story, reportedly a piece of 151,000, was once his "trial" in second time-111 1-2-and was witnessed by a crowd of about 300. He discussed questions, Mr. Yeong-Paeng's - "Pamphlet" was based photo, and Mr. Joon W. Kwon's "Pamphlet" was third. The photographs are sharp details showing traces of the error and finish of the rice.

Admiral Togo's flagship, the "Mikasa," at Port Arthur.

Togo's flagship, the "Mikasa," at Port Arthur.

Admiral Togo receiving Foreign Attaché on Board his Flagship, the "Mikasa."

WITH ADMIRAL TOGO ON HIS FLAGSHIP, THE "MIKASA," AT THE JAPANESE NAVAL BASE, NEAR PORT ARTHUR

The photographs, just received from Mr. Robert Hume, one of the correspondents of the "Weekly" in the Far East, are very sharp. Taken recently on board Admiral Togo's flagship, the "Mikasa," at the Japanese naval base near Port Arthur, Admiral Togo's recent exploit, the defeat of the Russian squadron in the great engagement of August 10 at Port Arthur, is the latest triumph of the Japanese commander, who has been the leading spirit in the activities of the Mikado's army in the Far East.

Photographs by Robert Hume

THE LATEST PORTRAIT OF HIS GRACE THE ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY, WHO IS NOW VISITING AMERICA

The American visit of the Most Reverend Randall Thomas Davidson, Archbishop of Canterbury and Primate of all England, is notable for being the first occasion on which a holder of this office has crossed the Atlantic. The Archbishop's plans include a visit to Canada, and later to Boston, where he will attend the twelfth general convention of the Protestant Episcopal Church. Dr. Davidson has held the office of Primate since January, 1904, when he succeeded Dr. Temple.

Opening of the New Army War College

The work of the new Army War College, which opens November 1, will consist largely in formulating elaborate plans for wars which we may have with foreign nations. It is not an institution for teaching, but aims to make practical application of military knowledge already acquired

By René Bache

WASHINGTON, September 1, 1914

THE Army War College will open November 1 to receive its first class of students, all of them officers not below the rank of captain and not above that of major. Who they will be, and how many, no body knows as yet, because the chief of staff, General Adna R. Chaffee, who controls this new military institution, and who will make the appointments, has not decided. The college temporarily will occupy No. 22 Jackson Place (the building used by President Roosevelt during recent repairs at the White House), pending the completion of the magnificent structure now in process of erection, on the grounds of the Arsenal barracks in Washington.

The War College is so new, and represents an such a departure in military policy, that most army men have a very indistinct notion of its character and functions. It is not a school at all, in the ardent sense of the word, but rather an assemblage of officers for the purpose of studying war problems. There will be neither examinations nor diplomas, and the object in view will be not to impart instruction, but to make practical application of knowledge already acquired. Imaginary campaigns will be fought, and much time will be devoted to playing games of war (somewhat resembling chess, but much more complicated), which possess great usefulness as a means of working out strategic and tactical plans for the management of our forces in case of conflict with any foreign nation.

The most important business of the War College, indeed, is to prepare such plans for the national defence. This is the day of scientific warfare, and the fighting branch of the government must be ready at all times to meet every imaginable contingency. Should hostilities break out with Germany, for example, the chief of staff must be able to produce instantly from its proper pigeonhole a scheme of operations so complete in minute details that a mere touch upon a button, as one might say, will set in motion the whole and supply military machine. Telegraphic orders, ready formulated, will only have to be despatched, and the entire work of mobilizing troops, equipping them for the campaign, and furnishing them with the requisite supplies, will be done without friction, without necessity for discussion, and without loss of time. Even the first steps of the war will have been determined in advance, as well as the outline of what is to follow, and the War Department will be free to devote its entire attention to dealing with incidental problems as they arise.

General Adna R. Chaffee
Chief of Staff, who is in Control of the new War College

The Army War College has for its president General Taylor H. Bliss, under whom are two directors, Colonel Arthur L. Wagner and Colonel Charles Shaler. There is, besides, a secretary, Major Samuel Reber, and the law provides that other officers may be detailed from time to time as assistants. To the direction of this "faculty," its student officers will devote their chief attention to the study of war plans. One, for example, may be asked to criticize a plan of operations, while to another will be given certain data in which to base a plan, which, when formulated, will be compared with the plan already approved. There will be informal letters on important problems that arise, and discussions of questions relating

General T. H. Bliss, President of the new Army War College

Major Samuel Reber, Secretary of the War College

The new War College, as it will look when completed to military road-making, the building or destruction of bridges, transportation by land or water, supply trains, etc., all with reference to the concrete project under consideration. If the siege of a fortress is contemplated, it will be not an imaginary, but an actual stronghold, and the study will apply only to that particular fortified place.

The officers detailed as students at the War College will be the picked men of the army. Under the newly adopted system the most promising graduates of the garrison schools for officers, the course of which occupies three years, go to the "special service schools"—at Fort Leavenworth for cavalry and infantry, at Fort Monmouth for artillery, and at Washington Barracks for engineers. The best men from these schools go to the Staff College at Fort Leavenworth, and the better graduates of the Staff College are sent to the War College at Washington.

The game of war, otherwise known as "kriegerpiel," used to help in the study of military problems at the War College, is played on a map, instead of a chess-board.

Two large maps, exactly alike, are used in the kriegerpiel, placed flat on tables in adjoining rooms. Sometimes only a curtain is hung between the maps, but the object in any case is to keep the commanding officer and his associates on one side from seeing what the other side is doing. The pieces, representing bodies of troops, companies, or regiments, are of wood or porcelain, and are pushed over the map when moves are made. By varying the sizes, shapes, and colors of the pieces they are made to stand for cavalry, infantry, or artillery, or for telegraph, language, or supply trains, etc. Arrows of different lengths placed in front of the pieces represent the firing of rifles or artillery, and the action of signs adopted is so complete that one can actually tell whether the cannon are discharging canister or shell.

The blocks, representing the troops, are prepositioned to the scale of the map, occupying as much space on it as real troops would occupy in the field. Arrows show the direction of marching, and counters give information of the condition of the soldiers. In fact, a glance at the map will show the official register not only the formation and position of the forces, but the losses the men have sustained, their weariness from previous marching, and the amount of ammunition they have expended. Judgments on the moves are given by the umpires, who, with colored pegs, record on a board the number of killed and wounded. A game of this kind takes three or four days to play, and is conducted in absolute silence, barring an occasional word of explanation or suggestion.

There is not space here for detailed description of the kriegerpiel, which takes various forms. It may represent a battle, illustrating tactics. It may be the strategical game, showing movements of armies over an extended area and covering a period of days or months. Or, perhaps, it may depict siege operations. At the War College campaigns of one year's real war will be fought over again in the war game. For example, the conditions a week before the battle of Gettysburg will be given as the problem, exactly as they were, with the number of men in the armies of Lee and Meade and the positions they occupied—but with the arms, ammunition, and facilities of transportation of the present day. The question asked is, What would happen? and the student officers are expected to work it out.

Now, if it be understood that the playing of the game is interrupted occasionally with informal lectures on problems encountered—such as the use of railroads in war—a pretty fair notion will be gained of the kind of instruction given at the Army War College. Beyond all this, the student officers will be required to work out special military problems. If we should get into trouble with Mexico, for instance, how should we mobilize our forces? It is easy enough to say that certain bodies of troops should be assembled at stated points, and that they should march in a given number of days to certain other points; but the War College student will be obliged to indicate exactly where at a given moment every man and every mile shall be. He must tell where the supplies are, whence they came, and of what they consist; he must show how the ammunition is to be brought up and what arrangements have been made for its distribution; and, among a great variety of other details, he must provide for the wounded.

The War College existed on paper as far back as 1861. Its management devolved upon a board, which did the work now performed by the General Staff, but it was not until the General Staff came into existence, in August of last year, that the college actually materialized. It then became, so to speak, a part of the body of the third division of the General Staff. The third division from June to time meets in session at the War College, and on such occasions it has for president and secretary General Bliss and Major Baker.

The general relations between the General Staff and the War College, which are a puzzle to nine out of ten officers in the army, are here shown. It is the business of the college to study the larger problems of military science, to devise war plans, and to train officers in the practical work of their profession. We have no great standing army, like the nations of Europe, and in case of trouble with a foreign power, we are obliged to depend mainly upon volunteers. It is not sufficient, therefore, to train a lieutenant to be a good lieutenant, or a captain to be a good captain, but American officers, who are to form the basis of an immense force in time of war, must be able at a moment's notice to perform duties of advanced grades. A lieutenant must know how to be a colonel, and the colonel must understand the duties of a major-general. Hence the value and the necessity of an education so complete as that bestowed upon the man who holds commissions under the War Department.

It will be a part of the duty of the Army War College to keep in touch with the military designs of foreign nations. At all times it will act in sympathy with the Naval War College, and where cooperation of the two services is requisite, war plans will be submitted to the joint army and navy board created last year. Not until a plan for war has been thoroughly criticized and finally approved by the General Staff will it be filed at the War Department, as representing the ultimate views of our military experts in regard to the measures advisable in case of war.

The Thames

By Sydney Brooks

London, August 24, 1904.

THE Thames is the most beautiful of rivers. I am talking, of course, of the pleasure portion of the stream, not the business. Nobody except "Army" and "Arist" thinks much of sailing on the tidal reaches below the locks. There is, of course, no enjoyment to be had from a trip down stream from, say, Thames to Greenwich. It is something to steam past the miles of warehouses and docks that line each bank, past the Pool of London that Turner so loved to paint with its myriad masts against a sunset sky, past the very heart and centre of the world's shipping, dodging in and out among strange craft manned by the crews of all nations, and so drifting slowly down to Greenwich, where you land to stroll in the park, glance at the famous observatory that regulates the maps of all the world, and take a six-course dinner of fish, and fish only, at the Ship Inn. All that makes up an existence not so bad elsewhere and well worth going through. But to do it properly one needs not a boat, but a steam or electric launch. It is not a pleasure, but a sight-seeing trip, and scarcely lends itself to loitering. To land with the right indifference one must get above Richmond, beyond the bricks and mortar of the suburbs. The few miles that lie between London Bridge and Richmond one may skip without loss. Mr. Henry James once asked if the English could really be said to be dense London. If London involves the Thames they do not, dense. If it involves the suburbs, which are the real London, Richmond without thinking much more better it would be if the management of it could be handed over to the French or the Americans. For here lies this magnificent highway, neglected. There used to fly up and down it a service of filthy, smoking, noisy omnibuses, and it was a relief to get out of them, and such a service might and should be; but now even these have gone, and amid all the congestion of London traffic, this incomparable thoroughfare remains, for all transportation purposes that the province can demand, a vast open space. It is a pity that the present confusion, confusion of bad management, road-rage, and excessive poor dues, I believe, Parliament and the public and the London County Council and the company that owns the steamers have grinded over the matter for years—the final result being that the London and Southampton steam service, running between Greenwich and Richmond,

For the ordinary Londoner the Thames only begins at Richmond, but from there on to Oxford every reach is a delight. Magnificent as is the Hudson, it has the disadvantage of being too high for a rowboat. One might just as well be on the Atlantic. Anything smaller than an Albany day boat seems lost on its majestic breadth. But the Thames is made for the single and double sculler, the punt, the Canadian canoe, and the small electric launch.

As the waters are nearly always flush with the banks, any large vessel would raise a flood. There are, I know, some despicable pleasure steamers that run daily between Oxford and Maidenhead, but they are not the sort of thing that I would like to see torpedo. They look delightful enough in the advertisements, but I would advise Americans to give them a wide berth. There are three or four first-class highways that run from London to Oxford, but more than a party of middle-class English tourists, unless they are a party of middle-class German excursionists or the beer and frankfurter type. The English middle-class rather likes these highways, but I don't like them. I don't like the English and their social representatives, gives every one it meets or passes on the river as an old and intimate friend, gets out at every lock and chances on the torpedo, and since and drinks consummately. I don't like the English, but I like the Thames. I don't like the company, the mere idea of a steamer on the Thames, above the locks, is sacrilegious in its iniquity. The Thames is meant for the individual or, at most, for individuals in pairs, not for a million of it and water than twenty or thirty yards—the way to enjoy it is to dawdle about on it, to explore backwaters and tributaries, to land when you come to any village that looks particularly attractive, to get out of the boat and walk about the bank, and never to be one of a party that is intent on "doing it." You can see more of the real Thames by a day's polymorphous sculling than you can see of the Thames by a whole distance between London and Oxford is a pleasure.

And to my mind the best of all starting-points is Marlborough. It is about an hour and a half's ride from town, and therefore well beyond the range of 'Arry and 'Arriet, who are the pests of an English as mosquitoes are of an American holiday. Marlow is it self a a delightfully typical village, with its broad main street, its old inns and amuse-house, and its sweet-smelling cottage, abate with country flowers. Apartments are to be had in abundance, and you can find your own little house, with its century-old inn close by the bridge and right on the very edge of the river, where the water, cooking, and appointments are of the best. And the two-mile run upstream to Hurley Lock forms the most beautiful of all the river scenery. The level of the river here it has a perfect setting. It winds in and out among wooded hills, past fields and flower-laden meadows, and between banks that the elevated gardeners in the world have done all they can to make beautiful. The level of the river is low, and the Oxford—and what boats they are!—in America you have nothing like them: long, narrow, light, springing to the stroke of the oar like a horse to the whip—and in half an hour a rowing you will be down to the river's brink, their gardens brilliant with beds of flowers, and always something going on in the grounds around a game of tennis or croquet, or children romping about, or groups of people sitting on the lawn, and the level of the river is low, and interest the eye as you row lazily past, and to supplement and widen the emotional as well as the artistic appeal. Such houses, new and old, built with the generous squandering of the money of the rich, are scattered along the river, and the line one side of the Thames or the other for a stretch of twenty miles or more. It is wonderful how rarely one finds a wrong note struck. In this country, where the instinct for gardening is so strong, and where the sense of the value of the land, of phenomenal fertility, it takes only a year or two to burn, and where the new houses in vines and creepers and ivy and covert net of ground into a miniature park. The English have a sense of the value of the land, and a sense of the value of the Thames, they put forth their best.

All this and in its quaintness you will find between Marlow and Hurley Lock. The right bank of the river is an almost unbroken line of mansions and gardens, with an old Seman church interesting, and trees upon rocky ledges, parks, and a willow-lined walk, and a tree of which one can see the whole morning with entire content. And just before Hurley we reached there is a wondrous backwater, fringed on one side by imperial chestnuts and on the other by hawthorns, agavezes and out, always deliciously cool and so quiet and peaceful that I have been known to sit there and marvel at lightning bolts for their amazing speed. There was one small boat in perfect safety and stroll past the lockkeeper's cottage through the fields to the "Old Bell Inn" at Hurley village, quaint, most charming and ancient of English hosteries, the sort of place where one would expect to meet Queen Elizabeth's coach. It is the only way to the famous place of the "Old Bell Inn" where one can see the real thing, a quaint wishing to purchase after nine hours' collection of old brass candlesticks, that twinkle in you from the mantelpiece, and one or two of his old oak referred. But most however, will supply you with food and drink and is bed, but the coffers and the candlesticks he will not part with for any price. The house is a fine old building, and the garden is a masterpiece. There is nothing to spoil the perfect pleasure of the row back to Marlow in the long English twilight.

How Folk was Nominated for Governor

By Homer Bassford

FOLK of Missouri is not yet thirty-five years old. Four years ago he was an unknown boy, whose friends said that he was level-headed and honest. This is the capital which got for him a nomination that was not necessarily meant for election. For his predecessor was not of the Folk party, and there were hints that Folk would better continue to buck and the practice of law. But there was a change in the political complexion of the city of St. Louis, and Folk got the job of circuit attorney, a place of honor and salary not to be despised. Now, almost a year of labor almost unexampled in a prosecutor's career, Mr. Folk is the nominee of his party for the Governorship of the State of Missouri—a nomination that has always meant election by great majorities.

DId politicians have asked much to their experience from what has passed in Missouri within the year. When Folk's friends, a group of sober businessmen over in the wholesale district, saw that the Circuit Attorney sought to be made Governor of the State, there was a mighty laugh. The man was a good deal cleverer man, most of them thought, but he did not consider the fact that it was his impudence to admit of a passing thought for it. Folk was a good boy, he had prosecuted well, but that was all. Folk had done his duty, perhaps a bit too strictly, as his political future would show. Folk had forgotten some of his old political cronies in the rigors of the grand jury room—something of a sin by the rule of "organization" in politics. As for the Governorship, when the time came, he would have to get out of the State, and he would meet a lot of the same people who had Meantime, Mr. Folk attended to business. Day and night he stuck to his desk, listened to witnesses, heard confessions, talked to grand juries closed cases, made up briefs, and, after a time, made arguments in the Supreme Court. Over in the wholesale district, the few friends who had mentioned his name for the best office in the State made their plans. They were the place of the lawyers, men who had not attended many primaries, who knew no conventions only through newspaper accounts, whose knowledge of the intricacies of politics was the same as a quack's of the more intelligent—his visits. Mr. Folks, his office and talking him that they had raised a sum of money for his campaign. The U.S. Attorney smiled and thanked them—and returned to his levels. The merchants were not discouraged. They knew how to raise money, and they felt that sooner or later there would be a use for it. They even talked Folks for fifteen minutes, and then they said, "Well, the name won't do the name won't do at length seem to explain that "all of this Folks talk is rubbish. It's likely to discredit the party." But the wholesale men knew nothing of party. They had a vague notion that the next State platform ought to contain something about a public office or public trust—they had heard the phrase long before, and they, too, suggested to them that there had come a time for the revival of it.

Six or eight months ago there arrived a psychological monster. Folk, who knows his political primer down to Z, went to see his businessmen friends. He said, in effect, that he had his eye on the ground, that he was ready to admit that their early view was right, and if they were now ready to spend their funds in establishing headquarters he would go somewhere in the South and make a speech. He chose a country town, the seat of a public

(Continued on page 1297.)

The Effect of the Tornado on the "High Bridge" over the Mississippi River

The Ruins of the Tivoli Concert Hall

SNAP-SHOTS SHOWING THE DISASTROUS EFFECTS OF THE TORNADO WHICH SWEEPED OVER ST. PAUL AND MINNEAPOLIS ON AUGUST 20

Twelve persons are reported to have been killed and 100 injured in the disastrous tornado which swept over St. Paul and Minneapolis on the night of August 20, causing a property loss estimated at $2,500,000. The storm demolished buildings and bridges in its path through the twin cities, the wind registering at one time a velocity of 100 miles an hour. One of the effects of the tornado was the wrecking of the "High Bridge," which crosses the Mississippi River at a height of 200 feet

TOM'S

Illustrated by Tom's

ILLUSTRATION BY A. ROGERS

DREAM

JOHN E. REDMOND, THE IRISH LEADER IN PARLIAMENT

The reader is referred to an article on Mr. Redmond and the plans of the Irish party in Parliament on the opposite page of this issue of the "Weekly"

A University Training for a Business Career

By William R. Harper

President of the University of Chicago

It is desirable to make a distinction, though probably an ill-founded one, between the phrases "business life" and "business career." The former would naturally include the latter; but it seems to me that the phrase "business career" is too dignified a term to be applied to a large proportion of the lives which may legitimately be said to be devoted to business. A certain number of men go into business-like careers. The number may be relatively small. It is, however, a large number absolutely. They belong to those men, and possibly women, who prove to be leaders; who are heads of departments or superintendents; who direct the work of others, who, in a word, are successful in life, not perhaps in the sense that they become wealthy, or in the sense that they alone experience the real enjoyment of life, but in the sense that they occupy positions of responsibility and have opportunity to develop the methods of work, and may claim to deserve credit for results achieved. It is this class of men who naturally has in mind when he speaks of university training for a business life or career. It goes without saying, perhaps, that as far as the business side of life is concerned, one would not recommend a university training for a man who is to be a shipping clerk, or an ordinary bank clerk, or a clerk in a railroad auditor's office. I do not mean to say that such a training would not be of infinite value to men in these positions from the point of view of life in general. It is necessary, however, to distinguish on the one side between the responsibilities and opportunities conferred directly with a business career itself, or with a man's delinquency in business, and, on the other, that higher life which every man is entitled to enjoy to the utmost.

New Opportunities for the Collegian

Within a decade or so two points have come to be realized: one of these in the business world, the other in the university world. No man who is acquainted with the facts will deny that in the special opportunities in the highest rank (in business) are opening to men of college training. College men are being sought out for practically every kind of business for positions of responsibility. Experience has shown that the college man, although he may not have the technical training for this or that particular business upon which he enters after leaving college, requires no long period of time in which to overtake the non-college man who started in the same business years before, and to overtake means, of course, to outstrip. Here and there may be found a business man of large success, who, when a man comes along, clings to the old idea that a college training does not help a man to prepare for business. Such men, however, are few, and the almost uniform success which college men have achieved furnishes enough to show that this old-fashioned position can no longer be maintained. Great business concerns are everywhere seeking for men whose minds have been trained, and they are willing to give such men ample opportunity to learn the technique of the business which they are to enter, strongly confident that in the end these men will excel. All agree that a man requires less chances for success in a particular profession or line of business if he enters upon that work at an early period in his life. There must be taken that the college man, unless his circumstances are of a special character, shall not postpone too long the taking up of his life-work. But it is even more clear that great risk is run in beginning one's life-specialty at too early a period. The danger here lies in the fact that one's habits become fixed in a certain routine, and only a small proportion of those who begin their life-work at an early date are strong enough to push forward into the higher ranks of business. We read now and then of a railway president who came up from the position of a porter or train dispatcher; but what proportion of conductors or train dispatchers ever get beyond these positions when they have once been fully installed in them? The advantage of college training lies in the fact that the man thus trained is not ordinarily satisfied to remain in a lower position, and that, even if he is, his ability, he presses forward by legitimate means to something better and higher.

"Training" and "Culture"

The fact which has come to be recognized in the college and university world, is that a new kind of training is possible for men who contemplate a business career. This new training, which has already been introduced into many of our institutions, does not differ in method or spirit from the other training. It consists in substituting for certain subjects, that form the larger part here of the curriculum of years gone by, certain other subjects which have in recent times come into prominence. In making these substitutions the college recognizes that training is no longer to be restricted to the employment of a few subjects; and that all subjects perhaps may contribute legitimately to the purpose of discipline and culture. The word "training" has come to be used in the larger sense. The word "culture" has likewise been greatly broadened. In the field of scientific study, as well as in that of history and political economy, great possibilities have been opened. The former and naturally toward those subjects, and now for which a scientific or technical training will be found useful; the latter in the direction of banking, railway management, insurance, journalism, and other closely related professions. Provision is now made in nearly all the larger institutions for courses dealing with the principles underlying these important callings, and the young man who has already made choice of his particular field in business may secure an intellectual training which will be of great service to him in the future, and at the same time a broad and comprehensive acquaintance with the facts and principles that relate to the particular business which he desires to follow.

These two great modifications of opinion, one in the business world and the other in the college world, have come within recent years. They have come side by side, each helping the other to gain ground in the territory of the other; if the word strong is not too strong a word to describe those who so frequently find in the idea that such subjects could be used to advantage in the college curriculum; or, on the other hand, those who ridicule the proposition that a college training is of real advantage to a man who prepares for himself a business life.

How Does College Prepare Men for Business?

What is it in general that the college does for the young man entering into business? Is it perhaps true that in some recent times the college has actually degraded itself in order to attract him? The purpose of the college method to clear. It is needed primarily to develop in the man systematic habits; to give him control of his intellectual powers; to fit him in such a manner that he may be able to direct those powers successfully in any special direction. It is important to observe that the training is of a general character. Special training looking toward a particular profession or line of work is not the province of the college. Such training is to a greater or less extent an apprenticeship. The difference between the general training and the special training consists in this: that the former requires a man to take hold of any kind of work; the latter, to him only for a particular thing. The man with special training finds himself made ready to be transferred from one kind of work to another, or, except in rare instances, as suggested above, to advance from one division of the field to another. The college man, on the other hand, requires in each case a given time in which to adjust himself to the new work, but this technique, or the amount of it necessary for his advancement, he will easily master. All this may be said of the old-fashioned curriculum; in other words, the curriculum by which the college men were trained who occupy high positions in the world to-day.

A More Practical Curriculum

It has come to be the opinion of many educators, as I have said, that the college may take a step forward in this matter and while securing the general training just referred to, at the same time provide the student with a given amount of special knowledge relating to the subjects that are fundamental in the particular line of business to be contemplated. It is argued that modern history could be made use of as a discipline with equal advantage as compared with ancient history. Modern languages, if properly taught, would secure at least a large amount of that training which a study of the classics was developing. Special training towards this more practical curriculum. It was followed by the recommendation of courses in chemistry and biology, which would prepare the way for medicine; by courses in constitutional history and international law, preparatory to legal work; and, as already suggested, by courses connected with the department of political economy, on commercial geography, education, money, banking, insurance, etc., which pointed in the direction of business. Sufficient time has not elapsed to prove conclusively that this policy is a good one, either from the point of view of the college or the student. It has, however, very much to its favor; and if we were to reach a conclusion on the basis of probabilities the case might be considered as settled. The greatest advantage connected with the policy is the fact that the ordinary student, knowing that the subject matter will be of real service to him in the future, takes a deeper interest in the work proposed, and acquires not only this special knowledge, but also a better training in proportion to the high character of the work performed.

The extent to which this adaptation of the college curriculum has been taken is already marked. To be sure, the south-eastern part of the country has been unable to make important changes in this direction. This, like all other efforts to make the curriculum a special one, calls for the expenditure of money in large sums. This has been done by several institutions, and the result is, perhaps, that it may be called such, is well under way. It is also probable that in some cases, that is, special carried too far; but that, upon the whole, it will prove successful proposals no one really doubts.

General vs. Special Training

The whole may be summed up in a few words. General training is believed to be superior in most cases to special training. This general training can be secured on the basis of a curriculum in part of special subjects, but also a special subject closely related to the special calling. If the danger involved in too early specialization can be avoided the policy is a feasible one. If, however, in the use of special subjects the teacher of the student fails to secure the general training the expenditure of money will be in vain, and the student will be a failure. It is a large contingency. It is asked, which will not succeed in the institution and fail in the world. It may succeed likewise in the case of one individual and fail in the case of another individual. Everything depends upon the spirit with which the work of the director is carried out, and it is only saying that it is necessary to set out all work of an educational character.

A Day with the Highland Stag

By James Barnes

I STOOD in the doorway of the little railway station overlooking the broad sweep of meadow that ran down to the rocky shore of the Firth. On the other side of the blue water rose the undulating hills of the Black Isle, dotted with the century-old stone farmhouses and the squares of yellow corn land. In the farther end of the platform stood a stocky, red-faced little man, surrounded by the various impedimenta of the British sportsman.

Presently another man came from the waiting-room and joined him, and the two compared their notices. The train was late; it was always late. I had been informed; but the short man seemed rather put out at the delay. When the stationmaster appeared he walked over to him with an air of irritated importance; there was another remission of time-pieces. If the stationmaster had been a Frenchman he would have shrugged his shoulders; but, being a Scotsman, he only smiled a non-committal smile in the depth of his red whiskers.

"She'll be comin' the noo," he said, closing his big silver watch with a snap. And at that moment the pungent staccato whistle of the little engine was heard a mile or so down the road. A few minutes later the train rolled in. A couple of servants emerged from somewhere and loaded bags and guncases and slung straps into a compartment, and my two sporting friends, in the glory of checked knickerbockers and deer-stalker caps, entered another. I followed them. I knew from a few words I had overheard that their mission up the line was the same as mine, and that they were going back into the Highlands after stag. It was my first experience, and I was as ignorant of the subject as a red Indian might be of grand opera, and I hoped that my companions might let drop something in their conversation that would give me a point or two. A few miles beyond we arrived, and I hoped to be joined on the train by my host, at whose shooting lodge I had been invited to stay and who had promised to fit me out with all the necessary paraphernalia, but the talk of the two sports-men gave me little information.

"How many heads did you get last year?" asked the tall man of the shorter.

"Thirty-eight. It was an off season, but there were five males," responded the red-faced one, puffing of his pipe. It sounded like the record of a game of cards. In my mind's eye I saw what I imagined to be a Highland deer-stalking party—a well-laid lunchcon-table ensconced behind a well-trimmed hedge, within an hour's walk, or so, of one of the great ancestral castles, a comfortable chair placed in a sheltered blind, and a stream of smoking, half-tame animals driven across the open by a line of noisy butlers; and, to tell the truth, my gorge rose at the picture. The hard day's labor of the American still-hunt came to me, the Indian guide cautioning silence, the great depths and solitude of the forest, the snail of man and the knowledge of woodcraft pitted against the cunning of the wild beast, whose protection is his ferocity, and his instinct in seeking danger. A pily rose in my heart for the smoking, bagged animals, driven up to afford moving targets for the comfortably seated sportsman, with his mind on the grunting hunch, while an obsequious leader standing near him to lead his extra rifle. Somehow I did not think I should like it.

There is a great deal in the recorded big bags of the English sportsman that we read of in the papers that goes against the grain of the American love of plain and forest, and I confessed frankly to myself that I had all this prejudice. However, it was to be a new experience, and new experiences are welcome.

At another little station, a hall an hour or so farther up the line, I saw my host, standing on the platform, and hastened out to join him. As we entered another compartment I spoke of my friends in the one I had just left. The short man, I was informed, owned a "bored" some miles beyond Sir Charles's, and cared for nothing else in the world but stags, rearing all his grouse moors, and confining his sport entirely to the rifle.

I determined to conceal my ignorance and ask no questions. As we lunched along past little villages and scattered farms, I did inquire as to the ownership of the land, and in the next matter of fact way my host replied that it was his. At last I asked him how large was his estate, and the reply quite staggered me—about three hundred and forty thousand acres—and Scotland a little country! We got out of host at a small neatly kept village of about fifty houses, where "the land," as all Scotch landholders are called, was our rendezvous by a crowd who gave him welcome, old friends and tenants. He had a kindly word for each. Two deer-stalking, bag, big gentlemen—gamekeepers I found out—immediately took charge of my baggage, and I saw three or four rifles in cases and leather gun-cases.

Beyond the station was standing what is known in Scotland as a "game cart," with two fine horses and a coachman in livery on

"I still kept my glass upon the staring line hundreds of feet before me"

"I should constantly peered out"

"Suddenly one of the stags lifted his head" the box. As I stood looking about me, a little swarmed old man of perhaps seventy came up and spoke to my host, who grasped him by the hand.

"Ah, surely, how are you?" he said.

The old man looked up with pleasure, his dim old eyes fairly sparkling. "Verre aed, Sir Charles; and I'm glad to see you, Sir Charles."

"As my friend loaded one of the bags into the cart he found time to whisper to me—

"Take a look at this old chap. He was the best man in the Highlands in his time, and my father's head keeper for fifty years."

I looked at the little dried-up figure leaning on his stick, and could scarce imagine it. The old man returned my glance with equal interest.

"It's a wild country yur'e gonn' into, sir," he said, "and I warn't no wum' w' ye, but I'm too auld for the hills now." He drew a long sigh.

His words had come to me like a revelation. It was the first shock of the upsetting of my preconceived ideas. I had seen little or no "wild" country since I had been in Scotland. I was to learn. We climbed into the cart and the horses started. We went by a little inn overshadowed by two gigantic oak trees. From the signboard swung the coat of arms of my friend's family. The castle at which he lived and all this land, swarming bird had belonged to his ancestors for over nine hundred years. Two old gaffers sitting in the sun on a bench boded their heads and touched their hats as we drove by. We crossed an old stone bridge over a roaring salmon river and followed the wide road along its eastern bank, a plunge in the river, or the hills, and its closely built-in main street and its stone cottages and little flower-filled gardens, into the country. There were a few scattered farms and then the purple stretches of heather. Far to the north lay a blue line of jagged hills.

For an hour we sat at a pace, passing now and then neat little houses and once a tiny isolated castle with a flag floating from the battlements, bodes intent to shooting or fishing tenants, and all belonging to my friend. And then the country began to look wilder. The blue hills grew nearer. I could see that the crevices rose into the overhanging clouds. For some miles now we had passed no habitation.

"How much farther have we got to go?" I asked as we turned abruptly out of a little forest of stunted bushes and once more saw the river roaring at our feet.

"About three hours," he replied. And again I received my second shock. The vision of the lunch-table grew fainter, my prejudices began to vanish slowly. In the next hour they had left me entirely. With a rattling and slipping of the wheels we planged down a steep incline and plashed across a rocky ford with the swirling water rising to the hubs. They on the other side got out and walked up a stiff incline, and there it was that the Highlands fairly gripped me.

It is only the hand of man that throws back the curtains; it is the discordant note suggested by signs of his presence that brings us to the realization of the place we live in. But here, except for the narrow winding road ahead, was the same country that had been known to the gray wolf, to the wild, killed savage, the precursor of the sturdy stock that still owns the land and loves it, and to the "antlered monarch of the glen," who still roams untrammelled from sea to sea.

Before us stretched a narrow valley, and on each side rose the towering hills. Along the bank of the river, that had now dwindled to what we would call a good-sized mountain trout-stream, were narrow stretches of meadow grass and stunted birches, and where they ended there rose, more humbled or a thousand feet above, the black billiards, with their bare, wind-swept tops. The clouds ahead of us parted, and I saw the gleaming snow on the top of a head-shouldered, craggy peak. I looked up into the clear air, but there sailed two water-waving doves—the eagles!

The glamour, the charm of the wilderness, took hold of me. I looked at my friend sitting opposite to me on the seat; he was drawing in long breaths of sheer enjoyment. For some moments we had not spoken. His life beside him among the travelled ways of men in long robes and powdered business dresses; it is but an infrequent excursion he makes to his native heath. I was surprised when he told me that it was some years since he had been to this particular spot in his dream.

Suddenly the keeper who was riding with the driver pointed at the hillside above us.

"Beasts! Sir Charles," he said.

At a word the horses were stopped. I looked up, but I could see nothing. "Beasts," I had learned, in Scotland is the generic term for the royal game. But do my best I could discern no sign of any living thing.

"They're all kinds," said Sir Charles, speaking first.

"And calves," added the keeper, with the glass still to his eye.

I begged for a squint. And then at last I saw them. Twelve or fifteen graceful deer, with their wide-spreading antlers, were looking down at us from at least a mile away. The glass brought them very near. They stood motionless as statues.

"They'll never take their eyes off of us no longer as we stand still," said Sir Charles, "but if one of us got out and took a step into the heather they'd be over the top in an instant."

So I was learning! The quarry was no so tame, after all! But keen, tingling delight of the sportsman grew in my veins. But we were moving on again, with miles of the valley before us. The evening shadows fell in the deep hollows and glens, the air grew keen and supple. But all journeys have an end. We came at last to a little broader bit of meadow land, crossed the stream once more, and there lay the lodge, a collection of two or three little stone houses, and from the chimney of the larger blue smoke was lifting straight into the air. A tall, lank man in knickerbockers strode down to meet us. His delight and pleasure at seeing the house was manifest in every line of his sunken and lined face. It showed in the tones of his voice as he answered questions. I noticed that my friend spoke to him in the same accents as his own. The man's replies were short and given quickly. Yes, there were some beasts at Glen Shuir and more seen at Stron Dain this week or so. (The black and white stag he said they saw a thousand feet above the little roaring stream he pointed out some awing objects. Above the glasses came into play, but they were "all kinds." In the waning sunlight that still crowned the top they could be seen browsing on the hillside grass and occasionally raising their heads and gazing down at the valley.) "Prepare for a hard day to-morrow," said Sir Charles, as he entered the lodge.

There was no luxury here. It was a plainly furnished little shooting-box, with pine partitions and rough furniture. The smell of cooking that came from the kitchen remained no day and it was hungry. We took a short walk back up the hillside, and then went to bed early, with dreams of the morrow crowding fast.

Long before dawn we were awakened, and breakfasted by candle-light. I suppose there is nothing so exhilarating in the world as the glimpse of a new country in the gray half-light of the morning. At all events, as we stepped out through the doorway on to the dew-laden grass and felt the chill of the past night in the still air, my heart began to beat excitedly. The sky was lightening, the sun was coming up, and the water of the stream played music that only the true love of the wilderness fully understands.

Donald, the tall keeper who had met us the evening before, had been assigned to me as my guide, counselor, and friend. The first that he had been picked out for the kitchen remained no day and in a bag out luncheon. A long telescope in a leather case and my camera completed his load. Another spy-glass was given to me and a climbing stick, like an alpenstock, with a crooked handle.

Sir Charles was going in a different direction, and a bill post waited at the corner of the house to take him part way on his road. Wishing me good luck, and with instructions to Donald to be sure that I got a shot, he left me.

Following the keeper's long stride I started up the hill. For an hour we walked on in silence, my whole endeavor being to keep pace with Donald, and as a matter of pride to hide the fact that the pace was telling on me. But before we got to the crest of the hill I had to ask for a halt, and I sat down in the heather blowing like a porpoise. Donald waited beside me. As I recovered I tried to sign the keeper of my fatigue, but he only said: "Just below, in a deep hollow, is a little loch of the clear, blue water. A stream trickled out of it and tinkled nearly away, dropping in rills and waterfalls to the edge of the cliff a half a mile away, where it plunged off into a trailing film of mist."

Donald said that he had been above the hills, but the loch was permeated with a pink, all-pervading light. It seemed to me that I could have sat there an hour in absolute enjoyment. Suddenly Donald began to crouch. He did so gradually until he was on his knees in the heather.

"Beasts!" said Sir Charles, as he took the telescope from its leather case and pulled it out to its full length of two feet or more.

I looked in the direction that he slowly pointed it. Two black dots against the sky-line, almost a mile away! I just saw them when they disappeared.

"They winded us, sir," he said, sliding the telescope with a snap. I then noticed that a slight breeze had sprung up, blowing from the high hills to the northward.

"We better be going on, sir," said my guide, presently, and in a few minutes we were climbing up once more. The grass and heather grew sparse and thin, and at last we came out on the top, a bare space covered with gray stones and heather, with here and there woody tufts of moss-hags. Following Donald's example I bent my back and crouched after him until we came to the divide overlooking the valley. The stream ran like a thread through the narrow green meadows below.

The highland stag feeds at night, and it was just at the hour when dawn begins that he leaves the low ground to slink up his mountain fastnesses. Once more the telescope came out. Donald had said nothing, but I saw that his glass was leveled keenly at a spot below us. I focused mine at last, and my heart began a sudden hurried beating. In a long, single line I could make out a score or more of dark-brown objects moving up the hillside. As the light broadened they became more defined. I could plainly see horns, and there a pair of branching antlers. Donald shook his head doubtfully.

"I am afraid, sir," he half-whispered, "they'd wind us if we tried to get before them. But, then," he added, "I'll do my best to turn them if you stay here and try to get to the top of the hill, the glen. There are one or two good beats there, sir."

With a few directions as to what I should do he left me and I saw him, with body bent, on a swift trot, make off until he disappeared with a sudden drop behind the crest of the hill. I had taken a short ride from the case, but still kept my glass close to my eye. The wind was blowing from the north, and I saw a white tail here and there. They were away, bounding swiftly over gullies and hollows, until a shoulder of the hill hid them from view. A few minutes more would have passed, but I was so full of the informed me that with the wind blowing as it was it would be impossible to get near any of the beasts in the valley to the south of us. He searched the corvess and hollows with his glass for some minutes, and delivered himself as follows:

"There're a good many birds scattered in the bracken, and there's a little switch-bone lying down here near you bird-er," he said, pointing.

The exercise of climbing had made me exceedingly warm, and now the wind that was freshening every instant was chilling me to the marrow, and I asked if there was a place less exposed from which we could see.

"We might cross to the other side," suggested Donald, much in the matter-of-fact tone that a man might suggest the shady side of the street. I looked across the valley. The hills even topped the ones that we were on; it was a matter for consideration. But it was getting too cold for me, and we stopped over the brink and began slowly to work our way down the almost precipitous side. We had gone but one hundred yards when the keeper raised his hand and began the slow crouching that I had noticed before was a signal for game in sight. When we were both prone in the damp moss Donald once more began to spy. Directly before us, feeding among the moss-bags, was a young stag with a fairly good set of horns. He was grazing up hill directly toward me, but as we watched him he turned and walked down the hill. Immediately Donald began to crawl, and I followed in his wake. We reached the shelter of a little hollow, and Donald cautiously peered out over the heather tops. As I crept up beside him he placed his lips so close to my ear that I could not help perceiving that he smoked very strong tobacco, and he whispered:

"There's a hind and calf lying down here within two hundred yards. We'll wait more to the right, or I'll they'll get the wind of us."

Again mere crawling through soaked moss and crumpling bracken, and then we halted. This time, after the inspection, Donald's whisper showed excitement, and he placed his lips so close to my ear that I could not help perceiving that he smoked very strong tobacco, and he whispered:

"There're three fine beasts, sir! Right ahead, lying down."

It took me some time to find them, for there was nothing but their antlers visible. Donald kept up a running, whispered comment on the situation, adopting a manner of familiar companionship, devoid of the least shade of either assumption or deference. He emphasized his whispers with gentle pressure of his hand upon my shoulder.

"We cannot move on," he said. "We'll have to stay here till they get out of the bracken. It won't be long now—they'll be moving. The little devil we saw first is working down toward them."

How Folk was Nominated for Governor

(Continued from page 1288.)

gathering, and there he told the plain people and the whistled farmer, fresh from the fields, that he believed in the prosecution of criminals, that party allegiance was a good thing as all organization is good, but that a man who stole from the public he had sworn to serve belonged to no party; that he was neither Democrat nor Republican; but came from the people, and his friends. There had been some criticism of Folk because he had condemned men of his own party, men who had made laws for the city and stolen for money while they were sitting in the city's councils and walking for streets with head in air. But when he told his former audience that thieves belonged to no party, that he did not want their votes or support, he had a hearing.

Then Mr. Folk went back to his office. He had convicted eight or ten men, but each grand jury brought up a new batch. One man, indicted for taking much of the money "put up" by an over-generous corporation for favors, had left the city and State and country. In Mexico there was no recognition of the right of extradition for the offense of bribery. So Mr. Folk dropped his mercenary friends and his political ambition and went to see the President. Mr. Roosevelt told him that a treaty might be proposed that it might be made to pass the Senate, and that it would be signed forthwith if Senatorial difficulties were overcome. The youth of thirty-three tackled the job. His treaty went through and received the promised signature. It went in Mexico and was ratified there. That Secretary Hay said that, in his judgment, the instrument was not retroactive, and that the missing link-dict could not be brought back. Mr. Folk had meantime returned to St. Louis but it didn't take him long to again find himself in Washington. He talked to Secretary Hay for a few hours, saw the President again, and after a delay of several days there was a new decision. The treaty was retroactive, the Mexican government would be asked to surrender the wanted man, and in the course of Mexican time—which is not American time—two officers from the United States brought the fugitive to St. Louis.

Eighteen or nineteen months had been brought about before Mr. Folk began to look toward politics again. By this time the alert machine had heard something, tireless waves had brought a message from the interior counties, and there was some distress thereat. But no alarm. Political prodigies had arisen before—and where were their graves now?

Three good men and true were put in the field. One of them was a Supreme judge of high standing, a gentleman possessing the confidence of the people. Another was a man of Folk's age, an engaging personality, and a strong man with a big individual following already made. The third was a brilliant orator, an office-holder of high position, and a party worker of the first class.

Suddenly one of the stags who were about three hundred yards away, lifted his head. Donald reeled over on his back and slipped the rifle out of his case.

"He's a brown beast, the further one," he said. "But it's a long shot, of three hundred yards, say." "I'll try it," said Donald as though it was an apology for his expertness. As I took the rifle and adjusted its sights, all three of the stags stood. The farthest one I could see was a fine one with a noble head.

"Be quiet, sir," cautioned Donald. "They'll be away." My heart was thumping loudly, as hearts have a way of doing on such occasions, but I sighted as carefully as I could and fired. As Donald had fairly prophesied I missed, and away the quarry started in single file, scattering a bit as they ran diagonally down the hill-side. Immediately I threw another cartridge into the chamber and made a hasty shot. The big stag that was following the others gave a jump into the air and came down in a heap. Donald rose to his full height. My own surprise at the result of the shot probably discounted any expression of exultation on my part, but the keeper gave vent to his feelings with the prompt exclamation of a boy.

"He's down, sir; he's down," he cried. And then he looked at me as I knelt there with nothing short of undimmed admiration. I felt rather embarrassed.

"I think thought that you'd do it, sir," he said, and that was what we shot at where the head lay. After the crop of grace we carried the body with bunches of heather and dried fern, to keep away the eagles, and in another hour I was toiling up the slope on the opposite side of the river, across which, by the way, Donald had carried my two hundred pounds on his thin wiry shoulders without tiring a hair. During the afternoon the wind seemed to be blowing from all directions, and though we made several long stalks, the beasts always got some intimation of our approach. Just about sunset I got another shot, and succeeded in bagging a fat five-year-old by a lucky chance. It was ten o'clock that night before we saw the lights gleaming from the windows of the little lodge. Mr. Charles, who had just come and was sitting next to his tired host in a tub of hot water, looked up at me from in front of the fire. I had heard from the gillies outside that he had not got a wot all day.

"Well," said he, and what do you think of it?"

I made some answer.

"My hat off to the wild beast of the Highlands," I replied.

"Meaning me or the stag?" asked the laird.

"The stag," said I.

They ran west into the State. One of them made scores of speech-dramatic friends, and all he heard saying that party were other men in the State as good as the prosecution of criminals in St. Louis.

By and by the counties began to vote. In the primaries out in the State there was a hardy dissent. In the cities there was much growing about Folk and desire for him in rounded primaries, but the youths from the furrowed fields answered back five to one. When the convention of last came together there was but one man named aside from Folk—the young man with the present following, and when the votes were all in it was this young man who rose to ask the convention to make Mr. Folk's nomination unanimous. There are 115 delegate districts in Missouri—and of these a hundred went to Folk on the only ballot.

And this is how he did it. Mr. Folk has practically made but one speech—the same talk many times. He has said that all good citizens must realize that the betrayal of a public trust is a public enemy. That the prostitution of place is a blow at the foundations of the Republic, and that when they are not alert in national politics their servants to guide in the people's property; that there must be a direct ballot, and an honest return for taxes paid; or there can be but one end to the national life. He pleaded for no party, but expressed his confidence in his fellow-citizens to recognize the right of a Democrat to job a Democratic community no more than he recognized the right of a Republican office-holder to rob a Republican community. All were criminals. Mr. Folk might have said that the six former members of legislature now in the penitentiary were Democrats and three Republicans, but he did not. The public knew that he was proceeding without regard to party affiliations.

Now the so-called machine in Missouri, which is not at all dishonest in its personnel, is shouting for Folk. There are some men in it who are saying that they were for Folk all along, that they knew his future, and had always supported him. But the record is different, and word of the machine men are honestly saying that they were mistaken. They are now for Folk because they believe in him, and that they were not for him before for the reason that they had put party above the man, which is, in most cases, the thing to do.

Now is the present time. In spite of the great honor that lies ahead of him—for Republicans and Democrats alike will vote for him in great numbers—he is still at work in his stuffy office in the Court Courts, hearing contentions, passing on judicial appeals. He is making a very good thing of it, and he is not only for the public but for the people's service. He is not only for the underbarners who have fallen into his clutches—but it is the pity of the hour!

Correspondence

THE NEW NEGRO CRIME AGAIN

ATLANTA, Ga., August 15, 1904

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

SIR.—The interesting theory that the disfranchisement of the negro in Mississippi had resulted in putting a stop to what you have styled "The New Negro Crime," was, I think, first advanced by you in your issue of June 20, 1903, on the authority of certain statements attributed to Representative Blandford of that State. In a letter from me dated February 20, 1904, and published in the WEEKLY during March or April of the present year, occurred the following sentence:

"Without any statistical data at hand as to conditions in Mississippi, my confidence in any man judgment of the negro and his crime impels me to disbelieve the premises, and to believe on the contrary, not only that the crime in question has not ceased in Mississippi, but that the conduct of the negro in that State is, and will continue to be, in all respects the same as in the other Southern States."

The letter from Mr. Thomas Jackson Ray, published in your issue of August 13, seems to support by statistics the correctness of my opinion above quoted. I would not, perhaps, be warranted in taxing your country or hardening your columns with any further reference to the matter, if it were not for the fact that my opinion was so axiomatic based upon a prima facie premises that its present vindication by the statistics would seem to entitle it to the weight which attaches to demonstrated theory. If you will refer back to the letter in question, you will see that I there attempted to show why the Fifteenth Amendment has little or no bearing on the subject, and that the real trouble at the bottom of the negro's increasing savagery lies in the Fourteenth Amendment. The opinion there expressed did not appear to address it self to your mind with any particular force, or, at least, to retain your attention, although you were good enough to allow a full page to it in your excellent paper; but it is the exact truth, nevertheless, and if the editor of the WEEKLY will read it again in the light now shed on the subject by Mr. Ray's letter, I think you will feel with further satisfaction.

I am the more encouraged to make this suggestion, because your paper has manifested a sincere purpose to find the truth which shall prove the solvent of this vexing negro problem, and because your liberal policy in opening your columns to a free expression of opinion has brought in such large contributions toward it.

Let me again briefly formulate what I conceive to be the truth of the case. I shall not try to argue it, or to prove it, but merely to state it, leaving time and free discussion to prove it or disprove it, as may happen.

The negro is a low order of mankind who has never in the six thousand years of recorded time shown aptitude or capacity for self-government or self-elevation. Under his American tutelage, which was much more cruelly administered than that of slavery, he underwent marked improvement in intelligence, industry, and religion, made some progress in education, and a little in conventional morality. The secret of this progress lay in the fact that his government during that period was consciously and openly adjusted to the theory that he was incapable of any considerable measure of self-government, and not adapted to American or Anglo-Saxon laws or institutions. The same principle was applied in his case that is applied by a parent to his children and by the United States government in the Indian and the Japanese—to a child that control was necessary, and that he would degenerate without it.

In the civic controversies which grew up in the United States, the prevailing faction adopted the opposite theory, and crystallized it into the Thirteenth, Fourteenth, and Fifteenth Amendments to the Constitution, injecting the negro race bodily into the citizenship of the Union and of every State, and undertaking to enforce their civil and political equality. The two last amendments were said to be necessary in order to make the first effective. It was contended that if Congress should stop after passing the Thirteenth Amendment, the negro would be enabled to nullify the latter by some substituted form of control similar to slavery. Therefore, by the Fourteenth Amendment, the negro was invested with full citizenship, and the States forbidden to discriminate in their laws, but required to govern the negro by the same code which applied to his more highly colored white fellow citizen. It also endeavored indirectly to compel his admission to the suffrage. The Fifteenth Amendment was more brutal in its methods, and has, therefore, seemed to be more important.

As a matter of fact, it is so cumbersome to enforce, and the Federal courts and Congress are so awkward and reluctant to enforce it, while at the same time it is so easy to evade, that it has long been a dead letter. The vast majority of Southern negroes to-day do not even know that they are entitled to vote. In Georgia the progressive adoption and development of the "White Primary" has entirely eliminated even the better informed negroes. The Fifteenth Amendment, therefore, has no bearing whatever on the subject.

The Fourteenth Amendment, however, is self-executing. Instead of being limited in its application to one function of citizenship, it affects every relation of life, and ipso facto nullifies every State law that contravenes it. It, therefore, is at the bottom of the increasing barbarism among the negroes. The mild laws and free institutions of the American people are as inadequate to govern and control the negro as it would be to restrain the head-hunters by fine and imprisonment. Nor does the blue-black spell of any more hope in the one race to change the Ethiopian's skin than a roasting circle would avail in the other to convert an Igorvite into a Chautauque freeman.

It follows from what I have said, and is obliged to follow, not only that the people of the South must continue to grow more progressive, but that their social and industrial system must deteriorate, and the negro continue to degenerate so long as his domestic regulations are interfered with from without. Women and children must be immured more and more closely, and no industry suffer in constantly increasing measure so slowly as our form of State government continues to be one of external interference tempered by domestic lynch law.

I am perfectly well aware that academic philosophers will reject the theory I have stated for many years to come, in spite of the manifest facts which make any other position absurd and impossible. I know also that well-meaning philanthropists will be loath to accept it, because to do so is to admit the last half-century to have been an indefensible blunder. Nevertheless, what I here here set down is Truth—plain, evident, demonstrated, and unpalatable Truth, supported by history and science, recognized everywhere in the world and by everybody, until it comes in dealing with the negro and the Southern white man,—then rejected, with out reason or excuse—simply rejected.

Your paper, Mr. Editor, is doing a great deal more good perhaps than you are aware. With the exception of a very occasional magazine article, the Metropolitan paper has not usually been open to free expression from the South. Indeed, I have seen no paper in the North, except HARPER'S WEEKLY, that has been willing to give patient and courteous attention to Southern opinion, which of necessity differs so widely from that of the North. Out of it must finally come Truth, for whether my opinion expressed by Southern men or Northern men is right or wrong, I have never will be true that free discussion and untrammelled expression is the only avenue to knowledge, and that "Error comes to be dangerous," and only then, "when reason is left free to combat it."

I am, sir,

HOBERT ALEXANDER.

A CONVERSATIONAL "DON'T"

New York, August 10, 1904

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

SIR.—Having read with interest your editorial in the August 5 issue of HARPER'S WEEKLY on "A Plea to Conversation," I beg to suggest a "Don't" which you have not mentioned, but of which I am sure "hotel porch" circles, but other less specialized circles, are in need. It is: Don't discuss the relation of art to morals—especially by artists. By avoiding this topic many friendships may be kept whole, which otherwise would be dissipated.

I am, sir,

HOBERT A. WARE.

WHERE THERE IS NO COMPETITION

HARRISBURG, Pa., August 5, 1904

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

SIR.—Noticing the free advertising you are giving the Pennsylvania Railroad on page 1193, in your WEEKLY dated August 8 and at which as a reader of your WEEKLY I am greatly surprised, I beg to suggest that you visit some of the stations on the main line of the Pennsylvania Railroad Company between Harrisburg and Pittsburg, where the railroad company in question has no competition.

You will find stations where passengers not only do not have benches to sit upon on the outside of the station room in any form of weather, but are forced to stand on the open platform. There is no road projection over the platform to keep passengers from either rain or snow while waiting for arrival and departure of trains.

Their main waiting rooms are something wonderful to behold. Cheapest kind of uncomfortable wooden benches furnished; as water-coolers for passengers from which they can secure a drink of water in quench their thirst; no clocks in said waiting rooms by which passengers can ascertain the time of day, and no announcement board to notify passengers whether the train is five minutes or five hours late, and if you are at all acquainted with the road between Harrisburg and Pittsburg you will know that there have been often long hours of waiting for a car or train.

While you are giving the Pennsylvania Railroad Company the benefit of your columns for such free advertising as is contained in your article, why don't you give your readers the benefit of all the facts and tell them—Yes!—that where the Pennsylvania State and the railroad have no competition there is no extent to the comfort and convenience of the traveling public, but where it has no competition, Well—in the language of a former citizen of some prominence in your State—"The star-spangled" badge be d—d."

I am, sir,

A READER OF YOUR PAPER

SHIRT-WAISTS ALLOWED

St. Louis, Mo., August 10, 1904

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

SIR.—It is not a very important matter, but I think our correspondent who wrote about "the shirt-waist man at St. Louis" must have been misinformed. I was at St. Louis for two weeks in July; part of the time it was very warm, and the shirt-waist and the confederate were in evidence on the grounds. It was only in the Art Gallery that coats were insisted upon. The incident of the two boys I read in one of the St. Louis papers at the time—they were stopped by the overzealous defense guard, but little boys were therefore exempted from it. I did not hear of it as applied to any other building. I agreed with a man who was entering the very careless; the defense guard told him of the regulations. It seemed to me a very proper one as applied to that part of the exhibition.

I am, sir,

B.

Progress of the War

From the beginning of the war, February 8 until August 22, the following Russian warships have been destroyed: the Petropavlovsk, Voronezh, Bocharov, Kurik, Bogorin, Kavriak, and Fraser. The battleships Pobeda, Retvizan, and Pervoraz, and the cruiser Palada were badly damaged in the battle of August 10. The Russian cruisers Rosina and Oronok were damaged in the engagement of August 14, in which the cruiser Kurik was sunk. The battleship Conqueror and three destroyers have been dismantled at Kail-Chow, and the battleship Admiral and the destroyer Urochov have also been dismantled at Shanghai.

The cruiser Sovoy was partially wrecked and driven ashore by the Japanese at Enakura, island of Sakhalin, on August 10. Several Russian torpedo-boats, destroyers, and gunboats are also known to have been sunk by the Japanese. Japan has lost the battleship Hatsuse, the cruiser Isokawa, and several torpedo-boats, and a Japanese cruiser was successfully torpedoed by the Russians on May 10.

In the majority of land engagements the Japanese have been victorious. Some of the most important Japanese victories have been the battle of the Yalu on May 1, the battle of Kin-Chow and Nanshan Hill on May 20, the battle of Yaluang on June 12, the battle of Telou, on June 13, the battle of Tschi-Chow on July 24 and 25, the battle of Simu-cheng on July 30 and 31. The Japanese estimate their total casualties from the beginning of the war up to and including August 1, at 12,005 men killed or wounded.

August 23.—A despatch from Chiofo says that the Japanese have captured two more forts at Port Arthur in the neighborhood of Golden Hill. The Japanese are reported to have driven the Russians from the parade-ground (about two miles north of the harbor), and have destroyed the town hall, which was used as a magazine.

August 24.—Admiral Katsuka to-day reported to the government at Tokyo that the Japanese cruisers Nisika and Kanaga yesterday bombarded and shelled the Japanese harbor and fired on the Russian forts east of Golden Hill at the entrance of Port Arthur. The Russian battleship Sevastopol, when engaged in shelling the Japanese land forts on May 1, was outside of Port Arthur yesterday, struck a mine and was disabled. She was towed into Port Arthur.

The Car to-day ordered the dismantling of the railway Ashid and the destroyer Urochov at Shanghai.

August 25.—The British government has ordered two cruisers from the squadron at the Cape of Good Hope to leave without delay the Russian volunteer fleet steamers Rosinab and Petersburg, and to convey to them the orders of the Russian government from which they must not further interfere with neutral shipping. A number of British vessels have lately been stopped and searched by the Russian cruisers.

The Car to-day received a telegram from Prince Oukhtomsky at Port Arthur, describing the naval battle of August 10. His story says that the cruiser Palada, which was previously reported to have been sunk by the Japanese, returned safely to Port Arthur.

A Russian destroyer struck a mine yesterday at Port Arthur and sank. Another destroyer was damaged by striking a mine.

August 26.—A despatch from Liao-Yang says the Japanese have begun an advance along the whole line of the Russian eastern front. General Kurapatkin reports a number of small engagements yesterday in which the Japanese were repulsed.

August 27.—General Oku began an attack upon the Russian forces at Anshan-Chan (only thirty miles from Liao-Yang, in the Yangtze) yesterday at the same time that General Kuroki commenced to attack them at Aiping. The Russian general staff to-day reported that General Sakharov, a detached regiment of the engagement at Anshan-Chan. The Russian losses were about 1,000 killed and wounded. General Kurapatkin reports that the total Russian casualties in all the fighting around Liao-Yang yesterday amounted to 1,150.

August 28.—The fighting around Liao-Yang was resumed to-day. The Russians have retired from Anshan-Chan, and the entire eastern division is reported to have been withdrawn to positions close to Liao-Yang.

August 28.—A telegram from Liao-Yang says the Russian army has effected its retirement, with transport and artillery, on Liao-Yang, and is now in position awaiting the Japanese advance. The Russians lost 300 killed and wounded during the retreat from Anshan-Chan. The Russians have evacuated Aiping. According to a despatch from Harbin, the total Russian losses from the fighting east and south of Liao-Yang during the past two days amount to about 3,000.

August 31.—The most important news of the war is contained in a despatch made public on this date, reporting a great battle at Liao-Yang, in which 200,000 on both the Russian and Japanese sides are said to be engaged.

Not That Kind

JOHN W. RABBIT, the leading comedian of Henry W. Savage's "Prince of Piles" company, now playing in London, tells this anecdote of his little son:

The boy was overheard saying to his pet rabbit: "How much is seven times seven?" (Of course there was no response from the rabbit.)

"How much is four times four?" Still there was no response.

"Now, I will give you an easy one. How much is two times two?" Still the rabbit refused to respond.

"Well," said the little boy, "I know father was fibbing when he said rabbits are the greatest multipliers in the world."

Always on Medicine—Max, West coast, California, 25¢ should always be used for children's medicine. It soothes the throat, soothes the stomach, stops all pain, soothes the cold, and is the best remedy for diarrhea. (L.A.P.)

BREAST FEEDERS' FEELERS—Breast Feeder's Cream is guaranteed without equal. It is certified according to latest sanitary methods, having a delicate deodorant, and is the best for the mother and the best for the baby. It is the best for the mother and the best for the baby. (L.A.P.)

CHILDREN will take Pils' Cream without objection, for it is so tender and pleasant. At drug stores. (L.A.P.)

ADVERTISEMENTS

THE EDITOR'S BRAIN

1342 2nd West Well Under Coffee.

A brain worker's health is often injured by coffee, badly selected food, and sedentary habits. The experience of the Managing Editor of one of the most prosperous newspapers in the Middle West with Postum Food Coffee illustrates the necessity of proper feeding for the man who depends on his brain for a living.

"Up to three years ago," writes this gentleman, "I was a heavy coffee drinker. I knew it was injuring me. It directly affected my stomach, and I was threatened with chronic dyspepsia. It was then that my wife persuaded me to try Postum Food Coffee. The good results were so marked that I cannot say too much for it. When first prepared I did not fancy it, but inquiry developed the fact that cook had not boiled it long enough; so next time I had it properly made, and was charmed with it. Since that time coffee has had no place on my table save for guests. Both myself and wife are fond of this new cup, which 'cheers but does not inebriate' is a much truer and fitter sense than coffee. My stomach has resumed its normal functions, and I am now well and strong again, mentally and physically. I am confident that coffee is a poison to many stomachs, and I have recommended Postum with great success to a number of my friends who were suffering from the use of coffee." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

Look in each pkg. for the famous little book, "The Road to Well-being."

Anti-dyspeptic. A tonic on appetite, and a delivery in weak drinks.

1390

The foundation of photography is the lens.

A poor lens makes poor pictures—a good lens makes good pictures. The best photographs in the world are taken with the GOERZ LENS. The best photographers use them. Catalogue Free.

Main Office, Berlin-Friedenau, Germany.
Branch Offices, 4 and 5 Holborn Circus, London, England. 22 Ave du Empereur, Paris.

C. P. Goetz, Room 33.52 E Union Sq, New York

Lakewood

"Among the Pines of New Jersey"

A Fashionable Fall Resort

90 Minutes from New York

Reached by the NEW JERSEY CENTRAL

Its palatial hotels are famed for their perfect cuisine and its sports include all popular pastimes.

For descriptive book will be sent upon application to C. B. Miller, General Passenger Agent, New York.

Copyright Notice

I, J. B. BAKER, of the County of New York, State of New York, do hereby certify that the within and foregoing work, entitled "The Road to Well-being," is a work of original authorship, and that I am the author thereof, and that I claim copyright therein, and that I have deposited a copy thereof with the Clerk of the County of New York, for the purpose of securing a copy thereof for the use of the Library of Congress, and that I have also deposited a copy thereof with the Clerk of the County of New York, for the purpose of securing a copy thereof for the use of the State Library of New York.

RELIABLE MAN WANTED

A prominent General Food Company will contract with a thoroughly reliable man for two years at $1000 per month, together with commissions and office expenses. Highest talent more required. Address: Battle Creek, Mich. 478. Battle Creek, Mich.

PISO'S CURE FOR BILIOUSNESS AND CONSTIPATION
10 CENTS
25 CENTS

BOKER'S BITTERS

Anti-dyspeptic. A tonic on appetite, and a delivery in weak drinks.

1390

THE TRUANTS

BY A. E. W. MASON

RESUME OF CHAPTERS

In the opening chapter Pamela Maricle is introduced in the reader as a young society woman of London, beautiful and of rare personal charm. Late one night Pamela and Alan Warriden, who is in love with her, observe a young couple leaving the opposite house. They are Tony and Milverton Stretton, who live in a gloomy house provided over by the rich but wicked father of the young man. They are in reality kept prisoners by the villain of the tyrannical old man, and it is only by playing truant and going out by stealth late at night that they are able to enter at all into the life of the outside world. But finally they both weary of their monotonous life, and Tony determines to go to America to make his fortune. In his absence Milverton becomes infatuated with Lionel Talbot, a gentlemanly adventurer. Pamela wishes to help her uncle Warriden on a mission to find Tony and bring him home. Warriden finds Tony, having lost all of his small fortune in New York, is now in the North Sea on a trawler. Warriden goes every arrangement to prevail upon him to come back to his father. Tony remains on the trawler until the term of his cruise is over, meanwhile having learned of his father's death, and then decides to sail in the French Foreign Legion, as no other career seems open to him. Sludge, a friend of Pamela's, learns from her of the peril Milverton is in from Talbot. He buys up Talbot's debts and places them in the hands of a single arm of soldiers, who insist on a settlement within twenty-four hours. Talbot receives a proposition from Sludge to supersede an important enterprise of the father's in Chile, which his financial difficulties compel him to accept. Warriden, although he has promised to his mother-in-law, again asks Pamela to marry him, and she allows him to think that in time it will be possible for her to accept him. The thing, she tells him, must make her take the step now. The return of Tony Stretton. Warriden, desiring of obtaining information as to Tony's whereabouts, goes to London to visit Tony's friend Mr. Sludge, who, he thinks, will be able to enlighten him. He finds on his arrival that Sludge has died suddenly, and of establishing the hard sailing and address of the carriage of a letter intended for the minister, thinks that he has found a clue to Tony's hiding place. Sludge returns from Chile and persuades Milverton to go south with him. They are seen driving together late at night in Rogers's Park by Mr. Sludge, who tells Pamela that he suspects danger for Milverton. Pamela persuades Warriden to go to an old training place of theirs for consultation: the parter of the village inn, in order to devise a plan to help Milverton. Pamela, for the second time, convinces Warriden to go in search of Tony, and he glides away. Pamela goes to Rougemont, which she had chosen as a resting place, and while there learns of the presence of Lionel Talbot. Stretton, meanwhile, is sent with a troop of soldiers on an expedition across the Desert of Sahara. On his return to Morocco he is given the commission of lieutenant, and he then decides to write to Milverton. At that moment Warriden arrives with the letter from Pamela. Tony reads the letter, and decides to desert the legion, with which he has enlisted for five years, and return to England. He starts in the guise of a pedlar for Morocco. Warriden is in great haste. Pamela learns that Milverton Stretton is expected at a hotel on the Riviera, and sends a telegram to Warriden at Tangier stating him not to fail to return by the ship, the date of Milverton's expected arrival. Tony comes safely through the mountains and meets Warriden just in time for tea.

CHAPTER XXVIII

DISCOVERY

THE two men smoked together upon the roof-top afterwards. "I left a man at the gate all day," said Warriden. "to watch the train from Sefton. I had brought him from Algiers. I do not know how he came to miss you."

"He could not know me," said Tony. "and I spoke to no one."

Tony was silent for a little while. Then he said, in a low grave voice, like a man speaking upon matters which he has no liking to remember:

"The male was taken from me some days ago in the Ah Yucal country." And Warriden upon that said, "good trouble."

"You are tired when you are in the city," said Tony. "I was a night of moonlight, so bright that the stars were pale and small, as though they were withdrawn; there was no cloud anywhere about the sky; and on each night that your translucent air, the city, with its upstanding minarets, had a grace and beauty denied to it by day. There was something of enchantment in its aspect. Tony smoked his pipe in silence for a little while. Then he said:

"Let us not talk about it! I never thought that I could be sitting here in Sefton after sitting for a little while when we start."

"Early to answer," replied Warriden. "We must reach Rougemont in the south of France by the thirty-first."

Stretton suddenly sat back in his chair.

"Rougemont? France?" he exclaimed. "We must go there? Why?"

"I do not know," Warriden answered. "A telegram reached me at Tangier. I kept it."

He took the telegram from his pocket and handed it to Stretton, who read it and sat thinking.

"We have time," said Warriden, "just time enough, I think, if we travel fast."

"Good," said Stretton, as he returned the telegram. "But I was not thinking of the time."

He did not explain what had caused him to start at the mention of Rougemont; but after sitting for a little while longer in silence, he betook himself to bed.

Early the next morning they rode out of the Rab Sages upon the thronged highway over the plain to Mequinez.

The caravans diminished, striking off into this or that track. Very soon there remained with them only one party of five, accompanied on small donkeys. They began to ride through high shrubs and fumes of forest over rolling ground. Stretton talked very little, and as the track twisted and turned across the plain he was continually standing up in his stirrups and searching the horizon.

"There does not seem to be one straight path in Morocco," he exclaimed, impatiently. "Look at this one. There's no man who it should not run straight. Yet it never does."

Indeed, the track lay across that open plain like some leonine monstrous serpent of a legend.

"I do not believe," replied Warriden, "that there is a straight path anywhere in the world, unless it is one, which has been set and made, or unless it runs from gate to gate, and both gates are visible. One might think the animals made this track, turning and twisting to avoid the bushes. Only the track is no straighter in the desert, where there are no bushes at all."

They halted for half an hour at eleven, beside a bridge which crossed a stream, broken and ruinous, but still serviceable. And while they sat on the ground under the shadow they suddenly heard a great rattling of hoofs upon the broken sods, and jangling saw a body of men ride across the bridge. There were about forty of them, young and old; all were mounted, and it appeared as wild and ragged a set of bandits as could be in Stretton's opinion on the ground beneath them; and without a word or a shout they halted as one man. Their very silence was an intimidating thing.

"E-mur," whispered Hushim. He was shivering with fear. Warriden noticed that the two soldiers who accompanied them at this journey to Rougemont quietly assumed their horses. Stretton and Warriden rose to do likewise. And as they rose a dozen of the mounted L'har quietly rode round from the end of the bridge and shied between them and the stream. Then the leader, a big man with a black beard turning gray, began to talk in a quiet and pleasant voice to the soldiers.

"You are bringing Europeans into our country. Now why are you doing that?"

The soldiers in less pleasantly replied:

"Your country? The Europeans are travelling with a letter from your master and mine, my Lord the Sultan, to the Governor of Mequinez."

"You will show us, then, the letter?"

"I will do nothing of the kind," the soldier replied, with a smile. The L'har did not move; the two soldiers sat upon their horses smiling; it seemed that matters had come to a deadlock.

morning," he said, "for the country is not safe. It will be well if you start early, for you have a long way to go."

"The earlier the better," said Stretton.
"It will do if you breakfast at five—half past five," said then, "to whose pointlessness was a thing unknown." And start at six—half past six."

"No," said Warriden. "We will start at five—half past five."

That night a company of soldiers kept posted about the tents, and passed the hours of darkness in calling to one another and chanting an endless plaintive melody. Little sleep was possible to the two Englishmen, and to one of them sleep did not come at all. Now and then Warriden dropped off and waked again; and once or twice he struck a match and lit his candle. Each time that he did this he saw Stretton lying quite motionless in his bed on the other side of the tent. Tony lay with the bedclothes up to his chin, and his arms straight down at his sides, in some ancient resemblance to a dead man. But Warriden saw that all the while his eyes were open. They were awake with his troubles and perplexities, keeping them to himself as was his wont, and slowly searching for an issue. That he would hit upon the issue he did not doubt. He had these few days for thought, and it was not the first time that he had had to map out a line of conduct.

His course might be revealed to him at the very last moment, as it had been on the traveler in the North Sea. Or it might flash upon him in a second, as the necessity to desert had flashed upon him in the midst of the alms of Ain Sofra. Meanwhile he lay awake and thought.

They started early that morning, and crossing a valley, mounted on to that high wide plain Dhehlar Larson and Dhehlar Geronan. They left the town of Mezquiza behind them; its minarets dropped out of sight. They had come into a most empty world. Not a tent village stood anywhere beside the track. They were riding right in a deep recess the white sanded loam of Mahal Idris fell down the dark side of the Larson like a cascade. A little further an arch of stone and a few pillars rising from the plain showed where once the Romans had built their town of Volubilis. And now that was passed there was no sign of life anywhere at all.

For hours they rode on a desolate, beautiful world. Bushes of anemone, white with their starry flowers, branched against them; plants of iris, purple and yellow, stood sturdily high upon their path; and at times the bushes would cease, and they would ride over a red carpet of anemones, which would pale away into the gold of the mustard flower. Flowers were about them all that day, but no living things. Even the air about their heads was still. The country seemed too empty even for the birds.

At eleven o'clock they stopped beside a stream which ran prettily between trees across their path.

"We shall find no more water until evening," said Ibrahim. "We will stop here."

Stretton dismounted and said:

"We can send the mules on and catch them up. It will save time."

The soldiers shook their heads.

"We are in the Berber country. We must not separate," they remarked.

Stretton looked around impatiently.

"But there is no one within miles," he exclaimed; and, as if to contradict him, a man walked out from the bushes by the stream and came towards them. He had been riding on this very track not two hours before by eleven mounted Berbers. He had been driving three mules laden with eggs and food to Mahal Idris, and his mules and their loads had been taken from him. He was walking home, absolutely penniless. His whole fortune had been lost that day; and when once again the travellers started upon their journey he ran at a trot beside their horses for safety's sake.

The road mounted now on to stony and mountainous country. It wound continually, ascending in and out amongst low round peaks towards the summit of a great line of hills which ran from east to west opposite to them against the sky.

"Beyond the hills," cried Ibrahim, "is the plain of the Selou."

A big village crowned the hill just where the track ascended. It had been placed there to protect the road. In a little while they came to the foot of the hill, and suddenly they saw, far below them, the great plain of the Selou, green and level, dotted with villages and the white temples of saints, and clumps of trees stretching away as far as the eye could reach. It was afternoon, not a cloud was in the sky, and the sun shone through the clear, golden air beneficently bright. The track fell away to the plain with a descent so direct the plain broke so steeply upon the eyes, that the very beauty of the scene caught the breath away.

Both Warriden and Stretton reined in their horses, and sat looking across the plain as a man might look sublimely from the crest of some high cliff over for the first time the sea. And then Warriden heard his companion begin to hum a song. He caught some of the words, but not many.

"Oh, come out, mah love, I'm a waitin' for you back!" Tony began, and suddenly he looked himself with an expression of anger, as though the words had associations which hurt him to recall.

"Let us ride on," he said, and led the way down the steep winding track towards the plain.

They pressed on, the evening, and camped late in the Beni Hassan country. Stretton slept that night, but he slept fitfully. He had not yet come to the end of his perplexities, and as he rode away from their camping ground in the morning he said, impulsively:

"It is quite true. I have thought of it. I am to blame. I should have gone into the house that night."

He was endeavoring to be just, and to this criticism of himself he continually recurred. He should have entered his home in Berkeley Square on the night when he contrasted himself with looking up to the lighted windows. He should have gone in and declared what was in his mind about them. Very likely he would only have made matters worse. Contempt for a visionary would very likely have been added to the contempt for a seidu-wari.

Certainly so faith would have been felt by Mullie in the morning of his plan. He would have been asked, in a low, even way, to take him in and stay at home. Still, he ought to have gone in. He had made a mistake that night.

All that day they rode through the Beni Hassan country westwards. The plain was level and monotonous; they passed village after village, each one built in a circle about the old Portuguese open turf into which the cattle were driven at night. For upon the hills, and in the forest of Mamara to the south, close by, the L'mar lived, and between the Beni Hassan and the L'mar there is always war. In the afternoon they came to the borders of that forest, and skirting its edge, towards evening reached the caravanerai of El Kantra.

The travellers saw it some while before they came to it—four high, smooth, castellated walls crowning a low hill. It stands upon the road from Fez to Rabat, and close to the road from Rabat to Larache, and is a garrison, and it is the only one of its kind there a stone from its walls into the trees of Mamara. Stretton and Warriden rode round the walls to the gate, and as they passed beneath the arch both halted and looked back.

Outside was a quiet country of gray colors; the sea was near to the far away, far away, far away, in a low, even way, to take him in and stay at home. Still, he ought to have gone in. He had made a mistake that night.

Inside was a quiet country of gray colors; the sea was near to the far away, far away, far away, in a low, even way, to take him in and stay at home. Still, he ought to have gone in. He had made a mistake that night.

Inside was a quiet country of gray colors; the sea was near to the far away, far away, far away, in a low, even way, to take him in and stay at home. Still, he ought to have gone in. He had made a mistake that night.

Inside was a quiet country of gray colors; the sea was near to the far away, far away, far away, in a low, even way, to take him in and stay at home. Still, he ought to have gone in. He had made a mistake that night.

Inside was a quiet country of gray colors; the sea was near to the far away, far away, far away, in a low, even way, to take him in and stay at home. Still, he ought to have gone in. He had made a mistake that night.

Inside was a quiet country of gray colors; the sea was near to the far away, far away, far away, in a low, even way, to take him in and stay at home. Still, he ought to have gone in. He had made a mistake that night.

Inside was a quiet country of gray colors; the sea was near to the far away, far away, far away, in a low, even way, to take him in and stay at home. Still, he ought to have gone in. He had made a mistake that night.

Inside was a quiet country of gray colors; the sea was near to the far away, far away, far away, in a low, even way, to take him in and stay at home. Still, he ought to have gone in. He had made a mistake that night.

Inside was a quiet country of gray colors; the sea was near to the far away, far away, far away, in a low, even way, to take him in and stay at home. Still, he ought to have gone in. He had made a mistake that night.

Inside was a quiet country of gray colors; the sea was near to the far away, far away, far away, in a low, even way, to take him in and stay at home. Still, he ought to have gone in. He had made a mistake that night.

Inside was a quiet country of gray colors; the sea was near to the far away, far away, far away, in a low, even way, to take him in and stay at home. Still, he ought to have gone in. He had made a mistake that night.

Inside was a quiet country of gray colors; the sea was near to the far away, far away, far away, in a low, even way, to take him in and stay at home. Still, he ought to have gone in. He had made a mistake that night.

Inside was a quiet country of gray colors; the sea was near to the far away, far away, far away, in a low, even way, to take him in and stay at home. Still, he ought to have gone in. He had made a mistake that night.

Inside was a quiet country of gray colors; the sea was near to the far away, far away, far away, in a low, even way, to take him in and stay at home. Still, he ought to have gone in. He had made a mistake that night.

Inside was a quiet country of gray colors; the sea was near to the far away, far away, far away, in a low, even way, to take him in and stay at home. Still, he ought to have gone in. He had made a mistake that night.

Inside was a quiet country of gray colors; the sea was near to the far away, far away, far away, in a low, even way, to take him in and stay at home. Still, he ought to have gone in. He had made a mistake that night.

Inside was a quiet country of gray colors; the sea was near to the far away, far away, far away, in a low, even way, to take him in and stay at home. Still, he ought to have gone in. He had made a mistake that night.

Inside was a quiet country of gray colors; the sea was near to the far away, far away, far away, in a low, even way, to take him in and stay at home. Still, he ought to have gone in. He had made a mistake that night.

Inside was a quiet country of gray colors; the sea was near to the far away, far away, far away, in a low, even way, to take him in and stay at home. Still, he ought to have gone in. He had made a mistake that night.

Inside was a quiet country of gray colors; the sea was near to the far away, far away, far away, in a low, even way, to take him in and stay at home. Still, he ought to have gone in. He had made a mistake that night.

Inside was a quiet country of gray colors; the sea was near to the far away, far away, far away, in a low, even way, to take him in and stay at home. Still, he ought to have gone in. He had made a mistake that night.

Inside was a quiet country of gray colors; the sea was near to the far away, far away, far away, in a low, even way, to take him in and stay at home. Still, he ought to have gone in. He had made a mistake that night.

Inside was a quiet country of gray colors; the sea was near to the far away, far away, far away, in a low, even way, to take him in and stay at home. Still, he ought to have gone in. He had made a mistake that night.

Inside was a quiet country of gray colors; the sea was near to the far away, far away, far away, in a low, even way, to take him in and stay at home. Still, he ought to have gone in. He had made a mistake that night.

Inside was a quiet country of gray colors; the sea was near to the far away, far away, far away, in a low, even way, to take him in and stay at home. Still, he ought to have gone in. He had made a mistake that night.

Inside was a quiet country of gray colors; the sea was near to the far away, far away, far away, in a low, even way, to take him in and stay at home. Still, he ought to have gone in. He had made a mistake that night.

Inside was a quiet country of gray colors; the sea was near to the far away, far away, far away, in a low, even way, to take him in and stay at home. Still, he ought to have gone in. He had made a mistake that night.

Inside was a quiet country of gray colors; the sea was near to the far away, far away, far away, in a low, even way, to take him in and stay at home. Still, he ought to have gone in. He had made a mistake that night.

Inside was a quiet country of gray colors; the sea was near to the far away, far away, far away, in a low, even way, to take him in and stay at home. Still, he ought to have gone in. He had made a mistake that night.

Inside was a quiet country of gray colors; the sea was near to the far away, far away, far away, in a low, even way, to take him in and stay at home. Still, he ought to have gone in. He had made a mistake that night.

To be Continued.

Sir Mortimer

By
MARY JOHNSTON
Author of "To Have and To Hold"

THE love of Sir Mortimer for the fair Damaris Sedley, a lady-in-waiting, holds unswerving course through a narrative alive with stirring incidents of the days of Sir Walter Raleigh, when all England loved, sang, adventured, and fought, in the flush of youthful power. Herein is a love story of uncommon charm cast among stirring scenes—love in the lap of adventure, set forth with rare imaginative power.

Readers of "To Have and To Hold" will welcome in this tale of love and gallantry the distinct advance Miss Johnston has made upon her former success. The romance is instinct with new life and color, like the golden days with which it deals.

"The witchery of romance pervades its scenes, and once in the grasp of the story the reader will be swept along the current to the end."—Chicago Chronicle.

"Her thousands of admiring readers will thank her for the book—a strong, vigorous, original story, with honor to the theme."—Scraper Herald.

"May be classed among the gems of modern novels."—Birmingham News.

"She has reproduced in a wonderful manner the time of Elizabeth, with all its greatness and its littleness."—N. Y. World.

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK

Rulers of Kings

by
GERTRUDE ATHERTON
Author of "The Conqueror," "The Aristocrats"

IN this novel is pictured the conflict between the two greatest forces in the world—American wealth and European royalty—in which the former triumphs. Gertrude Atherton, from whom the reading public has learned to expect surprises, has evolved a story both daring and original. Fessenden Abbott, the son of America's most colossal millionaire, in the midst of great financial undertakings that are watched by all the world, falls in love with the daughter of the Austrian Emperor. In her heart duty to the weakening monarchy of her fathers battles with an overmastering love for the young American. How Fessenden Abbott bends the will of emperors and alters the diplomatic relations of kingdoms to win the girl he loves is an original and most romantic piece of fiction writing.

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK

THE FUNNIEST OF BIOGRAPHIES

The Memoirs of a Baby

By JOSEPHINE DASKAM

NEVER before has the dignified title of "Memoirs" graced so funny a book as this latest tale of Josephine Daskam's—a writer widely known for her clever child studies. The sorry side of life—the tribulations of the little tots—have no place in this irresistibly amusing record of the home-life of a typical American couple. The baby refuses to develop psychologically or scientifically according to the theories set down in his Aunt Emma's books, but he grows to robust boyhood after a fashion of his own. All the various incidents of a lively youngster's boyhood, here find laughable portrayal. The unceasing arguments between the common-sense young father and the theoretical "Aunt Emma" not only afford such amusement as Josephine Daskam alone can give us, but go to make a clever satire on "modern" methods of rearing children.

F. Y. Cory, whose pictures of baby-life have never been equalled for cleverness and humor, has illustrated the book copiously with pen-and-ink drawings. The pictures are every bit as funny as the narrative, and the book will provide the laughter of any one who turns the pages.

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS, NEW YORK

THE GIVERS

BY
MARY E. WILKINS FREEMAN

THESE are Mary E. Wilkins Freeman's latest stories. All are filled with the humor and pathos of New England life—the type of story which is indisputably the author's own, and in which she scored her remarkable early success.

Of the stories in this volume, the title story—"The Givers"—has created more widespread interest and called forth more letters from the author's readers than anything else Mrs. Freeman has done. It is a laughable tale of the revolt of a sturdy, strong-minded woman against the inappropriateness of the Christmas gifts with which she is deluged by her well-to-do, unthinking friends. How she leads each in turn to replace her gift with some homely, serviceable article is a triumph of rough-handed New England diplomacy and a highly amusing tale.

Sophia Lane is but one of the many characters in this book who are good to know and not soon forgotten.

Illustrated, Cloth, $1.25

HARPER & BROTHERS
PUBLISHERS NEW YORK CITY

morning," he said, "for the country is not safe. It will be well if you start early, for you have a long way to go."

"The earlier the better," said Stretton.

"It will do if you breakfast at five—half-past five," said Ibrahim, to whom punctuality was a thing unknown. "And start at six—half-past six."

"No," said Warriden. "We will start at five—half-past five."

That night a company of soldiers kept guard about the tents, and passed the hours of darkness in calling to one another and chanting one endless plaintive melody. Little sleep was possible to the Englishmen, and to one of them sleep did not come at all. Now and then a soldier dropped off and waked again, and once or twice he struck a match and lit his candle. Each time that he did this he saw Stretton lying quite motionless in his bed on the other side of the tent. Tony lay with his hands upon his chin, and his arms straight down at his sides. In some unaccountable manner a great deal of time passed away, and at last the while his eyes were open. Tony was awake with his troubles and perplexities, keeping them to himself as was his wont, and slowly searching for an issue. That he would hit upon the issue he did not doubt. He had these few days for thought, and it was not the first time that he had had to map out a line of conduct.

His course might be revealed to him at the very last moment, as it had been on the tawdry in the North Sea. Or it might flash upon him in a second, as the necessity to desert had flashed upon him amidst the slopes of Ain-Sefra. Meanwhile he lay awake and thought.

They started early that morning, and crossing a valley, mounted on to that high wide plain Dibel Lashon and Dibel Geronan. They left the town of Mequien behind them; its minarets dropped out of sight. They had come into a most empty world. Not a tent-village stood anywhere beside the track. Far away to the right in a deep recess the white sacred town of Mahal Idria fell down the dark side of the Lashon like a cascade. A little farther an arch of stone and a few pillars rising from the plain showed where once the Romans have built their town of Volubilis. And once that was passed there was no sign of life anywhere at all.

For hours they rode on a desolate, beautiful world. Bushes of euphorbia, white with their starry flowers, brushed against them; plants of iris, purple and yellow, stood stem-high upon their path; and at times the bushes would cease, and they would ride over a red carpet of marigolds, which would pale away into the gold of the mustard flower. Flowers were about them all that day, but no living thing. Even the birds above their heads were still. The country seemed too empty even for the birds.

At eleven o'clock they stopped beside a stream which ran prettily between ferns across their path.

"We shall find no more water until evening," said Ibrahim.

"We will stop here," said Stretton.

"We can send the mules on and catch them up. It will save time," said Stretton.

The soldiers shook their heads.

"We are in the Berber country. We must not separate," they remarked.

Stretton looked around impatiently.

"But there is no man within fifty miles," he explained; and as, if to contradict him, a rain of arrows fell from the bushes by the stream and came towards them. He had been robbed on this very track not two hours before by eleven armed Berbers. He had been driving three mules laden with eggs and food to Mahal Idria, and his mules and their loads had been taken from him. He was walking home, absolutely penniless. His whole fortune had been lost that day; and when once again the travellers started upon their journey he ran at a trot beside their horses for safety's sake.

The road ascended now on to stony and mountainous country. It wound continually, ascending in and out amongst long round peaks towards the summit of a great line of hills which ran from east to west opposite to them against the sky.

"Beyond the hills," cried Ibrahim, "is the plain of the Sebou."

A big village crowned the hill just where the track ascended. It had been placed there to protect the road. In a little while they came to the brow of the hill, and suddenly they saw, far below them, the great plain of the Sebou, green and level, dotted with villages and the white towns of saints, and clumps of trees stretching away as far as the eye could reach. It was afternoon, not a cloud was in the sky, and the sun shone through the clear, golden air benevolently bright. The hillside fell away to the plain with a descent so sheer, the plain broke so abruptly upon the eyes, that the very beauty of the scene caught the breath away.

Both Warriden and Stretton reined in their horses, and set looking across the plain as a man might who suddenly from the crest of some white cliff saw for the first time the sea. And then Warriden heard his companion begin to hum a song. He caught some of the words, but not many.

"Oh, come out, come here, I'm awallin' for you here!" Tony began, and suddenly checked himself with an expression of anger, as though the words had associations which it hurt him to recall.

"Let us ride on," he said, and led the way down the steep winding track towards the plain.

They pressed on that evening, and camped late in the Beni Hassan country. Stretton slept that night, but he slept fitfully. He had not yet come to the end of his perplexities, and as he rode away from their camping-ground in the morning he said, impulsively:

"It is quite true. I have thought of it. I am to blame. I should have gone into the house that night."

He was endeavouring to be just, and to this criticism of himself he eventually recurred. He should have entered his house in Berkeley Square on the night when he contented himself with looking up to the lighted windows. He should have gone in and declared what was in his mind to do. Very likely he would only have made matters worse. Contempt for a visionary would very likely have been added to the contempt for a non-do-well.

Certainly no faith would have been felt by Millie in the sincerity of his plan. He would have been asked, in a lukewarm way, to abandon it and stay at home. Still, he ought to have gone in. He had made a mistake that night.

All that day they rode through the Beni Hassan country westwards. The plain was level and monotonous; they passed village after village, each one built in a circle round a great space of open turf into which the cattle were driven at night. For upon the hills, and in the forest of Mamura to the south, close by the Lashon flood, and between the Beni Hassan and the Lashon there is always war. In the afternoon they came to the borders of that forest, and skirting its edge, towards evening reached the caravanera of El Kantra.

The travellers saw it some while before they came to it—four high, smooth, castellated walls crowning a low hill. It stood upon the crest of a low rise to Rabat, and close to the road from Rabat to Larache, and a garrison guarded it. For you could almost throw a stone from its walls into the trees of Mamura. Stretton and Warriden rode round the walls to the gate, and as they passed beneath the arch both halted and looked back.

Outside was a quiet country of grey colour; the sun was near to its setting, far away the broken walls of the old Portuguese town of Medivah stood upon a point of vantage on a hillside, like some ruined castle of the Tyrol. Inside the caravanera all was noise and shouting and confusion. In the thickness of the walls there were little rooms or cells, and in these the merchants were making their homes for the night, while about them their servants and muleteers buzzed like a hive of bees. And the whole great square within the walls was one lake of filthy mud wherein raven and snail, and donkeys, and horses rolled and stamped and fought.

A deafening clamor rose to the skies. Every discordant sound that the created world could produce seemed to be brayed from that jostling throng of animals as from some infernal orchestra. And in the place was felt a sense of the most terrible.

"Let us pitch our camp outside!" said Warriden. But the captain of the garrison came hurrying up.

"No," he cried, excitedly. "The Lmar! The Lmar!"

Stretton shrugged his shoulders.

"I am sending a Hilal horse with the Lmar," said he.

"They have sent in word to us," the captain continued, "that they mean to attack us to-night."

Stretton looked perplexed.

"But why send in word?" he asked.

The captain of the garrison looked astonished at the question.

"So that we may be ready for them, of course," he replied, quite seriously; for life in Morocco has some of the qualities of opera bouffe. "No you must come inside. You have a letter from my lord the Duke of Fes, it is true. If the letter said you were to sleep outside the walls of El Kantra, then I would kiss the seal and place it against my forehead, and bring out my five hundred men to guard you, and we should all get killed. But it does not say so."

The five hundred men were really short of fitly. Stretton and Warriden laughed; but they had to go inside the caravanera. This was the last day on which they ran any risk. To-morrow they would cross the Sebou at Medivah, and beyond the Sebou the way was safe.

They rode inside the caravanera, and were allotted a cell which obtained some privacy from a hurdle fixed in the ground in front of it. The gates of the caravanera were closed, the sunset flooded the blue sky with a haze of rose; the muezzin came out upon the minaret, and the red rose from the minaret was heard in a moment his call to prayer; and then a drummer and a higher and louder into the rounded square. Suddenly there fell upon Stretton's ears, competing with the muezzin and the uproar of the animals, the "Last Post."

Stretton started up, amazed, and most deeply moved. An English officer instructed the Moorish troops. What more natural than that he should introduce the English calls and signals? But to Stretton it seemed most wonderful that here, in this Eastern country, while the Mohammedan priest was chanting from his minaret, he should hear again the words which he had heard in his father's tent, sounded by an Eastern bugle and an Eastern drum. In how many barracks of England, he wondered, would that same "Last Post" ring out to-night? And at once the years slipped away, the hard years of the North Sea and the Scheldt. He was carried back, among the days when he served in the Volunteers. Then arose in his heart a great longing that something of the happiness of those days might be recaptured still.

Warriden and Stretton crossed the Sebou the next morning, and rode with the boom of the Atlantic in their ears. Hills upon their left hand hid the sea from their eyes, and it was not until the next day, when they mounted on to a high tableland four hours from Larache, that they saw it rolling lazily towards the shore. They caught a steamer at Larache that night.

To be Continued.

Sir Mortimer

By
MARY JOHNSTON
Author of "To Have and To Hold"

THE love of Sir Mortimer for the fair Damaris Sedley, a lady-in-waiting, holds unswerving course through a narrative alive with stirring incidents of the days of Sir Walter Raleigh, when all England loved, sang, adventured, and fought, in the flush of youthful power. Herein is a love story of uncommon charm cast among stirring scenes—love in the lap of adventure, set forth with rare imaginative power.

Readers of "To Have and To Hold" will welcome in this tale of love and gallantry the distinct advance Miss Johnston has made upon her former success. The romance is instinct with new life and color, like the golden days with which it deals.

"The witchery of romance pervades its scenes, and once in the grasp of the story the reader will be swept along the current to the end."—Chicago Chronicle.

"Her thousands of admiring readers will thank her for the book—a strong, vigorous, original story, with honor as the theme."—Scraper Herald.

"May be classed among the gems of modern novels."—Birmingham News.

"She has reproduced in a wonderful manner the time of Elizabeth, with all its greatness and its littleness."—N. Y. World.

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK

Rulers of Kings

by
GERTRUDE ATHON
Author of "The Conqueror," "The Aristocrats"

IN this novel is pictured the conflict between the two greatest forces in the world—American wealth and European royalty—in which the former triumphs. Gertrude Athon, from whom the reading public has learned to expect surprises, has evolved a story both daring and original. Fessenden Abbott, the son of America's most colossal millionaire, in the midst of great financial undertakings that are watched by all the world, falls in love with the daughter of the Austrian Emperor. In her heart duty to the weakening monarchy of her fathers battles with an overmastering love for the young American. How Fessenden Abbott bends the will of emperors and alters the diplomatic relations of kingdoms to win the girl he loves is an original and most romantic piece of fiction writing.

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK

THE FUNNIEST OF BIOGRAPHIES

The Memoirs of a Baby

By JOSEPHINE DASKAM

NEVER before has the dignified title of "Memoirs" graced so funny a book as this latest tale of Josephine Daskam's—a writer widely known for her clever child studies. The sorry side of life—the tribulations of the little tots—have no place in this irresistibly amusing record of the home-life of a typical American couple. The baby refuses to develop psychologically or scientifically according to the theories set down in his Aunt Emma's books, but he grows to robust boyhood after a fashion of his own. All the various incidents of a lively youngster's boyhood, here find laughable portrayal. The unceasing arguments between the common-sense young father and the theoretical "Aunt Emma" not only afford such amusement as "Josephine Daskam alone can give us, but go to make a clever satire on "modern" methods of rearing children.

F. Y. Coy, whose pictures of baby-life have never been equalled for directness and humor, has illustrated the book copiously with pen-and-ink drawings. The pictures are every bit as funny as the narrative, and the book will provoke the laughter of any one who turns the pages.

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS, NEW YORK

THE GIVERS

By
MARY E. WILKINS FREEMAN

THESE are Mary E. Wilkins Freeman's latest stories. All are filled with the humor and pathos of New England life—the type of story which is indisputably the author's own, and in which she scored her remarkable early success.

Of the stories in this volume, the title story—"The Givers"—has created more widespread interest and called forth more letters from the author's readers than anything else Mrs. Freeman has done. It is a laughable tale of the revolt of a sturdy, strong-minded woman against the inappropriateness of the Christmas gifts with which she is deluged by her well-to-do, unthinking friends. How she leads each in turn to replace her gift with some homely, serviceable article is a triumph of rough-handed New England diplomacy and a highly amusing tale.

Sophia Lane is but one of the many characters in this book who are good to know and not soon forgotten.

Illustrated, Cloth, $1.25

HARPER & BROTHERS
PUBLISHERS NEW YORK CITY

Cash Dividends

and Other Concessions

Valuing Over

4½ MILLION DOLLARS

Have Been Voluntarily Given to Holders of Old Policies by

The Prudential

A Company Which is Actually Paying Out
More Than its Obligations. The Best Guarantee of Liberal Treatment.

Write for Policy Rates Today for Yourself or Your Family. Dept. T.

THE PRUDENTIAL INSURANCE CO. OF AMERICA

JOHN F. DRYDEN, Pres.

Home Office: NEWARK, N.J.

"Visit The Prudential's Exhibit, Palace of Education, World's Fair, St. Louis"

HARPER'S WEEKLY

EDITED BY

GEORGE HARVEY

HARPER & BROTHERS

NEW YORK

Other essions

LARS

en
by tial

ng Out
arantee

AMERICA
NEWARK, N.J.

In Search of the Unknown

By
ROBERT W. CHAMBERS

Author of "The Maid of Paradise," "Cardigan," etc.

THIS captivating story describes the strange adventures and novel love affairs of a young student of science who accompanies a learned professor on expeditions in search of the unknown in nature. The professor is on the track of some entirely new facts, with which he intends to astonish the world. In the meantime the student meets several girls, and half a dozen love affairs develop. A unique and highly entertaining story, in which Mr. Chambers has drawn his girls with his usual felicity, and their engaging charms are all the more piquant displayed in such fantastic surroundings.

Post 8vo, Cloth, $1.50

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK

Sir Mortimer

By
MARY JOHNSTON
Author of "To Have and To Hold"

THE love of Sir Mortimer for the fair Damara Sedley, a lady-in-waiting, holds unwavering course through a narrative alive with stirring incidents of the days of Sir Walter Raleigh, when all England loved, sang, adventured, and fought, in the flush of youthful power. Herein is a love story of uncommon charm cast among stirring scenes—love in the lap of adventure, set forth with rare imaginative power.

Readers of "To Have and To Hold" will welcome in this tale of love and gallantry the distinct advance Miss Johnston has made upon her former success. The romance is instinct with new life and color, like the golden days with which it deals.

"The witchery of romance pervades its scenes, and once in the grasp of the story the reader will be swept along the current to the end."—Chicago Chronicle.

"Her thousands of admiring readers will thank her for the book—a strong, vigorous, original story, with honor as the theme."—Sprague Herald.

"May be classed among the gems of modern novels."—Birmingham News.

"She has reproduced in a wonderful manner the time of Elizabeth, with all its greatness and its littleness."—N. Y. World.

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK

The Best ^{is} the Safest

SOME day men may not need weapons of defense, but since humanity is what it is to-day, arms must sometimes be carried, and those who carry them should insist on having the best.

You cannot provide yourself with a weapon without some feeling of responsibility. Properly used, the arm that you possess will protect your property and even save your life. You must have the weapon which is most reliable—the best.

The best is the safest; safest because simplest, made with the greatest care and of materials which experience has shown to be the most perfect for the purposes for which they are used.

It is precisely for these reasons that the best revolver is

THE COLT

Catalogue on Application.

Colt's Patent Fire Arms Mfg. Co.,
HARTFORD, CONN.

London Office, 26 Glasshouse St., London W., England.

Rulers of Kings

by
GERTRUDE ATHERTON
Author of "The Conqueror," "The Ancestress"

IN this novel is pictured the conflict between the two greatest forces in the world—American wealth and European royalty—in which the former triumphs. Gertrude Atherton, from whom the reading public has learned to expect surprises, has evolved a story both daring and original. Fessenden Abbott, the son of America's most colossal millionaire, in the midst of great financial undertakings that are watched by all the world, falls in love with the daughter of the Austrian Emperor. In her heart duty to the weakening monarchy of her fathers battles with an overmastering love for the young American. How Fessenden Abbott bends the will of emperors and alters the diplomatic relations of kingdoms to win the girl he loves is an original and most romantic piece of fiction writing.

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK

HARPER'S WEEKLY

Vol. XLVII.

New York, Saturday, September 17, 1904

No. 391

Copyright, 1904, by Harper & Brothers. All rights reserved

HARPER'S WEEKLY

Vol. XLVIII.

No. 2291

EDITED BY GEORGE HARVEY

THIRTY-SIX PAGES

NEW YORK CITY, SEPTEMBER 17, 1904

Terms: To Clubs a Copy—84 cts a Year, in Advance

Postage free to all Subscribers in the United States, Canada, Mexico, Hawaii, Porto Rico, the Philippine Islands, Luzon, and Tientsin, China

Entered at the New York Post-Office as second class matter

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS
NEW YORK CITY: FRANKLIN SQUARE
LONDON: 45 ALBEMARLE STREET, W.

COMMENT

PLATFORM: NO HERRING!

When, last week, in commenting upon the Herald's prediction of a political revolution which would elect John P. Morgan, we confessed our inability to detect signs of Republican forsaking their party, we did not have Vermont particularly in mind. Indeed, we knew very little of the conditions in that State beyond the fact that the Democrats were handicapped by a lot of inferior orators and the necessity of opposing a popular farmer candidate—even the President of the Grange—for Governor. But the result certainly sustains our contention. The Republican management undoubtedly put its best foot forward, sending up its best speakers and enlisting on Uncle ROOSEVELT's platform its utmost endeavorers, but what of that so long as it was able to show the country the largest majority—except in 1896—ever rolled up in a preliminary election in Vermont in a Presidential year? No wonder Mr. ROOSEVELT broke a silence that is becoming really oppressive long enough to express gratification. Two facts were apparently established: first, that there is no general revolt against his administration; second, that the conduct of his enemies is infinitely more efficient than that of his antagonist. There seems to have been no definite purpose on the part of the Democratic managers regarding the Vermont election. They neither did their best nor announced, as they might properly have done, that they would attempt no miracle in a hopeless situation. Consequently, when election day came, as would be said in the State where the deed was done, they were between lay and grass, and could neither explain nor excuse. Not enough time has elapsed to determine the actual effect of this first indication of public sentiment. The Republicans may be muchly encouraged and the Democrats utterly discouraged, but we hardly think so. A swift kick is good for optimists of the Times ilk, and sometimes results in an appreciation of the necessity of eliminating personal jealousies and getting down to business under single-minded direction. Up to the present time, however, so far as we can judge, General Chaos is still in command of the Democratic forces.

On Thursday, September 1, the World, the most aggressive newspaper supporter of the Democratic ticket, printed conspicuously upon its first page a story to the effect that Mr. J. PIERPONT MORGAN had made two visits surreptitiously to President ROOSEVELT, apparently by appointment, and that, as a result of four conferences, the two men had made a trade, by which Mr. MORGAN agreed to supply a large sum of money for use in the Republican campaign, and Mr. ROOSEVELT promised, in return therefor, to virtually submit to Mr. MORGAN's dictation in all matters pertaining to corporate interests, in the event of his election as President of the United States. The story was told with a minuteness of detail obviously designed to carry conviction to any possible doubter. Mr. MORGAN, accompanied only by Mr. CHARLES STEELE, one of his partners, had left the New York anchorage of the yacht-club at a certain hour on each of the two days on his steam-yacht, the Corsair, had landed in his launch at a certain point in the harbor of Oyster Bay at a specified hour, had proceeded thence to the President's summer home, where the conference took place, had returned at a stated time to the launch and the yacht, and had sailed away, the bargain having been made to mutual satisfaction. The head-lines under which the story was printed were as follows:

MORGAN SEES ROOSEVELT; DEAL MADE. TWO SECRET TRIPS BY THE BANKER IN HIS YACHT "CORSAIR" INSURE THE WALL STREET INTERESTS TO THE PRESIDENT BY TERMS SATISFACTORY TO BOTH. PARTNER STEELE AT THE TEN-HOUR CONFERENCE. MORGAN AND ROOSEVELT TALK OVER SITUATION AND THE FORMER OFFERS AID AND ADVISE THAT MAY WIN SUPPORT—THE BANKER TO RAISE IT UP, THE PRESIDENT TO "BE GOOD."

The result of the alleged conference was summed up in the article itself in these words:

That the result was favorable to all the wishes of President ROOSEVELT, as well as of Morgan's, political circles have long been well informed. It is thoroughly understood that President ROOSEVELT at this meeting, which is now a bit of political history, pledged to Morgan, body and bones, the future of the Republican party, and that in return for the promise that nothing "revolutionary" was to follow, President ROOSEVELT's election, the entire vast weight of the Morgan interests was to be thrown for the Republicans, and that all the money needed from Wall Street was to be produced at the proper time by a syndicate, with J. PIERPONT MORGAN at its head.

There was no equivocation, no reserve left to deceive rumor or mistaken inference. The positive assertion was made, as quoted, and confirmed editorially that President ROOSEVELT had "pledged, body and bones, the Republican party" and, of course, the nation and, of course, his official and personal honor in return for "money from Wall Street" to insure his election. It was the most astounding story, in a public sense, that has appeared in any American newspaper since the Times exposed the corrupt practices of WILLIAM M. THURGOOD and his associates.

Immediately upon receipt of a copy of the newspaper containing the article, i. e., on the same day, Thursday, September 1, President ROOSEVELT personally authorized the issuance of, and, we have no doubt, personally dictated, the following statement:

The story in the World about the visit of Mr. Morgan to the President at Oyster Bay is a lie from beginning to end. Neither Mr. Morgan nor any representative of Mr. Morgan has seen the President or communicated with him directly or indirectly at Oyster Bay or anywhere else. As far as the President or any one around him knows, Mr. Morgan has been nowhere near Oyster Bay, in a yacht or otherwise.

It would be difficult to construct a more emphatic or comprehensive denial. The World, in common with the other newspapers, published it conspicuously upon its first page under the heading "The President Says the World Lied." Notwithstanding the denial, however, the evening editions of the World, printed hours after the President's statement appeared in its own columns, published conspicuously a cartoon depicting the President and Mr. Morgan in the act of hiding the bargain. This could only be construed as an insinuation that the President, not the World, was the real liar. The only substantiation of its story the World has since produced, at the time this is written, is contained in an alleged interview with "Captain SEYMOUR BANKS, of the launch Scandalito, which carries passengers from the railway pier in Oyster Bay to the Senecaunda Corinthian Yacht Club," who "told a World reporter yesterday that J. PIERPONT MORGAN's yacht, the Corsair, had moored twice in Oyster Bay this summer," and continued: "The last time she was here was about six weeks ago. She came in the afternoon and anchored off the yacht-club, flying the absence pennant, which indicated that Mr. MORGAN was not on board. It was between four and five o'clock in the afternoon of the same day that Mr. MORGAN came down to the pier in Oyster Bay, and got into my launch. He was accompanied by a tall man of distinguished appearance, whose cheeks were hollow. I took them to the club-house landing, but instead of going up to the club-house they entered a small boat and were taken aboard the Corsair. Within half an hour the Corsair got under way and started off in the direction of New London." The World supplemented this impressive utterance with a statement that its reporters had besought both Mr. MORGAN and Mr. STEELE to confirm or repudiate its story and that both had refused to discuss the matter, apparently considering the obvious discoloration of even a mere admission that the word of the President might require substantiation from them or anybody else. Further than this, nothing has appeared at present writing, except a significant statement that the story was not printed until after a thorough investigation, covering a period of two weeks, had been made.

Now, how are we to account for the publication in a great newspaper of this monstrous accusation of perfidy against the Chief Magistrate of the nation? And how for its refusal of explanation or disavowal? We feel certain that the World would not wittingly have perpetrated a fake so glaring and so sure of prompt exposure. It must have been imposed upon. Then what sort of "investigation" was made in those fourteen days which elapsed before it felt justified in printing the story? And why is not the impostor exposed to public gaze and brought to the bar of justice? Such an imposition is a fraud, and a fraud is a misdemeanor. Does the World think to serve either the public's or its own interests by permitting such a one to go unscathed, in shielding him from the rightful effect of his own wilful act? The World's own punishment need not be considered. Not for years, if ever, can the damage to its position and prestige be repaired. But Mr. JOSEPH PLUTZER is in this country in active control of the newspaper. He writes and signs columns of luminous articles in support of the Democratic candidates. Has he not a word to say of this outrageous performance?

Truth must be proclaimed, illustrated, established.—
JOSEPH PLUTZER, in the World of September 3.
Yes, indeed!

Mr. EDWARD H. HANNA, just returned from Europe, is the latest acquisition of the Tribune's Four Men's Party. "It will be ROOSEVELT and FANNIN," he says. "Everybody wants them." It is a broad statement, if he refers to the fifteen millions of citizens who will vote next November if it doesn't rain, but the Tribune accepts it gracefully and gratefully. When Mr. HANNA took his dinner-pail and started eastward some months ago he was looking rather sickly, but he seems quite strong enough now to take a place under the hambone-tree. For the information of our rural readers, we may say that Mr. HANNA—or "Ed," as his fellow brakemen used to call him—is still working for (some regard the proposition as superfluous) the Union Pacific Railroad Company. He hawks at piece-work, but they found after a while that it was cheaper to put him on salary, and finally they concluded that it would be well to divide even that with the Southern Pacific Railroad Company if they expected to have anything left to pay freight-cars with. But then his habit of industry had grown to such proportions that he didn't have enough to do to keep him busy, and he signified a willingness to work also for—again the possibly superfluous proposition—the Northern Pacific and Great Northern Railroad companies. As we understand it, they are still considering his application with the kind assistance of various United States courts. There seems to be apprehension in some quarters that he might prove too expensive owing, doubtless, to an unauthenticated rumor that, in addition to his salary, the Union Pacific has to hang a trotter and the Southern Pacific a sulky on his Christmas tree every year. But all this has nothing to do with Mr. HANNA's meeting the requirements of membership in the Poor Man's Party. He is really so hard up that when he wants his boots blacked he never thinks of patronizing a dago, but passes a button marked "Governor-chairman" and gets a shine for nothing. It looks now as if he might have a chance to show his appreciation by casting a ballot for his shiner about the time he helps to prove that "everybody" is for ROOSEVELT and FANNIN.

Our Republican contemporary, the Sun,—Boston Herald.

Nonsense! The Sun is an independent journal earnestly striving just now to keep a straight face while advocating the election of THEODORE ROOSEVELT. But wait till the Governor-chairman raises his hand for reelection! We cannot be counted as one of his thick-and-thin suggesters, but it is a severe temptation to hope for his nomination just for the pleasure of seeing the sparks fly from the anvil at Park Row and Frankfort Street.

That Tribune editor is a slippery fellow. It will be remembered that he did not come down to the office on the night of the day when Judge PARKER sent his telegram, and here he is away again, with the result that the foreman of the composing-room reprints approvingly this cartoon in the Banghouston Press:

No doubt the shades depicted will exercise their best endeavors in a restraining way as indicated, but the question is, how much dependence can you put upon the influence of ghosts in a situation of this kind? We may be privileged to see later, but while the present pre-natural calm envelops Oyster Bay, the Tribune man will do well not to forget his cue. He may get himself disliked.

Mr. SUTHERLAND seems determined to get the Four Hundred into line.

We are beginning to doubt the salubrity of the famous air of the Berkshire Hills. It seems almost heretical to say so, but what can one think when Professor HENRY LEONIS NELSON, surely concerned in Williamsonian as a preacher of political economy to helpless students, has the nightmare? Professor NELSON is an able publicist and, despite evidences of an occasional attack of the filip, we have always regarded him as sound in mind and body. But there can be no doubt that he is beginning to see things. His latest vision is of the Colonel as Emperor of All the United States holding down his throne by force of arms. "Mr. ROOSEVELT's tendency to autocracy," he fearfully declares, "is shown by the expenditures which are being made in preparation for famed war, for the first object of an autocrat is to increase the armed force of the nation, and then to make it his personal force. Mr. ROOSEVELT has made the military force, especially the army, his own by favoritism." This is getting serious. We have often observed that, in the course of his active and varied career, the Colonel has seemed a little hampered at times; also, that he is somewhat disposed to run things his own way in Washington. But we had not harbored even a remote suspicion that he was conspiring with the other 99,999 members of our overpopulated army to take possession of the whole eighty millions of us. All we have to say is that it is a mighty mean thing to do, and we hope the attempt will fail, although it is difficult to see what to do about it in this expensively fly-time. Cannot the Professor himself come to the rescue? He has a good many friends in the navy, which, he intimates, is not yet committed to the daring venture, and if he will raise a suitable standard over his pet catboat off the Esopus landing, we doubt not a great rally will ensue. But he should act promptly. The bogy man will catch him if he don't watch out.

We hope that GEORGE HARVEY, editor of HARPER'S WEEKLY, will soon tell the world, openly and aboveboard, why the St. Louis Democratic convention did not nominate the Sage of Princeton, Hon. THOMAS CLEVELAND, for President. He knows all the reasons for that omisssion, and doubtless they are mighty good reasons!—Oxford News.

The best. Not enough delegates would vote for him.

Hollo! Doctor McKELWAY KNOWS a lot more things he hasn't told; in two columns of double leads he firmly admits it. This time he speaks from what there is left of the true inwardness of Uncle DAVID HILL, and definitely repudiates the report that that formerly crafty gentleman objects to the nominations of Judge CYRUS for Chief Justice, and Judge WENGER for Associate Justice of the Court of Appeals. "He has pronounced for nobody and against nobody. He has simply withheld himself and, so far as he could, has withheld his friends from favoring or disfavoring any men for the Court of Appeals judgeships, to be filled by election, this year. The difficulty of receiving this, considering Mr. HILL's incessant political activity heretofore, increases the duty of receiving it. It is a fact. The Essex's statement concerning it rests on knowledge, not on impression, or hearsay or deduction—but on knowledge." That is the way to talk. As the Doctor himself would say, when you know a thing, you don't guess it. And he knew all the time, the sly dog, but wouldn't tell. Somebody whom he obviously is acquainted with and possibly admires also kept other important information very quiet. Listen:

The latter (Mr. HILL) long ago made up his mind to withdraw from State politics. He long ago desired to announce his intention to do so at the date just named by him. For purely personal reasons, and at others' request, he withheld his announcement till now. Some to whom he privately communicated it would have violated no confidence had they announced the fact. But they consciously refrained from announcing it, because they thought it should first be announced only by Mr. HILL himself. It has been first announced by him, and they feel vindicated for their own voluntary reserve concerning it.

There! What do you think of that? Could anything be more chivalrous? But how well rewarded! Contemplate the consciousness satisfaction induced by the supreme "vindication" of "voluntary"—voluntary, mind you—reserve. Who can that peerless knight who reaped this noble self-appreciation have been? Doctor McKELWAY himself, by chance? We bet it was.

The supporters of Judge PARKER who are urging the nomination of Colonel LAMONT for Governor are making a mistake. He is a vigorous and honorable man, but he would not be a strong candidate. DELANEY SMALL is the man to nominate.

We must confess our preference that Judge PARKER be elected by the American people, and not by MR. CROKER, MR. MARSHY, or MR. HARVEY.—Boston (Herald)

Oh, very well!

Senator DREW declares emphatically that we hold the Philippines by perfect title and "could no more give them up than we could give up Louisiana or Florida," acquired in the same way. We confess our inability to see why we couldn't if we wanted to or considered that doing so would not conflict with a sense of duty to our wards. Mr. ROOSEVELT, Secretary TART, and the Republican platform admit that much—and more. They even promise to do it after a while—quite a while, maybe. Still, somebody should guide a flea into the Senator's ear. His remarks don't tally.

Senator EVERHART'S name may be found among the contributors to leading magazines, and it is believed he will help the Republican party now by his writing this year than by speeches.—Times dispatch from Chester Bay.

Oh, come, now! he speaks very well.

We said last week that the great trouble with Mr. DAVID B. HILL as a politician was that he never in his life had an honest conviction. But convictions do not come as a matter of course; settled opinions are the fruit of much thought and some study and of the experience of life. Mr. HILL has not spared thought, nor study, but it is possible that his experience of life has been in some respects defective. His chief interest has been practical politics; his chief associates have been practical politicians. He has no small vices. He does not smoke or drink wine. But these are both social indulgences, the accompaniments, as a rule, of varied discourse. Moreover, Mr. HILL is not only a bachelor, but one with very slight inclination for mixed society. He has habitually denied himself not only the common pleasures and solaces of domestic life, but the inspirations that come from the society and discourse of intelligent women. Now, womanhood constitutes the greatest help and one of the most important sources of inspiration that has been vouchsafed to man. Some great politicians have been bachelors; GEORGE CLEVELAND and SAMUEL JOHNSON among others. But in Mr. HILL's case the celibate condition, taken in conjunction with the freedom from small social vices, seems to have resulted in too restricted a contact with general society, and overmuch concentration on political details.

It requires a lot of self-repression to be a candidate these days. EVER REV. DR. SELAS CANNON SWALLOW ain't aisy! a word.

The Associated Press, apologizing for disseminating the report that Uncle DAVID called Mr. ROOSEVELT "a fraud," lately says that "it seems that a reporter of a local Democratic paper, upon whom the Associated Press depended for a report, failed to attend the meeting, but instead invented a speech for Senator HILL, which contained several statements wholly misrepresenting the Senator's views and quite at variance with his utterances," which induces the frank, though suitably humble suggestion that Generalissimo MARIAGA E STONE might serve his country to greater advantage by hobnobbing less with kings and emperors and looking more sharply after the working of his organization. The Associated Press really has a reputation to lose, and a few more inexcusable occurrences of this sort would not have an effect of reassurance that it will be saved.

It is no whitish campaign that the Democrats have entered into to be won by host and hire, but a deliberate and candid appeal to the nation on matters that concern the greatest principles of administration and Constitution.—New Orleans Times-Democrat.

Their choice of a chairman is proof conclusive.

HARPER'S WEEKLY treats with asperity (and pretended indifference) the suspicion of the public that its hostility toward President ROOSEVELT is governed by what is generally known in the country as the Wall Street influence. It proclaims its virtue as of the disinterested quality which is inspired solely by independent patriotism, and benevolence.—The Press.

This is the best sample yet of a great mind in sarcastic action. Just when HARPER'S WEEKLY "resented with asperity" or "pretended indignation" or "proclaimed its virtue" or carved a host about a "suspicion" that may or may not exist, we are not aware. Perhaps the Press can inform us. If so we will take and pay for one thousand campaign subscriptions to its own wood-pulp and eat it. Since, however, the slights are on our trail, we may as well confess and be done with it. HARPER'S WEEKLY is really edited by Mr. JAMES D. ROCKWELL. He doesn't like to edit, but he took the job because he needed the money. Moreover, he discovered that reading proofs makes him grow—and he also needed that. His associates are Messrs. HENRY H. ROGERS, JOHN D. ARNOLD, and DANIEL O'DAY. The insignia of the art department is Mr. J. PIERPONT MORGAN. He uses the steamship Corsica solely in the service of the WEEKLY. When, according to the World, though not according to the President, he stemmed shyly from the Twenty-third Street anchorage at 3 P.M. of a sunny day for Oyster Bay, his real mission was to get a snap-shot of Mr. ROOSEVELT skimming an oar, for publication in this paper. Our fashion department is in charge of Mr. JAMES H. HYDE, the well and favorably known model of Paris. All telegraphic and cable messages are received and sent by Messrs. CLARENCE H. MAYNARD and GEORGE J. GALT.

who alternate in the day and night service. The cashier is Mr. JAMES SWELLMAN, who also answers letters from complaining subscribers.

Our chief poet is Mr. JOHN A. McCALL, whose most successful recent production was the verse entitled "Memories," to which he attached his pen-name, LOUISE MORGAN SELL. Readers of the WEEKLY will remember it well. It was designed to be an ode to Mr. ROOSEVELT celebrating the emotion experienced by a poetic nature upon discovering an unsuspected political fancy. Having this explanation of its origin, our readers will be interested in recalling it, thus:

MEMORIES.

First, dear, I loved you like the dawn,
A cool new love, discreet and pale,
A love that trembled like a fawn,
Full of shy fear lest love should fail.

Then came the moon-love; like a flower
That glows in the embracing air
It sang its beauty to the hour,
And passing, left a fragrance there.

And now 'tis sunset, and the mere
Is all bloom like blossoming trees,
And now my erring love is here,
Half sleeping with old memories.

Mr. McCALL intended to make it longer, but just as he began the fourth verse a life-insurance agent came in to get him to take out a policy, and he was obliged to lay down his pen. The foreigner who signs SYDNEY BROSAS in the flesh Mr. ANDREW CONNORS, rather thinly disguised. Of the more important special articles published recently we may say that "Italian without a Grammar," signed MARY TUSTIN, was written by Mr. RICHARD A. MCCORMY, and "The Use of Adversity," signed W. D. HOWLAND, by Mr. CHARLES M. SCHWAB. These are only their pen-names. They write differently when they sign checks. The editorial policy is determined by the entire staff assembled in solemn conclave, and it is only proper to state that, in deciding upon the manifestation of the notable "hostility" to Mr. ROOSEVELT so strongly detected by the Press, the vote was unanimous.

The essence distilled from the verbiage of Mr. BOWKER COCHRAN's latest public utterance is to the effect that, so long as the bulk of the population comprises the mass of the people, we shall not be ruled by the privileged few. It is probably safe, therefore, to assume that even a week's search for righteous living left the heart true to Fall.

Secretary TART said, in his speech at Montpelier, "The Republicans hope that the time may come when they [the Filipinos] may be safely granted independence, and think that it will come." Mr. BROW, at Chicago, expressed his confident expectation "that the Filipino people will follow in the footsteps of the people of Cuba," and "will come to bear substantially such relations to the people of the United States as do now the people of Cuba." Judge PARKER calmed Mr. MURPHY'S anxieties on this subject with the assurance that when he said "self-government for the Filipinos" he meant eventual independence. He is even willing to promise now that they shall have their independence when they are fit for it. Perhaps the President will use some new turn of language about this matter in his letter of acceptance, which at this writing has not yet seen the light. Are we all practically of one mind and accord about those islands? Where is Senator BEVERIDGE? He who, in seconding Mr. ROOSEVELT'S nomination at Chicago, cried, "They [the people] know that while he is President the flag will stay put, and no American advantage in the Pacific, or the world, be surrendered." It is perfectly safe to say that we shall not be quit of the Philippines within the next five years, but does Senator BEVERIDGE now feel, as TART and BROW and PARKER do, that ultimate independence for the Filipinos is a thing to be hoped for, and confidently expected?

According to the Boston Herald, Mr. COVINGTON has warned the Republican spellbinders to fight shy of advocating high living expenses, after the fashion set by Secretary SHAW. The impression seems to have struck in that, just at this time, when most people are having all they can do to make ends meet, the idea might not evoke unbridled enthusiasm. We dare say this is so. Neither will the worthy Secretary. He has never yet opened his mouth without putting his foot in it.

While timidly rejoicing that there is no strike on the elevated, surface, and subway railroads, one cannot escape a pang of regret on the Journa's account.

The Evening Post's head-line over Mr. SHAFER'S Burning-ton speech runs, "ROOSEVELT Personally the Issue." The World's head-line over a communication from Professor NELSON runs, "The Real Issue is ROOSEVELT." There are seven weeks before election. They will all be profiles of argument and discourse, and the nut of it all will be—ROOSEVELT. It is not a question whether the Republican candidate is a good man, but whether he is the kind of a good man that the country wants for President. There was once a conundrum: Would you rather, or go fishing?

It may be instructive—we hope it will not be distressing—to our Southern brethren to observe that so conspicuous and distinguished a supporter of the Democratic ticket as BROWER JOHN E. PARSONS has been dining with BOWEN WASHINGTON at Stockbridge. But, of course, at Stockbridge there is no local race question.

Some remarkable estimates of the cost of Presidential campaigns have recently been published in the New York Times and Philadelphia Public Ledger. The data on which these estimates are based must be largely conjectural, as nobody believes that the accounts of national and State committees are rigorously audited. Few well-informed persons are likely to dispute the fundamental assertion that, for one dollar disbursed by a national campaign committee, at least four dollars are expended by the State committee of the same party in the forty-five States. It is this fact, often overlooked, which renders credible the current report that four years ago it cost $25,000,000 to reelect President McKINLEY. According to the computations to which we have referred, the aggregate outlay of both parties this year will be about five million dollars less. The difference is attributed to the unlikelihood that the Republicans, who are confident of victory, will deem it necessary to spend even half as much as they did in 1900. The Democrats will have much more at their disposal than they had four years ago, but their national campaign committee is not expected to disburse more than three million dollars, or about one million more than the Republicans think will be required, so far as the funds confided to their national committee are concerned, to keep Mr. ROOSEVELT in the White House. If we assume that the national committees of both parties will expend between them five million dollars and that the State committees of both parties will disburse only three times as much, we still have a total of twenty million dollars to be distributed in the form of campaign seed. As we have previously pointed out, no considerable fraction of the funds at the disposal of campaign committees can be used in corrupting voters. Almost the whole of the money will be devoted to organizing, advertising, and exhorting.

For printing and stationery alone it is calculated that each of the national campaign committees will spend half a million dollars. Of the scores of millions of documents sent out, a great many are franked, but to distribute the residue requires a huge outlay for postage. Extremely expensive also is the house-to-house canvass, which is made by each party early in September, and again about a fortnight before election day. Of course no such canvass is needed in any of the former slave States, except Delaware, Maryland, West Virginia, and, possibly, Kentucky. It would be equally superfluous in Pennsylvania or Vermont. No other item of expenditure is comparable with the sums paid for campaign speeches. It is expected that, when the campaign is fully under way, no fewer than five thousand political orators will be placed upon the stump as many "spellbinders" will be mastered by the State committees, the aggregate number of exhorters will not fall much short of sixty thousand. Some of the speakers receive $250 a week, together with their expenses, while others will accept no money for their services, but allow their actual disbursements to be made good. It is probable that the total cost of campaign-speaking on both sides, if as long in view the agents of both the national and State committees, is not overestimated when it is put at eight million dollars. As everybody knows, political campaigning is far better organized, and, consequently, more expensive, than it was forty, or even twenty, years ago. It is computed, though, as we have said, the data for the computation are by no means exhaustive, that the outlay of the national campaign committee of the Republican party in 1864 did not exceed $200,000, and that in 1864 it was only about $1,000,000. High-water mark seems to have been reached, not in 1860, as is generally supposed, but in 1860. This year the Republicans have a material advantage over the Democrats in way of expenditures, owing to the fact that Mr. DEMAS CARRAN, so far, has advocated the election of Judge PIERCE.

At the hour when we write, it is uncertain whether the Supreme Court of Wisconsin will place in the Republican column of the ballot the ticket headed by ROBERT M. LA FOLLETTE, or the so-called "Stalwart" ticket, headed by Representative S. A. COOK. The Stalwart faction obtained an order to show cause why a mandamus should not be issued to compel Secretary of State WALTER HAYES to place the Cook ticket in the Republican column. HAYES has replied, denying that the court has jurisdiction. If the court sustains HAYES'S plea, both Cook and LA FOLLETTE are expected to run. LA FOLLETTE will remain in the field even if the court should assert jurisdiction, and should grant the mandamus requested. If, on the other hand, the court should refuse the mandamus, not on the plea of non-jurisdiction, but on the ground that the LA FOLLETTE ticket is the legal one, Representative COOK is expected to withdraw from the contest for the governorship. In that event, nobody doubts that LA FOLLETTE would be re-elected Governor over his Democratic competitor, and that the Republican nominees for Presidential electors would also be chosen. Very few well-informed persons believe, however, that the outcome of the legal proceedings will be to leave only one Republican ticket in the field. If there are two Republican tickets, the Democratic ticket headed by GEORGE W. PERKINS has a fair prospect of success. We observe that ex-Senator W. F. VILAS and other Wisconsin friends of Mr. CLEVELAND have entered with vigor into the campaign, and seem to have hopes of victory.

There is timely reading in Colonel ROBERT BISHAM'S article on "Sectional Misunderstandings" in the September North American Review. How right a basis on paper secession had, Colonel BISHAM has set forth briefly and in an interesting and striking way, and he tells some things that not many readers of this generation know; as that "Revolution in the Constitution," studied as a textbook at West Point from 1855 to 1859, by ROBERT E. LEE and JEFFERSON DAVIS among others, expressly and repeatedly recognized the right of a State to secede from the Union. He tells how the New England States asserted the right of secession in six special cases before 1800. He tells of the early efforts of Virginia to get rid of slavery; how in 1793 her legislature prohibited the further importation of slaves; how in the Federal convention of 1787 she stoutly opposed New England, South Carolina, and Georgia, when they voted for the prohibition of the slave trade for twenty years. He tells about the Southern antislavery societies which flourished up to the time when the Garrisonian abolition movement gained headway in the thirties in Massachusetts. Firing that what is called "race prejudice" is not peculiar to the South he easily makes a strong case for his assertion that while the large proportionate negro population makes race instinct with social and political discrimination against the negro much more prevalent in the South than the North, race prejudice, with economic discrimination against negroes, yellow men, and brown men, is much more prevalent in the North.

What Colonel BISHAM is after in setting forth these truths of history and facts of current existence, is to make the North understand the South a little better, and to pay due attention to the beam in its own eye, and not devote itself too exclusively to the mote in its Southern brother's eye, to the end that North and South may understand one another better and work together in fuller harmony to solve the difficult problems that are the concern of both. Great progress in this direction of a better understanding based on fuller knowledge, has been made in the last two decades. It is exceedingly important that it should continue, and such deliverances as this of Colonel BISHAM'S are well adapted to further it.

Colonel BISHAM was a colonel of Confederate infantry who surrendered with his regiment at Appomattox. Written in the same wise and conciliatory spirit as his article, is another article contributed to the same magazine by CHARLES W. THOMAS, a Northern lawyer, who also served in the civil war, but on the Federal side. Mr. THOMAS was a delegate to the recent Republican convention at Chicago. He discusses the disfranchisement of many of the Southern negroes, the provisions of the Constitution which sought to prevent it, and the best solution of the problem that has arisen out of the failure of those provisions to do what was expected of them. The provisions in question are the second section of the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution, and the Fifteenth Amendment. The former provides that when the right to vote is denied to any of the male inhabitants of a State the representation of that State in Congress shall be reduced proportionately. The latter—the Fifteenth Amendment—provides that the right of citizens shall not be denied or abridged "on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude."

The Fifteenth Amendment, Mr. THOMAS holds, is a demonstrated failure, and encumbers the Constitution. He finds that the Southern States were compelled by disastrous evils to evade it, and have finally provided successful legal devices to that end. In section 2 of the Fourteenth Amendment he finds serious defects and structural weaknesses. He says the representation of the Southern States must in time be made proportionate to the number of voters, but for various reasons he deprecates the enforcement of section 2. Its enforcement, he says, would be very difficult, would make bad feeling, would do injustice, and would be generally objectionable and untimely. He would find a way out of this difficult situation which would be both sound in theory and acceptable in practice. He proposes to repeal the Fifteenth Amendment, and section 2 (and 3) of the Fourteenth Amendment by a new Sixteenth Amendment, which shall provide that Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States according to the number of male inhabitants who are permitted by State law to vote for President and members of Congress. This plan would leave suffrage in the hands of the States where it was before the Fifteenth Amendment was adopted. It offers a premium for extending the suffrage instead of providing a penalty for restricting it. Mr. THOMAS thinks that this solution of a difficult question would be acceptable to reasonable men in the South. Perhaps so. Perhaps reasonable men in the North would favor it also, and perhaps there are enough reasonable men in North and South to get the new amendment adopted. At any rate the suggestion has some excellent points, and is worthy to be discussed.

We learn with satisfaction from a special report made to the State Department by Mr. JOHN BARNETT, American Minister to Panama, that the climate of the Isthmus is by no means so unhealthy as it is usually described. He says that, as a matter of fact, there was not a single death in July or in August when it was impossible to sleep comfortably, and that, on an average, the days have not been hotter than they were in New York or Washington. At the date when Mr. BARNETT wrote, apparently about a week ago, there had not been a single case of yellow fever for over a month, and there was less malaria than is often encountered in sections of the United States where there is considerable turning up of the soil. Of course, the existing sanitary arrangements of the Isthmus leave much to be desired, but Mr. BARNETT has no doubt that, when the plans adopted by the Canal Commission for the improvement of the canal zone, and of the adjoining cities of Panama and Colon, have been carried out, the Isthmus will be one of the healthiest regions in the world. This welcome information would naturally have the effect of attracting adventurous Americans to the canal zone. It is, therefore, a timely warning given by Mr. BARNETT, that, while the cost of living on the Isthmus has increased nearly 500 per cent. during the last six months, there are but few, if any, opportunities, for the establishing of new mercantile and professional firms. Evidently there are no fortunes to be made at Panama.

Senator Lodge on the Campaign Issues

In the leading article of the September number of the North American Review, Senator H. C. Lodge, of Massachusetts, sets forth the reasons why, in his judgment, Mr. ROOSEVELT should be elected President. Aside from the skill and earnestness with which the Republican nominee is commended to his fellow countrymen by a personal friend, who is at once a veteran politician and a practiced writer, the article derives special interest from the probability, not to say certainty, that it was submitted to the President before publication, and that not a word of which Mr. Roosevelt disapproves would have been suffered to stand. What we have before us, therefore, is a document reflecting faithfully Mr. ROOSEVELT's own convictions and intentions, and intended to figure among the expostitions thereof midway between the speech of acceptance and the as yet unuttered speech of rejection. Under the circumstances, Mr. Lodge's contribution to the North American Review challenges close scrutiny on the part of both Republicans and Democrats. All Republicans except antimilitarists and the friends of reciprocity and immediate revision will read it with satisfaction, and it will be strange if Democrats do not find in it some matter for criticism.

Mr. Lodge is one of those Republicans who assert that events have by no means taken the gold standard out of politics. Much stress is laid on the assertion, in spite of the telegram sent by Judge PARKER to the St. Louis convention, and of the confirmation of his nomination by that body after his opposition to the free coinage of silver at the ratio of 16 to 1 was made known. The Senator from Massachusetts also seeks to conclude, or even insinuate, in the paragraph immediately preceding the paragraph that the gold standard is not an issue, and that Democratic nominees may hold any opinion upon the subject of the monetary question that they prefer. The gold standard, we are reminded, depends for its perpetuity upon the laws that are inscribed on the Federal statute book. The latest law relating to the subject was passed there by the Republican party, and so long as that party remains in power the law will neither be repealed nor so much as attacked. Why? Because the Republican President and the Republican party are absolutely at one in approval of that law. Republicans are not at liberty to hold any views they choose about the gold standard, for the error that they most profess, if they are to be acknowledged as Republicans, was formulated for them by the Chicago convention. So far, on the other hand, as any prominent member of the St. Louis convention is concerned, Mr. Lodge points out that not only Judge PARKER, but Democratic Senators and Representatives are, for their part, at liberty to go to Washington and make any attack they please upon the gold standard. This is true, but Democrats may hesitate to accept without qualification Mr. Lodge's supplemental statement that, even if the attack should fail, any agitation about the standard of money is purely confidence-inspiring, and is, in the long run, less prejudicial than the absolute repeal of the existing law would be. The Senator from Massachusetts underlines the good sense and composure of business men. They cannot be thrown into a panic by scarecrows. They are aware that not a session of Congress passes without some silly, irresponsible onslaught on freely established laws. They might be worried by a proposal to abolish the gold standard, if it were supported by the leader of one of the great parties in the House of Representatives, and if it had a chance of becoming a law. But what possible chance would such a monetary revolution have of being recorded on the statute-book if the White House were occupied by a man whose acceptance of the gold standard is not only known, but has been tried in the fire of temptation? Even if it were conceivable, moreover, that Judge PARKER, when elected to the St. Louis convention, had been so far from refusing to change it as the risk of losing thereby the nomination, a further fortress of the gold standard would remain intact. In fact, namely, that throughout the Fifty-ninth and the Sixtieth Congresses the Republicans are assured beforehand of a substantial majority in the Senate.

When all is said, however, it cannot be denied that Mr. Lodge is well advised when he makes the most of his party's adherence to the gold standard during the last eight years, and shows how led to win a third Presidential contest on the strength of it. It remains to be seen whether he can put across the issue into a semblance of life. Another feature of the Senator's article, which will be regarded by Republicans—and, for that matter, by many Democrats—with approbation, is the position that he takes with reference to the Philippines. It is true, as he and Secretary Tamm, that our administration of the islands has been visibly successful, compared with the experiment made by our Spanish predecessors. Unquestionably law and order reign throughout the archipelago to a degree never known before, and it seems to be equally indisputable that the Filipinos have a larger share in their own local government than they ever had before. It is also true, as the Senator and the Secretary say, that he and Secretary Tamm have been able to make the Filipinos understand that they have been promised to make vague promises to concede absolute independence at an unmeasured date, or to make, indeed, any promise which we are not prepared to carry out to the letter. It certainly would not comport with dignity or decency, in saying nothing of morality, for the American people, speaking through its Executive and Legislature, to tell in deliberate lie. These trifling but decisive objections to the indefinite assurances of good intentions embodied in the St. Louis platform and in Judge PARKER's speech of acceptance. They would furnish no answer at all, on the other hand, to a declaration—should Judge PARKER furnish one in his forthcoming letter of acceptance—that we are bound in morals and in expediency to put us toward the Filipinos precisely the same course which we have followed toward the Cubans, and, in the longer run, as in the latter, should make a definite promise to grant the islands perfect independence at a fixed date, no, for example, ten years from the present time.

There is one other point made by the Senator from Massachusetts in the North American Review which by Republicans, at all events, will be regarded as unassailable. It is perfectly true, as he says, that the antitrust act was on the statute-book in the last CLEVELAND administration, but was never enforced, and, moreover, was pronounced unconstitutional by Mr. CLEVELAND's Attorney-General. By Mr. ROOSEVELT's administration, on the other hand, the act has been enforced, his Attorney-General not only enforcing it to its equalization, but proving it to be so. It is true, as Mr. Lodge says, that, although both of the great political parties have had the same opportunities of attesting sincerity, the Republicans alone have shown by deeds a determination to enforce the antitrust act, while to such enforcement the Democrats have contributed nothing but "lunge and language."

It may be urged, on the other hand, by Democratic critics of Mr. Lodge's argument that his argument could be turned to such more than counterbalancing his positive assertions. What ray of hope, they may ask, is derivable from this article by the Republican revisionists of loans and the Republican eloquents of reciprocity in Massachusetts? There is not a word about reciprocity, except an insinuation that, because the Republicans granted it also in the way of tariff abatement just one-quarter of what the Cubans wanted, Republicans rather than Democrats should be credited with securing the reciprocity treaties with other foreign countries, which were long since concluded, but which hitherto the Republican masters of the Senate have stilly refused to ratify. To the establishment, doubtless, of scores of thousands of his Massachusetts constituents, Mr. Lodge will not even acknowledge as the North American Review there is at present there is any demand at all for a revision of the tariff. It will be over six years, if not longer, before the expiration of the next year or two should require revision, he would favor it. He merely inquires whether revision, when needed, would be likely to be undertaken more satisfactorily by the party which hitherto has treated the DUTY-free tariff as sacred, than by the party which, when laid in power, produced the WILSON-GORMAN tariff. Mr. Lodge, when he posed it, seems to have imagined that the question will be unanswerable, but it is not so. It is only this time that a large fraction of the Massachusetts Republicans would jump at the chance of substituting the WILSON-GORMAN act for the DUTY-free act.

Mr. Lodge has severely a word to say with regard to the series of proceedings by which Mr. ROOSEVELT is held by Democrats to have exhibited an arbitrary temperament and an allignment to disregard the spirit, and even the letter, of the Federal Constitution. We refer, of course, to such proceedings as the President's interposition in the authentic color strike; his vigorous promotion of ex-Assistant Surgeon Wain over the heads of scores of veterans of the civil war; his declaration of the existence of a "conspiratorial revolution" between two consecutive sessions of the same body, and his asserting by "Executive order" that the attainment of a given age shall be prima facie proof of the physical and mental disability required by statute of certain applicants for pensions. These incidents of Mr. ROOSEVELT's career in the White House are treated by Mr. Lodge as negligible, although considered as omens of what may be done hereafter, they have been watched with anxiety by thoughtful independents all over the country. To the charge that he forbidding "colonialism" to him "traps on the islands for the purpose of asserting its authority" Mr. ROOSEVELT not only violated the Treaty of 1846, but encroached upon the prerogative of Congress by committing an act of war. Mr. Lodge makes not the slightest allusion. He simply remarks that Mr. ROOSEVELT, by "his prompt and courageous action, has given us the Panama Canal." Neither is the slightest notice paid to the startling intimation contained in the President's letter read at the Cuban dinner that unless the Latin American republics pay all their debts to foreign creditors they may look for execution on the part of the United States. The Massachusetts Senator can scarcely have in mind this extraordinary assumption of a debt-collecting function when he praised Mr. ROOSEVELT for having "raised the prestige of the Monroe Doctrine to a higher point than ever before."

We end, as we begin, by saying that Mr. Lodge's contribution to the North American Review is undoubtedly a gem. By Mr. ROOSEVELT with satisfaction. Whether it will gain any converts, we are not a different copper-headed to the Republican nominee is, perhaps, a slightly question.

Comment upon "Comment"

HARPER'S WEEKLY has boiled down the issues of the campaign to this:

Imperialism (as defined by Mr. ROOSEVELT), recognition of the necessity of meeting a condition, regardless of the possible effect of a precedent thus established.

Constitutionalism (as defined by Judge PARKER). Rigid adherence to theory, irrespective of temporary consequences.

Which is the better?

Isn't it a fact that strict adherence to a precedent amounts a lack of progress? Is the strict theory in conditions arise, and in precedents must be made to care for them? A constant regard for precedent means stagnation. It retards progress and invites disaster. The business man who pays strict attention to precedent and more at all to present-day conditions is the man who gets left in the competition. Because a thing is right fifty years ago is no sign that it is right today. The world moves.

We do not argue for violation of any of the tenets of the Constitution of the country, nor do we believe President ROOSEVELT acts in any violation of them, but we do say that in commercial life or in national life, the man who recognizes things as the man who lives for the present, and does not allow the precedents of past ages to influence his actions. "A rigid adherence to theory," such as the WEEKLY attributes to Judge PARKER, would stagnate the country. We do not want a theoretical government, we want an active one doing one that shall take hold of present-day problems and settle them in a present-day manner.

If we insisted on precedent our Presidents would journey to the White House on hot-shock or by stage coach. We are beyond the stage-coach days, and the government should be run on ideas constant with this condition.

There are those who affect to be, even at this early and doubtful stage, a marked leaning of the noticeable Democratic enthusiasm that followed the action of the national convention and the historic telegram of Judge PARKER. Among these is the esteemed HARPER'S WEEKLY, a paper normally candid and fair in its political judgments, but whose editor, like other mortals, is liable to err through too great insight. We incline to think that our contemporary mistakes as to the reception of the speech of acceptance by the Democratic party. Instead of producing the unpleasant sensation of a wet blanket, it gave complete satisfaction to that very large element of the American public that was and is dissatisfied with the strictly personal government under which we live, and desires for the Chief Executive of the nation a man of deliberation and constitutional training instead of one of vanity and impulse. No one anticipated anything in the least dramatic in connection with the speech, and every one, for that matter, from general acquaintance with the character of the nominee, understood reasonably well ahead of time his words and manner. It was hardly to be expected that such an address, a more formally, should create any outburst of enthusiasm, and we think it rather premature to be estimating its effect on the Democracy of the country or even of New York from insufficient premises; that are at least the most superficial. In point of fact, we think we are justified in the belief that Democratic enthusiasm for the ticket has not only suffered no abatement, but can be counted on to increase progressively with the campaign. —New Orleans Times-Democrat.

In the mind of GEORGE HARVEY, of HARPER'S WEEKLY, Mr. ROOSEVELT's moving principle is "recognition of the necessity of meeting a condition, regardless of the possible effect of a precedent thus established." On the other hand, Judge PARKER's moving principle is "rigid adherence to theory, irrespective of temporary consequences."

In the main this distinction between the two candidates is reasonably accurate.

Mr. ROOSEVELT has shown that he can adhere to theory by his rigid attitude to the conventions of strict international law in all of our relations with foreign nations.

Mr. PARKER has shown recognition of the necessity of meeting a condition, regardless of the possibility of a precedent thus established, when he voted twice for HAYES, thus inhering the bromide attacks on the Supreme Court of the United States.

Either of these definitions can be twisted to suit circumstances, and can be made more or less favorable to either, but the definitions as presented suggest a laudable intensity of a great Democratic statesman who said, "It is a condition not a theory which confronts us."

If Mr. HARVEY's definitions are correct, Mr. PARKER'S Democracy lies far behind that of the man whom he is supposed to replace, the GRAY HAWK, the dark hunter of Cretaceous and Cretaceous. —Seattle Post-Intelligencer.

A highly instructive and suggestive article is copied today from HARPER'S WEEKLY, showing how quickly Mr. WHITNEY won the hearty and powerful cooperation of RICHARD GOSSETT and EDWARD MURRAY, Jr., in being selling the party against a splendid victory in the Senate and nation. It is written by GEORGE HARVEY, undoubtedly the confidential friend consulted after the nomination, and it is, therefore, authoritative.

This true story is related for the purpose of showing similar to suggest the necessity of promptly harmonizing Democratic differences, and presenting a solid front to the opposition. It is timely and trustworthy, and we reproduce it to help further the good work of unity and victory. The conditions are propitious for Judge PARKER'S election; if this consummation shall not be accomplished, it will be the fault of the party leaders, and not of the temper of the people.

The power of a master hand in shaping the destinies of a party and country is admirably shown in Mr. WHITNEY'S victorious part in the convention and CLEVELAND'S canvass of 1892. —Troy Press.

Never were warm expectations of an utterance worthy a great occasion and a grand opportunity so thoroughly frosted by acute disappointment as were the anticipations of President ROOSEVELT's acceptance in the PARKER speech of acceptance. HARPER'S WEEKLY admits that "Judge PARKER'S speech of acceptance fell upon his party like a wet blanket." His gold telegram had in some quarters raised expectations that his campaign utterances would be from the beginning lofty, independent, and inspiring. Yet in his first announcement of policy he actually declared "admirable" the platform from which he had deliberately excluded the United States proposal of the gold standard. The plain truth is that Judge PARKER is not of Presidential size. He has never declared himself an advocate of the gold standard. He simply regards it as "established." He carefully refrains from saying whether its establishment is agreeable or disagreeable to him. But he does say that the platform, which refused to approve it, is "admirable." The Democratic party has been once more gold-betted. —Louisville Herald.

THE WEEKLY overlooks the association that impelled many Democrats to withhold their support from HAYES or to vote for McKIMLEY. It was not that they preferred the Republican party or subscribed to its distinctive political doctrines, but that they believed their own party had adopted a wrong policy, which, if sustained by an election, would be detrimental to the country and also to the party. These Democrats of that persuasion tended rather to impair their sons with the necessity of adhering to sound Democratic principles, and this year when the party returned to a sound basis it is to be expected that, as a rule, not only the surviving Democrats who refused to support Mr. HAYES and his objectionable platform, but their sons also, who will vote for the first time for President this year—all earnestly support the Democratic Presidential ticket. —Anchorage Beacon.

While no offer of the nomination for the Governorship has been made in this State, there is a good deal of quiet talk among his friends around here, that there is an offer that ought to be made to him. It is that of Secretary of State in a cabinet that will never have any existence except on paper. The idea is that Judge PARKER might be so much of a secret as to be elected by the State as Secretary of State in a Democratic cabinet. And the idea is not merely local. We notice that it has found its way to New York, and that GEORGE HARVEY endorses it in HARPER'S WEEKLY, in the current number. There is so much to recommend it that Judge PARKER ought to act on the advice. It is given by his best friends. —Boston Advertiser.

HARPER'S WEEKLY is hard to please. In 1896 it was one of the most bitter and malignant of the opposition forces. Now it is fighting mad because Mr. HAYES' endorsement is not such as it would write. In last week's issue appeared an extract from a recent editorial. It attempts to belittl the reasons given for supporting the ticket. If the reader will examine the speech made by our candidate at the time of the nomination he will see that Judge PARKER has justified the reasons given by Mr. HAYES and has answered the arguments put forth by the "Journal of Civilization," as HARPER'S WEEKLY calls itself. It is determined to be displeased no matter what Mr. HAYES does. —Mr. Bryan's Com-moer.

The repeated demands of New York editors for a more aggressive Democratic campaign is now endorsed by GEORGE HARVEY in HARPER'S WEEKLY. That influential publication says that Judge PARKER'S speech of acceptance fell upon his party like a wet blanket, and that the advantage gained by the telegram to the St. Louis convention has been in considerable part lost by the unwelcome announcement, that paper thinks the Republicans are far in advance, although the task before the Democratic committee was necessarily greater and therefore called for Herculean efforts from the moment the St. Louis convention adjourned. —Washington Post.

HARPER'S WEEKLY is trying to make out a row for Judge PARKER on the ground that a number of newspapers which advocated the election of McKIMLEY are not supporting the Fousas candidate. The fact that all these papers are either Democratic or independent journals with a strong Democratic leaning, and that they are the notice of Editor HARVEY. The even more significant fact that several Democratic papers in the West have declared against the New York-West Virginia combination has been almost ignored by their contemporaries of the same party in the East. —Portland Chronicle.

If any one is getting more real joy out of this campaign than GEORGE HARVEY we are not aware of it. He may not be telling all he knows of politics and politicians as the Journal suggests, but he is telling enough to make the editorial pages of the WEEKLY brilliant with his wisdom, luscious with his wit, and intensely entertaining with his stories. Whether you agree with him or not, it is impossible to miss a single line from his pen without feeling that you have lost something of interest and of value. —New York Evening Mail.

The First Package sent through the Tubes—Postmaster Cuyne receives an American Flag

Postmaster Cuyne

E. L. Disney

Street Carman

Inspector Hylton

Officials at the Opening of the new Mail System

AN INNOVATION IN CHICAGO'S MAIL SYSTEM—OPENING OF THE CITY'S NEW PNEUMATIC-TUBE MAIL SERVICE

Chicago's new pneumatic-tube mail service was formally opened on August 24. A batch of mail was first sent through the line, after which the system was formally turned over to the government, and was accepted, on behalf of the Federal authorities, by Postmaster General Cuyne. The system consists of about nine miles of brass tube, through which bags of mail are transported by compressed air to different stations, including those located in the railway depots. The Chicago system is said to be the largest thus far installed in the United States.

Photographs by Theodore H. Wagner

Harry Hillman, of the N. Y. A. C., winning the 100-metre Run in 15 1-5 seconds—a new Olympic Record

Roy Evers, N. Y. A. C., making a new World's Record in the Standing Broad-jump Contest—Distance, 11 feet 4 7-8 inches

The Finish of the 60-metre Dash—Archie Hahn, of the Milwaukee A. C., Winner

SNAP-SHOTS OF SCENES AT THE WORLD'S OLYMPIC CHAMPIONSHIP GAMES AT THE ST. LOUIS FAIR

The world's Olympic championship games began in the Stadium on the Exposition grounds at St. Louis on August 29. On the first day of the meeting the world's record for the standing broad jump was lowered, as were also the Olympic record for the 100 metre run, and the record for throwing the sixteen-pound hammer. The most important event during the games was the Marathon race for a distance of forty kilometres (twenty-five miles and fifteen hundred yards), which was run on August 30. The race was won by Thomas J. Hicks, of Vanhookerport, Massachusetts, in 3:58.21. The record time for a Marathon race is 2 hours and 55 minutes, made by Louis, a French, at the Olympic games at Athens in 1896.

Ralph W. Bear, of the Chicago Athletic Association, breaking the World's Record for putting the sixteen-pound shot

Pyralis Labadie, of Athens, Winner of the Bar Bell Contest. He lifted a 216 pound Bell, surpassing the World's Record

Contestants in the Hurdle Race going over the last Hurdle of the Course—H. L. Hoffman, of the N. Y. A. C., leading, and F. Wallen, of the Milwaukee A. C., second

SNAP-SHOTS OF SCENES AT THE WORLD'S OLYMPIC CHAMPIONSHIP GAMES AT THE ST. LOUIS FAIR

A general description of the Olympic championship games, held recently at the St. Louis Exposition, is given on the opposite page. The snap shots reproduced above show some of the important events of the games

Labor as a Power in Politics

By John Keith

THE recent attempts of labor leaders to force employers into a recognition of their demands during the campaign in order to avoid labor disturbances before the Presidential election had once more to a consideration of some of the inherent defects in the policy of the men who control the output of the manufacturing community, and whose mistakes the influence of public opinion is being more and more firmly set against the present methods of coercion and misrule. It is beyond dispute that the power of labor, not only in politics, but in industry, depends upon the winning of public sentiment and upon correction by its own leaders of the present high-handed methods.

The United States, which is notoriously opposed to standing armies, has the largest labor establishment as the world. The increase has been at a rate far exceeding that of any European country. The English labor-unions had in 1900 a membership of 1,900,000, and in 1901 a membership of 1,900,000, while in the three years from 1900 to 1903 the American trade-unions increased from 500,000 to 2,400,000.

That this army of comparatively uneducated troops could be an enormous political power in this country is true, and at the same time it is capable of misusing its power, such an event as the recent atrocities in Colorado proves conclusively. It is not my purpose to give the impression that I consider the labor-unions an unmitigated evil, which could be and should be destroyed, but rather to point out where it loses power and influence by being its own worst enemy.

One of the first weaknesses in organized labor is that, while representing a minority of the actual laboring population, its acts are based upon the assumption that it represents the entire population of workers. The demands and complaints it constantly shuns over the truth that there is a large army of non-union labor standing on the very opposite side of the question, suffering from much that benefits organized labor, and more or less tacitly protesting against the very acts which union labor represents as essential to the welfare of all workers.

There consequently ensues a civil war in the labor world at the very time when the struggle with capital is in progress. This oppression of the disorganized majority by the active minority is carried so far that the laborer is justly entitled of forcing that very thing which it claims the greatest of crimes—a trust.

Almost every State in the Union has laws prohibiting those who would naturally be competitors from combining to control prices and limit competition. Yet there is no denying that this is the very end and aim of the labor-unions. It is not sufficient to fix the market price of wages, but it uses violence and ostracism to prevent competition.

In this last effort the labor-union makes a direct assault upon the constitutional liberty of every free man, to work for whom and for how much he will, or to employ whomsoever he will, at whatever wages he deems sufficient. Every strike, and in fact, the whole method of labor organizations, is in direct violation of these inherent rights. The workman of the new employees' unions consequently is highly chosen when they appeal to the "Constitution" and to "American liberty." This is one point upon which labor loses in its appeal to public opinion.

As the trusts are assailed by their "trust-busters" so the unions are attacked by their "strike-breakers." Non-union men, tired of brute conduct, are beginning to appeal to the courts for the protection of their constitutional rights. In America, Illinois, recently M. M. Trautman sued the Teamsters' Union No. 220 for $5000 damages, alleging that the union prevented him from making a living, and has caused him to become "poor, penniless, and helpless." He described the efforts made to compel him to join the union, the threats of strikes and boycotts that were held over him, and employers to compel them to discharge him when he would not join the union, and the threats that were made to prevent other employers from hiring him. He served summons on the nation's delegate and six members of the union, accusing them of conspiracy to drive him out of the trade and out of his State, "and to ruin his character as a workman and bring him into public disgrace and infamy." He insisted that the union was violating the Constitution in demanding that he should pay money to join the union and also in persisting in conduct that prevents him from working. This is believed to be the only suit in Illinois of this character, and the laborer's plea is certainly a very powerful appeal to a very deep-rooted American sentiment.

On the other hand, the unions are bound to fight such a case desperately, because their custom of using more than moral suasion to induce laborers to join their unions and to prevent employers from hiring non-union men were to be given up merely because it is unconstitutional, the entire underpinning of labor organizations would be chopped away.

Not long ago Judge Adams of the Illinois Appellate Court handed down a decision not only against the right of union men to interfere with non-union employers, but against the right of an employer to enter into a "closed-shop" agreement with a union to discriminate against the employment of men outside that union. The judge couched upon two points in which the creed of the labor-union is inconsistent with Americanism: the interference with the liberty and with the business sense first of the employer; second, of the employer. No country can be called free in which the workers are deprived of their liberty, but equally, no country can be called free if the employer is deprived of his;

especially as employers themselves are, after all, only the employees of some one higher up—or if the general public. Consistent interference in the conducting of a business by workmen who are inexperienced in management is a menace to the prosperity as well as the liberty of the entire population, including these labor leaders themselves.

There is no space here to attempt a story of the miserable and peevish interferences which workmen can inflict upon their employers when they are armed with the enormous power of the unions. Both impertinences and penalties are not the end; they frequently drive employers out of business, or out of the State, or into bankruptcy. In the year 1903 there were four hundred more failures than in 1902. R. G. Dun & Co. state that labor troubles in the building trades provided an unusual element calculated to precipitate insolvencies.

Knuckling to the unions does not always solve the problem. It becomes nearly impossible for the most compliant employer to avoid labor troubles, even if he keeps a closed shop and allows the unions to dictate.

Another point of weakness against which public opinion protests is that lack of financial responsibility makes the union usually liable to temptations to break solemn agreements. In this fact rests, perhaps, the chief weakness of the arbitration and the conciliation methods for avoiding strikes. In spite of solemn promises in advance, the union frequently refuses to abide by the decision of the board of arbitrators. Take the instance arising in Chicago a year ago, three ministers were selected by the steam engineers at the stock-yards to arbitrate their claim for an increase. The arbitrators delivered their decision, and in two days the dissatisfied union called a strike of 400 men, renewed their old demands, and declared an arbitral strike.

Signed agreements between employers and employees have fared little better. The failure of this was one of the chief reasons for driving the national metal trades into its war with the unions. As late as June 7 certain of the unions in the Building Trades Association were officially invited by other unions to break their solemn agreements. Even where these agreements are kept, it is frequently at the expense of the public and by means of a conspiracy between certain employers and certain employees to prevent competition from other employers or other employees. In previous articles I have substantiated the atrocious results of such conspiracy, as in the case of the teamsters of Chicago and the steam-fitters of New York.

The proof of the inability of labor to diminish the law of supply and demand, and to establish wages by strikes is the statistics of the last few years. From 1900 to 1900 the Bureau of Labor found that in general wages had remained stationary; that is, some organized industries have lowered their and still others have suffered an advance. From 1902 to the middle of 1903 there has been a noticeable increase in the wages of the unorganized. But this last year has seen reductions of from ten per cent. to twenty-five per cent. in the wages of tens of thousands of men, especially in the textile, steel, and iron trades. The annual number of strikes in the last thirteen years would not vary appreciably, yet in last year alone the total wage increase was stationary, rose rapidly, and fell rapidly. It is apparent, then, that the labor-union is helpless to combat the broader tides of industry.

None the less there have been hundreds and hundreds of strikes, some of them attended with violence, and all of them with heavy outlay of money and the evils attendant upon idleness. Take, for example, the Pattern-Makers' Union of Pittsburgh, which struck to raise their wages from $3.78 to $4 a day. The union remained idle for six months, exhausted all its accumulated funds, as well as the savings of its members, who earned nothing in that half-year, and where the price of living was more than ever up by the loss of time, the debts incurred, and the habits of idleness, inculcated through long idleness, and the theory that the world owes every man a better living than he can earn. The limited effort of unions upon wages is shown by the fact that during the past sixty years the wages of farm-hands and domestic servants have risen from $7 a month for farm-hands and $1 a month for cooks to wages sometimes reaching $2.50 a day for farm-hands and from $15 to $20 a month for cooks. Yet these are not the wages of the laboring class.

Compare this great rise of non-union wages with the action of 1300 members of the Baltimore Boiler-makers and Ship-builders who accepted a reduction of wages without strike last fall, or with the return of the window-glass-workers at Anderson, Indiana, who had been promised an increase of wages as the market price advanced, but found themselves facing a fall of fifty per cent. in the market; they sensibly, and honorably, accepted a reduction in wages. The American Sheet Steel Company on January 1 reduced the wages of its rollers, benders, and shearers by twenty per cent. This was in its own interest, but by reason of the reduction it was enabled to open five idle mills. In Springfield, Illinois, the union boiler-makers struck, and went back at once lower wages than they had before. The strikers in the C. & N. W. Works at Chicago, Michigan, lost six months' wages as the result of a strike. The Phoenix Iron Company, of Phoenixville, Pennsylvania,

Marquis Oyama, Commander-in-Chief of the Japanese Forces
 From photograph copyright 1904, by W. C. White Co., New York. R. S. Pease, artist

General Kodama (standing), General Terabeke (sitting)

Japanese Soldiers carrying Ammunition Packs over the Manchurian Divide

Japanese Soldiers marching over a Foot-trail near the Manchurian Divide

PHOTOGRAPHS OF JAPANESE MILITARY LEADERS, AND SNAP- SHOTS OF RECENT OPERATIONS UNDER THEIR DIRECTION NEAR THE MANCHURIAN DIVIDE

The two upper photographs were taken recently of the Japanese military leaders, the Marquis Oyama and General Kodama and Terabeke, who are important figures in the management of the Far-Eastern campaign. The two lower photographs are snapshots taken by Mr. William Deane, one of the "Workday's" special correspondents in the Far East, showing some of the difficulties under which the Japanese land forces have labored in their advance on the Russian in Manchuria.

reduced the wages of 3000 men by five per cent., and reductions of far greater value are, in repeat, being made all along the line, affecting the labor world by wholesale. Many of the prominent officials of the unions have been enough to issue warnings against resistance, although Samuel Gompers has made vigorous pronouncements against such a weakened policy.

Recent acts of violence are too many to recount in detail. On the 25th of May two freight-handlers were followed to Jersey City and assaulted in the street by five persons; one of them was killed, the other dangerously wounded. The Victor, Colorado, horser overhauled all others. The Railroad Gazette made a summary of the violations of the law for the year ending October, 1903, as follows:

By actual count, from a special report, since last October, trade-union members and sympathizers have been guilty of as many as four hundred and thirty attacks on crime. They are chargeable with four murders, three assaults, and fifty assaults of great violence, nine cases on shooting, and three times they the assaults have been resisted. The record of the month upon the same shows two cases of assault, violence of dynamite, four of shooting, and eighteen of murder. Yearly eight times have dynamite bombs been exploded upon trains and cars, four times have dynamite bombs been exploded, and the year has each three attacks upon bridges. Twelve have been assaulted thirteen times, and police resisted nine times, and there have been five attacks and injuries to the automobile. Neither agent noted, and the year has been protesting continually, neither young girls nor children have been pained from infanticide attack when a member of the family has wanted to obtain work, simply as an American citizen, although he did not hold a union card.

Not only have the union men been guilty of violence, but, worse yet, the criminals have received official union support. During the famous teachers' strike in Chicago, when Samuel Galtus, a commission merchant, drove his own wagon to the depot to take away a consignment of eggs before they rotted, he was killed by a teamster, who gave himself up and walked into the police station, accompanied by the president and secretary of the union.

During a strike at Dayton, Ohio, the members of the Iron Molders' Local attacked Clayton Florio and his son, beating them nearly to death. They were tried and convicted, but their fines were paid by the union, and they were not expelled.

That form of unconstitutional disturbance of the peace, known as the boycott, with its attendant evils of picketing and intimidation, has happened two often in need more than an allusion here. This curious law brought about a meeting of the National Union of Employees, known as the American Antitrust Association, with offices in New York and Chicago. It was permanently organized in June, 1903, by one hundred employees. One of the articles of constitution is that membership is not to be made public, though publicity is given as to the purpose of the organization.

Violent assault and libel are the commonplace of union rule, it is not surprising that blackmail and graft should go hand in hand with open crime. Sam Parks was a prominent example of both before and after. The very name of "walking delegate" has acquired such a stench in the public nostrils that an attempt is being made to replace it with the less malodorous name of "business agent."

Richard Carvel, whose high-sounding name is attached to a derisive name walking delegate, pleaded guilty recently to extorting $900 from Hopper & Sons, and five hundred employees presented a vain petition against leniency in his sentence. Thomas C. Walsh, a carpenter's delegate, was tried for extorting money from employers, and the jury three times disagreed. On January 31, 1904, two walking delegates of Paterson, New Jersey, were indicted by the grand jury for extorting $1000 from Contractor Sweeney under threats. Numberless other cases would be made public were it not for the timidity of many employers. There are other forms of corruption, such as that example in Chicago, where on December 24, 1903, six members of the Electrical Workers' Union were fined $1000 and costs for paying a clerk to falsify court records and then plotting to keep witnesses out of the court during his trial. On the February 8, 1904, seventeen members of the Chicago grand jury came out in a signed statement accusing the State's Attorney of unlawfully influencing the grand jury not to find indictments against certain labor leaders.

Open defiance of the law is by no means unknown, not only in the form of resisting and overpowering the police and sworn detectives, but the mandates of the court as well. On December 24, 1903, Samuel Gompers, in connection with an injunction issued by Judge

Friedman of New York against interference with non-union sign-makers, has been quoted as having said:

Never in the history of the world has a tyrant been found without a judge in either the tyrant or the judge. In law, and a fitting representative of this class, is found in a judge who, by his action, tells his name, for he is called Friedman. I am here especially in relation to him, for I have done so before at a distance; now I am in person the man, if there is any.

Since the regular army and the militia have been frequently called upon to preserve the peace, at the expense of interfering with the unions, the most violent attacks have been made on the two safeguards of our nation. Not only have they been assaulted with sticks and stones and bullets, but in the Victor, Colorado, affair, but efforts have been made to stir up public opinion against their very existence. William Potter, of the New York National Guard, was expelled from his union, and then barred out of his employment, because he had obeyed the Governor's call and gone with his regiment to a scene of riot. A similar episode occurred recently in Michigan.

Such outrages provoked an immense sensation and brought the unions into wide disfavor. A law, indeed, was passed forbidding any discrimination against members of the National Guard. The more necessary for such a law is in itself a curious thing. Now the less it cannot prevent the hostility to the militia or the our religious discrimination against militiamen. John P. Wrigel, a labor officer of Boston, testified in court that ninety per cent of the unions reject the application for membership of men serving in the militia, and the State and regular troops are a breed of hatred.

This sets the union in such complete opposition to all the first principles of patriotism and shows such a drift toward anarchism that many of the labor leaders have been compelled by a strong public indignation to disavow such feelings, and John Mitchell, after the great anthracite strike in Pennsylvania, thanked the militia for their good work. But such professions do not conceal the true extreme to which union sentiment has led its own victims.

The logical sequence of such an unpatristic attitude is the belief fostered in many places that the union oath is superior to an oath in court. Indeed, in Dayton, Ohio, thirty members of a union were proved guilty of perjury by their own books, and one of them declared that he rated the union oath higher than any other.

One of the chief causes that have led the unions to the depths of such national perfidy is the fact that they are likely to be ruled by ambitious knaves, who prefer politics to day labor and lead many of the labor leaders have been compelled by a strong public indignation to disavow such feelings, and John Mitchell, after the great anthracite strike in Pennsylvania, thanked the militia for their good work. But such professions do not conceal the true extreme to which union sentiment has led its own victims.

It may be set down as a general truth that the labor union acts in no way to the good of the country, but as an obstacle to the development of the country along the most scientific lines of economic advancement.

The evil effect of union tyranny upon the general public has been far-reaching. To take one instance, in Indianapolis the Allied Building Trades' Council boycotted a newly built hotel, and said that unless the building was completely torn down, the monster scraped from the bricks, the nails pulled from the planks and the structure rebuilt, from foundation to roof, every man at tempting to play polo in the building would be boycotted. The actions of the lively drivers in the recent strike in Chicago their interference with weddings, with the use of ambulances to carry the sick to the hospitals, and with the burial of the dead is still fresh in the memory of the public.

In a word, the effect of union sentiment in reducing all submission to one level; in frowning down the workman who by extra industry endeavors to improve his condition; in restricting output by union sentiment if not by actual orders; in struggling about to reduce the number of working hours and to raise the pay, and by increasing the quality of quantity; but by three and a half cent strikes; the effect of all these things is not only to diminish the ambition, the proficiency, and thrill of the workman, but what is of more importance to the labor-unions themselves is alienate public opinion and sympathy—by which alone organized labor can hope to have and exercise the power, political and otherwise, which is its due.

A Corner of England

By Sydney Brooks

SWINDON, DORSETSHIRE, August 21, 1904.

On a holiday the outside world is curiously and delightfully remote. More so perhaps to a journalist, whose range of interests and activities is bound to be a wide one, than to any one else. To me, at any rate, sitting by the English Channel, with the Isle of Wight just opposite, with boats darning about on the bay, with a circular aisle and a half of beach dotted with tents, bathers, children building castles, and all the gay well-being of the seashore, beneath my windows, London and the daily paper and all that are crowded therein seem incredibly alien. I can scarcely believe that but a day or two ago I, too, had views about the Welsh fight against the Education Bill; that I was inclined to make a personal matter of the Reading election; that Parliament really interested me; that I was positively anxious to learn something of the ecclesiastical troubles in Scotland; and that I was following the course of some war or other, in the Far East, if I remember rightly, with little flags on a huge map. And yet more imaginary still must be my recollection of being throttled in a violent collar, sitting in a back seat, and being told, I believe, that I had a couple of shillings in my pocket, of watching some stupid fellow in a sliding chair, of dining in a glittering, spick and span restaurant, if I ever did any of these things it must, I feel sure, have been in some previous existence. A few hours in a train and a world of things have snatched them off as though all such interests and experiences had fallen to the lot of "some other fellow of the same name." It is in far other fields that the real myself finds occupation and amusement. I am returning to the elements

The Advance Guard of the Army of Manassas, 1861—Troop "H," 7th U. S. Cavalry, General Corbin's Headquarters Guard

Army Leaders of General Corbin's Quarters—the Officers pictured are, from Left to Right: Colonel Knight, Colonel Fox, Colonel...

THE MILITARY MANOEUVRES AT MANASSAS
SPECIAL PUBLICATION

Published by G. W. Brown

House broken from Inc. thrown, and Pyramids formed in four Minutes from Eagle Cliff

© 2005 Blackwell Publishing Ltd

General West, General Bliss, General Grant, General Corbin, General Bell, General Lee, General Barry, Colonel Regan, Colonel Smith
 & W. P. Foster

Dr. W. H. Henshaw

SAS—SCENES AND INCIDENTS BY OUR PHOTOGRAPHERS

Building a Station for the Subway at Hickman Street, where the Road runs on a Trestle

Where the Subway becomes a Viaduct—a View of the Line between Hickman Street and Spanghten Duvel

The Trestle spanning the Road at 145th Street

NEW YORK'S NEW SUBWAY—PHOTOGRAPHS OF UP-TOWN SECTIONS WHERE TRAINS WILL RUN ABOVE GROUND

The three photographs on this page show interesting exterior views of up-town sections of New York's new rapid transit system, where trains will run above ground. It is expected that the Subway will be in full operation before the end of the year

The opening of the Subway Tunnel near Dyckman Street

A View of the Viaduct at Broadway and 125th Street

Photography by E. J. Brown, Brooklyn

The Loop at the City Hall Station, showing part of the Station Platform

The Ticket-office of the City Hall Station—View from the Platform

VIEWS OF NEW YORK'S NEW SUBWAY SYSTEM

The photographs show different views of completed and uncompleted sections of the new Subway system

The Barrier Skidder Party starting on an Exploring Trip

The Story of the New "Farthest South"

The expedition led by Captain Scott in the ship "Discovery," which was sent to explore the unknown regions of the Antarctic under the auspices of the Royal Geographical Society of London, has just returned. Following is Captain Scott's account of his experiences and the results of his exploration in the Far South

By Captain Scott, of the "Discovery"

IN essaying a brief account of our southern sledge journey it is impossible to forget the disappointment of certain perhaps too lively hopes of reaching a higher latitude which were formed at its commencement. At the same time it must be remembered that, in throwing considerable light on the nature and origin of the Great Ice Barrier and in extending the coast of Victoria Land, the journey contains points of great interest, and of an interest which might have been little enhanced had a higher latitude been reached.

It may prove of interest to my readers to quote certain paragraphs from the instructions issued by the President of the Royal and Royal Geographical Societies in the light of which our actions must, presumably, be judged. The following are verbatim extracts from those instructions:

"Such exploration (that of the first season) should, if possible, include an examination of the coast from Cape Johnson to Cape Cuvier, with a view to finding a safe and suitable place for the operations of landing, etc.

"The chief points of geographical interest are as follows: To explore the Ice Barrier of Sir James Ross to its eastern extremity; to discover the land which was believed by Ross to flank the Barrier to the eastward, or to ascertain that it does not exist, and generally to solve the very important physical and geographical questions connected with this remarkable ice formation.

"If you should decide that the ship shall winter in the ice, the following instructions are to be observed: (a) Your efforts as regards geographical exploration should be directed, with the help of dogs, to three objects, namely, an advance into the western mountains, and an advance to the south, and the exploration of the volcanic regions."

Emperor Penguins at the Great Barrier

It is well to keep in mind the objects our journey was intended to achieve, and to remember, amidst minor disappointments, that we must be considered as more strictly pioneers than the majority of polar travellers in being the first to make extended journeys in the Antarctic regions.

The early stages of the southern journey need not be dwelt on. The southern party left the ship on November 2, 1892, and overtook the supporting party, which had been delayed by bad weather, on the night of the same day. The rendezvous was kept (A), the depot established earlier in the season, some ten miles southeast of the bluff. This was reached by the southern party by easy stages on November 10, but the travelling, owing to the slipperiness of the wind-swept straits, proved much more arduous for the supporting party, who worked hard to rejoin on November 11. On November 12 the course was set due south, the parties in company, but the men slightly ahead of the dogs, and thereby greatly helping the drivers. On November 13 half the supporting party returned to the ship, with the satisfaction of having reached the highest latitude yet attained; the remainder continued south during this and the following day. On November 15 preparation was made for the final putting. The hard, wind-swept snowdrifts had disappeared, and, under foot, we had a light snow-cover, liberally powdered with softer snow; as yet such a surface had seemed to give us little trouble.

Trials and Difficulties

We had provisions for thirteen weeks and a larger amount of dog food than was expected: our outfit appeared in good order and fully up to our requirements. Shortly after noon the last dog was despatched, the last farewell said; we started on our journey, and without delay our troubles began. Our utmost efforts of coaxing and deluding could, on this day, produce only short advances of a few hundred yards at a time; at each stoppage the rear sledges had to be pulled up to the front one, to make the effort of starting less severe. Finally, as each stage grew shorter, the impossibility of proceeding in this manner became obvious, and we decided to camp and consider the situation. There seemed but one thing to do, namely, to advance with half the load at a time; this, of course, meant that each mile had to be traversed three times, but we consoled ourselves with the thought that the weights were rapidly diminishing, and hoped that we should soon be able to start on the old system. Instead of improving, however, things went steadily from bad to worse. For the first few days we made good something over five miles daily, covering over sixteen miles in doing it; but later the distances kept down until we were forced to be satisfied with an advance of three or three and a half miles. Again and again we tried to make a start with the whole load, but each effort seemed to prove more hopeless than the last. At first we were inclined to attribute much to the surface, and undoubtedly this had changed seriously for the worse. It grew softer as we went south, and the light, powdery surface crystals ever increased in quantity, bringing greater friction. But it was soon evident that there was also something radically wrong with the dogs. Their spirit had disappeared, and we could see that their internal economy was altogether out of order. This, it was hoped, was only temporary, due to the work, the change of diet, or the sun. We tried night marching without sign of improvement. A test was proposed, and a blizzard came seasonably, forcing us to spend a day in the tent. On the following morning the dogs were as listless as ever. At last we were reluctantly compelled to realize that there was a deeper cause for their indisposition; there could no longer be a doubt that their food, the dockfish, was entirely disagreeing with them, and was all the bottom of all the mischief. On the fifteenth we were steering due south, but on the twenty-first, realizing that there was little prospect of a speedy ending to our relay work, we turned towards the land with the hope of being able to make a depot. For the first time we discovered that the land continued to run as far as we could see to the south; it was difficult to estimate its distance at any point, but we made for what looked like the bluff cliff of a sharp head-land, but which proved to be a square of a mountain range of considerable height.

The events of the month are not likely to be forgotten by any of us. Day after day we plodded on in the same monotonous manner, the routine being in advance half the load as nearly as possible two and a half miles, and then to return for the second half. Then after lunch a similar advance was attempted, but usually resulted in a bare gain of one and a half miles. We ourselves could have worked longer hours and covered greater distances, but at each evening camp the dogs sunk down thoroughly done, and each day their exhaustion increased, until only the strongest dogs put any weight at all on the traces, and no advance would have been made had we not pulled ourselves. This, however, we were glad enough to do, taking it in those to drive a far more tedious task. After various attempts to reach the head-land which we were reaching at a distance of some miles a second depot was finally established in latitude 46 deg. 30 min. south.

The Problem of Food

On five days we had met a magnificent view of the land on our right; in the background it rose to a height of 10,000 feet, outlined in occasional slightly elevated but sharp peaks rising above lofty snow-covered ridges. The general direction of the high land was north and south, though it was interrupted with occasional hills of very regular pyramidal shape and square flat-topped table mountains, on the steep slopes of which the bare land was visible. Neerer to us the foothills rarely showed their heads through the deep undulating ice-cap, which at places ended abruptly on the summit of high perpendicular cliffs, and at others descended in long steep slopes to the surface of the barrier. In general appearance the mountains and foothills closely resembled the northern part of Victoria Land, as we saw it from the ship. Starting at about ten miles from the coast at the depot, we crossed during the succeeding ten days an extensive bay, aiming to pass within a similar distance of the point at which the coast again advanced. A closer approach not only brought us a softer and more difficult surface, but revealed occasional configurations amongst which the up-grades proved ever trying work.

It was about this time that we first began to feel the discomfort of hunger, and knew that for many a day we could scarcely hope to better our allowance. No doubt all our travellers had year could have eaten a great deal more than their allowance on extended journeys, but, from what I have gathered, I do not think that any other party really suffered from shortage of food as ours did. The reasons are too complicated to be discussed here, they previous allowance was fixed on the same basis as that of other parties, but, whereas with us the basis was the sum total, with others more or less considerable additions were made to it. Our arrangements were also modified by various causes, some of which tended to still further shorten our allowance. We decided to lay by a week's biscuit and other stores, taken equally from the bags to balance some seal meat, and we discovered much too late that after the first week we had been considerably overrunning our allowance of biscuit. Some early scurvy symptoms had caused Dr. Wilson to suspect the bacon, which we accordingly renounced, and laid by for the end of the journey, but we increased the pemmican slightly in lieu. Even with all facts considered, it is a little difficult to understand why we were so very hungry, but the fact remains we were, and we never culled down in our bags without feeling we could have withstood at least two more suppers of the same nature as the one we had just finished.

The Sledge used by Captain Scott's party in the Antarctic

One of the worst drawbacks was the inefficiency of oil. A gallon was calculated to last the ordinary trip partly for ten days; our original estimate was for one to last six twelve days, but after wasteage and some want of care during the first month, we discovered that each gallon that remained would have to last us fourteen days. This not only cut off all chance of a hot meal in the middle of the day, but necessitated the greatest economy in the warming and in the cooking. In both cases the "Pemmican" was carefully thawed, for breakfast it was going as a rule, less than twenty minutes, and for supper rarely more than half an hour.

For lunch we cooked out a small piece of seal flesh, some biscuit and a few lumps of sugar, and, with regard to the former, some grew to welcome the pieces that contained the most blubber. I could have surely believed this possible had I not experienced the delight of finding those yellow streaks of blubber in one's lump of dark, stringy fish.

A Strange Christmas

As the weather gradually cleared on our journey south, a very sharp, round peak showed up, far to our right, and, in the northern light, appeared a high mountain of a great distance. By Christmas day we were closest to it, and found it to be a sharp eminence about 2000 feet in height rising out of the ice cap of the foothills. Its solitary position made it a most conspicuous landmark, and in honor of the day we named it Christmas Mountain.

Our Christmas day was gloriously fine, the sun shone bright and clear throughout and had a most cheering effect, which, no doubt was much assisted by the fact that we looked forward to a special ration to celebrate the occasion. At lunch we had the swiftest of a hot meal, and in the evening after a special wash-up and lunch-up, we cooked three "NABU" rabbits and devoured a plum pudding about half the size of a cricket ball and the remains of a tin of rice specially reserved for this day. During the day the sledges had run extraordinarily easy so that, though the dogs did little, we were able to cover ten miles' an unusually long march and when we retired in we felt the satisfaction of having done a good day's work as well as the still more practical comfort of a comparatively full stomach.

On the following day one of our party had an exceedingly bad attack of snow-blindness. It is difficult to imagine as a matter of fact for this painful ailment than the great, boundless plain of the Barrier, with its every-varying conditions of light. The general impression seems to be that the greatest danger of an attack is on a slightly dull day, when things are not clearly visible and the eyes are strained to catch a difference of shade; but, curiously enough, we all seemed to find that there was a greater risk on the very bright, glaring days, when the sun was reflected in every crystal of the smooth snow-carpets.

The Farthest South

Christmas day had found us moderately close to the foothills on our right, whose high cliffs and snow slopes consequently shut out the land beyond. From Christmas Mountain nothing very remarkable appeared until the eye rested on a high mountain evidently close to the coast-line and bearing almost south to the 20th, however, a sudden and unexpected break in the coast-line revealed another huge strait, and gradually we opened out from behind its nearest cape a magnificent new range of mountains, in the center of which a sharp double peak rose to a greater height than anything we had yet seen on our journey. From the high, partially bare peaks, the slopes of the range descended in gradual undulations of snow to the level of the strait. Unfortunately the positions from which I was able to observe the altitudes of the peaks were too close to give reliable data for calculating their heights, yet, though the absence of foothills which increase their dignity may also have aided in their apparent height, we were so struck by their loftiness in comparison with other calculated heights that I have little doubt that the highest peaks nearly approached, if they did not exceed, 15,000 feet. In the evening of this day (25th) we got our best westerly view. Across the open strait, but to the southward of it, lay the mountains I have already mentioned; to their left ran out more extensive snow-clad foothills, their northern edge fringed with mighty cliffs, sometimes of a black and sometimes of a deep red color, which formed the northern limit of the strait. The coast-line continuing south wound around snowy headlands till it struck the flanking ridge of the spurs of our southern mountains, to the right, but behind the well-marked summit of which could be seen two other lofty peaks. When the southern ridge was reached, beyond the cape to which we could trace the coastline, but very close to it, two tiny white patches indicated land at a much greater distance, and showed that the coast-line continued in the same general direction for many a mile. The cape on our right still obscured the channel of the strait, which appeared to turn inside the neck, and we decided to push on with all we had the following day to get a better view of it.

But the 26th brought wind and drift, and we were obliged to remain in camp, and on the 27th it was so foggy we dared not leave the sledges, but continued in a southward direction with them. The surface soon changed entirely, and we found ourselves travelling over well-marked undulations of incoming height the crests of the waves becoming broader and at length traversed by cracks and crevasses. The light grew worse and at last, when we were forced to camp for the night, deciding, moreover, that, as we hoped to pay a visit to the land on our return, this must be our farthest camp.

Harassing the Dogs preparatory to Starting on a Sledge Journey

It will be remembered that the instructions bore the greatest stress on the question: What is that extraordinary ice formation, the Barrier? Can we now give a definite answer to the question? I fear that it must be considered we cannot; but, on the other hand, we have accumulated such strong presumptive evidence as to its nature and movement that there can remain little doubt with regard to it.

Fifty years ago, Ross, examining its seaward face, concluded that it was about at its edge; since then that face has broken away, in places as much as twenty or thirty miles. We have scouted far beyond the icy cliff which was visible in his day, and have obtained such depths as to prove that the part which was broken away was wholly absent.

If, as was evident, the edge of the literal Barrier was water-borne, how far did it continue in that condition? Nothing but a journey on the Barrier could throw light on this question, and even such a journey could not obtain positive proof unless, which was, of course, impossible, the actual stage of some southern portion could be examined. We should willingly enough have attempted many a mile to the southward for our glimpse of a section a quarter of a

Waiting for Herpou a boat through the ice that Victoria Land is not a narrow ridge of mountains, but that these mountains only outline an immense ice cap, covering an apparently extensive continental land, and the western party has

(Continued on page 137.)

Breaking the ice with gun-cotton

Correspondence

THE PRESIDENTIAL SUCCESSION

WASHINGTON, D. C., August 24, 1904.

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

Sir,—In the latest number of your excellent paper appears an article entitled "The Present Law of Presidential Succession." I do not take exception to what you say therein, but I take the liberty of pointing out what you, in common with all other writers on this subject whose words I have seen, do not say. You assume that Mr. Root's blow leveled at the St. Louis ticket, based on the score of the Vice-Presidential candidate's advanced age, remains only a partial idea, viz., the probability that Mr. Vice-President (17) Davis's early demise after assuming office may render Mr. President (17) Parker's personally chosen Secretary of State the hierarch, thus making it a vital question whether a bill shall succeed in May. And you add that "an easy and informal way to carry the bill" is for the Judge to announce at an early date the definite choice of a high-class appointee. You later, therefore, mention the lesser, yet essential, part of Mr. Root's thought. Stranger things have happened than the untimely death of a healthy man in middle life who sits in the Presidential chair; and in the event of the success in November of the Democratic party (may it not be so) Mr. Davis might live to succeed Mr. Parker, he might or he might not retain the same cabinet on his accession (18). Inevitably is the only "accident" President who has retained his predecessor's cabinet; therefore, considering his years, it becomes a question of improbability who Mr. Davis's Secretary of State may be. Why not ask for a definite announcement at that point?

I am, sir,

WILLIAM F. BURKE.

[Discussing this point, the WEEKLY, in its issue of August 6, said: "The first necessary thought, if President Parker should die) is who would be President Davis's Secretary of State?" But it went no farther. There were no puny "etc." Mr. Davis seems quite competent to select an able Secretary of State.—EDITOR.]

SHIRT-WAISTS

BOSTON, N. C., August 24, 1904.

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

Sir,—When we were very young we met a threatened infringement of our rights with "I'm going right straight and tell my mamma!" Given a choice, we drew a tight upper lip and say "I shall write to HARPER'S WEEKLY about that!"

The eloquent but aggrieved wail of the shirt-waist, by W. A. C., should be taken up and thoroughly discussed, be it to relieve the aggregate of human misery, on other lines, necessitates a vast amount of talking and writing, and this would necessitate a vast amount of shouting and vociferousness which it will come to stay.

It is quite possible to keep or break the golden rule by our dress, and it is our manifest duty to do so for ourselves that we may appear comfortable, and thereby promote the satisfaction of others.

Women lower the temperature in effect when they flit about, on hot summer days, in their fresh, cool cotton, linen, and diaphanous draperies, and wear none it by their scorching lined and lined-in cotton clothing, which is as ugly and uncomfortable as it is possible when you come to think of it.

It should be considered a complimentary plan planning for to be greeted in summer with an admiring "How cool you look!" and in winter with "What a comfortable, warm-looking garment that is!"

If all means let the men be encouraged to adopt the shirt-waist; all charitably minded women will be delighted to share the comfort they have found in it with their long-suffering brothers.

Perhaps, after all, the opposition of a few warped minds is only a bit of retributive justice, visited upon the men for the ridicule they have heaped upon woman's whimsicalities in dress; if so, now is the time for us to rise and heap bumps of ice upon the heated brain-pan of our brothers, and say, "Yes, you shall wear shirt-waists and be as happy and comfortable as you deserve!"

I am, sir,

G. E. S.

PAUL POTTER'S BULL IN CHIVENEY

CHEYENNE, WYO., August 24, 1904.

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

Sir,—In your issue of the 20th instant, I notice that your very amusing review of Gustav Kolbe's "minute study" of Judge Parker includes a reproduction of Paul Potter's famous painting of the young bull with which the Judge became so enamored while abroad that he brought home a copy. You make the statement: "But when at the Hague he came to Paul Potter's famous painting of the young bull, there he stopped and looked long and earnestly. There was something he knew all about. No painter could fool him on live stock."

A very large and faithfully executed copy of this painting adorns the wall of the size-room of this club, which, in the territorial days of Wyoming, was the rendezvous of all the convivial spirits among the cattle barons of this section of the West. This picture appears in perfect order, except that it contains three clean-cut holes, one of which penetrates the bull's left nostril, and another the white face of the patient cow. It seems that on the occasion of some gathering of the members, one of them had just returned after an absence of several weeks, during which time the picture in question was hung.

After getting into a state of belatedly-awakened by picking an unusually large number of hobbles at himself, this member wandered into the room with a friend, and, and no sooner seated himself at a table when his gaze fell upon this new painting. "This is the Judge, this worthy did not have to 'look long and earnestly' at the painting, but immediately drew his six-shooter and proceeded to puncture this work of art."

If this member's opinion of the young bull is general among Western cattlemen, it would appear that the explanation of this painting out here would not gain many votes for the Judge.

I am, sir,

FRANCIS PATTON.

PROFESSOR GOLDWIN SMITH AND IMMORTALITY

SAN FRANCISCO, N. Y., August 24, 1904.

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

Sir,—Permit me humbly to defend Professor Goldwin Smith's article in the North American Review for May against your correspondent Dr. Mockbridge in your issue of August 6.

Your correspondent quotes Dr. Smith's statement that "immortality, if taken in its narrow, conscious existence, is inconceivable. To attempt to conceive it ends in mental vertigo." As an intellectual concept immortality is as far beyond our vision as is before apprehension to be beyond the power of the lower animals, as conscious perception is beyond the vegetable kingdom. It does not form a mental conception of a thing, as it is, by merely naming it, nor by endeavoring to form an intellectual judgment as to its possibility.

Even our mental conception of this our present conscious existence is a mental, not intellectual fact—in a pitifully young. An attempt to get it clearly before us is apt to end in fatigue and vertigo. Self is the "moving picture" of the kinetoscope, and by what process can the mechanism be deduced from the picture? Such an intellectual task would be child's play to our attempt, by turning round on ourself in introspection, to build a conception of the self in me. When we have succeeded in doing this (beyond philosophical hypothesis) we will have gone a long way, perhaps the whole distance, towards a mental conception of immortality.

Intellectuality is not a proposition capable of apodictic proof, as more than the existence of God; both are matters of personal faith, personal relation to the divine; and theological arguments for both only convince us of what we already believe to be true. They fail to convince the sceptic, and figure very little, if at all, in the phenomena of faith.

Since we can have no mental conception of the nature of immortality we can have no intellectual proof, nor is such proof necessary. It is a question lying wholly in the domain of faith—it is well to recognize such a domain; that the universe divided by the intellect leaves a remainder. I know, too, to myself, on immortality seems so fundamental on the axioms. No argument from analogy, from the faith of others, can affect this faith.

The incidental, perhaps really principal, criticism of your correspondent on Dr. Smith's remarks on evolution is too abundant to deserve specific comment at this late day. Four years has been worked hard in former years; but he has been and some time.

To those who are interested in the question of immortality I give the following references: John Fish, Through Vain to God; H. B. Black, Private Confessions; E. B. Schuchman, Henry Drummond, Naturalism in the Spiritual World; William James, Lectures on Religious Experience (lecture on "Mysticism"); Lyman Abbott, "Certitude of Immortality," Outlook, January 31, 1903.

I am, sir,

R. B. G.

TILDEN AND THE TROUT

SAN FRANCISCO, CALIF., August 24, 1904.

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

Sir,—Your anecdote in the WEEKLY for the 6th inst. about the dogfish and his unsuccessful interview with President Roosevelt reminded me of an experience of my own at the White Mountains nearly twenty years ago when passing a week at Crawford's. Among the guests were Mr. Everett and Mr. Tilden. Towards the close of the day these enterprising statesmen strolled out for a walk along the banks of the Ammonoosuc. Before long their road reached a small bridge. "See that big trout?" said Mr. Tilden, as he espied a fat and comfortable fish a few feet from the shore. "I think I'll have him." "How?" he claimed his companion. "Do you expect to catch him without a hook?" "Well and see," was the reply, as Mr. Tilden resumed his coat and first night his arm in the shoulder. Promptly kneeling down he simply seized the fish, though with such unrelenting agility that he lost his balance and went in up to his neck. Nevertheless, with characteristic tenacity he held his prize, and the two anglers between them succeeded in pulling it to the bank. "There!" exclaimed Mr. Tilden as he yielded it to the limbered, "did you ever see a finer trout than that?" "Trout!" was the reply: "it's nothing but a snake." Tabern with a dissolving view! I am, sir,

BENJAMIN PATTON ARNOLD.

THE TRIANTS

BY A. E. W. MASON

SYNOPSIS OF TRIANTS

In the opening chapter Pamela Martine is introduced to the reader as a young woman of London, beautiful and of rare personal charm. Later we learn that Pamela and Alan Warfield, who is in love with her, observe a young couple entering the opposite house. They are Tony and Millie Stretton, who live in a shabby house provided over by the club but suited better of the racing man. They are in reality kept prisoners by the whims of the tyrannical old man, and it is only by playing truant and going out by stealth late at night that they are able to enter on all into the life of the outside world. But finally they both weary of their monotonous life, and Tony determines to go to America to make his fortune. In his absence Millie becomes acquainted with Lionel Cullen, a gentlemanly adventurer. Pamela wishes to help her. She sends Warfield on a mission to find Tony and bring him home. Warfield finds that Tony, having lost all of his small fortune in New York, is now in the South Sea on a trader. Warfield sends every message in general upon him to come home, but he refuses. Tony remains on the trader until the term of his contract is over (two months) having learned of his father's death, and then decides to sail to the French coast, England, as no other means seems open to him. John Mudge, a friend of Pamela's, borrows from her of the small Millie is in from Cullen. He borrows all without a check and places them in the hands of a single firm of old men, who based on a settlement within twenty-four hours. Cullen borrows a proposition from Mudge to superintend an important enterprise of the future in Chile, which his financial difficulties compel him to accept. Warfield, although he has proposed to her unconditionally before, cannot Pamela to marry him, and she allows him to think that in time it will be possible for her to accept him. One thing she tells him would never let her take the step now. The return of Tony Stretton, Warfield, desirous of obtaining information as to Tony's whereabouts, goes to London to tell Tony's friend Mr. Chase, who, he thinks, will be able to tell him. He ends on his arrival that Chase has died suddenly, and on examining the house, finding nothing and address on the envelope of a letter intended for the missing letter. Chase had been found a day in Tony's living place. Pamela returns from Chile and persuades Millie to go south with him. They are seen drifting together late at night in Heaven. But as Mr. Mudge, who tells Pamela that he is very dangerous for Millie. Pamela's cousin Warfield is an old friend of theirs for consultation. The party of the village has, in order to devise a plan to help Millie. Pamela, for the second time, concludes Warfield to go in search of Tony, and he gladly accepts. Pamela goes to Hampshire, which she had visited as a young girl, and while there hears of the presence of Lionel Cullen, Stretton, meanwhile, is sent with a troop of soldiers on an expedition across the desert of Sahara. In his return to Mudge he is given the commission of lieutenant, and then decides to write to Millie. At that moment Warfield arrives with the letter from Pamela. Tony reads the letter, and decides to desert the legion, with which he has enlisted for five years, and return to England. He starts in the guise of a pedler for Morocco. Warfield is to meet him at Ex. Pamela learns that Millie Stretton is expected at a hotel on the Riviera, and sends a telegram to Warfield at Tangier urging him not to fail to return by the ship, the date of Millie's expected arrival. Tony goes safely through the mountains and meets Warfield just in time at Ex, and they make their way together, with some difficulty, to the coast, where they take a steamer at Larcade.

CHAPTER XXIX

PAMELA MEETS A STRANGER

MEANWHILE Pamela waited at the Villa Pomignard, waiting from hour to hour, and from hour to hour, for the day to pass. The day passed one another. She watched the arrival of each train from Martville at the little station below with an expectant heart; and long after it had departed towards Italy she kept within her vision the pathway up the hillside to the villa. But the travellers did not return. Expectation and disappointment walked alternately at her elbow all the day, and each day seemed endless. Yet, when the next day came, it had come all too quickly. Every morning it seemed to her, as she turned her calendar, that the days passed one another, she wondered how they could pass so slowly. The thirty-first of the month dawned at last. At some time on this day Millie Stretton would arrive at Ex. She thought of it, as she rose, with a sinking heart; and then thought again. She dared not confront the possibility that the train might stop at Rapinodora, and come on to Italy and discharge no passengers upon the platform. She dared not recognize her dread that this day might close and the darkness come as faintly as all the rest. It was her last day of hope. Lionel Cullen was waiting. Millie Stretton was arriving. To-morrow, Tony might come, but he would come too late. Pamela lived in suspense. Somehow the morning passed. The afternoon slipped through towards Montrose. Pamela saw the smoke of the engine from her terrace, and knew that again that train had come the passenger from England. Half an hour ago Millie had most likely stepped from her carriage on to the platform at Ex. And still Tony Stretton and Warfield lingered.

Towards dusk she began to despair. In a little while another train was due. She heard its whistle, saw it stop at the station, and waited with her eyes fixed upon the hillside path. No one appeared upon it. She turned and went into the house. She thought for a moment of going herself to Ex, thrusting herself upon Millie at the foot of any snail; and while she debated whether the plan could at all avail, the door was opened, a servant spoke some words about a visitor, and a man entered the room. Pamela started to her feet. The man stood in the twilight of the room; his back was against the light of the window. Pamela could not see his face. But it was not Warfield, so much she knew at once. It could only be Tony Stretton.

"No you have come," she cried. "At last! I had given up hope."

She advanced and held out her hand. And some reserve in Tony's attitude, something of reserve in the manner with which he took her hand, checked and chilled her.

"It is you!" she asked. "I watched the path. The train has gone some while."

"Yes, it is I," he replied. "I had to inquire my way at the village. This is the first time I ever came to Rapinodora."

Still more than the touch of his hand and the reserve of his manner, the cold reserve of his voice chilled her. She turned to the servant abruptly.

"Bring lamps," she said. She felt the need to see Tony Stretton's face. She had looked forward so eagerly to his coming, she had hoped for it, and dispirited of it with so full a heart; and now he was come, and with him there had come, most unexpectedly, disappointment. She had expected ardor, and there was only, as it seemed, indifference and stolidity. She was prepared for a lot of questions to be furnished and upon her in so with a question that no time was given to her for an answer to any one of them, and he stood before her, seemingly cold as stone. Had he ceased to care for Millie, she wondered?

"You have come as quickly as you could?" she asked, trying to read his features in the obscurity.

"I have not had a moment since I received your letter," he answered.

She sought at the words "your letter." Perhaps there by the reason for his reserve. She had written frankly, perhaps so frankly, she feared at this moment. Had the letter suddenly kindled his love for Millie? No, things, as should, could happen had happened. Diffusion might have withered it like a salt stain of lightning.

"My letter," she said. "You must not exaggerate its meaning. You read it carefully?"

"Very carefully."

"And I wrote it carefully," she went on, pleading with him in difference; "very carefully."

"It contains the truth," said Tony. "I did not doubt that."

"Yes, but it contains all the truth," she urged. "You are not to doubt that, either. Remember, you yourself are to know I wrote that, didn't I? I meant it."

"Yes, you wrote that," answered Tony. "I am not doing what you are right. It may well be that I am to blame. As well be that you, too, are not quite free from blame. Had you told me that morning when we rode together in the train, what you had really meant when you said that I ought never to leave my wife?" And at that Pamela interrupted him.

"Would you have stayed if I had explained?" she cried. And Tony for a moment was silent. Then he answered slowly.

"No; for I should not have believed you. And then he said."

(Continued on page 118.)

(Continued from page 136.)

for the first time since he had entered the room. "However, it can do neither of us any good to discuss what we might have done had we known then what we know now."

He stopped at the door opened. The lamps were brought in and set upon the tables. Tony waited until the servant had gone out, and the door was closed again; then he said:

"You sent a telegram. I was here in answer to it. I was to be at Roquebrune on the thirty-first. This is the thirty-first. Am I in time?"

"Yes," said Pamela.

She could see Tony clearly; and of one thing she at once was sure. She had been misled by the twilight of the room. Tony, at all events, was not indifferent. He stood before her, travel-stained and worn. His face was haggard and thin; his eyes were tired, like the eyes of an old man; there were flecks of gray in his hair, and lines about the eyes. These changes she noticed, and took them at their true value. They were signs of the hard life he had lived during these years, and of the quick, arduous journey which he had made. But there was more. If Tony had spoken with a measured voice, it was in order that he might control himself the better. If he had stood without gesture or motion, it was because he felt the need to keep himself in hand. So much Pamela clearly saw. Tony was laboring under a strong emotion.

"Yes, you are in time," she cried; and now her heart was glad. "I was so set on saving both your lives, in keeping you and Millie for each other. Of late, since you did not come, my faith faltered a little. But it should not have faltered. You are here! You are here!"

"My wife is here, too?" asked Tony, oddly; and Pamela's enthusiasm again was checked. "Where is she?"

"She arrives at the south of France to-day. She stops at Eze. She should be there now."

She had hoped to see the blood pulse into his face, and some look of gladness dawn suddenly in his eyes, some smile of forgiveness after the stern set of his lips. But again she was disappointed.

Tony seemed to pat his wife out of his thoughts.

"And since your message was so urgent," he continued, deliberately, "it follows that Calton comes to-day as well;" and he repeated the name in a singularly soft, slow, and almost caressing voice. "Lionel Calton," he said.

And at once Pamela was desperately afraid. It needed just that name uttered in just that way to explain to her completely the emotion which Tony so resolutely controlled. She looked at him again. She had planned to bring back Tony to Millie and his home. The Tony Stretton whom she had known of old, the good-natured, kindly man who loved his wife, whom all now liked and none feared. And, lo! she had brought back a stranger. And the stranger was dangerous. He was dealing with anger, he was anticipating his meeting with Lionel Calton with a selfish which, to Pamela, was dreadful.

"No," she exclaimed, eagerly. "Mr. Calton has been here all this while, and Millie only comes to-day."

"Calton has been waiting for her, then?" he asked, implacably.

"Oh, I don't know," Pamela exclaimed in despair. "I have not spoken to him. How should I know?"

"Yet you have no doubts?"

"Well, then, no," she said. "I have no doubt that he is waiting here for Millie. But she only arrives to-day. They have not met until to-day. That is why I sent the telegram."

Tony nodded his head.

"So that I might be present at the meeting?"

And Pamela could have cried out aloud. She had not thought, she had not dreamed. She had lived all her thoughts on saving Millie. Set upon that, and she had not understood that other and dreadful consequences might ensue. These consequences were vivid enough before her eyes now. All three would meet—Tony, Millie, and Lionel Calton. What would follow? What might not follow? Pamela closed her eyes. Her heart sank; she felt faint at the thought of what might and so blindingly followed.

"Tony!" she exclaimed. She wrung her hands together, pleading with him in short and broken sentences. "Don't think of him! . . . Think of Millie. You can gain her back! . . . I am very sure. . . . I wrote that to you, didn't I? . . . Mr. Calton. . . . It is not worth while. . . . It is of no account. . . . Millie was lonely, that was all. . . . There would be a scandal, at the best. . . ." And Tony laughed harshly.

"Oh, it is not worth while," she cried again, piteously, and yet again. "It is not worth while."

"Yet I am anxious to meet him," said Tony.

Suddenly Pamela looked over his shoulder to the door, and for a moment hope brightened in her face. But Stretton understood the look, and replied to her, "No. Warriiden is not here. I left him behind with our luggage at Monte Carlo."

"Why did he stay?" cried Pamela, as again her hopes fell.

"He could hardly refuse. This is my affair, not his. I claimed to-morrow. He will come to you, no doubt, to-morrow."

"You meant him to stay behind, then?"

"I meant to see you alone," said Tony; and Pamela dared question him no more, though the questions thronged in her mind and tortured her. Was it only because he wished to see her alone that he left Warriiden behind? Was it not also so that he might not be hampered afterwards? Was it only so that another might not know of the trouble between himself and Millie? Or was it not so that another might not be on hand to hinder him from exacting retribution? Pamela was appalled. Tony was angry—yes, that was natural enough. She did not have to half her present distress if he had shown his passion in temperate words, if he had threatened, if he had raved. But there was so much deliberation in his anger, he had it so completely in control; it was an instrument which he meant to use, not a fever which might mislead him for a moment and let him go.

"You are so changed," she cried. "I did not think of that when I wrote you. But, of course, these years and the Foreign Legion could not but change you."

She moved away, and set down holding her head between her hands. Stretton did not answer her words in any way. He moved towards her, and asked:

"Is Calton, too, at Eze?"

"No, no," she cried, raising her head, thankful at last, that here was some small point on which she could attenuate his suspicions.

"You are seeking too much of the trouble."

"Yet you wrote the letter to me. You also sent the telegram. You sent me neither the one nor the other without good reason."

And Pamela dropped her eyes again from his face.

"If Calton is not at Eze," he insisted, "he is close by."

Pamela did not answer. She sat trying to compose her thoughts. Suppose that she refused to answer, Tony would go to Eze. He might find Millie and Calton there. On the other hand, it was unlikely that he would. Pamela had seen that quiet, solitary restaurant by the sea, where Calton lodged. It was there that they would be, she had no doubt.

"Where is Calton?" asked Tony. "Where does he stay?"

Pamela closed her ears to the question, working still at the stern problem of her answer. If she refused to tell him what he asked, Millie and Calton might creep for to-night. That was possible. But, then, to-morrow would come. Tony must not think to-morrow in any case, and to-morrow he might be too late.

"I will tell you," she answered, and she described the place. And in another minute she was alone. She heard the front door close, heard Tony's step upon the gravel of the garden path, and then all was silent. She sat holding her throbbing temples in her hands. Visions rose before her eyes, and her fear made them extraordinarily luminous and vivid. She saw that broad, quiet terrace over the sea where she had lunched, the lonely restaurant, the tables of that suite of rooms open to the street. A broad column of light streamed out from the window in her vision. She could almost hear voices and the sound of laughter. She imagined the laughter all struck dumb, and thereafter a cry of horror stilled the night. The very silence of the villa became a torture to her. She rose and walked restlessly about the room. If she could only have reached Warriiden! But she did not even know in which hotel in all the hotels of Monte Carlo he had gone. Tony might have told her that had she kept her wits about her and put the question with discretion. But she had not. She had thought that Stretton had purposes of his own behind. Tony asked for no restraining hand, when at last he came face to face with Lionel Calton. She sat down, and tried to reason out what would happen. Tony would go first to Eze. Would he find Millie there? Perhaps. Most likely he would not. He would go on then to the villa in the Corniche road. But he would have wasted some time. It might be only a little time; still, however short it was, what was waste of time to Tony might be gain of time to her if only she could find a messenger.

Suddenly she stood up. There was a messenger, under her very hand. She scribbled a note to Lionel Calton, hardly knowing what she wrote. She bade him go the instant when he received it, go at all costs without a moment's delay. Then, taking the note in her hand, she ran from the villa down the road to Roquebrune.

To Be Continued.

All's Well

By Elizabeth Carpenter

WHY harbor fear? The planets one by one
Their peaceful paths pursue through trackless space;
The myriad stars, tho' distant from the sun,
Yield mellow light with undiminished grace.

What tho' swift, sudden storms sweep swiftly by
And fret the face of heaven for an hour?

Above the tempest's rage a boundless sky
Unshadowed bends its blue in tranquil power.

To steadfast souls nor strife nor sin can bring Resultant ill. Where Love and Quiet dwell
The full, harmonious spheres of being swing
Serenely on their way—and all is well.

Our National Expenditures

The expenditures of the United States government are much less in proportion to population than those of many other of the leading nations of the world. This fact is shown by a statement published by the Department of Commerce and Labor through its Bureau of Statistics, showing the population, revenues, expenditures, and indebtedness of the principal countries of the world. It shows that while the expenditure of the United States, with 80 millions of people, is $50 million dollars, that of France, with 39 million people, is $93 million dollars; that of Germany, with 58 million people, $33 million dollars; while in practically every country aside from China and India, with their enormous population, the per capita of government expenditures is greater than in the United States. Even in the case of Russia, with its population of 141 millions, the per capita of government expenditure is about the same as that of the United States. While it is true that a larger proportion of public expenditures is borne by State and local governments in the United States than in many of the more centralized governments of Europe, these figures of the relative national expenditures of the various governments are at least interesting at the present time.

What We Cost the Government

The table puts the population of the United States at $67,372,000, the government expenditure in 1903 at $640,325,000, and the per capita expenditure $7.57. The per capita government expenditure of Canada is given at $9.39; the German Empire, $8.43; Italy, $10.92; Austria-Hungary, $14.27; Belgium, $17.40; France, $17.48; the United Kingdom, $21.39; and Australia, $27.68. Russia's annual expenditure is put, for the latest available year, at $1,116,093,000, as against $644,383,000 in the United States; but the fact that Russia's population is given at 141 million brings the per capita expenditure to about the figure shown by the United States.

The table of the Bureau of Statistics presenting these figures of population and government expenditures includes all countries for which data on this subject can be had, and its figures show for the countries in question a total population of 1,308,000,000, and government expenditures amounting to $7,000,826,000, with government revenue amounting to $7,001,486,000.

The Most Prosperous Country

The table in question also shows in the case of each country the excess of revenue or expenditure in the latest available year, and in this particular the United States also presents a satisfactory showing, the excess of revenue over expenditures being greater than that of any other country, while in many countries the expenditures exceed the revenues. For the latest available year the United States shows an excess of revenue over expenditures amounting to $1 million dollars, while France shows a reverse of revenues amounting to only $26,000; Germany, an excess of expenditures over revenue amounting to $7 million dollars, and the United Kingdom an excess of expenditures over revenue amounting to 100 million dollars.

Up and Down

Our following telephone conversation, severely overheard between a woman whose home is in the suburbs and a business acquaintance of her husband, illustrates some of the curricular of our language.

BUSINESS ACQUAINTANCE: "Good morning, Mrs. —. I'd like to speak to Mr. —."

Mrs. —: "A moment." "I'm sorry, but my husband isn't down yet."

B. A. (fingering): "Isn't down yet?"

Mrs. —: "I mean he isn't up yet. I'm letting him sleep into this morning; he was so down last evening over his office troubles that he was about ready to give up. The boys'll be down as soon as he gets up."

THE Keeley Cure

San Francisco, Cal.
New York, N. Y.
Chicago, Ill.
St. Louis, Mo.
Portland, Ore.
San Francisco, Cal.
New York, N. Y.
Chicago, Ill.
St. Louis, Mo.
Portland, Ore.

San Francisco, Cal.
New York, N. Y.
Chicago, Ill.
St. Louis, Mo.
Portland, Ore.
San Francisco, Cal.
New York, N. Y.
Chicago, Ill.
St. Louis, Mo.
Portland, Ore.

San Francisco, Cal.
New York, N. Y.
Chicago, Ill.
St. Louis, Mo.
Portland, Ore.
San Francisco, Cal.
New York, N. Y.
Chicago, Ill.
St. Louis, Mo.
Portland, Ore.

San Francisco, Cal.
New York, N. Y.
Chicago, Ill.
St. Louis, Mo.
Portland, Ore.
San Francisco, Cal.
New York, N. Y.
Chicago, Ill.
St. Louis, Mo.
Portland, Ore.

San Francisco, Cal.
New York, N. Y.
Chicago, Ill.
St. Louis, Mo.
Portland, Ore.
San Francisco, Cal.
New York, N. Y.
Chicago, Ill.
St. Louis, Mo.
Portland, Ore.

For Liquor and Drug Using

A scientific remedy which has been skillfully and successfully administered by medical specialists for the past 25 years.

ALL CORRESPONDENCE CONFIDENTIAL

A STUDY IN GOVERNMENT AND POLITICS

$50,000

The above sum has been set aside by THE CINCINNATI COMMERCIAL TRIBUNE, to be distributed as awards to the subscribers of THE COMMERCIAL TRIBUNE or THE CINCINNATI WEEKLY GAZETTE who estimate the total vote cast in the State of Ohio for President of the United States at the election to be held November 8, 1904.

Here Is What We Offer

To Our Subscribers Who Engage in This Gigantic Intellectual Contest

To the one making the nearest correct estimate of the exact total of the vote	$15,000
To the Second Nearest	5,000
To the Third Nearest	2,500
To the Fourth Nearest	1,000
To the Fifth Nearest	500
To the Sixth Nearest	300
To the Seventh Nearest	200
To the Eighth Nearest	100
To the Ninth Nearest	50
To the Tenth Nearest	25
To the Next 100 Nearest ($10 Each)	5,000
To the Next 400 Nearest ($2 Each)	2,500

In all 775 Awards, amounting to $30,000

If any subscriber should, before October 1, 1904, estimate the exact total vote, there will be paid an additional amount of

If any subscriber should, after October 1, 1904, and before 8 p.m., November 8, 1904, estimate the exact total vote, there will be paid an additional amount of

A Grand Total of

OUR RATES

For $1 you will receive The Daily and Sunday Commercial Tribune for 12 weeks and be entitled to two (2) estimates. For $1 you will receive The Weekly Tribune for one (1) year and be entitled to five (5) estimates. For $10 you will receive The Daily and Sunday Commercial Tribune for one year and be entitled to ten (10) estimates. For $100 you will receive The Daily and Sunday Commercial Tribune for one year and be entitled to twenty (20) estimates.

SPECIAL NOTICE: For every $100 you will be entitled to one (1) estimate and be entitled to one (1) estimate and be entitled to one (1) estimate. For every $100 you will be entitled to one (1) estimate and be entitled to one (1) estimate. For every $100 you will be entitled to one (1) estimate and be entitled to one (1) estimate.

For subscription lists, data about previous votes, and further information, address the Manager of THE COMMERCIAL TRIBUNE AWARD BUREAU, P. O. BOX 817, CINCINNATI, O.

A Revolution in Farming

By William R. Lighten

Within twenty years agriculture has been changed from a primitive to a thoroughly scientific basis.

No better illustration of this change could be found than is afforded by the manner of handling the corn crop of the present year. Within the memory of men who are still at work in the fields, the time of human labor necessary to the production of one bushel of corn was four and one-half hours; the labor cost being thirty-five cents. In 1902 the time of labor fell to forty minutes, and its cost to ten cents. Every successive step has been modified; the horse-power although has given place to the steam gang plough; the old method of dropping the seed by hand and covering it with a hand hoe has yielded in the machine which checks, plants, and covers in one operation while driven rapidly across the face of the field; cultivation is better performed with one-fourth the labor; the hand corn-knife has been supplanted by the horse or steam power harrower. But the most radical difference appears in the final processes. The old-fashioned "shucking-pig" is no more; and along with it has disappeared the gala "shuckings" with its glimmer of red ears and knives. That labor is now all performed by huge machinery: one may be pardoned for wondering whether the rural night will not soon be doing his very kissing by steam-press, so thoroughly persuaded is he becoming of its greater efficiency. And it is easy to remember the day when corn-shelling consisted in rubbing two ears together by hand, or in scraping the ears across the nests of a skiff laborer could shell one bushel of grain in an hour and a half; that is to say, the shelling of the crop of 1902 would have occupied the entire population of the United States for more than three months. But this is now accomplished by power-machines, some of which have an hourly capacity of 700 bushels.

Equal or even greater advances have been made in the methods of wheat culture. Against the costly hand labor of the last generation, which required the expenditure of three hours of time to the production of a bushel of grain, modern machinery, having widely supplanted hand-work, has reduced the time and per bushel to ten minutes. Most remarkable of all implements is the power-driven harrow in the giant automobile fields, which cuts, threshes, cleans, weighs, and sacks the grain from a hundred acres in a single day. Every other industry of the fields has shared in the benefits of this new machinery: every process is highly specialized; every process is highly specialized; every process is highly specialized. The cost of labor by perfected machinery and modern methods was computed in 1902 on the production of seven bushel ears in a year—wheat, oats, rye, barley, corn, white potatoes, and hay; the aggregate saving being more than $200,000,000, or showing the greatest advance, $325,000,000.

These advances, which are nothing short of revolutions, are only to be appreciated in the full in the future West. There has hardly been the chief industry, and where the production of the great field staples is now centralized. Some time ago the writer once who was a stranger in the West: three hundred miles of almost unbroken harvest field, the landscape dotted with gigantic machines of the highest type, rearing about every other mile, smouldering with black clouds of smoke, making ready the world's loaf. The stranger concluded, half whimsically:

"I can't call farming a pastoral pursuit nowadays in your big West. The romance is all gone out of it; your western farm is nothing but a noisy machine-shop; your farmers are all turned mechanics, your economists, men of affairs. They would their simple old dads say if they could behold this!"

Whatever the loss in pastoral simplicity, in the traditional civility of bucolic manners and attitudes, there is no denying the great gains in scientific and economic and consequent social and political power. No part of the nation now rests upon a farmer foundation than the agricultural prairies.

To the World's Fair St. Louis

The very best facilities for comfortable, pleasant and prompt service have been provided by the Lake Shore's train service, the most extensive and complete of any line. Fast through trains from New York, Boston, Buffalo, etc., in connection with the New York Central and Boston & Albany route and the Big Four line, a choice of routes via Cleveland, Toledo or Chicago. Tickets read in car.

The Lake Shore

& Michigan Southern Railway
afforded service at Niagara Falls, Chautauque, Tonawanda and Chicago and beyond today with the train at latter place.

Tickets sold at points east of Cleveland give option of going by rail or steam, either way between Buffalo and Cleveland with extra charge.

For your trip, to visit or enjoy the great World's Fair, about the World's Fair, consider the Lake Shore's train service, the most extensive and complete of any line. Fast through trains from New York, Boston, Buffalo, etc., in connection with the New York Central and Boston & Albany route and the Big Four line, a choice of routes via Cleveland, Toledo or Chicago. Tickets read in car.

A. J. SMITH, G. F. T. A., Cleveland, O.

MENNE'S BORATED TALCUM

TOILET POWDER

FOR THE FACE AND SKIN

RELIEVES ITCH, CHAFING, and SUNBURN, and all other skin troubles.

Sold at all drug stores. Do not allow others to sell you cheap imitations. See Menne's name on the wrapper. Sample Free.

The life insurance dollar is the most effective one. It protects your family and your own old age better than any other, if invested with the

PENN MUTUAL LIFE
921-3-5 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia.

FOR MEN OF BRAINS
Cortez CIGARS
—MADE AT KEY WEST—

Crop shortages occur, of course; but their hardship falls upon the consumer, not upon the producer. Furthermore, shortages are less common and less disastrous to the volume of the industry. Improved machinery must provide a better cultivation, greatly offsetting the occasional seasonal evils. The modern farmer is more completely the master of his fortune than is the manufacturer or the merchant or the farmer, being less at the mercy of artificial conditions.

Weather Reports by Wireless Telegraphy

In Great Britain, owing to its isolated position, the Weather Office experiences great difficulty in making forecasts owing to the lack of sufficient data of atmospheric conditions, particularly in the Atlantic Ocean. Through the cooperation of a London newspaper—the Daily Telegraph—arrangements have been made whereby messages will be sent by wireless telegraph from steamers which will give full information of the weather conditions in the Atlantic, and enable the forecasters to test their predictions on various conditions of barometer, temperature, wind, and weather conditions. While the present system provides for messages at points about one hundred miles distant from the coast, it is to be extended as rapidly as possible. In the meantime, reports are received simultaneously from several vessels in different positions, the approach of storms can be traced with considerable accuracy. In addition, each vessel is supposed to test in its statements of general weather conditions encountered. It is thought possible that with the additional information to be furnished by wireless telegraph that not much greater accuracy would follow, but that the time limit could be extended from twenty-four to forty-eight hours.

Color Taste of Mosquitoes

In connection with the investigation of the transmission of disease by mosquitoes, some experiments have been made recently tending to show that these insects have a certain taste for light. This was demonstrated by placing boxes lined with various colored cloths on the floor of an apartment infested by mosquitoes and noting that while many of the insects went into the boxes lined with blue few went into those with lighter colors. Accordingly from the results of observations it was possible to arrange a scale in the following order: blue, dark brown, scarlet, black, slate, gray, olive, green, light green, pearl, pale green, light blue, white. Furthermore, it is asserted that an investigator entering a tent with white clothes is far less likely to attract the mosquitoes than one with gray flannel. These experiments, while most interesting and altogether convincing, and the question has been advanced, why do the mosquitoes attack the white flesh of the face and arms. Possibly in this case the other element besides color must be considered, and it seems to be no reason why people living in districts infested by mosquitoes should not make colored tents on their own account in selecting the colors of their clothing according to the above scale, and also make use of it in painting their houses and particularly their verandas.

Tabacco and Hearing

A Paper read at the recent Congress of Otolary held at Bordeaux, France, by M. Delie dealt with the effect of tobacco on the auditory nerve, and in it was described the injurious effect on the patient's hearing. There is a direct action of the tobacco on the auditory nerve, and the stimulating effect of the nicotine on other nerves is likely to add further complications, so that tobacco should always be used in moderation and especially where trouble with hearing is being experienced, and patients should be warned at an early date. In fact, there are certain conditions of the tissue when all smoking should be forbidden, and especially where the patient is comparatively young.

A Ladder of Swords

BY

GILBERT PARKER

Author of "The Right of Way"

*Illustrated
by the Kinneys*

*Post 8vo
Cloth
$1.50*

"SHE SCANNED THE SEA"

